A coolie is a Chinese slave, bound for a longer or shorter time, and in February, 1862, Congress very properly forbade the importation of coolies from China. This was done because the coolie trade was already large and increasing; and one firm in California is understood to have imported more than 30,000 during the last eight years. This fact alone would go far to prove their value as laborers, which is, however, otherwise fully attested, the most interesting article upon the subject being one by Mr. PUMPELLY in the Galaxy for July. The Chinese laborer, it appears by conclusive testimony, is industrious, docile, faithful, efficient, and works for small wages, as is to be expected of those who can live at home upon two dollars a year. In the Flowery Kingdom there are 200,000,000 inhabitants, which it is supposed might be conquered by an army of 50,000 trained European soldiers skillfully led, there is, of course, an exhaustless supply of such laborers; and, as Mr. ADAMS well says, when we break down the Chinese wall to let ourselves in we let them out.

A person named ROOFMANSCHAAP, a Hollander by birth and a manufacturer, was recently the lion of a day in New York, having previously been the hero of the Memphis Convention which assembled to devise means of supplying the Southern States with labor. The sentiment of the Convention seems to have been expressed by Mr. J. W. CLAFF, who remarked that "the South" did not wish European laborers, as they wanted to own land, while, in his opinion, "the South" preferred labor that could be managed "as of old." He added, he thought that "what the South" wanted an ignorant, brutish, servile population of laborers, instead of intelligent, industrious, self-respecting workmen. Mr. ROOFMANSCHAAP was evidently the right man to gratify such a desire. In reply to the question of a reporter in New York, the coole contractor said that in the Southern States "anything but coerced labor will bring about prosperity." Mr. ROOFMANSCHAAP had apparently overlooked the law of which we spoke, and which forbids any citizen or foreign resident in this country to prepare any kind of vessel for the purpose of bringing coolies "to be disposed of, or sold, or transferred, for a period of years or for any time whatever, as servants or apprentices, or to be held to service or labor." Of course the law does not forbid free and voluntary emigration.

The inducements for honest emigration to this country are so palpable and persuasive, the flood is always sure to be large, and the difficulties incident to a rapid increase of the resident foreign population in the present circumstances of the country are so evident, that nothing is more instructive than the perversion of this illicit emigration. America has an endless welcome for the industrious laborer who comes hither to secure larger opportunities for himself and his children, but no country welcomes an inundation of foreign barbarism. Nothing, indeed, can be more absurd or more characteristic than the resolutions of the Memphis Convention in California virtually denouncing the Chinese laborers who have been brought here; for the Chinese are innocent, and the case merely simulate a local hostility already enough inflamed. Besides, the Chinese movement has begun, and will not be stayed. The wise course is to restrict it within its natural limits by rigidly preventing the opening of a new slave-trade under the name of encouraging emigration.

Meanwhile any artificial and immense increase of population in the Southern States which, as Mr. ROOFMANSCHAAP remarks, must supplant the colored laborers, with the probable annexation of Cuba and a million and a half of Spanish creoles and slaves, opens a prospect which need dismay no one, but which is not necessarily delightful. It is not the number of the population but its quality that makes a great nation; nor do abundant labor and cheap wages announce an imminent millennium. The mere fact of assimilation of a nation like ours is indeed immense; and all that can be asked is that it be reasonably treated.

FALL TRADE.

IMPORTERS and jobbers are now removing from the busy spring-trade goods, and those for the fall are taking their place. The total imports for the month of July of dry-goods amount to nearly eight millions of dollars as against about seven millions for July of last year. The last month's importation about three-eighths were entered for warehousing and the balance for consumption. This importation of dry-goods for the first seven months of the year amount to about fifty-seven and a half millions as against nearly forty-five millions for 1868. These values are estimated in gold, exclusive of freight and duty, which probably amount to about sixty-five per cent. It will be seen, therefore, that a deficiency of entered dry-goods—the proportion of which is sent here on foreign account —can not be expected.

No deficiency is looked for in the quantity of domestic fabrics, which, with the exception, perhaps, of cotton fabrics, which are held firmly on account of the low stocks of raw cotton both here and abroad. The stock of cloths is increasing again, although some of the manufacturers continue on short time; but as the new crop will begin to come forward in October, it is supposed that work will be generally resumed in the fall. Cotton came forward last year late in September, but crops generally are not as early as they were then.

The cable telegram of July 30 states that the "Cotton Supply Association have adopted a resolution looking to the speedy development of railways in India in order to facilitate the exportation of cotton from that country. This course was taken in consequence of the insufficiency of the supply from the United States. The stock of American cotton is not large enough to keep the mills of Lancashire fully engaged.

As the Cotton Supply Association is voluntary and unofficial, the adoption of a resolution for the development of railways would amount to no more than a recommendation on the subject. It is the India Board which must act upon the question before any thing effectual can be done. We have from time to time given accounts of the proceedings of the Cotton Supply and other private associations, and although they possess great interest, and perhaps may be relied upon to show a present deficiency in the quantity of raw cotton necessary for the manufacturing establishments of the world, their action does not deserve to be telegraphed over the United States, and may be attributed to cotton speculations.

Whether or not the price for our cotton fabrics will be maintained depends upon the time at which the fall trade will be active. If activity shall not commence before the end of October, the market is almost certain to be, as the dealers express it, "soft;" but there are indications of an earlier and a considerable demand. The crops over the United States are tolerably good, and there is no apprehension of any important change in the money market. Money, however, is not abundant among the farmers, and they seem disposed to exercise a corresponding economy.

The reason for this closeness in money is very apparent. The Southern people have taken away a large amount of legal tenders—the profits of their cotton crop for 1868–69; and as this crop has not yet come forward for delivery on their wealth, the money will be retained to answer the numerous purposes of their improved position. There will be no purchasing in the market for the numerous articles required on their plantations; and their strength will contribute to that of the whole country, and will be lasted with the fall trade.

The progress of the English in aiding the cultivation of cotton in India, by providing railroads for its export, can not be effected in one year; nor, as they therefore be assumed that the Southern planters will enjoy remunerating prices for raw cotton.

We have endeavored to show that the true policy of the English is to abandon their attempts to aid to the quantity in India, and to rely more, if not mainly, upon this country, on the ground that it can reached with the most perfectly adapted to the purpose, while that of the Southern States is exactly what the cultivation requires; and it would be a calamity for the South, but for the anxiety produced by opposition, to grow enough of the raw material to supply the mills of the world, and, when cultivated to this extent, competition would insure reasonable prices.

The efforts of the English in this country—as India, Central America, and many points are on a supposed insufficient supply, justify the South in proceeding with this culture to an increased extent, as it is not probable that the mine will soon be reached where the quantity will be much above the wants of the world. Not only with respect to cotton, but also as to grain, the English expect that the surplus will need them in the Liverpool and London markets, and they feel so outraged at having to seek and pay liberally this year for cotton that they are making unusual, but futile, efforts to produce enough in India to enable them to command the whole market.

The reduction of the rate of interest to 3 per cent. by the Bank of England is an indication that business has not resumed sufficient activity to employ the bulk of the capital at home, and inasmuch as the foreign trade is not promising, and manufacturing industry, particularly in cotton goods, is not profitable, the resumption of business on a specie basis was inconvenient amount of gold from this country may not happen in time to interfere with the fall trade. A considerable amount of our bonds will mature during the last days of July, and the exchange was sold by cable transfers.

The movements of Mr. BOOTWELL have given improved standing to our securities in foreign markets, and they have reached the highest quotations known since the war. But the large imports made by us show that the proceeds are applied to what we consume; and the result will be, that, instead of imparting strength, we shall presently be obliged to draw more specie than we have drawn for several. It is exceedingly difficult, so long as we have a much larger amount of paper-money in proportion to the value of the circulation than any commercial nation permits, or than we had before the war, to have any substantial advantage from the sale of our securities in foreign markets—such is the extravagance which attends excessive issues of paper. But yet a contemporary urges in a mercantile journal that gold and silver shall hereafter be treated as mere articles of commerce; and that paper-money, not redeemable in the precious metals, but convertible into bonds and the bonds into them, shall constitute the sole money of the United States. No greater delusion than that paper-money not instantly redeemable in coin can be permanently relied upon was ever indulged in, but yet the policy has had its advocates ever since the time of LAW and his grand speculations, which involved thousands in ruin. There is now no probability of the adoption of this monstrous scheme, the trade of the country will not be affected by the proposition.

It would appear, therefore, that we enter upon the fall trade without any serious embarrassment from domestic or immediate, foreign or domestic, and with the advantage which results from the promise of reasonable crops in all parts of the Union.

NOTES.

THE French cable has been landed at Duxbury, with a modest salvo of speeches, and the President and the Emperor have exchanged congratulations. The correspondence of his Majesty, whose other enterprises upon this continent, such as the dissolution of the Union and the Mexican empire, have woefully miscarried, was very formal. The response of the President was cordial and becoming, containing a courteous allusion to the liberal policy of the United States in permitting the landing. That liberal policy is reciprocity; and we trust that, if the Emperor does not modify the monopoly which he or his legislature has granted to the managers of the cable, this enterprise also will miscarry. It is very desirable to save intercourse with Europe, but it is still more desirable not to have it upon disastrous terms.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE has presented the petition of 25,000 women to Parliament asking for the franchise. This, however, is not the whole number of English women, and we presume therefore that it will have no weight with those who are willing to do something whenever "the women themselves" wish it and ask for it. If in the ancient days MR. SUMNER had presented the petition of 25,000 slaves asking for their personal freedom they would not have granted in prayer, but the fact would have been very impressing and significant; and if next December MR. JOHN STUART MILL present the petition of 25,000 citizens asking for a reform in the Civil Service it would not be long before the country demanded it, but it would be a very decided symptom. Let us hope that those who are waiting for the women will see in the petition of 25,000 women at least the parting of the lips preparatory to the question.

GREAT railway companies will of course continue to roust passengers at their pleasure, but does a citizen lose all rights whatever merely because he pays a railroad for his transportation by rail? Are we not only to be mangled and fractured and roasted, but must our families also be deprived of the society of one of our number? A correspondent of the Times asserts that two dispatches addressed to MRS. HALLECK, the widow of one of the victims at the late Mast How massacre upon the Erie Road, were not even forwarded. The train was delayed for one hour before of similar incidents upon the same road, and adds that it is always difficult to get a telegraphic message delivered at any point where an accident has occurred. This is both outrageous and amusing. It is an outrage that a company should thus treat an accident, but it is even more amusing that the public should submit to it. We shall be surprised and consider it quite unbecoming the dominance of the direction of the Erie Road, which Governor HOFFMAN has, with characteristic "Democracy," continued in office for a term of years, if they were not elected, if they do not vindicate their independence of common humanity still further. Let them arrange to roast two passengers a week upon the celebrated Delaware Division—the via media of the road—and then require the survivors at the end of the journey, amid pain of a similar fate, to sign a certificate expressing their admiration of the scrupulous care, intelligence, and honesty with which the road is managed. There is no reason whatever to suppose that it would not be done. A public which patiently submits to the burning of travelers will hardly object to excoriating their executioners.

WE read with great edification the discussion in the Convention of Christian Young Men at Portland upon the question of the Christianity of United States. It appeared that, after settling that point, the Convention appointed among the chief officers of the Association MR. JAMES W. BACON, of NEW YORK. It was the next day, we believe, that the sad and surprising announcement of the resignation was published, and then came the astonishing statement that he had lose the $63,000 in stock speculations, but had appropriated nothing to his private use, and that he was "at his home in Connecticut, and, it is said, is deeply mortified at the position in which he has placed himself." This is too delicious for comedy; but we presume the facts have already suggested to the intelligent members of the Christian Convention that it is hardly worth while to pronounce upon the religious character of strangers when they may be so profoundly mistaken in the characters of their own brethren. But we will not accuse them of trusting the old plea that the crimes of the Pope were the offenses of the head not of the Holy Father. They will not have forgotten the trenchant reply.

THE Board of Education in this city have received and are considering a very important report from MR. MAGNUS GROSS upon the ventilation of the public schools. MR. GROSS is a gentleman who is able to express positive convictions in the most unmistakable language, as those know who, in the Constitutional Convention, heard his plea for equal suffrage, and his denunciation of the Metropolitan police when executing the Excise Law. MR. GROSS recently defended classical studies in the College of the City of New York in a speech remarkable in terms of MR. NATHANIEL SANDS; and whatever he undertakes he executes with energy, ability, and intelligence. MR. GROSS protests against the suffocation of the children in the public schools, and all honest citizens will sustain him. Most of our halls are pest-houses in this respect, and it is shameful that we should compel children to sit for hours in a poisonous atmosphere. The case needs no argument, and the Board of Education could no more satisfactorily prove its efficiency than by radically reforming this evil. If, however, it should not be reformed, we hope that MR. GROSS will report to the public.

How the heart warms to a hero! And although, as MR. WHITE tells us in his "Age of Burlesque," it is the fashion not to express emotion, we defy any one not to exclaim with admiration when he sees, not in famous verse but in the blurred type of a newspaper, the description of an incident that recently occurred near Malone, in New York, upon the Ogdensburg Railroad. The train was coming on at full speed when the engineer saw a child of two years upon the track. He sounded the whistle for the brakes, and his mother ran screaming to save her child; but the fireman, W. LAVANWAY, seeing that she would be too late jumped from the locomotive, and leaping and running snatched the little one from the track just as the locomotive was about to crush him.

IN MR. WHITE'S article, of which we just spoke, he calls the London Saturday Review "the greatest literary power among English-speaking men." His assertion upon such a subject is certainly very weighty; but we doubt if it would be generally accepted as true by the best judges in this country. Whether he means that its criticisms are more feared, in the manner of the old Blackwood, or more influential, we should think his verdict might be successfully disputed. There is, indeed, a certain ponderous gruffness in the tone of the Saturday Review as well as great knowledge and evident culture in many of its articles; but we are very sure that no literary eminence of character would much more dread the censure and enjoy the praise of the Fortnightly Review, for instance, which speaks to a smaller audience, but expresses the thought that really moulds the England of to-day.

THE Pennsylvania Registry law has been sustained by the court of last resort, to the great satisfaction of all who honestly desire to see something to secure the purity of the ballot-box. Judge STROUD was opposed to the law upon the ground that it destroyed the freedom and equality of elections, which the State Constitution guarantees. Judge AGNEW contemptuously disposed of this shallow subterfuge by asking to whom are the elections free? "They are free only to the qualified electors of the Commonwealth, clearly they are not free to the unqualified……It is the duty of the Legislature to secure freedom and equality to such regulations as will exclude the unqualified and allow the qualified only to vote." Judge AGNEW then adds, in words that have pungent meaning in Pennsylvania and New York, and for which every good citizen in the land will thank him:

"It is true there is a kind of liberty this Registry law will destroy. It is that licentiousness, that sedulous freedom which surrenders the polls to hirelings and vagabonds, to persons from the lowest purlieus of dusty, men without citizenship or a stake in the commonwealth, men who will commit perjury, violence, or murder itself."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A TERRIBLE accident occurred on the Memphis and Louisville Railroad at a point eight miles from Chattanooga, Tennessee, July 28. In crossing the ridge or trestle over Rodd's Creek, the greater part of the sleeping-car, the last of the train, was precipitated into the bed of the creek from an altitude of about thirty feet. Four persons were killed outright, and from forty to fifty were more or less seriously injured. The train consisted of a locomotive, express car, mail and baggage car, two passenger coaches, and one sleeping-car, all of which were more or less shattered by the splinters, and afterward, with the exception of the sleeping-car, were destroyed by fire. The loss of property amounted to $200,000.

MR. ISAAC TOWNLEY died at Hartford on the morning of July 30.

On July 26 a severe earthquake shock was experienced at Memphis, Tennessee, accompanied by a subterranean noise.

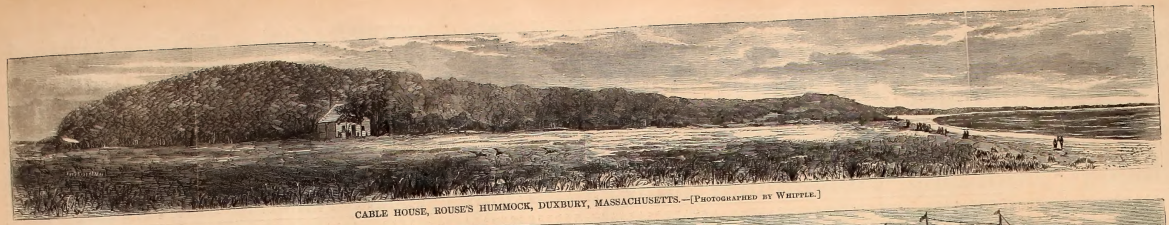
The farms along the entire breadth of the valley of the Colorado of Texas are fully equipped. Cotton in Texas, have been entirely swept away by the recent floods. The estimated damage on the Colorado alone is $8,000,000.

FOREIGN NEWS.

WE learn from Liverpool that the Cotton Supply Association has adopted a resolution looking to the speedy development of railways in India, in order to facilitate the exportation of cotton from that country. This course was taken in consequence of the insufficiency of the supply from the United States. The stock of American cotton is not large enough to keep the mills of Lancashire fully engaged.

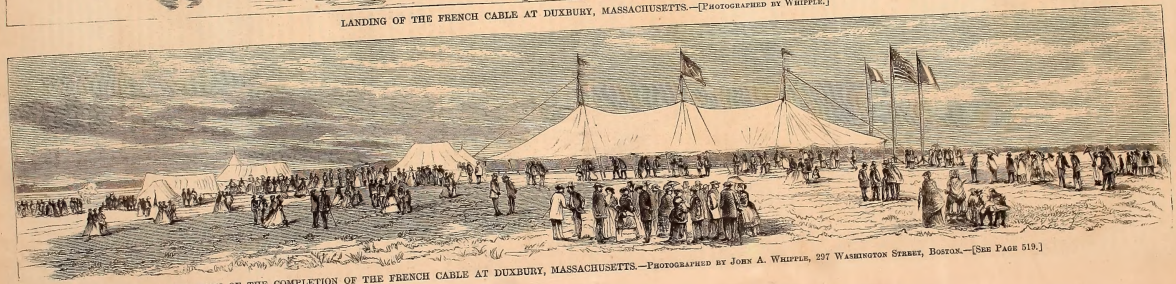
A French paper, the Patrie, states that the political reforms soon to be proposed to the Senate will be more liberal than the Emperor's message to the Corps Legislatif foreshadowed. Among these changes, it is said, is that the sittings of the Senate will be made public.

The dividends for the coming Spanish Government in 1870 during the month of August have been fixed at $2,500,000.

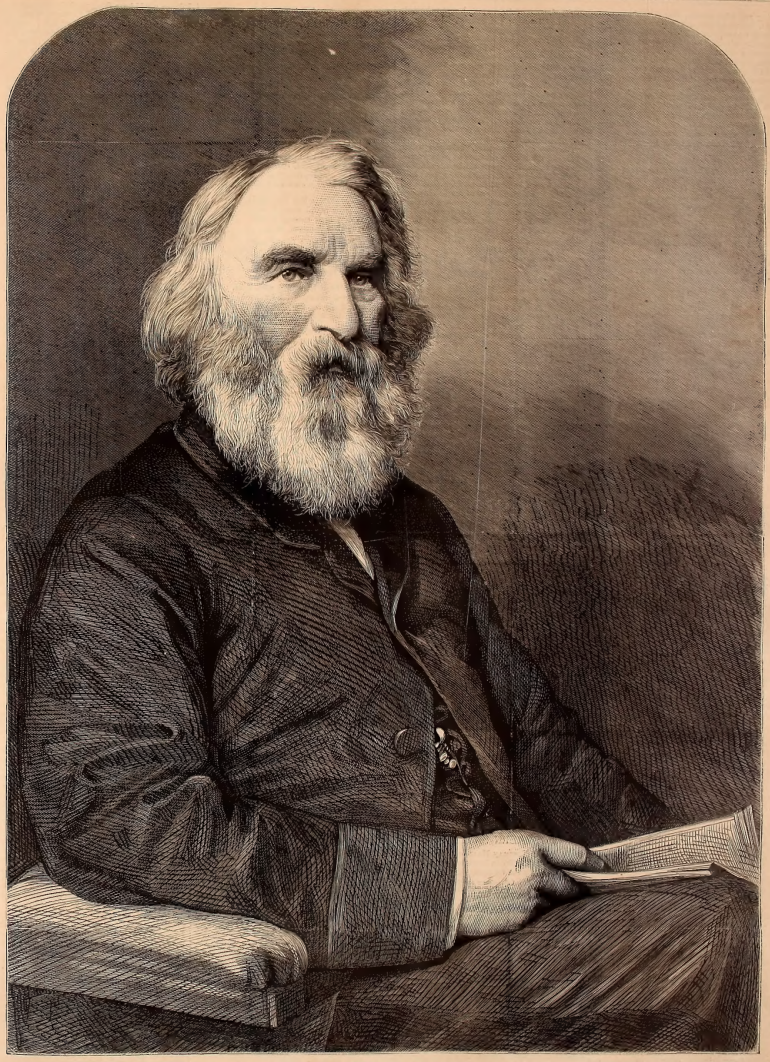


CABLE HOUSE, ROUSE'S HUMMOCK, DUXBURY, MASSACHUSETTS.—[Photographed by Whipple.]

LANDING OF THE FRENCH CABLE AT DUXBURY, MASSACHUSETTS.—[Photographed by Whipple.]



CELEBRATION OF THE COMPLETION OF THE FRENCH CABLE AT DUXBURY, MASSACHUSETTS.—Photographed by John A. Whipple, 297 Washington Street, Boston.—[See Page 519.]



HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

Now that LONGFELLOW—the most popular of American poets—is in England, the question is naturally asked, What do Englishmen think of him? In reply it may be said that LONGFELLOW is, in England, more popular than TENNYSON. It is also true that TENNYSON is more popular in this country than LONGFELLOW. This seems strange at the first glance; but the reason is obvious. LONGFELLOW's poems are cheaper in England than here; and TENNYSON's may be bought here at a nominal price as compared with their cost to the English reader. Is there not here a strong argument against an international copyright, which would exclude both TENNYSON and LONGFELLOW from the poorest classes?

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW was born at Portland, Maine, February 27, 1807. He is now, therefore, nearly sixty-three years old. His father, the Hon. STEPHEN LONGFELLOW, was an eminent lawyer. He entered Bowdoin College at the early age of fourteen, and during his course he gave evidence of those abilities which have given him such high distinction both as a scholar and a poet. Among his productions at this period may be mentioned his "Hymn of the Moravian Nuns," "The Spirit of Poetry," "The Woods in Winter," and "Sunrise on the Hills." After his graduation he seems to have had some vague idea of adopting the legal profession. But a more congenial occupation offered. He was appointed Professor of Modern Languages and Literature at Bowdoin College, with the privilege of residing some years abroad. In 1826 he sailed for Europe, and during that and the two following years he made a tour through France, Spain, Italy, and Germany. He returned home in 1830, and entered upon the duties of his Professorship, which he held for five years, when he accepted a similar position in Harvard College, succeeding Mr. GEORGE TICKNOR. He, in 1835 and 1836, made another European tour through Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Germany, and Switzerland. In 1854 he resigned his position, and has since resided at Cambridge.

In 1835 he published his "Outre-mer," followed by "Hyperion," in 1839. His "Voices of the Night," published in 1839, first gave him an extended reputation as a poet. These were followed by "Ballads, and Other Poems" (1841); "Poems on Slavery" (1842); "The Spanish Student" (1843); "Poets and Poetry of Europe" (1845); "The Belfry of Bruges, and Other Poems" (1846); "Evangeline" (1847); "Kavanagh," a novel (1849); "Seaside and Fireside" (1850); "The Golden Legend" (1851); "The Song of Hiawatha" (1855); "The Courtship of Miles Standish" (1858); "The Wayside Inn" (1863); and "The New England Tragedies" (1868). Besides these, a number of poems from his pen were scattered over numerous periodicals.

The tendency of LONGFELLOW'S poetry, like that of GOETHE, is for the most part objective, dealing with things of real existence, which as may be conceived to exist outside of the poet's mind; it is therefore healthy and objective. In all know "The Village Blacksmith;" and the man who hears it well sung may feel himself a stronger and happier man than before. This is what the genuine poet can do for mankind—to create, and to impress forever upon that memory of the race which is called imagination, some true type of our common humanity, 'in the recognition of which we forget and forgive each other—grief, as we feel "the whole world is kin." Who can not sympathize with the blacksmith? We see him bravely standing at his forge, "with his, work, from morn till night;" and with his heavy hammer, beating on the anvil, in a storm of sound and flame and flying sparks, to shape the iron of his life:

"His brow is wet with honest sweat,
He earns whate'er he can;
And he looks the whole world in the face,
For he owes not any man."

We see him again on the Sunday morning, in the gallery at church, with his boys; "he hears the parson pray and preach," but he also hears his little daughter in the choir, "singing with her mother's voice:" and the blacksmith's hard, rough hand wipes a tear of sweet sorrow from his honest eyes:

"Toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing,
Onward through life he goes;
Each morning sees some task begun,
Each evening sees it closes
Something attempted, something done,
Has earned the night's repose."

In his discursive prose essays and romances "Hyperion" and "Outre-mer," we may observe his voluptuous scholarship of the Middle Ages, his human language and their figures. The Rhine land and the old cities of Germany; the old provinces of France, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Spain, and Italy; Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, including Iceland, are made the alternate homes of his traveling Muse. She sometimes comes faithfully back to Massachusetts, and there sits down to relate some characteristic tale of the Pilgrim Fathers, the Puritans of the old colonial time, or the sturdy patriots of the American Revolution. The educated New Englander is thus a cosmopolitan, or complete humanist, in his range of intellectual sympathies. Mr. LONGFELLOW is, indeed, as one might say, an omnivorous translator of foreign poetry and literature of foreign themes. These versatile performances do not much concern our estimate of his merits as an original poet. His versions from the French, German, and Italian are usually both more accurate and more graceful than any versions of the same kind by a mother hand.

In that unique mythological epic of the North American Indian, the Stone age, the transcendental Iliad "Hiawatha," with its masterly appropriation of a large store of ethnological learning, he has produced a charming poem and an enduring monument of human life. The first reading is seldom quite satisfactory. One is teased by the multitude of names; outlandish names, the frequent repetition of phrases and epithets, as in Homer; and the peculiar versification, an unrhymed accentual Saxon chant, which seems at its idling strain, the rude metrical compositions of the old Anglo-Saxon form of our language. But we can not resume, again, a poem that we explained by their immediate context; while the air of more than rustic, more than boyish simplicity, given by the artless metrical art of many unessential details, is found at last not more wearisome than in the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey" of the immortal Greek. The poet who speaks to us here is not the highly educated Professor of Harvard University, but the untutored Indian singer NAWADAHA, dwelling in the Vale of Tawasentha, and warbling "his native wood-notes wild" as fitted to those he heard from the birds of the forest primeval, or in the moorlands and the fenlands, and on the shores of the Great Lakes:

"Wheresoever these legends and traditions
With the odors of the forest,
With the dew and damp of meadows,
With the curling smoke of wigwams,
With the rushing of great rivers,
With their wild reverberations,
As of thunder in the mountains!"

In order to enjoy this noble poem we must exert the active faculty of imagination. We must try to feel in ourselves what the poor savage Ojibbeways and Dacotahs must have felt before them to have really been favored by divine appointment with an inspired chief of their race; a demi-god, a son of the west wind, sent to be their leader and teacher; one accredited by miraculous signs and gifts of power, and enlightened by a special revelation of heavenly wisdom. Such is Hiawatha; the bravest, kindest, strongest, and cleverest of men; the best of friends, the best of lovers and husbands, the darling of Nature; the comrade of all living creatures, talking with every beast and bird; the valiant champion, the mighty hunter, the inventive craftsman; the author of laws and learning, of arts and manners; not still a natural, heir to all human sorrows; and doomed to vanish mysteriously from among his people when he had welcomed the advent of the first Christian religious mission.

The story of "Evangeline," belonging to the history of the French colonists in Nova Scotia, has a gentle pathetic interest, which tends, with the refined purity of sentiment, the grace of innocent manhood, and beautiful, guileless rural life, the tender affections of the heroine, and the descriptions of American scenery, to make its perusal very agreeable. But it seems ever haunted, like that of "Hiawatha," by an air of mortal sadness, which breathes the spirit of humility and resignation, and the spirit of despair. Listen to the mournful refrain:

"While from its rocky caverns the deep-voiced neighboring ocean Speaks, and in accents disconsolate answers the wail of the forest."

The remembrance of this plaintive note besets us all the way, as we follow the human hearts of the lovers, in their failing pursuit of each other, from north to south, and from east to west, and back again, from the far West, to the tomb of Evangeline. Indeed, till they find rest in the little Catholic church-yard behind the crowded street. As in a grand dramatic poem, the identified scenery of North America, the descriptive passages of this beautiful poem unfold in succession before our eyes the luxurious prairies, with their "billowy bays of grass ever rolling in shadow and sunshine," bedecked with an infinite variety of brilliant flowers; the haunt of buffalo herds, of the elk, the wolf, the wild horse, and the vulture; or the deep ravines and gorges of the Rocky Mountains, with their jagged rocks upon above perpetual snows. Mr. LONGFELLOW has certainly done his best to sing the picturesque features of his mighty native land.

Another good example of his poetical patriotism is "The Courtship of Miles Standish." This story is founded on fact, belonging to the early years of the Puritan settlement at Plymouth, in Massachusetts Bay. The character of the brave, honest, headstrong, angry, and sometimes ridiculous Englishman, a soldier of freedom with the experience of a soldier of fortune, will be new to have been drawn by Sir WALTER SCOTT. That of the true English modern Priscilla, with her delightful frankness and activity, her womanly indignation at the clumsy manner of his wooing, and her undisguised liking for John Alden, is worthy of companionship with Rebecca and Alice Page. Any artist who wants a pretty subject for a charming little picture of figures in a wood or meadow may be advised to try his hand at one of John Alden leading the white bull, with his bride seated on a crimson cushion and saddle-cloth, aboard on a pleasant day, through the foliage of an American autumn, colored with the golden hues of that climate's season.

In these fundamental poems LONGFELLOW is characteristically American, both in the subjects selected and in the treatment of them. His countrymen may well be proud of him.

SOUTHERN SENTIMENT.

THE REV. NEWMAN HALL well illustrates the sentiment of the Wade Hampton class of Southern citizens by the following anecdote:

In illustration of Southern sentiment, I will relate an incident which occurred in a railway car near Richmond. The Governor of Virginia, Mr. WALKER, was hospitably entertained at the his official residence, and was conducted by him to the car. A gentleman, near Petersburg, where at length Grant broke through the Confederate lines, at the distance of fifty miles from Confederate capital. The Governor introduced me to a Southern gentleman and clergyman of the old régime, and who at once addressed me in a very excited manner and with loud tones of voice, denouncing the intention of upward of thirty people who were in the car, and became so violent that I felt constrained into the subject of the war; denouncing the Yankees, and fully to justify the course of Jefferson Davis, the doings of the Freedmen's Aid Society; saying that the Southern people would never allow their former servants, that they would not be interfered with, and that I had a short time to get out of the country. He added, "I was a rebel—I've no apology to make—I'm not ashamed of it, and I'll tell you why." I suppose the remark that at least he must submit that the conquered ruled over the conquerors. He continued, was allowed to talk so strongly against the Government in the presence of the Governor, quietly, and before the Governor himself. At this the pleaster became furious, and standing on the platform behind, clenching his fist and shaking it at the Governor, who sat quietly looking out of window, he said in excellent voice, "Governor! who's the Governor? I'm as good as any Governor—I'm a Southern gentleman!" He then went on to denounce England, and said he hoped to see the day when the Republican movement would cross the Atlantic, headed by Yankee gunboats, and carrying devastation all round our coasts. Such a crusade would make the North and the South one again. I said, "This cannot be. The North are angry with us because we sympathized with you; but you seem to give us no credit for it. You seem to be our supposed good-will." "Yes," said he, "and it's the fate of all Southern men. We have our sympathies, and break the blockade? But, like all who try to sit between two stools, you tumbled down, and are hated by both of us."

AT SEA.

We sail from the island (he,
My love, slept all too sound
To come with us to sea
From the gardened burial-ground),

We travel the various earth,
We tarry a little while
And go—in his death and birth
He is claimed for her own by the isle.

On its hills he opened his eyes,
And their shapes seemed strange and bright,
Sinking beneath the rise
Of the sudden and ruthless night.

His eyes looked up to these grown
Grave faces of ours, the flower
Of life that was overblown
Before it was full as a shower.

Our lives held his like the weeds
Hold birds in the summer days,
Stirred with their singing moods,
Traversed a thousand ways.

But the rain is dried in the rose,
And the song bird ceased in the trees,
And the petals cleave and close,
And the forest is ill at ease.

When the noon is flooded with light,
One cloud, one shadow, can a hand,
Hides half the heaven from sight,
And makes a shadowy land.

To our knees in the world's fair walk
Bloom flowers, but we pass by them
To gather the broken stalk,
The snapped and the headless stem.

We look down into the deep
Of days as for something lost,
We start from the restless sleep
Of night by the same dream crossed.

The grasses over his head
In a small wave rise and meet,
As water under the keel
Life gave to his little feet.

He sleeps, we wake for a time;
But our sleep shall be as long
Some raining of pleasant rhyme,
Some singing of boisterous song.

Ah, well! we sail to the east,
The day goes down on our track,
When your love-soft eyes have ceased
From longing and looking back;

Turn round, I am here, be brave!
Some moment of happier fates,
Look over the uncut wave!
Look on to the white-chilled straits!

Take heart! keep courage! the skies,
The new ever are the same,
Stoop down their delicate dyes,
But the sea is blue as they.

And whether by sea or shore
Two glad gazers things have we,
One sweet thought, and one more,
Thy love and mine for thee.

MY LOUISE.

BY JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

BUT yes! I have suffered much, mol, and have eaten the bitter bread of exile, as Dante says it; but exile is not bitter any more, and I am very happy. I have lived nearly twenty long years in New York, and for ten years of that time I was more poor, look you, than one of Mürger's Bohémiens. And, foux, it is not so pleasant to be poor in New York as it is in the Quartier Latin. I did much complain myself at one time because one can not have the wine ordinaire in New York as one has it in Paris, and I was more than would cost for a pleasant dinner near the Pantheon, Church of St. Geneviève now, but I or even the Café Royal. I could love the ale of Philidelphia, ffor the lager-beer not more; and I dare not drink the Bourbon—that amounts to fire in the body. But I have found the name of Bourbon was to be trusted. We are, in my country, of the Bourbons, that they never can any thing but good. I forget any thing. The Bourbon of New York makes people forget every thing and learn great many things one had better not know. Ah, but the cuisine is not always for the poor; and the beverages are—ah, well—detestable. Even a glass of the vin bleu of the Quartier could have been a pleasant treat for me here in New York, not so long time ago. But now things are all different, and I am very, very good Bonapartist when I will; and my daughter is very happy, and her husband loves her; and I have such a charming little grandson, and a dear, and a great boy—a grandson. Yes, I am an exile, and I shall never perhaps see Paris any more; but my country of exile is not there now, and I love America, and I am as happy as any worn-out old Republican can be who has for years his exile endured, and knows that it is under the sceptre of a tyrant.

I am an exile of 1848. I fought for the Républque Sociale et Démocratique: behind the barricades I fought for it; first against the tyranny of kings, then against the treason of egotistic and selfish, false Republicans. I fought for the cause of the prolétaire. I am an old man, and I have memories. I have walked with Berenger in the alleys of the Luxembourg, and I have known Lafayette. I can remember to have seen Dumouriez in London; and much have I at than that—I have known Armand Cavier, and the great, good Godefroi Cavaignac. All these were men, look you; though not all thought as I do, or would have flung up their chapeaux for the République Sociale et Démocratique and the cause of the prolétaire. But Paris now! Grand Dieu, what a descent terrible! Tyranny of the bayonet; despotism of the cotillon! Reign of the gendarme and the cocotte! Nouvelle Babylonne, the brave Eugene Pelletan calls it. Nothing free but morals!

Well, pass from that. It is not worth the pain to say much of it. Let me tell my own little history. I left Paris when Louis Blanc and Victor Hugo and the rest found it right to leave it. I was not arrested—no one asked about me. I had my revenge when, from the deck of the steamboat leaving Calais, I waved my hat and cried Vive la République Sociale et Démocratique! I went to England—to London—but could not stay there. The heaven was all too dark; one saw not the same sky nor the sun, nor only fog; and my poor wife could not bear the heavy clouds and mists. We voyaged from Liverpool to New York in the Zeta, eleven days' voyage. Seven, eight weeks on the ocean; and we were crowded up, my wife, our little daughter, and myself, with hundreds of strange men and women, canayères like ourselves. I tell you, it did try the souls of people! And we were sick, my wife and I, all the time—all the time. Eight weeks! To us it seemed more like eight years. But the days roll on, and the ocean; and one accustoms to hear a noise and commotion more than the ordinary on deck, and I mount there, very miserable—that goes without saying—and look out the shore, and I give a sigh, and say to myself, Enfin!

Then we live some time at Hoboken, and then in Brooklyn, and again in New York—in a house that debouches on Bleecker Street, which was then far up town, and did not have its present atmosphere of commerce over it. I lived by teach French and Italian, and to translate for some of the journals; and my wife would give instruction in the music, and she was much in the affairs of gentlemen, and make the fine linens and laces of the ladies look good as new. The music lessons did not bring in much money. But I did not for long time have many pupils to instruct in French. Some of the parents were a little, just a little, brutal, you know, to their children, and mad in your sense, but rather, perhaps I would say, brusque. Just a little brusque, yes; and when they came to speak of their children learning French from me, they would say they could not comprehend my English. Truly that was long ago. I have outlived the Philistine influence, I tell you. Wherever I go now they always believe that I am native of England—one true-born John Bull.

Four years passed away, and my poor wife died. Ah, that was a hard proof, a heavy trial! Never had we had a word of quarrel—not even once, only once. That is to say, once when we were very poor—ah, nearly to famishing, one night say; and then a little money had unexpected fortune one day—only a dollar or two—and brought home some milk and food for the infant—and we were all heart—of course, mon-John, you know—to nourish my wife. I made two portions of it, and one was large, and—ah yes—we almost quarreled over it. For I had made the one portion larger that she might have it, and she would not, and she would put it on my plate, and I demanded had she forgotten her duty to my wife, and would she not obey? and she said no, she had not forgotten her duty as wife, but would not obey; and we had a little argument; but after all it was not quite a quarrel, thank God!

I was left alone with my little girl. It was a hard struggle. For years I did every thing for her; then she began to do almost every thing for me. She was very pretty girl, my Louise—a charming girl, every body said. She is beautiful now—much more beautiful than ever, I think, when her own children at her feet. But it is certain that she was very pretty then, and she had many admirers, whom, however, she did not encourage. Always was she always good, gentle, and she loved her father, and cherished always the memory of her mother. I am not what you call a pious man, look you; I am a Voltairian. I have seen so much of priesthoods at home that I am like the brave Swiss who excused himself for not crossing the hill on the hot day of passing he had seen tant des soutanes. But I have always taught my child to love the good God, and to have a true and faith in Him, and to cherish the memory of her mother, who has gone to heaven. For I believe in heaven. Were there not, I could have now never my wife, after all her hard proofs and sufferances here below?

It seemed strange to me for a long time the liberty accorded to young girls in New York. In France the young girl never promenades alone; never is alone in a chamber with a young man, even with her lover; never has any acquaintance except through her parents, and with their approbation, and with their presence. Imagine to if I was in some land of a wild race when I saw all the young girls circulate without restraint through the promenades and the streets, and omnibuses, accept and give invitations, and hear themselves in every way as if they were married women. I came to expect always to see acts of surprise when, one evening, having been invited by a kind pupil to a grand reception in Fifth Avenue, I saw a child whom I knew to be a fille receiving diamonds! Neanwoins my daughter liked the ways of freedom very well; and I do not think the American citizen-girls have more of it than those than even our French girls, after all. Under this reign of liberty my daughter made her first acquaintances, although she kept admirers at a distance, and she was much loved by parents, and had many invitations; and I was happy of it, for I feared that our life at home was colorless and triste for a young girl. Eh bien! it was when she was entering an invitation to dance of a lady to whose daughter I gave lessons in French —I was beginning now to have many pupils—that she first saw a handsome young man, Stewart Gardner, one of the jeunesse dorée of New York.

It was not long after this that Stewart Gardner came to me to take lessons in French. My faith! I was a little astonished, for he spoke French so well. He said he desired to have the true Parisian accent. "Monsieur," I said, gravely, "c'est impossible. Only un Parisien can have the true Parisian accent. You will lose your time and your money." He smiled and said he did not hope for perfection absolute, but to approach a little nearer to perfection. I did then engage myself to do with him all that one could; and for an American his accent was not to despise. Truly, he had lived some years in Paris, and had been there more lately than I. But I engaged myself to improve his accent—and I did.

When I told my Louise that evening she was not so glad as I had anticipated. She said, "Oh, papa, why does he come?" And I said, "But it is to acquire the Parisian accent, my child." "Oh, papa, don't!" "Don't what, petite?" "Don't have him coming here for lessons; he does not need any." "My dear, which is the better able to judge of his needs—you or he? Have you ever observed his accents in speaking French?" "Oh no, papa." "Well, then, what do you know? C'est fini. She only haussait ses épaules, and said no more.

So Stewart Gardner came and took lessons; and I did perfection him in accent and style; and he came often in the evening, and I played the violin for him, and told him of the Revolution, and guessed my daughter would step, and he would sing with her, and I grew to love him very much, and to be glad always when he came. I found myself one day to be did sometimes to meet my Louise in the streets, and that they would promenade together; but this I did not then know of. I had known that they would have severely reasoned with her; because Stewart Gardner was the son of rich parents, and would be rich himself, and my poor girl would have no dot but her virtue.

I was very blind. Perhaps that we are all blind when it acts of seeing our own children. I did not see that ma petite and this youth were drawing every day closer and closer to each other. And I came back now I marvel why my eyes were, for I can recall in memory hundreds of traits and incidents which might have taught me that these two were in love. But then I was no wise and modest, and so loving to her father; and he was so loyal, frank, and honest that I could have suspected nothing. So they became lovers, and I never knew!

One day I was very busy much in the morning —very early, I would say. I did not return to my home until night. It was late in summer, and as I came up the street I looked for me petite at the window, with her bright face among the flowers. She was not there! I entered our room; I looked all. All there seemed desolate! No sight of my daughter! Never, never before had I returned home after my day of labor and not found her there to give me to welcome! I was going to rush down stairs and ask the good woman who kept the house whether she knew any thing of my daughter, when she turned to the cheminée, and I saw a letter there in her handwriting, and addressed "To my dear father." Think! I tore it open, and read:

"Oh, my dear father! we love each other, Stewart and I, and can not live asunder! Forgive me that I leave you!—at least—only a moment. We will not ask your consent, because we feared your high, Parisian sense of honor would compel you to withhold your sanction from a step which to many eyes must seem culpable. But you will forgive me yet, and you will be happy. Ever your devoted daughter,

"LOUISE."

I dropped the paper on the floor. The chamber seemed to revolve itself. My daughter had fled with Stewart Gardner—my poor, dear, deceived daughter was dishonored! Oh, my God! Oh, mother of my infant! In the heavens above us, I thought, what cannot thou say to the unthinking husband, the wounding, blind father, who has allowed this calamity to fall on thy child?

I fled out to where the fugitives had gone. I wandered about aimless and wild for two or three days. I inquired at Stewart's house; I saw his parents. They were angry, bitter, furious; and we only quarreled; and they were as ignorant as myself whither the hapless pair had fled! I returned home, and took down my pistol rapiers I had, and I felt a pleasure all grim and sanguinary as I looked at their points. Par Dieu, I am not yet so old! A vieux moustache can even yet do something. I can not save thee, my daughter; but I can avenge thee, or I can die!

Thus I sat, evening after evening. Behold that one bright summer evening I heard on the stairs a step I knew too well. He had returned then, this insolent seducer, to defy me, or perhaps to buy me off with money! In New York, perhaps, they think all can be paid with their distested dollars!

The door opened—and behold Stewart Gardner smiling, though looking as pre abashed, and holding out his hand.

"You will forgive me," he said, "whatever others may do."

"Traitor, deceiver, coward, monster!" were my frantic words, and I sprang for my rapiers and seized them.

He fell back astonished—as I then thought, afraid.

"Lâche!" I cried.

"But, Monsieur, you surely are not serious? You are not so unforgiving for a little deception?"

"Coward, it must that we battle ourselves! We must cut the throats together! Take your weapon!"

"But, good Heaven, Monsieur, will you not listen?"

"On guard, coward!"

"What on earth have I done?"

"Betrayed me! deceived me! betrayed and deceived my poor petite, my cherished Louise!"

"But this is madness! You can not believe it! Why, Monsieur, do you not know—"

My rage only grew the more stormy as he spoke. I thrust a weapon into his hand; I struck him with mine upon the breast; I cried to him that if he did not defend himself I would traverse him with my sword through the heart. There was a flash like lightning in a smile on his lips, which truly inflamed me. I rushed at him. Were he not quickly on guard, credit me, he would have had my sword in his breast. But he sprang to defend himself with a celerity all marvelous.

That was a combat! Once I boasted myself to be a master of my weapon; and even still, look you, my arm is not weak, and my wrist has not lost its souplesse. Mon Dieu, I did my utmost possible to kill him! I almost succeeded more when I think what is my madness I might have done! If I had killed him—oh, then what would have been left for me, miserable old man, but to slay myself! Ah, Dieu, I did not kill him, nor even inflict a wound on him. He had learned the use of his weapon in a good Paris school; and he had youth. His arm was supple, and his wrist was steel. He only guarded himself, and the more I grew hot the more did he grow cool. At last he parried a wild downward mine with a parry truly brilliant, and my sword flew out of my hand and dashed against one of the walls of our chamber.

He sprang at the weapon and seized it.

"Either kill me," I cried, "or let us still battle ourselves. It is always a chance of existence!"

"My good, dear Monsieur," he now asked with a calmness all provoking, "what are we supposed to be battling ourselves for?"

"But, malheureux, do you pretend, then, not to understand the making the daughter a wife?"

"My faith, I profess to be all unable to understand the feelings of a father who seems to have set his face against the making his daughter a wife before she has half passed through the month of honey."

"A what! Have you not betrayed—"

"My dear father-in-law, how can you talk in such a way? If our darling Louise only heard you! And could bring the two to her cheeks, matron though she be, I assure you."

"Then, Stewart—Stewart, mon garçon, Stewart, my cousin—you are not a villain, then?"

"Dear, Sir, what did you take us for—her or me? She is indeed Madame Stewart Gardner; and I think it very probable that she will soon come into better fortune by her marriage. But we trust to time to soften my people and reconcile them; and once they see how darling Louise they will love her just as her father and her husband do. For the rest, we love each other, and you love us, and we can live on nothing. Louise will be happy."

"But why did you not tell me all this before now, my son?"

"Well, Louise wished at first to tell you. But then we knew you were scrupulous and punctilious in the affairs of honor; and you might fancy that you were under a kind of restraint concerning, because of the reluctance of my parents; and we thought it better to say nothing, even to you, until the knot was tied and could not be untied."

"Ah, if only my dear wife were living!" But where is my daughter, my angel Louise?"

"I thought she would have been arrived here before now. She will not be long." What would she have said, my father-in-law, if she had come in a few minutes ago, and seen you charging me, with sang-pourpoint, sword in hand? Eh, mon beau-père?"

"Coquin, not a word of that to Louise! How could I ever forgive her father for raising his rash hand against the life of my husband? Oh yes, you smile, because you think you were well able to defend yourself; but you must not be too arrogant in your victory, my son-in-law. I admit you can hold your sword well for an American; but then you have been trained it the first schools of Paris."

You comprehend that I was not willing to allow my two young people and wild for two or three days. I inquired at Stewart's house; I saw his parents. They were angry, bitter, furious; and we only quarreled; and they were as ignorant as myself whither the hapless pair had fled! I returned home, and took down my pistol rapiers I had, and I felt a pleasure all grim and sanguinary as I looked at their points. Par Dieu, I am not yet so old! A vieux moustache can even yet do something. I can not save thee, my daughter; but I can avenge thee, or I can die!

Thus I sat, evening after evening. Behold that one bright summer evening I heard on the stairs a step I knew too well. He had returned then, this insolent seducer, to defy me, or perhaps to buy me off with money! In New York, perhaps, they think all can be paid with their det

GRAND BALL GIVEN IN HONOR OF PRESIDENT GRANT AT THE STETSON HOUSE, LONG BRANCH, JULY 28.—DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.—[SEE PAGE 519.]

MR. A. T. STEWART'S NEW RESIDENCE, CORNER OF FIFTH AVENUE AND THIRTY-FOURTH STREET, NEW YORK CITY.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.—[SEE PAGE 525.]

THE RED BREAST OF THE ROBIN.

AN IRISH LEGEND.

Of all the merry little birds that live up in the tree,
And revel from the sycamore and chestnut,
The prettiest little gentleman that dearest is to me
Is the one in coat of brown and scarlet waistcoat.
It's cockit little Robin!
And his head he keeps a-bobbin',
Of all the other pretty fowls I'd choose him.

For he sings so sweetly still,
Through his tiny slender bill,
With a little patch of red upon his bosom.]

When the frost is in the air, and the snow upon the ground,
To other little birdies so bewilderin',
Picking up the crumbs near the window he is found,
Singing Christmas carols to the children:
Of how two tender babes
Were left in weakened guides,
By a cruel man who took em there to lose 'em;
But Robby saw the crime
(He was watching all the time!),
And he hindled a perfect crimson on his bosom.

When the changing leaves of autumn around us thickly fall,
And every thing seems sorrowful and saddening,
Robin may be heard on the corner of a wall
Singing what is soleasing and gladdening.
And sure, from what I've heard,
He's God's own little bird,
And sings in time to grief just to amuse 'em:
But once he sat forlorn
On a cruel Crown of Thorn,
And the blood it stained his pretty little bosom.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

"Her eye, her lip, nay, her foot speaks."
Twelfth Night, or What You Will.

It was about two weeks after the fire at Auriel that, in the words of the Court Newsman, Lady Diana Merton, Lionel Cheyne, the honorable Mr. Orme, and the honorable Amelia and Rosa Orme, joined the distinguished circle enjoying Lord Airdale's hospitality at Holme Park.

Lady Diana had arranged with Lord Orme that she should accompany his party to Holme Park, because she feared it was an awful thing alone; the truth being that, extravagant to profligacy in the matter of luxuries obtained on credit, she yet at times was unduly frugal for small coins, and hated being obliged to disburse them. Traveling in Lord Orme's society implied that a large portion of the expenses of the journey would fall to him. She appropriated the most comfortable seats in express trains and hackneycarriages with an air of unconsciousness which nearly goaded Amelia Orme into rebellion.

"I know she's only coming because Captain Mowbray is to be there," that young lady said to her sister, wrathfully. "I hate such mean underhand ways; and see how she twists papa and Conrad round with her little finger."

And, indeed, Conrad, who had moulted short jackets, and was showing fine symptoms of longtailed coats, more than once announced to Rosa Bosom-friend, young Spenser, Lord Airdale's son, a fellow-Etonian, at whose request Conrad had been invited to Holme, that Lady Di was "quite his style, by Jove!"

Mowbray was pressed to welcome his friends when they first arrived. Mowbray was out hunting, the host said, in answer to a casual inquiry from Orme; doubtless the party would meet him at dinner-time, as well as Chiarveaux and some other fellows, who had also gone out. But ere Orme's guests had been a few minutes at Holme she was better informed as to the real cause of Thurstan's absence.

What guests are to a general, so is a quick-witted lady's maid to her mistress. Lady Diana rarely revealed her own plans of operations to her subordinates; but she made use of her to ascertain those of the enemy. Every one at Holme was talking of the disaster at Auriel. Captain Mowbray's gallantry was the theme of every tongue. Had he not, when taking a moonlight stroll, after dinner, during his nightly elegar, been attracted by the sight of his burning house, and entered it at the risk of his own life to save that of the poor girl who was only tenant? Something was said about that odd man, the schoolmaster, having given Captain Mowbray much assistance; but that the said schoolmaster lost his wit as last, and let the means of escape slip out his fingers; and then, did not Captain Mowbray, having quickly made a ladder with rope, ascend the walls of the house, and again imperil his life to save that of the poor fool who had been unequal to the task of self-preservation? Had not the fire-engines arrived promptly, both must have perished; for it seemed that Captain Mowbray could not persuade his companion to make any exertion to save himself, and when men were half suffocated, and one much injured, when the firemen extricated them from the burning pile at considerable risk to themselves. The whole of the house was not destroyed; the south wing was only partially injured, and the schoolmaster—it was he who had been hurt—was lying there now, attended by the girl who kept the house. The old woman who ordinarily lived with the girl had gone home to her cottage to see a sick grandchild on the night of the fire; and had it not been for Captain Mowbray's timely interposition the poor solitary inmate of his unoccupied home might have become ashes, like the family portraits on the staircase, without any one being the wiser.

All these details were collected by Lady Diana's maid, Letty, and by her repeated to her mistress while the latter underwent the soothing process of having her hair brushed.

Lady Diana was lazily on what she heard then she lifted up the gray eyes, and asked:

"Is the girl pretty whom Captain Mowbray saved?"

"Well, James" (James was Lord Airdale's valet) "do say she's a nicelish sort of looking girl," Letty admitted, reluctantly; "but I don't consider he's no judge. Captain Mowbray rode over there to-day to inquire after her."

"That will do; you may go," Lady Diana said, quietly. Then she clasped a necklace of brilliants round her white throat, and went downstairs to the drawing-room so preoccupied that she never observed that she had pinched her hair skin in the fastening of the necklace, and that a tiny spot of blood was staining the brilliancy both of throat and jewel.

Lady Di mentioned herself in one of the oldfashioned sofas which adorned the Holme drawing-room; she was a good judge of effect, and knew how admirably the sunset glow in the delicate whiteness of her bust and arms would merge into relief by the dark crimson satine that supported her; when she had observed head showed the exquisite contour of her throat, and her hair made a mellow glow against the cold shadows of the drapery.

She was looking more than usually beautiful to-night she knew, and she did so wish that all her admirers in esse and in posse could witness her loveliness. Few things irked Lady Di more than to find her sweetness wasted in a desert drawing-room, where there were none to miss. She felt on such occasions as a Soyer might feel who had provided an exquisite repast of which no guests came to partake. Lady Di's attitude would have done equally well for Thurstan or Captain Mowbray, or Chiarveaux, or Lionel Cheyne. Captain Mowbray was the first to enter the room.

Thurstan flushed at the sight of her.

"By Jove!" he thought, "she is handsomer than ever."

Lady Di on her part greeted him with genuine satisfaction; all the languor in her eyes, all the indolence of her movements, gave way before the brightness of her delight. As she sat there resplendent in her gracious loveliness, bringing to bear on him all the attractions of her wit, beauty, and experience, Thurstan became fairly dazzled.

"I have never forgotten you," he said, in answer to one of her half-reproachful questions; and Lady Di smiled a little scornfully to herself, for she knew well that her former lover had entirely forgotten her for a time, and that it was the power of her presence now which made him fancy that her attraction had ever been equally strong.

Suddenly Lady Di asked:

"What became of that man—the schoolmaster, whose life you saved?"

A deep gloom fell on Thurstan's face as he answered:

"He left Auriel for his own cottage, despite our earnest entreaties, this morning; he was quite unfit to travel, but persisted in going. Do you know, Lady Diana, that man is one of the noblest fellows on God's earth? He saved my life, and yet I feel as if I were under an obligation to him. I ought to repay him, by dragging him out of the smoke that night, he struck at me fiercely, and made a blinding effort to prevent my escape. I think he must have slightly lost his head."

"Very likely," Lady Di said, indifferently. Then, looking keenly at her companion, she added, "And what about that girl?"

Thurstan drew his head away quickly (it had been resting on the back of her chair, in near proximity with her shoulder), put both hands in his pockets, and stared at the fireplace. He could not recoil from herself was an answer to Lady Di's suspicions; she had judged so many criminals at the bar of her tribunal that she was quick to detect the slightest evidences of guilt—she perfectly understood that she had recalled another lost love to Thurstan's mind, and her memory of his forgetfulness of this duty be owed that love prompted the question, "What girl?"

"There is nothing to see out of the window," Lady Di said, dryly; "it is pitch dark. Do you know, Thurstan, I am very curious about this burning my necklace? it is unclasped." She lifted up her chin, still dimpled and white as that of a child, as she spoke, and he was fain to obey her request.

"You have hurt yourself," he said, suddenly, as his eye fell on the spot of blood on her throat; as he spoke his voice involuntarily took that intonation of tenderness which not uncommonly becomes a strong love, when we perceive it to injury, however slight, done to the beauty of a woman. Lady Di, with half-closed eyes and upturned face, had accepted the service in the attitude of a cat sidling up its head to be stroked, and Thurstan Mowbray looked as if he had spoilt a fine picture, and unconsciously, when the door opened, and Amelia Orme entered the room.

"I am sorry to that for you," she said to Lady Diana, in a tone of quiet malice, "men are so stupid about such things; see how clumsy Captain Mowbray's fingers are, and what a long while they take to accomplish their task."

"Do you happen to have entangled your hair in the clematis?" Lady Di said, giving back the blow with a smile. "Men's fingers are stupid, indeed, unaccustomed as they are to such duties," she added, placidly. "Please go on, Captain Mowbray."

Captain Mowbray hurriedly clasped the necklace, and Amelia retired scowling. She had all the will but not the ability to cope with the graceful effrontery of the elder woman.

The rest of the guests now entered the room. Any novice in the art of coquetry might have taken a useful lesson from Lady Di's on such occasions as these. Numbers did not dismay her. With exquisite tact she contrived to make each comer believe himself—more beyond all others; she looked tenderly at one, she murmured to another some apparently trifling words, which, in fact, had reference to a by-gone mutual flirtation. She contrived in the most masterly manner to make all discussions, whether on literature, politics, or fashion, incorporate some personal reference to herself. In what lively spoke of a new mode of wearing the hair? She managed to remind Chiarveaux of a certain day when he had accidentally touched the soft beauty of her own tresses. Did they mention the last new novel? She referred to some passage in it which touched on the sensitivity of second marriages, and entreated Lord Orme to read it; and when the budget was discussed, and Lord Airdale grew prosy over the figures of naval estimates, Lady Di imperceptibly led the conversation toward our coast defenses. Then she spoke in a low tone to Thurstan, on the Sussex coast; pointed out a certain hour when she had stood there in the blaze of noon with her head cold with despair; hinted at the tears she had shed when she returned to her solitary home, feeling that life had become a weary blank, that all its brightness had passed away with the departure of sun-glory, when his lips pressed her own in the last bittersweet caress. She did not allude to the concern she showed at the overdone sweet-bread, or of the useless expedition she made to Italy in pursuit of Lord Orme." Lady Di never talked about her failures.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

JEST AND EARNEST.

THAT night when the party was breaking up Lord Orme came up to Thurstan, and said, with some emotion:

"Did you really save that poor girl's life at Auriel?"

"On the contrary," Captain Mowbray explained, "it was a great friend of mine, a fellow called Douglas, who saved us both."

"But you were the first to enter the building with the view of rescuing her," Lord Orme said, eagerly. "It was a noble act, Mowbray; you needn't look so modest of it." Lord Orme took the young man a hand and shook it warmly.

"God bless you!" he muttered, and turned away, overcome by some of his own emotions.

Captain Mowbray stared after him blankly.

"What the deuce was I to say?" he thought, ruefully; "I never was reward being thanked when you don't deserve it; but how could I explain matters without letting the cat out of the bag. The cat I must be still, for Lady Diana Douglas is gone. I will go there early to-morrow."

"What shall I give you for your meditations?"

Lady Di stood before him with outstretched hand, and the faintest suspicion of a yawn revealing her pearly teeth.

"What shall I ask?" he said, drawing nearer to her.

She looked at him with an indescribable expression—a delicious combination of shyness and coquetry—of timid confidence. Suddenly the expression found voice.

"You know well that aught you chose to do for me would fill me with any required you could name. You know that I can not forget, that I have never ceased to reproach myself for my folly in letting you slip out of my hands. Can you forgive me, Thurstan?"

They were standing on the landing-place outside the drawing-room door. She herself partly concealed by the heavy curtains of a window near which she leaned; her beautiful shoulders were shadowed by the crimson that were placed on the window-sill; the light of a lamp overhead shed a subdued glow over the fairness of her round arms, and the bust of her magnificent figure. Thurstan looked at her with a vague idea that some evil fascination was dragging him down to hell. He wondered if the floor was thick with the perfume of flowers; if the light was dim, and retreated beautiful women instead of ugly fiends; if the music was soft, and glooms covered such rich low tones, full of subtle temptations, such as had just now trembled in his ears.

Then he gave her his hand, and cried,

"You try me too far, Lady Di. You tempt me to disappoint, you inspire hopes only to baffle them. Why will I be honest with you? not that you deserve honesty of me, but because I would not fight for your own destruction—ever. When you first taught me to love you I paid back your lie with truth; I loved you as sincerely as ever man loved woman. I would have married you a good husband, although I was, as you said, too young, as you meant too poor, to marry a woman of your station. But you threw me over because I wouldn't be content with the husks of a heart; because, being a chivalrous young fool, I objected to the cold, substantial nature of the devotion which you had pretended to feel for me. Well, there's no need to talk any more about the past, for I am not the boy you were to me now. If you wish to lure me back to the state of semi-madness about you, you are yet beautiful and powerful enough to succeed; but I warn you fairly I can not woo you on the same terms, for I am no longer free; and if you tempt me to woo you on other than I will you will be a fool."

All the color had faded from his face. There was a threat in his eyes which she had never seen there before. Lady Di became conscious that she had raised ill the man the latent tiger which every soul native knows to exist beyond its others; she looked tenderly at one, she murmured to another some apparently trifling words, which in fact, had reference to a by-gone mutual flirtation. She contrived in the most masterly manner to make all discussions, whether on literature, politics, or fashion, incorporate some personal reference to herself. In what lively spoke of a new mode of wearing the hair? She managed to remind Chiarveaux of a certain day when he had accidentally touched the soft beauty of her own tresses. Did they mention the last new novel? She referred to some passage in it which touched on the sensitivity of second marriages, and entreated Lord Orme to read it; and when the budget was discussed, and Lord Airdale grew prosy over the figures of naval estimates, Lady Di imperceptibly led the conversation toward our coast defenses. Then she spoke in a low tone to Thurstan, on the Sussex coast; pointed out a certain hour when she had stood there in the blaze of noon with her head cold with despair; hinted at the tears she had shed when she returned to her solitary home, feeling that life had become a weary blank, that all its brightness had passed away with the departure of sun-glory, when his lips pressed her own in the last bittersweet caress. She did not allude to the concern she showed at the overdone sweet-bread, or of the useless expedition she made to Italy in pursuit of Lord Orme." Lady Di never talked about her failures.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

JEST AND EARNEST.

THAT night when the party was breaking up Lord Orme came up to Thurstan, and said, with some emotion:

"Did you really save that poor girl's life at Auriel?"

"On the contrary," Captain Mowbray explained, "it was a great friend of mine, a fellow called Douglas, who saved us both."

"But you were the first to enter the building with the view of rescuing her," Lord Orme said, eagerly. "It was a noble act, Mowbray; you needn't look so modest of it." Lord Orme took the young man a hand and shook it warmly.

"God bless you!" he muttered, and turned away, overcome by some of his own emotions.

Captain Mowbray stared after him blankly.

"What the deuce was I to say?" he thought, ruefully; "I never was reward being thanked when you don't deserve it; but how could I explain matters without letting the cat out of the bag. The cat I must be still, for Lady Diana Douglas is gone. I will go there early to-morrow."

"What shall I give you for your meditations?"

Lady Di stood before him with outstretched hand, and the faintest suspicion of a yawn revealing her pearly teeth.

"What shall I ask?" he said, drawing nearer to her.

She looked at him with an indescribable expression—a delicious combination of shyness and coquetry—of timid confidence. Suddenly the expression found voice.

"You know well that aught you chose to do for me would fill me with any required you could name. You know that I can not forget, that I have never ceased to reproach myself for my folly in letting you slip out of my hands. Can you forgive me, Thurstan?"

They were standing on the landing-place outside the drawing-room door. She herself partly concealed by the heavy curtains of a window near which she leaned; her beautiful shoulders were shadowed by the crimson that were placed on the window-sill; the light of a lamp overhead shed a subdued glow over the fairness of her round arms, and the bust of her magnificent figure. Thurstan looked at her with a vague idea that some evil fascination was dragging him down to hell. He wondered if the floor was thick with the perfume of flowers; if the light was dim, and retreated beautiful women instead of ugly fiends; if the music was soft, and glooms covered such rich low tones, full of subtle temptations, such as had just now trembled in his ears.

Then he gave her his hand, and cried,

"You try me too far, Lady Di. You tempt me to disappoint, you inspire hopes only to baffle them. Why will I be honest with you? not that you deserve honesty of me, but because I would not fight for your own destruction—ever. When you first taught me to love you I paid back your lie with truth; I loved you as sincerely as ever man loved woman. I would have married you a good husband, although I was, as you said, too young, as you meant too poor, to marry a woman of your station. But you threw me over because I wouldn't be content with the husks of a heart; because, being a chivalrous young fool, I objected to the cold, substantial nature of the devotion which you had pretended to feel for me. Well, there's no need to talk any more about the past, for I am not the boy you were to me now. If you wish to lure me back to the state of semi-madness about you, you are yet beautiful and powerful enough to succeed; but I warn you fairly I can not woo you on the same terms, for I am no longer free; and if you tempt me to woo you on other than I will you will be a fool."

All the color had faded from his face. There was a threat in his eyes which she had never seen there before. Lady Di became conscious that she had raised ill the man the latent tiger which every soul native knows to exist beyond its others; she looked tenderly at one, she murmured to another some apparently trifling words, which,

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

OF SWEET CAME SOUR, OF DAY CAME NIGHT.

WHEN Robert Douglas recovered his hurts sufficiently to crawl away to his own home he wrote a few words of farewell to Azalea, in which he entreated her not to break in on his solitude for some little while to come.

He avoided seeing her before he went, alleging that he was not strong enough to sustain even the slightest excitement. Since that terrible night, when mental anguish surpassed the animal fear of death, when all life's miseries seemed culminated in the burden of that fathomless despair, Douglas had never spoken to or looked at her, whose very presence was in itself a wound to him; the sound of her voice made him wince. He had come to regard her with somewhat of the shrinking aversion a caged lion feels to the hand which has subjected it with a burning rod. He turned his face from the light and from her; he would admit of no attendance save what old Sally could render him. He felt that a glance at Azalea's face, insolent in all the radiance of happy youth, would madden him beyond endurance; all he asked for was solitude and silence, and these obtained he sat and watched all his pain from dawn to eve, his eyes dull with pathos as those of one who can not turn his head from the horror of a corpse. When the sun was brightest his hot eyes were closed; when the air was loud with the ecstasy of birds he was mute.

A stranded wreck makes no response to the soothing ripple, the whispering kiss of summer's warm waves; the dismantled hull, victim to the brief mad passion of a stormy hour, is merely a sullen blot on the golden sunlit ocean; and this disaster, it seems to brood over its tragedy of the past. The desperate effort—the wail of despair—the frenzied supplication—all are but memories, and so it lies between the gloom of sky and sand—a darkness in the sunshine—a silence in the murmuring tides. Ever and anon waves play round its despondent sides. The silver fringe of the surf sports over it ere rushing back to the deep bosom of the parent sea. Gray dawns look coldly on its sombrous shadow; red eves flush it with tawny glory; winds sigh or storm over it; shells cling to it; the sea-gull and sea-flowers throw themselves into its lap. Shapeless and gray; greeting and farewell echo over it; but it retains that calm which precedes destruction, that apathy which marks decay.

It is a year in the midst of life's eloquence. It is a paralytic mocked by the sound of the lute and song; through all the mutable vitality of nature it is dead, fixed, and immovable. It worse than perishes—it stagnates.

Douglas's farewell to Azalea ran as follows:

"MY DEAR CHILD,—I am quite well enough to move now, and I fancy that I shall get well sooner in my own home. I am much in love you; and do not think me unkind if I say that, for time, I shall prefer utter solitude to any society however agreeable. I am much afraid of the terrible events of the last few weeks; and I would fain forget, if possible, some of the horror attached to them. I do not apologize for myself to you, for a note I received from Captain Mowbray a few days after the fire informed me of the relation which subsists between you, and makes me blessed with a young husband who loves her, and whom she loves, does not need to be troubled by the light of a weary old face like mine. I shall so far interest myself in your future as to pay and induce your husband to communicate his marriage at once to his family; and in other respects I shall try and fill the place of your dear father—but I must not dwell on these things to you: may God bless you more than he has seen fit to pardon me. If ever you are in trouble—if you ever require advice or assistance, write but one word, 'Come,' and you may command the presence of Yours faithfully,

"ROBERT DOUGLAS."

Azalea wondered and grieved a little over Douglas's strange letter. Sometimes, when Thurstan was not there to banish the thought, the dreary winds of evening seemed to whisper to her of something which she had lost—something of shelter, of protection and of love, which had passed away into her foster-father's grave, and into that terrible confusion in the flaming lane. But her lover's voice, her lover's touch were sufficient to woo her back into the beautiful dream, while she, in her ignorance, mistook it for reality; and in that dream the melancholy of her future desolation was not prophesied. How much the gayer she appeared in all hearts but her own, which was as true as her life had been sinless, that Thurstan was already a little uneasy of the prize he had won without a struggle—that his sometimes restless manner and thoughtful eyes betrayed a mystery to herself; that he did not understand her, and that the enigma she had possessed its charms at first became fatiguing in its inexplicability? Lady Diana was never hard to understand. She had the art of making her own intellect subservient to that of her lovers, of converting ideas to him in such fashion that he was deluded into belief that he himself had engendered them. No one can deny that it is a misfortune to have a mistress who makes you feel her superior than one whose genius is distinct and unsociable as a monolith. Thurstan understood that Azalea was not of either, and that she worshiped him, in consideration of which he overlooked her peculiarities of mind; but then Lady Di was also very lovely, and——at this dangerous point of his meditation Thurstan would generally walk away from Holme in the direction of Auriol, much on the same principle as that which made the soldier in the fairy tale take a bite of antidotal apple when he found the influence of the magic pear becoming too serious.

Reader—supposing you to be a man—command that you ever suffered the inconvenience of loving two women at the same time? If so, you can sympathize with the perplexity of the ass when trying to make a choice of thistles, or the vacillating of Alexander between his rival queens. The situation is not an uncommon, although it may be an undignified, and not altogether one undeserving of sympathy.

Meanwhile, when Lady Diana watched Thurstan break away from the toils she was beginning to wind round him with all the gentle tact of an experienced spider who knows how to tie its pet fly, and leave her for the tenant of that blackened ruin at Auriol, she bit her pink lips until they bled, and swore that before the night—whatever trouble it entailed on herself—whatever disaster it inflicted on others—she would win back this man to herself. Thurstan had but he should sicken at every hour spent out of her presence, and weary of the cause which thus detained him.

You see, one of those misfortunes which overtake the most beautiful coquette had fallen on Lady Diana. She was really in love—not for the first, or even the second time, you may be sure, but she felt it now as she has known it for that. After all, she was at this moment more deserving of pity than her younger rival. Love to Azalea was Paradise—to Lady Di, Purgatory. Azalea believed in all things, more especially in her lover—Lady Di believed in few things, least of all in human faith. Then, in her present position, many a stout ship can scarcely have much confidence in the stability of timber. Lady Di would have given much to be able to put a good hearty belief in any man. She would fain forget the inevitable decline from the heights of a proud position to that of a mere plaything. She knew too well how in the most constant breasts the sweet instinct of possession—passion which is like the beautiful flowers of the tropics, where strange phantasms and colors of unspeakable glory are incorporated with the wild splendor of the tempest—dies to make room for calm in stagnation. Even in victory she tasted defeat; pain in defeat she endured as severely as though its pangs were unforeseen.

Thurstan's dereliction wounded her vanity—money, it would not have done that. Then the sight of his face was sweet to her; his voice was a charm to the ear; his eyes haunted her like a constant dream; his touch was a thrill to her, nothing more than a dream in her life altogether, for she was in truth too old to marry him had he been free (and he had never asked her to be so), he was bound by more than ordinary ties to another), and she was too poor to retain him long as a lover. Her profession was beginning slowly becoming desperate, and every time a fresh dun knocked at the door she looked at Lord Orme and thought, "Marry me you must—liking you like it or not." So Thurstan would be nothing but a phantom of pleasure; but when a phantom is lovely to look on, it becomes a terrible looking at it too closely. Experience is a less pleasant thing when we see with painful clearness all the defects of the present.

Lady Di wisely shut her eyes and opened her mouth to take the bonbon which Fate sent in her way.

A NAUTCH DANCE.

WHOEVER has not seen a Nautch dance has something to see. Some three or four sets of Indian dancing-girls had performed in Calcutta, and having told our tall, gawky Arab conductor that we were desirous of these peculiar beings, he made the necessary arrangements without any In the evening we repaired to his house, and were ushered into a long, narrow room, covered with a Persian carpet and cushions, and in the centre a brass lamp with a number of burners. The apartment contained several native gentlemen of the room, leaving the divan for the Nautch girls.

Shortly our tall Arab enters, ushering in some half a dozen creatures clothed in white muslin, followed by half a dozen Indian musicians bearing their instruments, consisting of a peculiar kind of drum, a guitar, and a tambourine, and the flageolet kind. The ladies divested themselves of their outer scarf of red silk and gold, and arranged on the divan opposite us—their arms bare, bosoms nearly, and legs quite so. Their heads were ornamented with wreaths of jewels; gold ornaments in the nose, and massive chains hung from one side of the nostril, pulling down the lobe.

One looked rather old, say twenty-eight; the others young—two under thirteen. All were of Hindoo caste of respectability, as I could wander the eyes. They lounged on the cushions in the most fascinating manner, as they apparently thought, gently playing with their gold and green them, every moment casting up their large black eyes to us longishingly, lovingly, enchantingly, and sorrowfully.

The musicians strike up a semi-dismal, sentimental sound. One of them has a peculiar small, melancholy-looking drum, which he plays while he sounds by striking with the palm of his hand, obtaining the most peculiar but not unmusical sounds. The others have instruments more common.

The girls now begin to cast off their outer garments, and stand round and make tinkling chains. This done, they advance, tap the heels, then the toes, making the chains to the time of the musicians. The dance, we think, is doubtless to follow. Wriggling about (there are no other words that describe the motion), throwing out their arms, and peeping beneath their scarfs, they advance and retreat. They then sing lovesongs, conjointly with the musicians, to screw in their ears, gradually increasing the loudness of the music; the girls advancing and receding, their eyes dancing, their arms waving, and then whirling away, discomposed, as it seems, at down almost exhausted.

And this actually was the dance, and all there was of it.

During the dancing and singing they frequently lifted the nose ochaunes to wipe their streaming faces. Right glad were we to pay an aggregate of eight dollars for the entertainment, to leave the house, and get on board the steamer.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

EVERY week or two some luckless visitor at Niagara Falls utters, through the newspapers, a dismal notice of warning in regard to the impositions practiced upon innocent strangers by the hotel keepers. Perhaps the writers of these warnings have been victims; but, from our own personal experience, we are almost inclined that some of the "Notes from Niagara Falls" printed under date of 1869, were made up from old manuscripts writers years ago. Our weeks visit at the Falls failed to entangle us in a single trick The hotels charges were in no wise more exorbitant than at other summer resorts; and if all the hotels in the port appointed as the one where we happened to be, there can be no complaint in the view on that score. We, when you linger at the windows of the Indian shops, some kind-looking old woman will come down with an appropriation to enter; but if you pay no attention to her she soon retires. Backmen, too, as in other places, are fond of inducing you now reasonably they will show you the sights; but they are easily silenced by a polite firmness. Only in one instance were we unreasonably followed. Our party, having taken a carriage to drive, received one morning to walk over to the Canada side to get a better view on the bridge. Having crossed the New Suspension Bridge, a backman assailed us with the cry, "Go to the Rock for fifty cents;" and, notwithstanding both eldest and youngest refused refusals of his offer, he followed in our wake, kindly drowning his pity for us we assured him, by music, until he was ready to exercise himself and rescue for "fifty cents" the next party that came. The music of our party turned round and said, in a solemn Philip cool tone: "We calculate to walk up to Table Rock if it costs us a dollar a piece!" The backman disappeared instanter.

Visitors to Niagara would be better satisfied if they should bear in mind that considerable expense is involved in preparing such places as "Goat Island," "The Three Sisters," and "The Cave of the Winds" for safe and comfortable inspection. If bridges, stairs, etc., had not been built, we should lose glorious views, which are well worth the fee demanded. Nevertheless we find it as pleasant if the various arrangements which facilitate our visit were out of interest were rendered to go to decay. Improvements are made from year to year in the attractions of the vicinity of the place; and, under a new and efficient police, there is far less annoyance than formerly from the importunities of hackmen. On the whole, all the great objects can visit Niagara and not rejoice that an opportunity is so easily obtained for viewing the glorious Falls in so many different aspects.

Extensive preparations have been made for observing the solar eclipse of August 7. August. Many distinguished scientific gentlemen have gone to Iowa for this purpose; also a company of government officers, under the direction of Professor Peirce, Superintendent of the temporary observatory, and all necessary instruments, will make observations and take general observations, as well as to take photographic views.

Another railroad horror! On the New Orleans and Lafayette Railroad a passenger train fell through a wooden trestle bridge, the cars take fire, three persons are burned to death, and many wounded. The bridge had given way, it is said, and the officers of the road are "censured." Is this all? Are the public altogether barbarians in this matter?

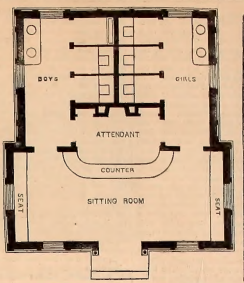
Any one who has contemplated the grand drinking tableau which is on free exhibition on the west portal of the Capitol at Washington will not be surprised at the ingulished scientific gentlemen have gone to Iowa for this purpose: also a company of government officers, under the direction of Professor Peirce, Superintendent of the temporary observatory, and all necessary instruments, will make observations and take general observations, as well as to take photographic views.

Another railroad horror! On the New Orleans and Lafayette Railroad a passenger train fell through a wooden trestle bridge, the cars take fire, three persons are burned to death, and many wounded. The bridge had given way, it is said, and the officers of the road are "censured." Is this all? Are the public altogether barbarians in this matter?

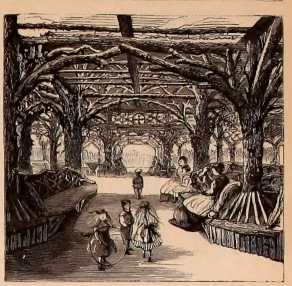
Any one who has contemplated the grand drinking tableau which is on free exhibition on the west portal of the Capitol at Washington will not be surprised at the announcement that the Temperance Society, Sons of Temperance, and all necessary instruments, will make

THE DRIVE AT NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND.—DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.—[SEE PAGE 525.]

NEW YORK CENTRAL PARK—CHILDREN'S COTTAGE.



FLOOR PLAN OF CHILDREN'S COTTAGE.



CHILDREN'S SHELTER.

NEW VIEWS IN CENTRAL PARK.

EVERY year witnesses new improvements in the New York Central Park. This is very evident to the merely occasional visitor, who always finds some novelty that did not meet his eye upon former visits. We give some illustrations on this page of the latest novelties introduced.

The most interesting of our sketches are those of the Children's Shelter and the Children's Cottage. For several years the children of our schools have been allowed the use of the playgrounds of the Park. Any child attending the public schools of the city may have the privilege of the play-grounds, upon application to the Commissioners of the Park, with a certificate from his or her teacher of the punctual attendance of the applicant upon the school and of good character. We also give an illustration of the Boys' Play-Ground. By confining the use of the grounds to school-children the practice of adult clubs of match games, and the objectionable features that have become the frequent attendant of these games, have been effectually prevented. Croquet-play upon the girls' ground has been initiated, and several swings have been erected for the use of children.

A great variety of animals have been added to the zoological collection in the Park—among them a fine specimen of the American buffalo; a toucan; an American black bear; a cinnamon bear, from India; a white-lipped peccary; a fine Mexican lion, two years old, captured on the upper Rio Grande; a magnificent grizzly bear from the Rocky Mountains; a Brazilian and two South American ostriches; a pair of Rasse cats from Java; a beautiful Angola leopard; a pair of prairie-dogs, and a number of Java sparrows and chaffinches.

The formation of a Zoological Garden has been included in the plan of the Central Park. A beginning has been made in the collection of animals, and it is designed in time to develop this feature of the establishment into a completer form. Beyond its use as a never-failing source of interest and pleasurable gratification to the public will be its value as an addition to the educational resources of our city.

An important branch of Natural History of almost romantic interest is that relating to the forms of life that once existed upon the earth, with reptilian characteristics, twenty-six feet in length and fourteen in height, was found at Haddonfield, New Jersey.

PALEONTOLOGICAL STUDIO AT THE CENTRAL PARK MUSEUM.

but are now extinct. Mr. WATERHOUSE HAWKINS has been selected to attend to the restoration of fossils illustrating ancient life upon this continent. We give an illustration of the Paleontological Studio at the Central Park Museum, with models of animals of ancient times now being restored from the fossils by Mr. HAWKINS, including the skeleton of the Hadrosaurous Foulkii, which forms the centre of the group. This gigantic and remarkable animal, a creature which we might name. It has no great antiquity, and has, therefore, little regard for what is old. In London or in Paris you may see some relics of past centuries; these are reverenced and preserved as long as they endure. But New York is a series of experiments, and every thing which has lived its life and played its part is held to be dead, and is buried, and over it grows a new world. Of how few buildings in this city can it be said, "Here is something that will last for a thousand years?" How few, indeed, are built with any idea of permanency!

But there is one edifice in New York that, if not swallowed up by an earthquake, will stand as long as the city remains, and will ever be pointed to as a monument of individual enterprise, of far-seeing judgment, and of disinterested philanthropy. This is Mr. A. T. STEWART'S new and palatial mansion on Fifth Avenue, of which we give an illustration on page 521.

MR. STEWART'S NEW RESIDENCE.

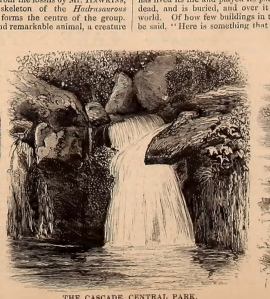
NEW YORK is not a picturesque city, like London or Paris, or a dozen other European cities such an edifice should not be surrounded by spacious grounds. But Mr. STEWART evidently looked forward to the time when the pushing commerce of the city would make its demands felt even in Thirty-Fourth Street.

There is nothing like it in the world, not even among the palaces of the European nobility. That is the impression which first strikes us as we enter the building. The architect, Mr. KERN, had a difficult problem to solve. He was to make an eternal monument which should also be fitted for a temporal habitation. He has admirably succeeded, we must admit; but still every one who looks upon the result must feel that this splendid palace was never designed primarily for a private dwelling. It is a temple rather than a mansion.

The very first glance at the building suggests a fault in architectural design—at least, we deem it such. The elaborate system of pilasters at the two main entrances support nothing. They constitute an architectural conundrum. For, if there is any well established canon of architecture, it is the law that no column should exist without supporting something—something more than an entablature: something needing columnar support. Then, again, it seems unfortunate that

This building is constructed of marble, but of that enduring kind of marble which appears to the eye very much like granite. It rests upon hewn masonry, which in turn lies upon a solid rock basis. The finishing inside is throughout of beautiful Italian marble, the work upon which was done in Italy. The style of architecture is purely Corinthian. The building does not strike one as extraordinarily large at the first glance. It is only three stories in height. But it towers above all the surrounding structures. For each story is over twenty feet in height. So the several apartments do not at first seem to be of more than ordinary size until we know their measurement.

BOYS' PLAY-GROUND, CENTRAL PARK.



THE CASCADE, CENTRAL PARK.

SHEEP ON THE GREEN, CENTRAL PARK.

The entire structure, external and internal, is destitute of showy ornamentation. The style of luxury exhibited is of very chaste and quiet. It is grand without being heavy; it is fine and elaborate without being fanciful. This will appear even more to be the case when the walls are finished and subdued in color, so as to harmonize with the blue-veined marble. The doors are to be of rose-wood.

The building, with scarcely an alteration in the arrangement of its rooms, could be transformed into a magnificent art-gallery. It almost naturally lends us to hear the architect speak of this as a reception room, of that as a breakfasting, and of another as the parlor. The beautiful waterrobe and bath-rooms are the only portions of the house which distinctively suggest the idea of a private residence. The vista of rooms is one of the most remarkable features which strike the eye. From one end of the building one looks through to the other. The grand hall leads to the marble staircase—the most beautiful specimen of architecture of that kind in the country. Passing beyond this, we enter the picture-gallery, which is to be adorned with the finest specimens of statuary and painting that Mr. STEWART has been able to obtain during a search of several years.

The windows throughout the building consist each of a single pane of glass. There is an electrical apparatus for lighting the gas. The entire structure is in keeping reflects great credit upon Mr. STEWART, and as a work of architecture it is equally creditable to Mr. KELLUM.

THE DRIVE AT NEWPORT.

OUR illustration on page 524 of the Drive at Newport is suggested from a drawing by Mr. C. G. BUSH. It is a very full and characteristic representation of one of the most prominent features of this fashionable summer resort. The Drive has recently been greatly extended, so as to lead round the Point and back again, making a circuit of about ten miles.

ANTIPATHIES.

We can readily understand that the olfactory powers of nature in man or woman recoil with loathing from disagreeable or offensive odors; but it is hard to believe that this objection can in any degree apply to the sweet fragrance of the Queen of Flowers. Yet we have well-attested instances of Popes probably by hard usage of these in his mind when he used the expression,

"Die of a rose in aromatic pain"

According to Sir Kenelm Digby, of the Lady Hennege, of the bedchamber to Queen Elizabeth, had a rose upon her cheek when she composed herself to rest, that cheek became immediately blistered. Cardinal Don Enrique de Cardona went into a swoon upon encountering the smell of a rose, and Laurentius, Bishop of Lorch island, was killed by the same cause. During the session of the states Cardinal Caraffa shut himself in a chamber in his palace, and suffered no one to approach him who carried one about his person.

"I knew a stout soldier," says Donatus, "who could not endure the smell or sight of the herb rue, but would instantly betake himself to flight on his first notice of its presence."

Cheese, secretary to Francis the First, King of France, a Parisian, was forced to fly from hostility with bread when there were any apples at table, and to otherwise was the smell of them to him that if one had held near his nose it began to bleed almost instantaneously.

"I have myself," we are told by Scaevolus, as quoted by Schenck, "the younger daughter of Frederick the First, King of Naples, who could not eat the smell of fish, nor even taste the smallest quantity. As she grew up to be of her mouth she was seized with vehement fits, and falling on the earth and rolling herself upon, would lamentably shriek out. This she would continue to do for the space of half an hour, after which she would return to herself."

Guarnerius relates that hog's flesh was so disgusting to him that it produced the effect of poison, although he never used it in any food or sauces. When his mother, on a particular occasion, gave him a dish of that meat without his previous knowledge, minced into small pieces, but, as he unwittingly ate some, within an hour after he was seized with a violent palpitation of the heart, fell into fits, and concluded with a vomiting of blood.

Schenck also says a learned person once told him that he knew one at Antwerp who would immediately swoon as often as pork was set before him upon the table at which he was present. Further, that he was also acquainted with a person of high quality who fainted at the sight of an egg; and that if one were included in paste, or otherwise covered up, he fell down as dead, and was unable to return to himself until the obnoxious dish was removed. Germanicus could not endure the sight or voice of a cock, and the Persian Magi had an intense horror of mice. Henry III. of France could not sit in a room with a cat. The Duke of Schomberg had the same aversion.

This is by no means an uncommon antipathy. A gentleman in the court of the Emperor Ferdinand would bleed at the nose when hearing a cat mew, no matter how great the distance might be that separated him from the obnoxious animal. Mathiolus tells of a Germany, who, coming at winter time into an inn to sup with him and some other friends, the woman of the house, being acquainted with his temperament in this particular, put a mouse in a chest in the same room where they sat at their meal. But though he had neither seen nor heard of it, after a little time the same gentleman came over his face, and he cried out that in some corner or another a cat was concealed. A most recent instance of this nature is the case of the late Mr. Vandenhoff, the celebrated tragedian, which came within the notice of the present writer. Walking with him on one day in the Zoological Gardens at Liverpool, and being in close conversation, Vandenhoff suddenly stopped, grasped the arm of his companion almost convulsively, and pointed forward with some nearly inarticulate exclamation. A cat was hobbling toward them, a sort of lusus naturæ, without hind-legs. It was chased away, and after a short interval we resumed our walk in the customary demeanor. On another occasion the writer happened to sit next to him at a dinner-party, decidedly to the front, grasped his knife and fork, fell back in his chair, and said, faintly, "There's a cat under the table!" The brute had breathed by his chair. The effect was instantaneous. Shakspeare, as we all know, says,

"Some men there are love not a gaping pig;
Some hate the dog."

and then he adds, as a commentary, "There is no firm reason' to be rendered for these strange loathings."

Among the records of antipathy we find one of a man who could not endure that an old woman should look upon him. Pliny says that if he met the smallest dog he was seized with convulsions in the left hand; of a young girl who swooned at the sight of a frog; of a child twice speaking or singing; of a man who perspired violently if she saw a beetle; of a nobleman of Mantua who became paralyzed at the sight or contact of a hedgehog, and for two years imagined he was gnawed internally by such an animal; and of a maid-servant in Germany who had lived entirely on milk, without any other kind of food. She was not able to endure even the smell of bread, and if she accidentally ate of it was put into her basin, even at a distance, she detected it immediately. Ambrose Paré, the celebrated French surgeon, mentions a gentleman who never could see a carp without fainting. Also a lady on whom a boiled lobster had the same effect. Erasmus, though a native of Rotterdam, had such an aversion to all kinds of fish that the smell of it gave him a fever. Joseph Scaliger never could endure it. Cardan was particularly disgusted at the sight of eggs. There are persons who cannot bear to look on spiders; others who cannot touch the mass of that material. M. Vaugleem, a great historian in France, would run away from the meeting at the sight of a roast pig. M. de Lauzye, in his "Tableau de l'ancaintance de toutes Choses," gives an account of a very fierce officer who never dared to look at a mouse, it would so terrify him, unless he had his sword in his hand. M. de Lauzye said he knew the man perfectly well. The great Marshal Saxe looked under his bed every night to see that no animal of any kind was there. The philosopher Montaigne had such an aversion to be saluted that he fell down if any one paid him that respect. The Duke d'Epernon fainted at the sight of a leveret. Marshal d'Albret turned sick at table if a sucking-pig was served up. Tycho Brahe felt his limbs sink under him if he encountered a hare or fox. La Mothe le Vayer could not endure the sound of any musical instrument, yet had exquisite pleasure from the noise of thunder. This anecdote has been fathered on Dr. Gregory, the celebrated Edinburgh physician, who, being asked by a lady if he liked music, replied: "Madam, I like it as well as thunder or any other noise." Something to the same effect was said by Dr. Johnson to another lady, who observed that a concerto he had just heard was very difficult. "Madam," growled the philosopher, "I wish it had been impossible." An Englishman in the last century was near expiring whenever the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah was read to him. We could multiply similar cases of antipathy almost ad infinitum, but enough have been adduced.

LITERARY FRIVOLITIES.

UTILITY is not always the chief object of literary labor, and neither is "value received' always its aim and end; for in the "Curiosities of Literature versa, as the reader chose; while a third, again, would find in the same pages a most instructive, or, perhaps, anagrammatic, poetry. Another class of literary trifles, among others, might be named those who chose to display a microscopic skill by writing so small that their work appeared to the naked eye only a mere waxy line. Laborious ingenuity of these kinds, so far from being discouraged, was rather pleasurably indulged in by some of the best ancient writers, of whom might have been expected other and better things. Take as an instance of one of these literary frivolities, for which the author seldom, if ever, receives either fame or emolument, many of the works of Lopez de Vega—works now never heard of, and, perhaps, better so, since many of them were of a character unworthy of their author. The Spanish poet wrote no less than 1800 plays, of which only about a fifth occupy a place in the literature of his country. And among this fifth are writings were five novels, from each of which one of the five vowels were excluded—a conceit which must have cost the author considerable labor. Of this kind of literary work, which has been called Lipogrammatic, there have been many instances in all languages. Tryphiodorus, composed a Greek Iliad, from the first book of which the letter a was excluded, the second book excluded b, and so on throughout the alphabet in succession. Pindar, too, wrote an ode from which he omitted the letter s; and Polycrates, a monk, performed a similar feat to that of Tryphiodorus in the sixth century. It has been recorded also of a Persian poet that he read a poem to the king of Persia, in the letter a were altogether excluded; but his royal highness speedily wearied of hearing it, and presented the complimenting the poet upon his skill and ingenuity, bluntly recommended that all the other letters should be sent to keep company with the excluded a.

In relation to those who have chosen to exert themselves in the way of microscopic writing, the fact will be recalled of Homer has been written in so small a compass as to be wholly inclosed in a nut-shell has been often referred to as one of these curiosities which would require a lens to seen ere it could be believed. However doubtful such a feat may appear, it is certain that one Hahn, who was a master of impossible, demonstrated by experiment that it could be done. A piece of vellum, 16 inches in length and 8 wide, which had been ruled with fine lines containing 30 verses, and thus filling both sides of the vellum, 15,000, the whole number of verses in the Iliad, could be written. He then took this piece of vellum, folded compactly, would go easily into the shell of a walnut. It is nothing unusual to find nowadays persons in a still more minute character than this, seeing that the Ten Command ments have been written in a compass small enough to fill a pea with room to spare. There is a portrait of Queen Anne in the British Museum, on which appear a number of minute lines and forgchen, which, when examined through a microscope, are shown to be the entire contents of a small folio book which the librarian has in his possession. This is similar effort in the way of microscopic calligraphy was some years ago discovered by a gentleman who had bought at a sale a very fine-look portrait of Alexander Pope, surrounded by a design in scroll-work. Upon looking through a glass, in order, if possible, to discover the artist's name, he was astonished to find that the fine lines in the surrounding scroll-work consisted of less than a fifth of the poet, so minutely transcribed as only to be legible by the aid of a magnifier. This was an evident imitation of a similar effort in the way of portraiture which was at one time in a library at Oxford, where a head of Charles I. was drawn in minute characters, which were only discernible the lens of an engraving, but which, when closely examined, were found to be the Book of Psalms, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE had a WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine for more than fourteen years, and during that time it has been in almost constant use, without any repairs, and is now running. Many thousand dollars' worth of work has been done with it in furnishing my hotel, and my wife says she would not exchange it for any other machine she has ever seen.

NEW YORK. A. D. FAILING.

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty cents per Box. Mailed by 60c. Sold by druggists. S. G. WELLING, 871 Broadway.

AGENTS Wanted.—Hinkley Knitting Machine. Knits every thing. Send to office, 176 Broadway, for Circulars.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GRAND EXCURSION TO
LAKE SUPERIOR.

The splendid steamer METROR leaves Cleveland, Ohio, on Friday, July 16th and 30th, August 13th and 27th, at 8 o'clock, P.M., and Detroit, Mich., the following evenings at 10 o'clock, for Superior City, Mich., and all points of interest on Lake Superior. Passage secured and other information obtained by application to

HUCKLEY & CO., Agts., Cleveland, O.,
or J. T. WHITTING, Agent, Detroit, Mich.;
or A. T. STEWART, Broadway, New York.

WEDLOCK;

OR, THE RIGHT RELATIONS OF THE SEXES, is a new and popular Summer Book, giving practical—sensible—instructive—and truthful information, and which should not marry. BOOKSELLERS have it. $1 50, or in extra gilt, $2 00. Sent, free, post, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

GET IT PURE.

A pint of Pain Paint for $3, a quart for $3, or a gallon for $20, double strength, with full directions, will be sent to any person, free of Express charges, on receipt of the money at DR. L. L. WOLCOTT'S Office, 181 Chatham Square, New York; or 4 pint bottles of Anhibitor, for Catarrh and Colds in the head, on receipt of $5. Small bottles sold at all Druggists.

A T DR. HERO'S SCHOOL for YOUNG LADIES are advantages to be found in no other. Circulars free. EMILY A. RICE, Principal. Send for circular to Dr. J. HERO, Westboro, Mass.

GROCERS, DRUGGISTS, HARDWARE and FURNISHING STORES sell

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'
SAPOLIO
FOR CLEANING AND POLISHING
TIN, BRASS, IRON, WINDOW GLASS, MARBLE, KNIVES, FORKS, MACHINERY, and general METALLIC WARE.
Removes all Rust or Stains. Gives a Brilliant Polish. Better, cheaper, quicker, and more convenient. Contains no poisonous or injurious ingredient. Is elegantly wrapped. It is to the interest of Storekeepers to sell it.
Depot, 211 Washington St., New York.
SOAPS OF ALL KINDS FOR FAMILY USE.
Established 1869.

PIANOS and ORGANS.

Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of first-class makers, for $275 and upward. NEW COMBINATION for $50 and upward. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $40 to $175, at 481 Broadway, N.Y. HORACE WATERS.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Ten Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE Three cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly in advance. When sent to Canada, the Postage from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with the same additional for the Magazine, or 52 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume; and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the first Number of January and July. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscriptions expire. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft is preferred to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it may be replaced without loss to the subscriber.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, be sure to name the post-office to which each is sent, and never alter the direction.

Subscribers who wish their MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscriptions expire. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft is preferred to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it may be replaced without loss to the subscriber.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, be sure to name the post-office to which each is sent, and never alter the direction.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 50 per Line: Cuts and Display, $2 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THOMSON'S
PATENT
"GLOVE-FITTING"

The Most Popular Corset ever introduced into the American Market.

The strongest proof of the excellence and popularity of this Corset is found in the numerous attempts to palm off worthless imitations as the genuine imported "Glove-Fitting." We therefore call special attention to our stamp, which is always to be found on the genuine goods, and of which we give a fac-simile below.

TRADE MARK.
THOMSON'S PATENT IMPROVED
GLOVE-FITTING.

N.B.—All infringers of Patents or our Copyright in Name, "Glove-Fitting," will be prosecuted.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
391 Broadway, N.Y.,
Sole Importers and Patentees for the United States.

CYPRESS HILLS
CEMETERY.
OFFICE, No. 124 BOWERY, N. Y.,
(Corner of Grand Street).
OFFICERS:
EDMUND DRIGGS, President.
WM. J. PEASE, Vice-President.
WILLIAM MILES, Treasurer.
WILLIAM EDWARDS, Secretary.
A. S. JARVIS, HERVEY G. LAW, JOHN I. VAN ALSTYNE, ALFRED M. WOOD, CHARLES N. G. PALMER, Sup't and Surveyor.

SWEET QUININE.

Sweet Quinine is universally used—done for dose—in the purest (bitter) Quinine, with the important advantage of the sweet instead of bitter.

SVAPNIA.

Svapnia is Opium Purified of its sickening and unconscious properties. It is the most perfect Anodyne and Sedative Opiate yet discovered.

Sold by druggists, prescribed by best physicians.
STEARNS, FARR, & CO., Chemists, New York.

ONLY ONE DOLLAR

FOR ZION'S HERALD to Jan. 1st, 1870. A first-class Illustrated Religious Journal of 16 pages. 700 Contributors; 5 Editors. The cheapest paper in the land. $2 50 a year, in advance. Specimen copies free. E. D. WINSLOW, Publisher,
11 Cornhill, Boston.

$15 A DAY. Samples Free. Address, with stamp, RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

BOOKS FOR THE COUNTRY.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Publish the following Works:

ROOSEVELT'S FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. Five Acres Too Much. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Careful Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss as involved in Amateur Farming, with much valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Large or Small Places in the Rural Districts. By Hooper B. Roosevelt, Author of "Country Life in North America," "Superior Fishing," "Game Birds," &c. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

FLAGG'S EUROPEAN VINEYARDS. Three Seasons in European Vineyards. Treating of Vine-Culture, Vine Diseases and its Cure; Wine-Making and Wine-Bibbing as affecting Health and Morals. By William J. Flagg. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SCOTT'S FISHING-BOOK. Fishing in American Waters. By Genio C. Scott. With 170 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

MEAD'S GRAPE CULTURE. An Elementary Treatise on American Grape Culture and Wine-Making. By Parsons B. Mead. Profusely Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

VAUX'S ARCHITECTURE. Villas and Cottages: A Series of Designs prepared for Execution in the United States. By Calvert Vaux, Architect. Fourth Edition, with New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Illustrated by nearly 900 Engravings. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

THE AMERICAN HOME GARDEN. Being Principles and Rules for the Culture of Vegetables, Fruits, Flowers, and Shrubbery. To which are added brief Notes on Landscape Gardening, with a Calendar of Operations and Chemical Constituents. By Alexander Wilson. Several Hundred Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

WOOD'S HOMES WITHOUT HANDS: being a Description of the Habitations of Animals, classed according to their Principles of Construction. By J. G. Wood, M.A., F.L.S., Author of "Illustrated Natural History." With about 140 Illustrations engraved on Wood by G. Pearson, from Original Designs made by F. W. Keyl and E. A. Smith, under the Author's Superintendence. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 50.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above works by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Removed to 335 Broadway.

$15. THE COLLINS WATCH FACTORY $20.

The Collins Metal and Jewelry Factory has removed from 37 Nassau Street to their splendid New Offices,

No. 335 BROADWAY.

These superior Watches have now been in use over three years, and give universal satisfaction; and although sold at so moderate a price, are not surpassed in appearance and for time by gold ones costing $100 and $200. They have been greatly improved, but the price remains the same, $15. Those of extra fine finish, $20. Gents' and Ladies' sizes. Jewelry of the richest styles, in every respect equal to that sold at double the price. We have but

ONE OFFICE, NO AGENTS,

and are not responsible for the bogus and worthless goods sold at many jewelry establishments. Our Factory is the ONLY PLACE where the genuine Collins Metal Watches and Jewelry can be had.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.,
No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth Street,
(Up Stairs).

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

The Novelty is the best Press ever invented with which to do your own printing, and is second to none for the use of General Printers.

Price of Presses, $15, $20, $30, $60.

Send to BENJ. O. WOODS, Proprietor, 337 Federal St., Boston, Mass., for descriptive circular containing testimonials from all parts of the country, with specimens of work done on the press, and specimen sheets of Types, Cuts, Borders, &c.

The following correspondence is self-explanatory:

Executive Mansion,
Washington, D. C., June 8, 1869.

Benj. O. Woods, Esq., 337 Federal St., Boston:

Sir,—Please send by express, "Collect on delivery," one of your "Novelty" Printing Presses, complete, price $15.

This press is for the son of the President. Please address it to "The President, Executive Mansion, Washington, D. C." Very truly yours,

O. E. BABCOCK, Secretary.

Executive Mansion,
Washington, D. C., June 32, 1869.

Benj. O. Woods, Esq., 337 Federal St., Boston:

Sir,—The President requests me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th inst., and also the receipt of the press and material by Express.

The President wishes me to thank you for the kindness in supplying so much material for the kindergarten of Jesse at much above the price he is to pay. Mr. Jesse is much pleased with it.

I am, sir, your obt. serv't,

O. E. BABCOCK, Secretary.

The Novelty Press, wherever used, has given great satisfaction; doing excellent work, and with great ease of simplicity. Merchants, druggists, and business men generally can make a great saving of time and expense by its use.—Boston Journal, June 26.

Office of the New Brunswick Water Co.}
New Brunswick, N. J., June 23rd, 1869.}

Benj. O. Woods: Dear Sir—The Octavo Press and furniture came safely to hand, and works upon the first trial, to my entire satisfaction. Yours, &c.

THOS. N. DOUGHTY, Secretary.

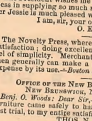
IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.



The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from every other known to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to gold have deceived the most critical judges, and even the eagle eye of the engineer of the press in stamping the cases for the engine properties, but has also obtained a medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are fully jewelled, perfectly regulated, and in every way well finished and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them an excellent time-keeper.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.

Address all orders to C. O. D. with charges,
Address JULES D. HUGUENIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

FOR PIANO-FORTE INSTRUCTION

There is no Book equal to it, is the remark of every one who has carefully examined with RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD, the most popular, thorough, and progressive work. Scales, Exercises, and Exercises ever published. Price $3 75. Sent post free. Fully set to Music Dealers. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, 277 Washington St., Boston.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $8, $12, $16. Offices, $15, $30, $60. Send for a circular to PRESS CO.
15 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

$10 PER DAY GUARANTEED

Agents to sell our Improved Sewing Machine. It makes the lock stitch, alike on both sides, runs the lightest or heaviest, and is equal in every respect to any Sewing Machine ever invented. Price $25. Warranted 3 years. Send for circular. Address Journeay, Clark, & Co., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., or Chicago, Ill.

PARLOR STEAM ENGINE: made entirely of brass. Will run a small furnace complete; will disagree a child can work it. Sent free, with instructions, for $1 00; three for $2 50. Address
WALTER HOLT, No. 102 Nassau Street, New York.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

VINEGAR.—How made from Cider, Wine, Molasses, or Sorghum in 10 hours, without using drugs. For terms, circulars, &c., address U. H. KNOX, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Ct.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., 30 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

MADAME FOY'S
COMBINED
Corset Skirt Supporter and Bustle.

Is just the article needed by every lady who would consult health, comfort, and style. Every one of these goods have been sold within the last five years, and the demand from it is constantly increasing.

HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers,
New Haven, Conn.

D. B. Saunders & Co., Boston, Mass.; Lee, Alexander, Bros. & Co., Philadelphia; Adams & Moore, Baltimore; Kauffman & Blum, New York, are our agents.

$100 PER DAY DISCONTINUED.

Having obtained an extensive and wide-spread sale for our "CENTURY" brand of Fine-Cut Cheroots Tobacco, we desire to announce that we shall not pack daily 4000 in order to sell 4000 cigars after this date, July 1st, 1869, its merits being so favorably recognized that this daily packing is no longer necessary. To avoid misapprehension, however, we would add that we shall continue to make orders for elegant Meerschaum Pipes in our "YACHT CLUB" and "EUREKA" brands of Smoking Tobacco.

The "YACHT CLUB" is devoid of injurious, and can not injure the health, and is especially recommended to people of sedentary occupations or nervous constitutions.

The trade are invited to send for circulars.

P. LORILLARD, New York.

PSYCHOMANCY, Fascination; or, Science of the Soul, as applied to the purposes of life. 400 Pages, 8vo. By Hickory Hamilton, B.A. A curious book for the million. Tells how to cultivate personal magnetism to acquire the wonderful power over men or animals. Can be obtained by sending postage stamp and address to T. W. EVANS & CO.,
41 South 9th Street, Philadelphia.

MAPLEWOOD INSTITUTE for Young Ladies, Pittsfield, Mass., commences its Fall term Sept. 15th. Facilities and location unsurpassed. Rev. C. V. SPEAR, Principal.

EMPLOYMENT that pays. For particulars, address E. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

$10 PER DAY.—Agents wanted to sell an Amusing Set of Toys. Specimen and particulars on receipt of 25 cents. Address, J. E. CASE, 26 Liberty St., N. Y.

$9 A DAY FOR ALL. Address A. J. FULLAM, 650 Broadway, N. Y.

"As natural as Thackeray, and more real than Dickens."

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
have just published:

My Daughter Elinor.

A NOVEL.

8vo, Paper, $1 25.

A good American novel, presenting life and society in the United States—the life that we live and the society of which we are a constituent part—but long been the desideratum of publishers and the despair of novel-readers. It is a story in which the characters and types of the American people at large, differing from the same society in communities of other countries, is rarely found to be the case even from the press. Such a story is "My Daughter Elinor," which is destined to attain a wide popularity. Its ease delineating with natural-ness and verisimilitude the life that is around us. It is from such books that the historian gathers the habitudes of the age of which he writes. The style is easy and unaffected, at times straining overmuch at epigram, and again rambling a little into elegant prose; the dialogue natural and effective, never torturing with obvious comment or clearing with inevitable inference.—Evening Post.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send the above work by mail, postpaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 25.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
have just Published:

FAMOUS LONDON MERCHANTS. A Book for Boys. By H. R. Fox Bourne. With Portrait of George Peabody and 34 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

SIGHTS AND SENSATIONS IN FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND; or, Experiences of an American Journalist during the War. By Edward Gryffyn. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SANDS'S PHILOSOPHY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, the Pupil, the School. By Nathaniel Sands. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Careful Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss as involved in Amateur Farming, with much Valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Large or Small Places in the Rural Districts. By Hooper B. Roosevelt, Author of "Country Life in North America," "Superior Fishing," "Game Birds," &c. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S SCRIPTURE HISTORY. The Stories of the Bible, Selected and Arranged in the Words of the Text from Captivity. Edited by William Smith, LL.D. With Maps and Woodcuts. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 00. Uniform with The Student's New Testament History.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By Alfred Russel Wallace, Author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro," "Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection," &c. With Ten Maps and Fifty-one elegant Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By Genio C. Scott. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through Great Britain, Ireland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Northern France, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad and Steamboat Guide, Passport, Consular, and Currency Directory. Revised Edition: Seventh Year. Large 12mo, Leather, with Pocket-Book Form, $3 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversation in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Plan. Revised to the Present Time. For the use of Travellers." By W. Pessmore Fenning. Author of "Professor of Modern Languages. Revised Edition, with Notes and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 18mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

The New Novels

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HETTY. By Henry Kingsley, Author of "Stretton," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. 8vo, Paper, $1 25.

CORD AND CREESE. By the Author of "The Dodge Club." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

STRETTON. A Novel. By Henry Kingsley, Author of "Hetty," "Geoffrey Hamlyn," "Ravenshoe," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE DODGE CLUB; or, Italy in 1859. By James De Mille, Author of "Cord and Creese," &c. With the DODGE Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS.

New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.

THE VIRGINIANS. 150 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE NEWCOMES. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 63 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will issue immediately New Editions of Thackeray's other Novels, Illustrated by the Author, at correspondingly low prices.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS.

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

IF IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

☞ To be followed by Charles Reade's other Novels.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S LAST NOVELS:

PHINEAS FINN. Illustrated. Complete in Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $1 75.

HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Complete. With 64 Illustrations by Marcus Stone. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $1 80. Part II., separately, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TO AGENTS.

LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812 is now ready for delivery to Agents. Price, in Cloth, $6 00; Full Sheep, $7 50; Half Calf, $10 00. HARPER & BROTHERS.

AFTER SUPPER.—STRANGE ADMISSION!

MR. S. "May I have the pleasure of Waltzing with you, Miss JONES?"

MISS J. "I would with pleasure, but unfortunately I'm quite Full!"

A Seven per Cent. GOLD LOAN.

$6,500,000.

The KANSAS PACIFIC Railway, now in successful operation from Kansas City to Sheridan, proposes to build an extension to Denver, Colorado. The Government has granted Three Millions of Acres of the finest lands in KANSAS and Colorado, which are mortgaged for the security of a loan of $6,500,000.

This loan is secured in the most effectual manner. It represents a road in profitable operation, and will open the trade of the Rocky Mountain Country, and connect it with the great markets of the East. It is considered to be one of the best loans in the market.

EVEN BETTER IN SOME RESPECTS THAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

The loan has thirty years to run, principal and interest payable in gold, semi-annually, seven per cent.

The coupons will be payable semi-annually in either Frankfort, London, or New York, and will be free from Government taxation. The bonds for the present are sold in currency at 96, with accrued interest.

Circulars, maps, and pamphlets sent on application.

DABNEY, MORGAN, & CO.,
53 Exchange Place, N.Y.

M. K. JESUP & CO.,
12 Pine Street, N.Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Why Languish with a Sick Headache when one or two doses of that pleasant remedy, TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, will remove the pain and leave the brain cloudless?
KEPT BY DRUGGISTS ALL OVER THE WORLD.

TO THE BOOK TRADE.

DR. CHASE'S RECIPES: or, INFORMATION FOR EVERY ONE, a book of 384 pages of practical information for Physicians, and all branches of Mechanics, Farmers, Farmers, and for general family use, is now

OPEN TO THE TRADE.

This is the most practical Book of Recipes in the WORLD. Evidence—over 350,000 copies of the work have been sold. Every Bookstore should have from a dozen to 100 copies.

For one copy enclose $1 25. For Price-List to Dealers, send for a Circular.

Editors who will give this advertisement one insertion, and send us a marked copy, will receive the book postpaid.

THE JUDD FAMILY; OR, AN EVENING VISIT, AND WHAT CAME OF IT, will be ready for Agents in August.

Address A. W. CHASE, M.D.,
July, 1869. Ann Arbor, Mich.

A, 1.—Fragrant as the Lily of the Valley is the Aroma of Barry's Tricopherous.

MRS. ESQ, Willoughby Ave., near Stevens Street, Brooklyn, says, "BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS is the most beautifying Hair Restorer I have ever used."

FOUNTAINS, VASES, and GARDEN ORNAMENTS,

JANES, KIRTLAND, & CO.,
8, 10, & 12 Read St., New York.

"FRESH AS A MAIDEN'S BLUSH" is the pure peachy complexion which follows the use of HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM. It is the true secret of beauty. Fashionable ladies in society understand this.

The Magnolia Balm changes the rustic country girl into a city belle more rapidly than any other one thing.

Redness, Sunburn, Tan, Freckles, Blotches, and all effects of the summer sun disappear when it is used, and a genial, cultivated, fresh expression is obtained, which rivals the bloom of youth. Beauty is possible to all who will invest 75 cents at any respectable store and insist on getting the Magnolia Balm.

Use nothing but LYON'S KATHAIRON to dress the hair.

STEVENS' POCKET RIFLE.

With Detachable Shoulder-Rest.

Most popular arm made for Sporting and Target-Shooting. SMITH & WESSON'S REVOLVERS, in any quantity, for cash, at hundred price. WILLIAMSON'S DERRINGERS, and other Pistols.

J. W. STORRS & CO., MFR'S Agents,
223 Broadway, New York.

HUTCHINSON'S HAIR COLORING.—The best and most reliable HAIR RESTORATIVE ever offered to the public. PRICE ONLY 50 CTS. PER BOTTLE, or large bottles for $1 00. Satisfaction guaranteed in all cases. Sold by all Druggists, and Wholesale by JOHN F. HENRY, at U.S. Family Medicine Warehouse, No. 8 COLLEGE PLACE, New York.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
127 Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 74 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 94 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

MANN'S DOUBLE TROLLING SPOON.

This Trolling Bait stands unequaled for catching Pike, Pickerel, Bass, &c. It is far superior to any single spoon ever invented.
Price 90c. each. JOHN H. MANN, Syracuse, N.Y.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE and CLAVERACK COLLEGE offers a Four Years' Collegiate Course for Ladies. Graduates receive the Baccalaureate Degree. A Three Years' Seminary Course for Ladies and Gentlemen. The best collegiate preparation for young men. Board and tuition in the entire course $300 a year. Re-opened September 6. Address REV. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Claverack, N.Y.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES to Agents, to introduce the Wilson Sewing Machine. Stitch alike on both sides. Samples on two weeks' trial. Extra inducements to experienced agents. For further particulars, address the WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO., Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMPSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS THUPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KUNKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MRS. C. BLUME, Pittsburg, Pa.; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; CLUETT & SONS, Albany and Troy, N.Y.; J. T. HAMMER, Rhinebeck, N.Y.; J. H. HOUTENMEYER, Ithaca, N.Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; C. M. MEYER, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. M. LOGAN, New Haven, Conn.

IVORIDE

KNIFE-HANDLES.

EQUAL IN

BEAUTY and DURABILITY

TO THE GENUINE

IVORY,

AND AT

HALF THE PRICE.

This material is guaranteed to resist the action of heat and cold, whether of water or of the atmosphere.

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS.

J. Russell & Co.,
Green River Cutlery Works,
83 BEEKMAN STREET, New York City.

NATURE'S GREAT RESTORER.

GREEN MOUNTAIN MINERAL SPRING WATER, Mount Holly, Vt.

This celebrated water cures Dyspepsia, Rheumatism, Piles, Scrofula, Urinary Diseases, and Female Weaknesses. "It is a tonic and general builder-up of the system." Send for Descriptive Circular. Sold by Druggists.

MCKESSON & ROBBINS, No. 91 Fulton St., N.Y., GEO. C. GOODWIN & CO., Boston, Mass., Agents.
F. FENN & CO., Proprietors, Rutland, Vt.

GOING UP TOWN!

On the 15th of August we shall remove to
747 BROADWAY, near 8th St.,
and now offer our present stock of
CHINA, GLASS, AND FANCY GOODS
at very low prices.

Davis Collamore & Co.,
470 Broadway, near Broome St.

IN REMOTE SETTLEMENTS OF UNTOLD VALUE.

Food makes blood; blood makes the body. If the blood be pure, the body is healthy. So if we are not in health, we know some impurities are lurking about which must be removed, and the sooner the better.

Brandreth's Pills remove all from the system which nature needs no longer.

The wonderful cures effected by Brandreth's Pills have arrested the attention of enlightened physicians. Upward of five thousand now use them in their daily practice, and two hundred have given their written testimony as to their innocence and value as cleansers of the bowels and blood.

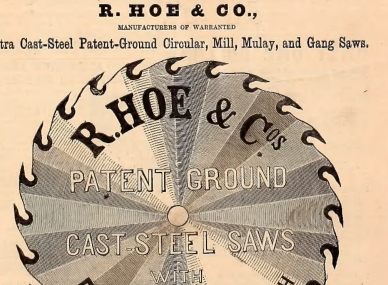
Their untold value is to those living in settlements where doctors can only be had at great expense. For if you are sick, you have only to take one or more doses of Brandreth's Pills to get cured. Full Directions are with each box.

Sold by all Druggists.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Genuine MEERSCHAUM goods. Stores: 518 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, and 64 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 5546. Repairing and Boiling also done.

R. HOE & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS OF WARRANTED

Extra Cast-Steel Patent-Ground Circular, Mill, Mulay, and Gang Saws.



CIRCULAR SAWS,
WITH MOVABLE OR INSERTED TEETH.

We claim for our Patent Circular Saw the following advantages over all others:
The shanks of the teeth are elastic, and exert a uniform discussion in the sockets.
The stability of the plate is in no way affected by inserting new sets of teeth.
Each tooth, independently, may be adjusted to the cutting line.
No rivets, keys, or other objectionable appliances are employed in connection with the teeth, which are so simple in construction and as easily used as a nut for a bolt.
In short, all the difficulties heretofore experienced in the use of movable teeth for saws are fully met and obviated by this invention.

Also,

TUTTLE PATENT "CHAMPION" CROSS-CUT SAWS.

CROSS-CUT SAWS OF ALL KINDS.

SAW MANDRELS, CUMMING MACHINES, &c.

Send for Catalogues and Price-Lists.

R. HOE & CO.,
Printing-Press, Machine, and Saw Manufacturers.
NEW YORK; BOSTON, MASS.; and LONDON, Eng.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 660.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

GREAT WHISKY CONFLAGRATION IN PHILADELPHIA, ON THE NIGHT OF AUGUST 4, 1869.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 330.]

THE FIRE IN PHILADELPHIA.

THE late fire in Philadelphia was the most destructive that ever occurred in that city. The buildings consumed constituted the largest warehouse in the United States. They possessed an enormous capacity, and were considered by their architects to be so completely proof against fire that they advised the owner to avoid the expense of insurance.

These buildings were erected for Colonel W. C. PATTERSON in 1854; they were nine in number, situated on Market Street, extending east to Front Street, and having also a front on Lombard. They were of brick, with iron columns on the first story, and with walls eighteen inches in thickness.

The fire originated in the section on the corner of Lombard Street. About seven o'clock a large portion of the wall on Lombard Street fell to the pavement with a loud crash, supposed to have been pushed out by the weight upon the floors. The whisky stored went down with the ruins, and in a few moments a terrific explosion took place, throwing down every wall of section H, scattering bricks, timbers, etc., in every direction, while the flames shot up in a solid body for above the surrounding buildings, creating a general consternation among the residents of the neighborhood. The explosion, of course, set the entire contents of the warehouse on fire, and soon burning whisky ran down the gutters in Swanson Street to Pine, and thence into the sewer leading to the river.

The flames extended until they involved the entire block. The firemen from all portions of the city were soon upon the ground. Shortly after midnight their efforts were materially aided by a shower of rain. By daylight the fire was quite far from being extinguished, was under control.

There were 20,000 barrels of whisky stored upon the premises. The entire loss of property is estimated at between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000, on which there was insurance to the amount of $2,290,000. The largest loss is reported by the Imperial, of London, nearly, $319,000.

WILLIAM ARETHORN, one of the firemen, was so seriously injured by falling from a ladder that he died. A large number of persons suffered injuries.

This fire will lead to an investigation as to the propriety of storing large quantities of whisky in a single warehouse; it will also tend to diminish the confidence hitherto felt in fire-proof buildings —at least in those where combustible matter is stored.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1869.

THE UNITED STATES AND SPAIN.

THE revolution in Cuba has now continued for ten months. The intelligence from the island is always confused and uncertain, but there has been no report of any serious and decisive battle, and the military operations have been apparently confined to skirmishing and guerrilla warfare. The form of a civil government has been proclaimed in the Cuban camp, but there is no evidence that it fulfills any functions. The "Grand Congress" on the 10th of April unanimously declared that the revolutionary party is fighting for independence of Spain and annexation to the United States, and that the Junta in New York from time to time announces that it has very good news, and that decisive events are about to happen.

Meanwhile the wrongs under which Cuba suffered from the government which Spain has overthrown are notorious. The island was squeezed to furnish money for the Spanish treasury, and was controlled wholly by Spanish interests and influences, so that every kind of progress was hopeless. For many years there has been profound discontent; and if the Cuban revolution had not been simultaneous with that of Spain, and the character of the population had inspired more confidence in the practicability of a wise and liberal political system, the revolt would have commanded the unmingled sympathy of civilized countries. But the events in Spain promising great reforms naturally suggested waiting to learn whether terms of conciliation might not be offered which would be agreeable to the Cubans, while it was difficult to believe that the success of the revolution would do more than establish a South American republic upon the island. This last consideration does not, indeed, affect the right of the Cubans to establish their independence of a harsh foreign rule, but it does necessarily affect the feeling with which the citizens of Cuba regard.

During the ten months of the revolution Spain has been busy at home remodeling its government, and has finally adopted a liberal Constitution, with general suffrage and freedom of the press—indeed, with the usual safeguards of liberty, but with a royal head of the system. Unable to agree upon a King, the Assembly appointed a Regent, and the present political situation of the country is therefore temporary. But in a country so long subject to ecclesiastical domination as Spain has been there is an ignorance of the kind that is most difficult to remove or to control. There have been plots and risings, and although order has been generally maintained the country is still disturbed, and its situation is far from satisfactory. The last loan for the public expenses was taken at 20 to 40 cents on the dollar, and the deficit this year must be many millions of dollars. More troops for Cuba are going to be spared, and those upon the island are evidently unable to subdue the revolutionists. It is reported that a general levy of the Spanish population in Cuba is now to be made for a final effort against the revolution. Should that fail the result would seem to be inevitable.

Under these circumstances it is reported that the United States have proposed to the Spanish Government that Cuba shall be relinquished upon the payment of a certain sum, for which the United States shall be responsible. And it is added that this proposition is accompanied by the threat that if Spain does not accede, belligerent rights or the power of Cuba will be acknowledged by this Government. It would be better, however, for the United States to offer to mediate than to make a distinct proposition of this kind; because if accompanied with the threat named it is virtually an intervention. Recognition of belligerent rights to Cuba would be a practical recognition of independence. Such a concession, as MR. SUMNER truly says in his speech upon Our Foreign Relations, "bears the same relation to acknowledged independence as gentle fears to hope."

An offer of mediation in Cuba would proceed with peculiar grace from the United States to Spain. This country has scrupulously and triumphantly maintained its neutrality in the contest. Its neighborhood to Cuba and its old amity with Spain indicate it as a friendly mediator. If Spain declined the offer we should of course reserve to our discretion the acknowledgment of belligerent rights or the recognition of independence; and whatever measure should be adopted it would appear as the result of the actual situation, and not as a penalty imposed upon Spain for not accepting our advice. It is, indeed, reported that such advice has been made by this Government upon the suggestion of the Spanish Minister, and with the knowledge that it would be accepted. But in this case the threat would be wholly unnecessary. To grant belligerent rights to Cuba when we were satisfied that it was entitled to them would be merely the recognition of the situation, and not an unfriendly act to Spain. But to tell Spain that it must accept certain terms that we offer, or we will virtually take Cuba, is merely an insult.

TEMPERANCE IN POLITICS.

THE Massachusetts Democratic Convention meets on the 24th of August, and will doubtless nominate MR. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, who will get a much larger vote than he will get alone because of the Temperance complication. A few years since there was virtually a prohibitory law in Massachusetts. Then came a reaction; and after some delay a law was passed, like that recommended by the committee of the late Temperance Convention in this State, which authorized each town to determine for itself whether to license or prohibit. That, again, was superseded at the last session of the Legislature by the present law, which is prohibitory of all the ordinary drinks except cider. Even lager beer is forbidden. This, however, was against the advice of Governor CLAFLIN, of Senator WILSON, and of the Republican party, the President of the Temperance Alliance, who was in consequence asked to resign.

But the law was no sooner enforced by the seizure of MR. PEABODY'S private lager beer than there was such a protest of public opinion that, after the delay of a day or two, there came a written opinion of the Attorney-General, under which the liquor was restored and the prosecution abandoned; and presently MR. SPOONER was invited to resume the Presidency of the Temperance Association. Meanwhile Judge PITMAN, the leader of the prohibitory party and late President of the Senate, had been appointed by Governor CLAFLIN to the Bench, and the lager beer seller at Arlington was convicted before him, and received the whole sentence of the law. The feeling of the State is aroused, and the Temperance question is essentially be an important element in the election.

It is, of course, a question within the Republican party. The liquor interest purchases, subscribes, works, but is much too sensible to nominate a separate ticket. It throws all its force for the party which is most favorable to its purposes; and that is the Republican party. The temperance men, whether moderate or thorough, are Republicans. Many of the most ardent are anxious that the Republican party should declare for prohibition; and this year many of the moderates, unwilling that the party should fall under the control of the thorough temperance leaders, are willing to vote at all, or will vote for MR. ADAMS as a protest and warning. The papers are discussing vigorously the proper policy for the Republican party to pursue. The Commonwealth—a radical Republican but not a radical temperance advocate—thinks that it will be neither possible nor reputable for the Convention to avoid the question, and urges a plain declaration of principle.

Hitherto the party has refused to make prohibition a test; and it should reflect very carefully before it decides to do so now. Of course no well-informed man, Republican or not, supposes that a majority of the voters in the country are now, or will be for a long time, in favor of a prohibitory law. The reason of this is by no means that the relation of drunkenness and crime is not well understood; but it is to be sought in opinions as to the most efficient remedy of the difficulty, and of the rightful function of government. A Republican, therefore, who urges that the party shall make prohibition a party principle, proposes that the party shall retire from the control of public affairs; and his course can be justified only by the conviction that the ascendency of the Democratic party will be more destructive to the country, and directly or indirectly to the cause of temperance. That it would be better to call the Democratic party to power in the present situation of the country, although the great debate of the last few years is passing away, no Republican believes. If, however, he would make prohibition a party principle, it can only be because he holds that Democratic dominance, with unrestrained license of drinking, would be a greater blessing than the supremacy of the Republican party with moderate temperance legislation. His policy would be to increase drunkenness in order to stimulate public opinion to its legal prohibition.

The fault in this, it seems to us, is to maintain the organization of the great and powerful party whose sympathies are with all humane reforms, to which the temperance legislation hitherto is due, and which will unquestionably advance as public opinion advances upon the subject. Rather than that no party and no law can go. The Connecticut Democratic Convention of New York most truly remark:

"Prohibitory legislation as the fruit of mere political organization, and without public pressure upon, and ready in existence or by the creation of new ones, would prove a failure except as the people gave it efficiency by the force of its popular verdict, and the enforcement of adequate penalties for violating such a law."

But thus far the advocates of prohibition mistake the point upon which to concentrate their efforts. That their policy is sound they should strike at the root as well as at the branch of the mischief, and prohibit the manufacture and importation as well as the sale of intoxicating liquors.

VIRGINIA REPUBLICANISM.

BY the universal consent of the stanchest Republicans in the country the division of the party in Virginia ought no longer to continue. If the supporters of MR. WELLS had persisted in denying the validity of MR. WALKER'S election, and in contesting the result before Congress, there would have been reason for maintaining the two organizations. But the result of the election has been honestly accepted by the late opponents of MR. WALKER; and as an earnest of their good faith the chairman of the WELLS faction, himself requesting, as he truly says, a hundred thousand Republican voters, proposes a union with the WALKER organization, reasonable that the late division was a question of men rather than of principles. It may be regretted that, if this were so, the union had not been effected before the election; but it was not, and we must therefore deal with the actual situation.

The election, as will be remembered, was carried by the secession of about twenty thousand Republican voters from the vote cast for MR. WALKER. The bulk of his vote was not Republican, and when the representative of the turnized Democracy proposes a union upon an honorable understanding there should be no hesitation upon the other side. If there be hesitation it is suspicious, and the reply of MR. GILMER can not possibly be considered unsatisfactory. MR. GILMER asserts that the party which he represents is the National Republican party of Virginia. He asks whether the fact that many who were lately secessionists acted with it makes it less Republican.

The reply to this is, that those who were professedly and sincerely such Republicans voted for MR. WALKER. The bitterest enemies and revilers of the Republican policy were his supporters. MR. GILMER, the correspondent of the World, whose remarks we recently quoted, were among the WALKER voters. Does MR. GILMER claim that in any serious sense they are Republicans? The correspondent of the World which contains the letter of MR. GILMER says, derisively: "The Democratic party had nothing to do with the Virginia election." Certainly not! MR. O'GORMAN exclaims exultingly to a crowd at Tammany, in whose name MR. GILMER nominates JOHN T. HOFFMAN for President, that "the deed was done well. The Republican policy was carried in Virginia mainly by the votes of its opponents. That fact is universally acknowledged, and MR. GILMER has no right to claim that such a body of voters is the Republican party of Virginia merely because from the necessity of the situation they sustained the conditions imposed by Congress. When he says to the hundred thousand undoubted Republicans who voted for MR. WELLS that he will "gladly welcome" them to a party of twenty thousand Republicans, plus four times as many of their opponents, he may insist that he represents the friends of General GRANT, but he must remember that those friends support Tammany Hall, MR. O'GORMAN, and MR. GARVIN in denouncing General GRANT.

The plain duty of MR. GILMER was to have accepted immediately and heartily the proposition of MR. JENCKES, and to have secured the organization of all those who, however previously differing upon the question of amnesty, differ no longer, and who have no difference whatever upon the other great points of Republican policy, equal suffrage, the Fifteenth Amendment, and all that they imply. His refusal prolongs the perplexing situation. He, indeed, gladly welcomes the most earnest Republicans to the following, among others, of those who remark that "we can not shut our eyes, hold our nose, and swallow the black dose of negro suffrage." But that is evidently the promising method of uniting a Republican party.

It will be necessary for the friends of the Administration and its principles to watch the course of affairs in Virginia with great attention. Governor WALKER speaks very fairly. But when he says that equal rights must be maintained, it is for him to consider by whom they are most likely to be maintained and by their proved and professed friends, or by their ancient and open enemies.

GEORGE PEABODY.

MR. GEORGE PEABODY has been again publicly honored for his generous gifts to the interests of labor in England and education in this country. At the completion of the Peabody Institute in Danvers a few weeks since there was a meeting of distinguished persons, who said and sang very pleasant things of MR. PEABODY. At the White Sulphur Springs, Virginia, he had received the freedom of the railroads furnishing him special and comfortable cars, the guests from the Southern States, through a committee, of which MR. HENRY A. WISE was chairman and MR. JOHN MINOR BOTTS orator, presented him with congratulatory resolutions and a speech. Meanwhile, in London MR. STORY'S statue of MR. PEABODY was being erected, and unveiled in the presence of the Prince of Wales, the United States Minister, the sculptor, and other distinguished personages, and with the very friendly speech making. MR. PEABODY has the satisfaction of knowing how fully and gratefully appreciated his most excellent purposes are, and of seeing them in course of happy accomplishment.

It is to be regretted, however, that amidst all this deserved congratulation the formal expression of thanks upon the part of any number of citizens of the Southern States should have fallen to such a gentleman as MR. JAMES LYONS. It might as well have been MR. HENRY A. WISE, who is the guest and admirer of MR. PEABODY gives an immense sum to support schools in the Southern States. Thereupon MR. JAMES LYONS, lifting his eyebrows, proceeds to flap and soar: "I take leave to say that down-trodden and oppressed as never a Christian people were before—placed below the negro and stripped of all their constitutional rights, the Southern men nevertheless retain the lofty instincts which made their soldiers brave, and their women more than Spartan wives and mothers—" and so on. This was peculiarly graceful and tasteful and conciliatory and appropriate. The President of the United States, MR. JOHNSON, expressed the sense of the policy which MR. JAMES LYONS denounced, is one of the managers of the Peabody fund; and the resolutions addressed to MR. PEABODY could only be considered an elaborate insult, if they were not ludicrously childish. Why is it that Americans living in the Southern States must always be represented in their most provincial occasions to this absurd conventional attitude? Why must they always result in ridicule upon the speaker.

In London the Prince of Wales spoke in a peculiarly strain of this country, of MR. PEABODY, of MR. STORY, and of MR. MOTLEY. MR. MOTLEY'S little speech was peculiarly felicitous in its allusions to MR. PEABODY. "Most fortunate as well as most deserving," he said, he has discovered a secret for which misers might sigh in vain—the art of keeping a great fortune for himself through all time. For I have often thought of a famous epitaph, familiar, no doubt, to many who now hear me, 'What I spent I had; what I gave I have; what I kept I lost.' And what a magnificent treasure, according to these noble and touching words, has our friend, and the poor man's friend, preserved for himself till time shall be no more, and

"Dispose to be his bounty and his measure,
When all the breathers of this world are dead."

A JUNKETING TRAMP.

IN the good old Democratic days which were so piously bemoaned the other evening at Tammany Hall, and whose return is so ardently desired by the disinterested patriots there assembled, there could be no such grave and withering charges of "junketing" brought against the President of the United States. The innocent recreations of that great and good man, the penultimate Democratic President, PIERCE, were co-operating with Border Ruffians led by the Democratic ATCHISON, and shooting free settlers in KANSAS. The relaxations of his successor, and the last blessing in the form of a Democratic President that has been vouchsafed to us, Mr. JAMES BUCHANAN, were harboring rebels in his Cabinet, and wringing his hands over the beginnings of civil war, with the maundering complaint that nobody had a right to do so, and nobody had a right to stop it. These were the reasonable and humane aversions over which Tammany was vocal with praises.

Alas! alas! we have fallen upon evil days! The President of the United States, no longer gayly causing American freemen to be shot, and propagating slavery—no more airily regretting that rebellion can not be stopped, and abandons himself to breathing the ocean air at Long Branch and recuperating at Saratoga. Since THERSITES disported himself at Capri there has been nothing so odious as the "junketing" of the gloomy, imperial GRANT at the sea-side. Such is the emergency that Democratic patriots hasten to the city to denounce the President for going out of town. Leaving the "two-forty" in the wagon, the iced Champagne in the goblet, and the pâté untouched until after the set of their speeches, they arraign in far-resounding rhetoric this feasting tyrant. What was NERO's fiddling while Rome was burning to GRANT's "junketing" while the rights of American citizens are every where despised?

It is notorious, it is flagrant, that since GRANT destroyed the power of his country to make war he has ruined its influence in the Cabinet, and that no American any where is longer safe. A hundred thousand Americans are wandering around the world, and every body knows that they are all be roasted at slow fires by the effete Despotisms, while the taciturn GRANT, unconcerned, will still twist his scornful heel around in the Lancers, and loll and languish in the lap of Sybaritic delights. Oh, for an hour of the Spartan PIERCE! of the heroic BUCHANAN! of the spotless FLOYD! of the incorruptible TOUCEY! of the patriotic J. DAVIS, of Mississippi! of the liberty-loving MASON! of the honorable SIDNEY! of HENRY A. WISE! of WIGFALL! of VALLANDIGHAM! of H. CLAY DEAN! of all the noble Democratic host whose names and deeds are the national glory!

For further particulars of our progress toward voluptuous empire, and of our fatal tendency to selfish and corrupt politics, inquire at the office of the Mayor, of the Corporation Attorney, and of the District Attorney. The latter, in the intervals of its public advertisement at Tammany Hall, will be glad to show to all interested an infallible remedy for junketing at Long Branch, which its name is JOHN T. HOFFMAN, that only junkets at Saratoga.

THE CROTON BOARD.

THIS is one of the few distinct portions of the city government which has the confidence of tax-payers, but yet it is the only one whose salaries are not paid by the tax-eaters who control the affairs of the city. The officers of the Board are THOMAS STEPHENS, President; ROBERT L. DARRAGH, Assist. Commissioner; and General GEORGE S. GREEN, Chief Engineer. The latter succeeded Mr. CRAVEN, who is now in Europe, and possesses all the requisites for the station—engineering skill, official integrity, and high personal character—and doubtless exercises the same influence over the action of the Board which was allowed to Mr. CRAVEN. Its duties are of the most important character. A reservoir for storing water in Putnam County, to maintain during the heats of summer the requisite daily supply of sixty million gallons of water, is now being constructed—work with which General GREEN is perfectly familiar; but the importance of the Board is most felt in the arrangements necessary for the distribution of the water, in which they are brought into contact with every citizen.

If this duty were not performed impartially and justly the city would feel the burden of misgovernment with a severity not yet known, as there is the widest opening for favoritism and oppression in fixing the charge upon each citizen, and particularly among those whose supply is special, arising from some industry in which they are engaged. The persons constituting the Board are in the constant and diligent performance of their duties, and would unquestionably be paid but for the want of agreement in the distribution of patronage between them and those who pay the salaries. The grounds alleged, however, are the litigation set on foot by JOHN J. BRADLEY to oust Mr. STEPHENS from office of President, and a supposed illegal construction of the Board, resulting from their refusal to recognize him in that position. The Supreme Court here, after Mr. BRADLEY had abandoned his claim to the office as hopeless, on a renewal of it found no difficulty—such is its construction—in supporting his last position; and the case now remains in the Court of Appeals, Mr. STEPHENS being the appellant waiting for its decision. Mr. BRADLEY bases his claim on a supposed appointment by the Board of Aldermen, in December, 1866, made on the nomination of the Mayor; and Mr. STEPHENS, appointed originally in 1860, holds, on the strength of two successive acts of the Legislature since passed, which leave no doubt of their intent.

By the first of those acts, passed in May, 1866, several months in advance of Mr. BRADLEY'S appointment, it was declared that "the Engineer and Assistant Commissioner of the Croton Aqueduct Department shall continue in office for the term of three years from and after the passage of this act, and on the occurrence of a number shall be filled by the members of the Board remaining in office," etc., a provision which divested the Board of Aldermen of the right to appoint Mr. BRADLEY, if the act was valid.

Mr. BRADLEY, immediately after this supposed appointment by the Board of Aldermen, took the oath of office and entered for a mandamus against Mr. STEPHENS to return the latter on the ground of such invalidity; but the case was decided against Mr. BRADLEY, and no appeal was taken. The title of the act related exclusively to the tax levy.

In this state of things, and while Mr. STEPHENS was actually enjoying the position—no one contesting—the Legislature, in 1867, passed a further act that "the term of office of the persons now severally discharging the duties and exercising the powers of Engineer and Commissioner, Assistant Commissioner, and Chief Engineer Commissioner of the Croton Aqueduct Department, is hereby extended for the term of five years, from the first day of January, 1867," etc.

It was not until May, 1868, a year and a half after Mr. BRADLEY'S supposed appointment, and long after Mr. STEPHENS'S title to decision made against him, and also after he had withdrawn his protest against the payment of Mr. STEPHENS'S salary, and openly consented to its payment, that he commenced new proceedings to remove Mr. STEPHENS from office.

The ground now alleged is the same originally taken—that it is not a term for life—but the Legislature is void because it was a local matter and appeared in what he terms a local bill, the tax levy for 1866; and further, that at the time of the passage of the act of 1867, authorizing the Board to hold over, Mr. STEPHENS was a usurper illegally occupying the office; that Mr. BRADLEY was then its legal incumbent, incapable of vacating it without resigning to the Mayor and Board of Aldermen, and also that the act of 1867 violates the Constitution.

The two provisions of the Constitution relied upon are, first, "that no private or local bills, etc., shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title," and, second, that "all county officers, etc., shall be elected by the electors of the respective counties, or appointed by the Boards of Supervisors or other county officers, as the Legislature shall direct," etc.; but this provision was added, that "all officers whose offices may hereafter (Constitution of 1846) be created by law shall be elected by the people or appointed, as the Legislature may direct."

If both acts are void, then Mr. BRADLEY claims that the former appointment of the Croton Aqueduct Department are unrepealed, and that he was appointed pursuant to this authority.

In answer to the ground, 1st, of his long acquiescence in the decision against him, which still stands as a complete adjudication, is not fatal, is this, that the Croton Board is not merely confined to the city of New York, and hence is not local. The works extend through Putnam and Westchester counties, where large and expensive operations constantly to be performed, and the Board stands on the footing of the Board of Health, which derived its authority from the Legislature, and was sustained by the courts for the same reason that duties extended to adjoining localities. Nor is the tax levy local; on the contrary, it partakes of the character of a public and general law. This has been decided in several cases, though not by the Court of Appeals. To extend the term of an incumbent has also been held not to violate the latter constitutional provision. By the amended charter of 1849 the Croton Board was constructed anew, and, having been created since 1846, the provisions of that act are not opposed as the Legislature shall direct would seem to apply. On these grounds it would seem to be clear that the Board will be sustained. If one is ousted the other will be appointed.

This attempt to reconstruct the Croton Board, so that it shall be in harmony with the abuses which appertain to the entire city government, is part of the scheme for making the city independent of the Legislature. The city owes the same allegiance to the State which may be exacted from any citizen. The city government of the State is a unit, and each city is a mere part of its political machinery for carrying into effect the public powers which may legislate for the city at its pleasure within the limits which the Constitution prescribes. The tax-payer finds protection nowhere else than in the Legislature, and although it is not ample trembles to think what will be his condition if the court of final resort in this State shall sweep away this weak but only safeguard.

But there can be no doubt that the warrant to pay the salaries of those who perform the duties of the Croton Board would readily be signed if they possessed that happy facility of disposition, elsewhere so general, which allows the property of tax payers to be consumed with an unappeased appetite by those who now control our local affairs for their own selfish interests.

NOTES.

IT is very amusing to observe the kind of criticism which is lavished upon the movement for the extension of political rights to women. They hold a Convention in this country, and they are told that when they win the suffrage they will have it, but that women ought to speak for themselves. They hold a meeting in London at which Mr. MILL, Mr. MORLEY, Professor FAWCETT, Lord HOUGHTON, and others speak, and there again it is said that the willingness of English women to hold their tongues is the reason of the greater dignity of the cause in England. Whether they speak or whether they forbear, they are equally criticised. But it would certainly have been comical if the American Sons of Liberty had been told that if they would only hold their tongues they would serve their cause better.

A DEMOCRATIC organ of General ROSECRANS for Governor of Ohio says, that "it will be a glorious day for Catholics when, under the blows of the anarchistic and morally unconsecrated system will be shattered to pieces." MASSIMO D'AZEGLIO, always a Roman Catholic, who was for some time Prime Minister of VICTOR EMANUEL, says, in his memoirs: "My education was governed by the Jesuit system, and the problem it has always to solve is how to avoid in this—'keep a young man till he is twenty constantly engaged in study which are of little or no value in forming his character, his intelligence, and his judgment."

THE Government of the United States recently forbade the departure of thirty gun-boats now building for the Spanish Government with the supposed intention of making war upon PERU. Those who are resolved not to be satisfied that the Administration has either vigorous, feeble, or honorable, thereupon shouted that they were not meant for PERU at all, but for Cuba; and that, wishing to help Cuba indirectly, the Government professed what it did not believe. If the Cabinet of General GRANT wishes to recognize Cuba as a belligerent, it will do so, and do it openly. If it does not, it will continue to regard its neutral duties as honestly as heretofore. It certainly will not resort to such an absurd and clumsy expedient, which could be instantly exposed. Those who hail the arrest upon this theory as the indication of a laudable intention to assist the Cuban revolutionists must entertain very remarkable ideas of honorable national and official conduct.

THE Free-Trade League has opened a most vigorous attack in "Notes on Fallacies peculiar to American Protectionists," by Dr. FRANCIS LIEBER. Dr. LIEBER is one of our profoundest students of political and economical science; and his brief and pointed pamphlet is a magazine of high generalship. The most powerful arguments in favor of protection are skillfully refuted and with force and knowledge. The wide circulation of the pamphlet can not fail to be of great service to the cause of Free Trade, and the friends of Protection will find it necessary to oppose this clear and telling volley by something equally trenchant and striking.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE public debt statement shows a reduction of the Government indebtedness during the month of July amounting to $3,624,29.

THE Chicago City Government have ordered the building of a second tunnel under the river, similar to that at Washington Street. The new tunnel is to be made at La Salle Street.

IN the election which took place in Tennessee August 6 Mr. STOKER, the Conservative candidate, was chosen Governor by a majority of about 50,000.

GENERAL ROSECRANS warmly declines the nomination of the Ohio Democratic Convention for the Governorship of that State.

IT never rains but it pours. The success of the Atlantic cable has led to a shower of projects for ocean cable lines. An "American" line is projected, for communication with some friendly European power, probably FRANCE. Another line is proposed to connect Scotland with Quebec. The Portuguese authorities have adopted a resolution granting concessions to companies desiring to lay submarine cables to or from the shores of Portugal. Then, again, a West India and Panama Telegraph Company has been organized to connect South America with Europe and the country by land and by a cable from Cape St. Lucas. Less directly connected with American interests than these projected lines is the line that will be laid early next year between Falmouth (England), Gibraltar, and Malta—the latter point is already in telegraphic communication with Egypt, from which a cable will be laid to Bombay next April.

FOREIGN NEWS.

AN international exhibition is to be held at Turin in 1873, to commemorate the completion of the Mont Cenis Tunnel.

A terrible accident occurred near Dresden, in Saxony, August 5, in the coal mines of the Zauckerode districts. Over three hundred persons were killed.

THE preliminary surveys for a ship canal through Schleswig-Holstein, to connect the Baltic and the North Sea, have been completed, and the Minister of Prussian Government will undertake the work.

AT the opening of the session of the French Senate, August 3, M. Rouher made an address. He referred to the duty devolved upon that body of examining the proposed reforms, and said they should inquire whether they were popular enough to go hand in hand with liberty, and at the same time strong enough to resist anarchy. He was confident the Senate would enter upon this discussion with the firm intention of tempering the will of the country, and that by the combined efforts of the Government and the Senate a more generous harmony would be established between the powers of the State and the institutions of the Empire, and they would acquire renewed strength, lustre, and popularity.

A slight fire in the Cathedral of Trani, Sicily, recently, during the celebration of a great festival, caused a panic in the congregation, and sixteen people were trampled to death and others were badly injured.

The British Government has refused to recognize Mr. James Haggerty, the new United States Consul at Glasgow, on the ground that he is in sympathy with the Fenians.

On August 6, during the session of the British Parliament much commotion was caused by a loud explosion, and the discovery of a canister which had contained powder.

The Cubans have lately received reinforcements, and appear to have a hopeful view of the contest. They have taken Holguin, and propose to make it their seat of government. The order of Spanish Fish relating to the seizure of Spanish vessels manifestly intended to encourage the Carlists, and the recall of Rear-Admiral Hoff from his post in Cuban waters will do much to encourage the revolutionists. Admiral Hoff was suspected of active sympathy with PRIM.

M. Lesseps's Suez Canal seems to have a little upset the Egyptian Mercury. His prophetic eye catches a glimpse of the Egyptian empire to be, and he is impatient of the Turkish Suttan's supremacy. He has had a great independence for many years, but this is not sufficiently. His promises, displayed during his late European tour displeased the Sultan, and but for the intervention of the great Powers war might have followed. This intervention, and the poverty of both the Egyptian and Turkish exchequers will undoubtedly secure peace.

THE ECLIPSE.

THE eclipse of August 7 was a complete success. The weather was unusually auspicious for scientific observations, particularly along the line of total obscuration, extending from Alaska to South Carolina. At Des Moines, Iowa, Springfield, Illinois, Louisville and Shelbyville, Kentucky, Cincinnati, Ohio, Terre Haute, Indiana, and Wilmington, North Carolina, the spectacular protuberances were observed. Mercury and Venus were visible to the naked eye. The result of these scientific observations will probably be given to the world in a compact form.

We give below four cuts showing the appearance of the eclipse at New York city during the several stages of obscuration. Our diagrams are from photographs furnished by ROCKWOOD, of this city.

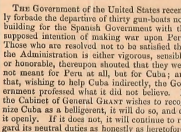

FIG. 1.—SOLAR ECLIPSE, NEW YORK.

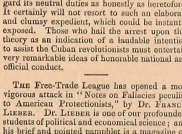

FIG. 2.—SOLAR ECLIPSE, NEW YORK.

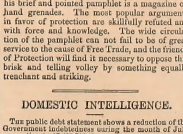

FIG. 3.—SOLAR ECLIPSE, NEW YORK.

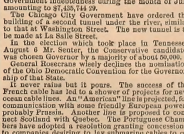

FIG. 4.—SOLAR ECLIPSE, NEW YORK.

THE AMERICAN TRIUMVIRATE—MEDALLION PRESENTED TO MRS. GENERAL GRANT BY EX-SECRETARY BORIE.

THE AMERICAN TRIUMVIRATE.

A MEDALLION has been recently published by W. MILLER & Co., Artists, of Philadelphia, giving us a single view the heads of WASHINGTON, LINCOLN, and GRANT. The idea of combining these three heads in a single piece of art reflects a popular conception. WASHINGTON, LINCOLN, and GRANT were made Presidents at the three great critical eras of our history. WASHINGTON —the Virginian gentleman—is the characteristic representative of our colonial period. LINCOLN and GRANT belong to that new era in which the gigantic West plays so important a part. History will record that General GRANT was the guardian of our liberties even before he was called to the seat of Executive power. Truly WASHINGTON will ever stand upon record as the Father of his country, LINCOLN as its Savior, and GRANT as its Preserver.

This medallion is of bronze, the heads being of life-size. It was privately presented to Mrs. General GRANT at Long Branch by ex-Secretary BORIE. Messrs. MILLER & Co. are executing a number of artistic pieces of this character, which are of great beauty and value.

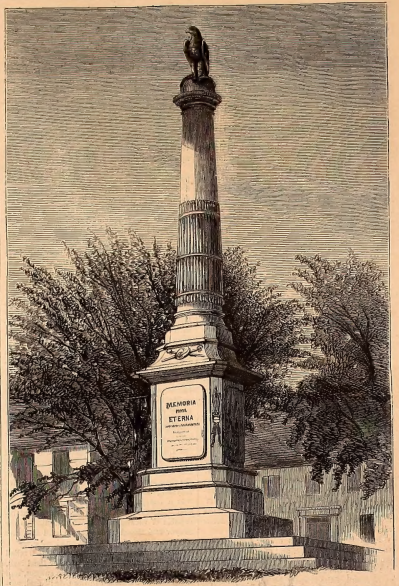
SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT PLYMOUTH, MASSACHUSETTS.

On Monday, August 9, the Soldiers' Monument at Plymouth, Massachusetts, was dedicated. The location of a monument commemorative of the heroes of the war for the Union upon a spot which was nearly two hundred and fifty years ago rendered sacred by the landing of the Pilgrims makes this dedication an occasion of great popular interest; and we have, therefore, given an illustration of the monument on this page.

HARVESTING ON THE BATTLE-FIELD OF BULL RUN.

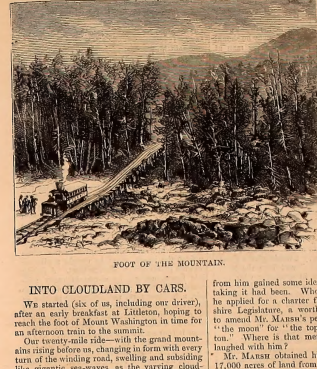
How rapidly the wounds of war are healed! Half a million of men are swept from the earth by a civil war; but before a grateful people have done writing their epitaphs their places are more than filled, and the census scarcely notes the increase of mortality on their account.

Eight years have passed since the battle of Bull Run, and to-day there is left scarcely a trace of this early conflict of the war. Where the youth of the North and of the South met in array of battle eight years ago, there to-day the farmers are harvesting the cereals of August. The field that was red with blood is yellow with grain. And now the improvements of agriculture are illustrated upon the arena where then a feudal system of labor arrayed its boastful champions.



THE SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT PLYMOUTH, MASSACHUSETTS.—(PHOT. BY LOCKE AND ROBBINS.)

HARVESTING ON THE BATTLE-FIELD OF BULL RUN.



FOOT OF THE MOUNTAIN.

INTO CLOUDLAND BY CARS.

We started (six of us, including our driver), after an early breakfast at Littleton, hoping to reach the foot of Mount Washington in time for an afternoon train to the summit.

Our twenty-mile ride—with the grand mountains rising before us, changing in form with every turn of the winding road, swelling and subsiding like gigantic sea-waves, as the varying cloud-shadows moved across them—had intensified all our previous desires, and the ladies vowed with great vehemence that to the top they would go, though they should do it upon their hands and knees. And so it seemed they must, for when we reached the toll-gate at the commencement a busy scene met our eyes: piles of lumber, newly-erected sheds, workmen going and coming and plying the hammer and the saw, but, alas! no cars. We went into the log-cabin, where the ladies were amused to find telegraph - office, store-room, parlor, and sleeping-room in a curious state of admixture, where we were informed that the Superintendent of the road, Mr. J. J. SANBORN, would be down with the train from the summit. We found here Mr. MARSH, the projector of the road, and from him gained some idea of what an undertaking it had been. When, twelve years ago, he applied for a charter from the New Hampshire Legislature, a worthy member proposed to amend Mr. MARSH's petition by substituting "the moon" for "the top of Mount Washington." Where is that member, and those who laughed with him?

Mr. MARSH obtained his charter, purchased 17,000 acres of land from the base to the summit, broke ground, and built a mile of the road before railroad men could be convinced of its practicability.

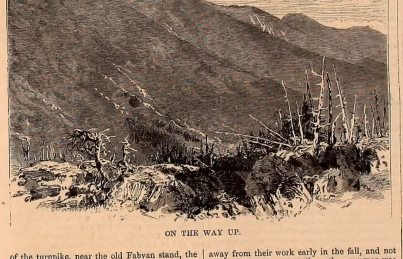
Then a company was formed, and under Mr. J. J. SANBORN, the present Superintendent, the work slowly but surely progressed. Driven away from their work early in the fall, and not able to recommence until another summer was almost at hand, there were very few weeks of each year in which any work could be done. Last October the laborers were interrupted by a sudden snow-storm without having time to gather up their tools. Under the snow they laid all winter, and not until June could the men go up to lay the remaining five hundred feet of track. In less than a month it was completed; and by the opening of another season there will be a comfortable dépôt and small hotel at the foot.

We took our lunch, sheltered from the sun, and partially protected from the numerous black flies, in one of the rough buildings put up for the workmen. We availed ourselves of the opportunity to study a little the construction of the cars and track, and carried off some of KILBURN BROTHERS' admirable stereoscopic pictures, which, transferred by the artist to these pages, give the result of our investigations better than we can do in words. A third track, laid between the other two, is fitted with cogs. A third wheel, both in the engine and the cars, is furnished in like manner. The teeth of the one fitting into those of the other propel both car and engine steadily up the steepest grades. It thus differs from the Mount Holyoke Railway, where a stationary engine pulls you up by a long rope, and from the Mount Cenis Railway, where two little wheels, griping the third rail, propel you by means of friction only. Looking up the track, and realizing that it is really as steep in some places as an ordinary flight of stairs, we almost doubted our courage, and we listened eagerly to Mr. MARSH's kind and detailed explanations of the means which are used to secure the safety of the trains. Morethan once the ladies shook their heads and turned away from the track, made almost dizzy with looking at it from below. Hark! a whistle! We run to see a black dot smoking a very minute cigar. It comes nearer, and, as we see men and women there, we hold our breath, and when they safely reach us, strangers though they are, we feel like congratulating them that they have safely passed through such an awful experience. We are somewhat rebuffed by seeing them step calmly out upon the platform as if from an ordinary carriage. We are not willing to be outdone, so we think of the atmospheric brakes, of the friction-brakes, of the rachet-wheel, and the cogs, and look very brave. Mr. SANBORN, in spite of some difficulties in the way, most kindly made up a special train. The old and smaller engine, and a common platform-car, with a rough tier of seats upon it, were soon ready. The seats were arranged to be level on an ascent of one foot in five, and when the car is on level ground the seats present that angle. While we were arranging ourselves upon them our predecessors on the road stood by giving us the benefit of their recent experience—counseling sundry tyings on of hats, coat-buttonings, and extra wrappings. But the sun is so hot! Never mind; wait and see how long it will be so.

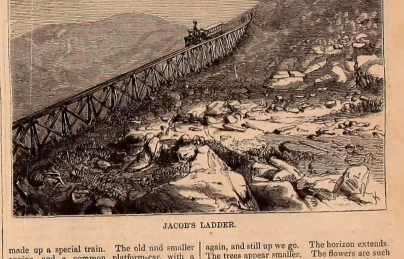
We start. There are no wheels—only looks, one at another, and underhand graspings of the seat—and up we go, as if pushed from the earth into the air. No place to step off upon. On a trestle-work, sometimes more than twenty feet high, we seem entirely severed from the earth. The steatest of the party looks a little pale; but we feel the firm grip of cog upon cog; we remember that the wheel is so clamped upon the pin-rigged middle rail that neither the engine nor the car can be lifted or thrown off; that the pawl dropped into the rachet-wheel would hold us in the steepest place; that the shutting of a valve in the atmospheric brakes effectually stops the wheels from moving; we look at our Superintendent, who stands composedly watching the engine; his calmness inspires us with courage, and we dare to look off, and then—we forget all fears. We are ascending so precipitately that unless we look directly behind us up the track, we seem to go up from the middle of a great valley. Hills and valleys, streams and lakes and distant villages, spread out before us with a wonder of beauty that beguiles us of all fear.

Suddenly we become conscious that there are no more black flies. The sun seems not quite so hot. Our wrappings are not quite so oppressive. The trees are not so large. We are still creeping up, up. There are no level places. When we stop to water the engine, it is on a steep grade, and we wonder whether we shall not go whizzing down. But no! We start again, and still up we go. The horizon extends. The trees appear smaller. The flowers are such as bloomed with us two months ago. Admiration gives place to awe. There is no room in our hearts for fear. We care not if the wind is chilly—we drink in the wonder. Another stop for water. There is some consultation between Superintendent and workmen. Water is short. Why? Frozen up. Frozen up in July? Snow enough soon we come to a laborer with red, cold hands, who reports frozen ground only a foot below the surface. Think of it, you who were sweltering in the city. But look off: Yonder are distant lakes, filled up by the sunlight. The mountains about us shrink into small hills, and still we are not at the top. It begins to feel damp. We come to a cloud. What is it like?

MOUNT WASHINGTON RAILROAD.



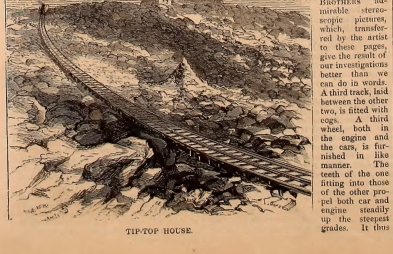
ON THE WAY UP.



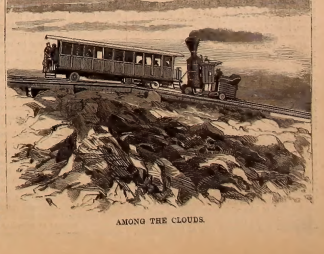
JACOB'S LADDER.

of the turnpike, near the old Fabyan stand, the good-natured gate-keeper, with many sympathizing regrets, said the cars had gone up. A glance at our disappointed faces induced a doubtful "perhaps they may go up again this afternoon." This, with a tin cup of delicious mountain strawberries which he had just gathered, gave us some encouragement. On we went by the beautiful Ammonoosuc, calculating our chances, and watching the thread on the mountain, scarcely believing it possible any thing more than Queen Mab's fairy coach could descend upon it, but each moment hoping to see the smoke, which would show us the train was descending, and might therefore be ready to take us up.

Arriving at the dépôt (we speak prophetically)



TIP-TOP HOUSE.



AMONG THE CLOUDS.

Like rain? No. Like fog? No. We are saturated, permeated with moisture. It seems almost to drive through us. But now it lifts, and how gloriously the sun lights up the valleys! There are no trees about us, only dwarfed attempts at trees. Now and then moss-covered rocks, now bare rocks. Just beside us winds the carriage-road. Now we pass poor LIZZIE BORDEN'S hut—but most appropriate monument. Now we are at the top. Cloud-wrapped, we see nothing save the rocks just about us. Stepping off the car we are almost thrown down by the wind. Tightly drawing our wraps about us, shutting the driving water out of our eyes, we scramble to the Tip-Top House, and by the blazing fire we have time to consider what we have done.

In an hour and a half we have climbed by steam a ladder nearly three miles high. We have ascended in that time over 3600 feet. We are more than 6000 feet above the level of the sea. We have passed from the atmosphere of July to that of January. The stunted vegetation just below is not that of New England. It is the vegetation of Labrador. Shall we dare to go down again, to drop, in some long grades, at the rate of one foot in three? The Mount Washington car has on that a car set free would make the descent in less than three minutes. We shudder at the bare thought. He tells us that he can load that car with stone, adjust the brakes, and leave it without a man to operate them, and it will make the descent in safety. We are reassured. There are the atmospheric brakes—if one gives way there are three more to hold; there is an ordinary friction brake with which the engineer tells us he can stop the train in four inches; there is the ratchet-wheel that stops it instantly; and there is the steam in reserve that never used in the descent, but always ready as an additional protection; and, finally, the mechanism is so arranged that it seems as though even carelessness in the engineer could well be fatal. It is only the novelty of the thing of which inspires fear. That novelty is already gone. And after a good breakfast we descend the mountain-side, exchanging the piercing winds and yet more penetrating clouds for sunlight, throwing off our wintry wrappings, coming from the region of arctic rocks to that of semi-arctic vegetation, and from that of stunted vegetation to that of noble forest trees, with less tremor than we originally experienced on the top of our old-fashioned stage among the precipitous hills of Maine.

THREE THREADS.

WHAT would he do? Mattie watched him in a secret tremble. Of what was he thinking as he swung in the hammock? She had taken up her position as she would stand for a bust. But supposing he should do something frail and desperate?

What was it all about? Nothing! a trifle in the beginning. Mattie was sometimes unreasonable, and had taken upon herself to be jealous.

"You are a mean master," she had said to him. "You can do as you like. If you actually prefer Miss Grierson I have nothing more to say—only you can not wear her colors and mine, you know!"

"Wear her colors!" repeated Tom. "I was civil to the girl. What would you have me do? Conduct myself like a Hottentot to every woman but you."

This was precisely, I am afraid, what would have suited Mattie; but of course she answered, briskly,

"Conduct yourself as you choose! I am not dictating to you. I only propose to regulate my behavior by your own."

"I think you are trying to make me angry."

"Not at all."

"But what have I done? Is it because I played a game of croquet with her when she asked me?"

"She asked you! But I dare say; she is bold enough."

"She is a very nice girl;" and Tom's eyes began to sparkle.

"She has fine taste. She admires you."

"As I do her."

"Oh, very well! I have no wish to interfere," retorted Mattie, bravely forcing back a tear or two; and just at this most unsatisfactory stage somebody interrupted them, and Tom walked away not a little angry. He vowed to himself that Mattie was a fool, and he would never have looked at it of her; and more than he was inclined to humor her in a sulky way. He would take his horses and drive over the country for a day or two. Mattie could hardly be jealous of that, and when he came back she might be glad. That where there is gunpowder the spark is sure to fall. At any other time he would have met old Mrs. Simpson; but then and there, Mattie looking on from the window, he encountered Miss Grierson going to croquet.

Miss Grierson was a coquette, and she hated Mattie. Quick as thought she handed him her mallet.

"I am so glad I met you, Mr. Musgrove. I was looking for a champion to fight my battles. Edna and Major Willis have challenged me, and declare they will beat me and any partner I may find out of the field. You will help me, won't you? I have wagered Edna a box of gloves on the issue."

As Tom said, what could a man do? He would rather not have gone with her under Mattie's very eyes, and he did determine to treat her with polite indifference. But Miss Grierson made the most of her opportunities, and after all Tom was not the man to bear too heavy a hand on the curb. When she poised her little arched foot on the ball was he not to admire? When she laughed at his play with merry malice, and followed him about the field with playful taunts, and teased and badgered him at every stroke, making all the time the prettiest little picture herself, his grim look softened in spite of himself; and how could he help it? Where one pretty girl frowns the next who smiles looks so much the sweeter, you know.

Of course, Tom thought so. These are the arguments from his side of the question, you understand. Mattie's view was different. When he shouldered Miss Grierson's mallet she took it as a defiance, and was strongly tempted to go away and cry; but pride told her to stay and look on, and pretend she was not unhappy. Every pretty art in the Grierson was a fresh stab. Every gesture of Tom's a fresh proclamation that he cared nothing about her. He had never looked better in Mattie's eyes, but she told herself that this was no wonder. She did not really believe that it was the end. Somewhere locked a belief that Tom would humble himself and make his peace. But she would not put to the test this belief in words, and only to say to herself over and over that all was done between them; and when Tom's back was turned she nearly restored to good-humor, and began to pull over her spools, she took them away from him and went off alone.

"I told you," she said, in a low, steady voice, "that you could not wear both colors, but must choose. I choose mine, and you have chosen, and I withdraw my claims." And with that she slipped a certain ring from her finger and dropped it into his hand.

For a moment Tom sat looking from the ring to her, in a sort of stupid surprise, and Mattie's heart beat high. She was sure that he would be loved her; and I suspect that something like triumph showed, after all, in her face, pale and quivering as it was, as his smoothing wrath suddenly flamed. He rose also, and with a look in his eyes that she did not understand, he said,

"I shall be exactly as you please," he said. "I disdain to justify myself. But if, at any time, you should repent of your present capricious, you will find me, as you have always done, at your command."

Then he threw her a low bow and walked away, leaving her very much as if the earth had suddenly swallowed every one who belonged to her. Miss Grierson called to her, "Mattie, Mattie!" but got not answer, and flung himself into the hammock swinging between the two maples; and Mattie stood looking after him, as if it were the first beginning of our story. What would he do? Should she go to him? No, never! It was he who had offended her. Manifestly, if she could but have known it, these were precious moments, for as Tom lay sullenly swinging to and fro a cheery voice called,

"Good-by, Tom; I'm off in an hour."

"Off!" echoed Tom; and then, struck by a sudden thought, "Going to get off?"

"Why, in the stage, to be sure. You must be dreaming to ask that question."

"An hour, you say?" and Tom came out, on his feet. "I will go with you."

Woodford's jolly face put on a look of intense surprise.

"Are you sure you are serious? How about Mattie—"

"Never mind that," cut in Tom, sharply. "They are all alike. Give me a horse and a boat, and the girls may take care of themselves. I have had enough of them."

And with that he marched off to pack his trunk. When Mattie came down to dinner she found an empty chair beside her.

"Mr. Musgrove and Mr. Woodford are both gone, dear," said Miss Grierson. "They left regards for you." And the spiteful little coquette was half consoled for the loss of their two best men by Mattie's pallor. But Miss Grierson (Mattie) the blue in her sky had turned gray indeed.

Now, one would hardly have supposed that these threads, snapped short at Shorespoint, could have altered in any way the pattern of Miss Mattie's life at Cliffe. But it was Kitty Kitty's first season. The world was all before her, to be tried: a world in which, as she knew by dint of reading novels, a pretty girl could do looking young men, ready to fall in love, and to pursue, through no matter what difficulties, damsels like—well—a Kitty Cliffe. Happy Kitty! only seventeen, her trunks full of fresh toilets, and no doubts or fears assailing her. She came so airily through the hall, she was so fresh and sparkling, she looked at every thing with such pleased eyes, she was so self-conscious, yet so unconscious, that Mrs. Cliffe, looking on the piazza, looked after her with something like interest, and asked Woodford to introduce him.

Woodford laughed aside to Mattie. In his present humor Tom was a nuisance. For the first day or so he had been in rather extravagant spirits, buoyed by the consciousness that he had asserted his rights like a man; but reaction had set in, and Tom was so surly that Woodford felt he should not be able to make Miss Blodgett bear-leader, and took Tom up at once.

Kitty, poor little thing! saw what was coming, and knew they were coming to her. She did her best to look unconscious, like the other girls; but that unseen personality that is in every one Kitty failed utterly. She blushed before they reached her, and was very nervous on being introduced; and the power of her responsive heart tongue ran all the faster. "Did he like Fern Cliffe? She did. And the hotel? It was splendid! She had been delighted with the boats, and the bowling-alley. This fresh little girl amused him. Every thing she found delightful. The next morning found him waiting to take her in to breakfast, and she allowed him to see that she had expected him. He monopolized her on the road the principle that he would have tried for the monopoly of any thing else that pleased him, and without thinking very much about it; and she was quite satisfied. There was every reason why he should please her. He was the best-looking man at Fern Cliffe. His natural easy composure, weighted by his constant regret, became an indifference that excited her respect. She thought he was superior to herself, because he only smiled at what startled her. For all, the dear little soul had discovered that Tom had his religious doubts. Need I say more? It is not already known the under world which young ladies take up missionary work when the convert to be made is a good-looking young man? When she first touched on this subject Tom was inclined to be bored and irreverent.

"To tell the truth," he said, carelessly, "I doubt if I have ever very much about such things. Why should I?"

"Why! oh!" Words failed the little preacher before such enormous confessions. "Why because it is wicked, you know, not to care;" and catching just then the shadow of a smile on Tom's face as he looked around looking up at her, her brown eyes brimmed with tears.

"I don't know how to argue," she said, simply, "but I wish you would give a great deal to make you good;" and here the little mouth began to quiver in sympathy with the eyes, making Tom feel, for the moment, that he was a brute. And if this pretty, innocent little creature chose to interest herself in him—well, why not? We are not responsible for her fine nature.

"And— If I were always near you," he said, softly, "I might be a better man."

And then the little preacher's heart thrilled with a sudden hope. What if she could convert him? And the two were at once on a more familiar and friendly footing than they could have reached in a month of flirtation.

So the days slipped into weeks, the weeks into months, and Tom was rolled up in that month for Mattie. Now that she had lost him she found how much she had to do with him. Under this tree they had quarreled. Near those rocks he had told her "that no other woman could have such power over him;" and—forgiven, and—forgiven her. Over every walk was written remember! The very empty chair beside her caused her to look for him. He had sat there! All her songs—he used to sing them with her. She sang them now with Charlie Grierson. In fact, she liked Charlie, that misguided young man, and then, when he presumed, sent him over without remorse. She was quite determined to make no angry but all those who failed in health and looks, and when her elder sister, Mrs. Hesperia, came down she found Mattie in rather a sizable state.

Mrs. Hesperia was emphatically a woman of tact. Finding something much wrong, her forte as sister she knew by intuitions, but not head nor eyes and ears. Of course it did not need quite half a day to discover that Miss Grierson hated Mattie. Miss Grierson did not have her shrine.

"You could hardly believe, Mrs. Peri, how Mattie has flirted," said Miss Grierson, on the piazza. "I have not had time to look at my dear. You know you did, though I admit you have behaved much better lately. Indeed, we have all been delighted with Mr. Musgrove's good looks, and when he left Shorespoint we were quite sorry for Mattie's sake. Mattie can't help it, you know, dear, that she is a coquette. She felt that she winced and blushed under the Grierson's stab; but Hesperia, wisest of women, understood nothing. Mattie so blind as those who will not see. She remembered that Mr. Musgrove had come to Fern Cliffe almost every winter. The hotel books told her when he had gone away, and while she was waiting for further revelations something came in a letter from Fern Cliffe, and that Tom Musgrove was stopping at Fern Cliffe. "He is at une petite sotise with a pretty little Miss Kitty Cliffe," wrote the fair gossip, "but in a melancholy way. It is the common belief here that your sister Mattie threw him over. If she did I am sorry for her. He is the best young man I have seen this season."

And now Mrs. Hesperia had the whole story. That Tom was in love with Mattie; and in August they had fires at Shorespoint. So one evening found the two sisters sitting in the twilight before a flicker of flame on the hearth while the rain beat outside.

"What a weary world!" murmured Mattie, dolefully, when Hesperia left Tom was now.

"What weary people, rather!" answered Hesperia, lightly. "Depend on it, Mattie, half our miseries is of our own seeking and having. I have just had a letter from Maria Hunter, bewailing herself. You remember she quarreled with her fiancé, Arthur Slade; and now they are both miserable, because both are too proud to make advances."

"And quite right!" cut in Mattie. "I mean she is right. It is the man's place to make them."

"Are you sure of that?" returned Hesperia, quietly. "Suppose it is the woman who is in the wrong? But granting it, for the sake of argument, do you think pride is worth while to pay over the whole happiness of a life to make good some theory about a man and woman's place? Maria knows that Arthur loves her. One word from her would end it all. If she refuses to speak that word, it is not because she loves her pride better than her love? If so, let her go. There will be no heart-break in the case. But if it were my case, if I thought a man worth loving, and believed that he loved me, I should not be turned out of Paradise so easily. Nothing should stand between us—not even my own self-love."

Mattie started, and looked curiously at her sister, for Hesperia had spoken with either remarkable energy. But Hesperia went on in her ordinary manner:

"I was reminded of Maria's case by getting a letter from her, about which I wished to consult you. She is at a place called Fern Cliffe, and is anxious that we should join her. What do you say?"

It seems to me dull enough here."

Again Mattie looked hard at her sister, but she could read nothing in that artless woman's face. Three days later they were at Fern Cliffe. Mattie's pride rebelled sorely. The move looked so much like following Tom. But Hesperia's words rang in her ears. Nothing should stand between us—not even my own self-love.

Are there brain telegraphs, more subtle than those worked by electricity? All that day Tom's thoughts had been busy with Mattie. Kitty was pretty and fresh, but he was a little tired of being listened to and admired. Mattie kept him on his mettle. With her he must prove himself what she wished him to be. Kitty and he were not betrothed in spite of the gossips of Fern Cliffe, but they were close on it. He knew all the few possibilities of her child's nature, and what answer she would give if he should ask her; but how could he ask her, when it made him catch his breath only to think of the romance that he and Mattie had lived together? The recalling of this sort he was thinking, Kitty on one arm, her pink and white shawl on the other, as they came up from the beach, when he caught a glimpse from the piazza that made him start. A dainty little figure, marked by a certain saucy self-assertion in every gesture; a tall head-dress, hair, a brilliant face, not altogether regular in feature, nor yet set color, but a face that bloomed like a pink-white flower; and in the most distinct, deliberate intonation—a little dash of affectation about it, but not a pretty affectation?), as she stood talking with a very handsome woman, also a stranger; in brief, Mattie and Mrs. Hesperia.

There was a moment's pause. Kitty's self-assured Kitty, went up to the two ladies, and took off his hat. The muscles about his mouth did quiver a little, and Mattie did not. Tom was both acquitted themselves very well. You could hardly have said that they were pledged to each other, much less that each was on the rack. Tom was introduced to Mrs. Hesperia, and then he went back to Kitty.

"Your mamma is not pretty," remarked Kitty, unskilfully; "or is she an old friend?"

"Pretty! No! She is beautiful," retorted Tom, deeply offended; and Kitty felt that she hated the new-comers, and she went past them with rather a showy unconsciousness, and with an air of having absolute possession of Tom.

"What an underbred person!" said Mattie, looking after the little figure, and as if in echo of her thoughts.

"That will be a match," said Maria Hunter's voice close in her ear. "I never saw such a flirtation. Kitty can hardly a moment apart."

"And I came to Fern Cliffe!" thought Mattie, bitterly, darting in spite of herself a look full of reproach at Hesperia, who, on the first ill-mannered little girl, would be useless to repeat it. Mattie now had the bit between her teeth, and her only endeavor, as Hesperia foresaw was to prove herself indifferent. She could not even be persuaded to treat Tom civilly. He asked her to drive. She was engaged. "Tomorrow, then." "That is promised too." Then she turned her back on him to pin a bouquet in Mrs. Dorrance's button-hole; and a very pretty picture it was; for she had the smallest hands, and could make the most bewitching face, of any girl in Fern Cliffe; but Tom was turning away, with something like an oath, when he met Hesperia's friendly eyes, and some irresistible impulse made him go up to her with,

"I beg your pardon, but did Mattie—I mean did Miss Mattie receive a letter from me just before you came to Fern Cliffe?"

Then Mrs. Hesperia was triumphant. That night's mail took out a letter to the postmaster at Shorespoint, and a day or two after Mattie found a note on her table, bearing a double postmark, and directed in a hand not "invented from Shorespoint." Something in the handwriting made Mattie start and change color. It was only a copy of some verses from the "Lovers' Quarrel:"

"Woman, and will you cast,
For a word, quite off at last
Me, your own, your own?
Since, as Truth is true,
I was, all the happy past—
Me do you leave uphast,
With the memories to me unused?

"Love, if you knew the light
That your soul casts in my sight—
How I look to you
For the pure and true,
And the honest and the right—
Bear with a moment's spite,
When a mere mole blemishes the white."

And at the foot of the page, "Remember your promise."

But then, months before, Tom and Mattie had settled those verses, and had been forced by them into a sudden seriousness.

"What if we should quarrel?" he asked.

"But we shall not," she answered, laughing.

"But we may," he persisted. "You are teasing and capricious. We are both obstinate. Let us make a bargain. And if such a time should come I will send you these verses. If I send them, promise you will come to me. Not to forgive me—only to come to me."

And Mattie had promised, promising, of course, that it was absurd; but she had promised. She would never have made the first advance—but her promise. It is astonishing what an iron shackle a promise is in some cases. Really, you see, she had no free-will in the matter. And so—Tom, standing gloomily and alone at a little distance, felt a hand on his arm, and turning quickly, saw Mattie holding out a letter, half shy, half haughty.

"I only came to-night," she said; "and—you see I keep my promise."

Tom's arms were around her in a moment.

"Thank God!" he said, huskily. "I was going away to-morrow. Your indifference drove me mad, my darling."

"But I was not indifferent," whispered Mattie; "and I am very sorry, Tom. I believe I was quite wrong, after all."

The two were more in love and happier than ever. Nothing is quite so sweet as love's young dream, except perhaps love's young quarrel. It was not to be marred even by Miss Grisewell's charitable comment, that "It would be strange if Mattie had not caught Mr. Musgrove, when she went down to see him, with her sister to help her."

And Kitty—Kitty was hard hit, no doubt; but in the merciful ordering of events she had been endowed with an excellent appetite and a perfect digestion, and nobody can actually pine on a series of good dinners. Nobody without a reliable digestion is capable of a three-volume romance. And, after all, these little affairs are to a belle what measles and hooping-cough are to one's childhood. So, by degrees, Kitty rallied, and is, I hear, the reigning belle at the Seashore House this summer.

THE MONEY-DIGGERS.

THE moon just emerged from behind a cloud, and the shadow of the blasted tree stood boldly right across the stone.

"Time!" cried the leader.

The three men stooped down and picked up their pickaxes.

They stood on the edge of a deep hole—so deep that three men must have spent many days in making it. A ladder projected above it. Three grew around. It was the hush of midnight. It was a lonely cliff projecting far into the sea, whose waters washed it, and now, in dashing against it, made the only audible sound. Over their heads was the blasted trunk of a venerable tree, with one blackened branch projecting outward.

These three men stood in the moonlight and prepared to descend. They were about so ugly a collection of human beings as it was possible to find.

"We ought to reach it to-night," said one, as he began to descend.

"Will, Dick," said the last one, "when we get it we won't think of our labor."

"Out of the way, Bill," cried the third. "There's no time to lose. Let me down."

"Are you coming, Sam?" cried the first man, his voice sounding deep down in the pit.

"All right," cried Sam; and in a few minutes the two men were at the bottom.

The third man, called Bill, stood at the top. He was waiting for the night. He lighted his pipe and walked about, looking around in every direction. It was a glorious night. His eye wandered everywhere. All around, except as cept on one side, spread the ocean, calm and still, sleeping in the moonlight. From the pit below there increased noise of the falling pickaxes came up, and the scraping of shovels. The men were working busily. Tired of walking about, the watcher sat on the edge of the pit and looked down. It was wide and deep. At the bottom the men were digging by the light of a lantern. They were making a narrower excavation, and throwing the earth out into the wide floor of the pit.

"Hope yet?" cried Bill.

"Not a sign."

Silence followed, and the men continued to dig; again the dull sound of the pickaxes alone broke the silence.

"Dull work, this," at length exclaimed one of the men, resting on his spade.

"It's the brazen rod, by all the saints! Dig! dig! dig!"

The two men turned from the hole, and tore away with their picks into the side where the rod projected. In their anxious labor not a word escaped them. The watcher above clung to the edge of the pit and looked down. His heart beat fast. Strange thoughts rushed tumultuously through his mind.

The men's axes flew like light. The earth was torn out in large masses. The brazen rod was uncovered more and more.

At last the pick of Sam struck something, which gave forth a hollow sound.

The two men trembled. They dropped their axes and looked at one another.

"Go on! go on!" roared Bill from the top of the pit.

The men sprang to work. The earth was thrown out in great masses. Soon an iron plate appeared. Beyond a doubt it was the side of an iron chest.

"Go on! go on!" cried the watcher above them, impatiently.

A few minutes more and the iron chest sank down, and seizing it with a violent jerk the two men threw it out into the large floor of the pit.

"There's treasure there, my boy!" cried Dick, sinking down upon the ground. The two men, overcome with fatigue, lay on the earth for many minutes, panting.

"Come—there's no time to lose!" cried the watcher. "Hurry up—hurry up!"

The two men jumped up.

"How are we to get it up?" cried they.

"The tree," cried Sam.

"The tree can scarcely bear its own weight," said Bill.

"What shall we do, then?"

"Why, I suppose we'll have to dig a sluice and pull the box up."

"Nonsense!" cried Bill. "That will take us forever. This is the way;" and, seizing the ladder, he pulled it up by a sudden exertion of Herculean strength. While the others looked on silently he slid the ladder over the top of the pit so that it came out altogether. Then raising it up he placed it across the pit against the trunk of the tree.

"There, boys!" he cried; "I'll fix the tackle-block now, and we'll pull it up."

He ran up the ladder, tied a block firmly to it, through which he passed a rope, and let it fall down into the pit.

"Have you got the rope?"

"Yes—all right!"

"Then fasten it to the box and pull it up."

The men did as they were bid. Soon the ponderous chest began to ascend. In a few minutes it hung in the air at the top of the pit. Bill received it and secured it.

"Lower!" he shouted.

The men let go.

In a moment the heavy mass descended on the ground, and as it fell the rope was jerked up out of the pit and pulled upon the ground.

The two men below looked at one another.

Some time elapsed. They heard a noise above as Bill panted and tugged at the chest.

"Make haste there!" cried Sam at last.

There was no answer.

The hearts of these two men throbbed violently; a terrible suspicion passed through their minds. They were not long in suspense.

Suddenly an enormous granite rock fell over the edge of the pit. The tree bent violently; pulled Dick aside he would have been killed. As it was, his elbow and foot were fearfully injured.

"In there, for your life!" cried Sam, as he pushed his groaning companion into the side excavation where the lantern had been.

The two men crawled in, and barely in time. Behind them came the rush of falling rocks and earth. A moment later, and they would have been buried alive.

Buried alive—but what else were they? Down into the pit fell immense quantities of earth, closing them in forever.

The lantern was not yet extinguished. By its light the men looked at one another with pallid faces and staring eyes.

"God played us foul. He is going to bury us alive!" cried Dick, with a groan.

Sam was silent.

"Blood relations! what a punishment!" cried Dick again.

"Yes," growled Sam; "we drowned young Cooledge, and now we are buried in his turn."

"Better to have let young Cooledge come and taken all he wanted than this."

The voice of the latter ceased. Both were lost in gloomy reflections. Still the stones fell. But after about an hour there was silence.

The flickering light of their lantern they could see that the mouth of the place where they sat was nearly filled up. They could breathe, however, even though there was not escape. In the deep silence of the night they could hear the noise made by Bill above them as he tugged at the chest.

"He's getting the box down toothe boat," said Sam.

"Yes," groaned the other.

The sounds grew fainter and fainter. The long weary hours of the night rolled slowly along. The men sat as though petrified. Sam still held his pick in his hand, having picked it up preparatory to his expected ascent.

At last the sounds, to which they had listened like men in a dream, ceased utterly.

"Come!" at length cried Sam; "what shall we do? I'm not going to sit here and starve, of die."

"It's morning! Look!" cried Dick.

Sure enough, looking through the small opening still left, they could see faint daylight in the pit.

"Hush!" exclaimed Sam, clutching Dick's arm and listening.

Their strained ears a low moaning sound was plainly audible.

"What's that?" cried Dick.

Sam clasped his hands and looked up.

"It's the surf!" he cried.

Seizing his pick in both hands he struck at the end of the cave, and with all his force he dug vigorously. At last, with a tremendous blow, he struck his pick against the passage. The earth yielded; it descended, and with a mighty fall came in. In a huge mass it all fell down before them, and there appeared the glorious light of day, the blue vault of heaven, and the mirror like sea.

"Now for vengeance!" cried Sam.

Slowly and stealthily the men crept out. The pit had been dug on the middle of a large tongue of land. They had dug down for sixty feet, and then on one side altogether for as much as thirty feet. That had brought them out on the steep side of the cliff. The shore lay at their feet. A little distance upward they saw the boat. But he was in it. He had just put on the chest on board, and now, panting from the tremendous exertion, he sat on the bottom of the boat.

Holding his pick in his hand, Sam came on, followed by Dick. Bill did not perceive them. They came nearer. They were close to him. A splash which they made on the water aroused him. Suddenly turning he saw the huge form of Sam standing erect before him with the pick upraised.

With a loud scream of terror Bill seized a brace of pistols, one in each hand, and fired. At the same moment Sam's arm descended. The pick fell and pierced Bill's shoulder. He tumbled over the boat on his back, and lay writhing in agony. Sam, too, fell at the same moment mortally wounded. Dick was struck by the second bullet in the arm. Faint from the loss of blood, he too sank down.

There were the three men, each wounded in a different degree, writhing in pain, from which two at least would never recover.

A long cry from behind them made them all start. A young man came leaping down the steep cliff and rushing toward them. The sight arrested Sam's dying gaze, made Bill utter a cry, and Dick rise to his feet in terror.

"Young Cooledge!" cried Dick.

"Wretched men!" cried the youth, coming up; "what have you done?"

"Are you from the grave?" gasped Dick.

"No. Heaven delivered me. I floated on a board to this island. Here I have been witness of your atrocities. You have all met a just retribution."

He moved to the boat.

"Save me!" cried Sam to him.

"Save me!" cried Dick. The others had sunk down with a groan. "No," said the youth. "It was I who told you of this treasure. Wishing to have it all for ourselves, you tried to murder me. Heaven has put it in my way, and I will take it. As for you, wretch that you are, hope for no mercy from me, but be thankful that you are not as these lying dead at your feet!"

And he boat sailed away, leaving the wounded man alone with the dead.

PREPARATION OF PRECIOUS STONES.

ALL the black and white onyxes of the shops are colored artificially by being boiled with sugar or oil, and then with sulphuric acid; orange topazes are "burnt," and the beating them red-hot; bad turquoises are improved by a solution of copper; chrysoprases are boiled in sulphate of nickel; and blemished diamonds even may be sometimes improved by treatment with chlorine; opals, too, may be warmed before being shown, for the sake of the experiment. These stones are occasionally found capable of being decolorized by heat. A suitable cut specimen is selected, and placed in a vessel full of sand; over it is heated to full redness for some time. The stone when cold is found to have lost its color and its clearness, and then approaches in lustre, hardness, and play of colors, or "fire," to the diamond itself. It is set in a massive ring of gold and worn for several times the value of the metal. The ignorant pawnbroker has mistaken the stone for an inferior but large diamond. He values it, and lends upon it a proportionate value, though of high scientific interest, the ring is never redeemed.

THE INQUISITION IN SPAIN.

DURING the debates on the Constitution in the Spanish Cortes an event occurred which stirred deeply the national feeling. When leveling the ground for the large new square of the Dos de Mayo the workmen came upon the old Quemadero de la Cruz, the "Smithfield" of Madrid, where the heretics and heretics used to be burned, the victims of the Inquisition. Layers of black dust, with remnants of bones and other relics, turned up at every stroke of the spade. People crowded to the spot, and the grim Quemadero, with its ghastly diggings, became the wonder and talk of the capital. A speaker in the Cortes took up the theme, and dwelt upon it with a vivid power and painful minuteness galling to the Ecclesiastical party, but cheered to the echo by the Liberals. As the assassination of the Prefect in the Cathedral of Burgos helped to rouse popular feeling at the beginning of the debates, so this lucky, or let us call it providential, discovery gave new force to the enemies of despotism and intolerance. All Spaniards who can read know that multitudes perished by fire in the autos da fé at Madrid, Seville, Valladolid, and elsewhere; but now there was visible evidence of the fact. Besides, many Spaniards can not read, and the traditions of the old cruelties of Rome had grown faint. The history of the past will now help the progress of the future.

The Inquisition was first founded by a Spaniard, Dominic, of Castile, for the suppression of the Albigensian heresy. The poor Albigenses, unprotected and unarmed, were by Dominicans, like sheep by wolves. The formal establishment of the secret tribunal took place after Dominic's death, at Rome, in the Council of Toulouse. It took root as a permanent institution in Spain and Italy more than in France. Its second founders were Spaniards, Torquemada and Xavierre, the former being the first Grand Inquisitor. He had earnestly labored, in Isabella's early days, to infuse into her mind the same spirit of religious intolerance which possessed his own. He strove to obtain from her, while yet a girl, a pledge that she would she ever come to the throne, she would devote herself to the extirpation of heresy, for the glory of God, and the exaltation of the Catholic faith." When Isabella ascended the throne of Castile, Torquemada urged her to fulfill that promise, and was seconded by Xavierre. Long did Isabella's womanly heart resist the fiendish instigation of Torquemada; but at length she was passive in his hand. A bull of Pope Sextus VI. authorized Ferdinand and Isabella to appoint "inquisitors for the detection and suppression of heresy in their dominions." In 1480 two Dominicans were appointed, with vast and irresponsible powers.

The story of the Inquisition in Spain is too well known to need to be repeated here. In Protestant countries more is known than in Spain itself. But there will be publicity enough now, and it will be well to recall the dark records of Rome's cruelty.

Llorente, who himself had been secretary to the Inquisition in Spain, and who, in that capacity, had enjoyed access to its records, gives, in his history, a statement of the number of the victims whom punishments are therein registered. The details are too large to be inserted here, but the general results are as follows:

Number of persons condemned, and who perished in the flames.....	31,912
Burnt in effigy, having died in prison, or escaped.....	17,659
Sentenced to the galleys, or to imprisonment.....	291,450
	341,021

"The Inquisition," continues Llorente, "ruined and branded with infamy more than three hundred and forty thousand persons, whose disgrace was reflected on their families, and who bequeathed only opprobrium and misery to their children. And to those more than one hundred thousand families who emigrated in order to escape from this blood-thirsty tribunal, and it will be seen that the Inquisition has been the most active instrument of the ruin of Spain. But the most disastrous of all the acts which it occasioned was the expulsion of the Moors. For the sold to those who were banished from Spain the countless numbers who perished in the insurrections of the sixteenth century, and the eight hundred thousand Jews who left the kingdom, it will be seen that the country lost, in the course of a hundred and twenty years, almost three millions of its most industrious inhabitants.

It is well, therefore, to revive in Spain this history of the past, so that the shades of the martyrs may, as it were, be "sown o'er all the fields where still doth sway the triple tyrant." Let the young generation of the bright days of the martyrs, that they, having learned the way of truth,

"Early may fly the Babylonian woe."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A BOOK ALL TITLE PAGES.—The Peerage.

MOTTO FOR A HAIR-DRESSER.—"Parting is such sweet sorrow.

EXCURSIONIST (from Salt Lake). "Give me through tickets for fifteen grown persons and thirty-nine children."

NEW TICKET CLERK (from Massachusetts). "If it's a school or Sunday-school we can make them cheaper to you."

EXCURSIONIST (indignantly). "Sir! It's my own private family, Sir!"

LONG BRANCH.

Long Branch has the audacity to be in New Jersey.

Otherwise there's nothing to be said against it.

Any body can go to Long Branch who has a mind to.

It is the property of nature.

Before starting it is advisable to draw all your capital out of the bank.

Raise all you can on mortgage on your property.

Collect all the money that is owing to you.

Borrow all you can of your friends.

You will find no difficulty in spending it all at Long Branch.

Long Branch consists of beach, and water.

The hotels run along the beach, and the beach runs in front of the hotels.

If you want a map of Long Branch, just draw a chalk line as long as you like, and suppose the hotels are on one side, the beach on the other.

Then with a hatchet roll along the line, and makes rollers into which the festive bathers plunge.

The beach at Long Branch is quite a philosophy study at bathing-time.

You see wonderful sights.

The gorgeous butterflies have changed into shabby-looking girls.

And where, oh where, have those girls gone?

There is no delusion about the hotels.

They take you in, but in a respectable manner.

They are wonderful hotels, some of them.

There seems no end to them.

The length of the buildings is to be compared to nothing, unless it be the length of their bills.

THE GIRL FOR ME.

Just fair enough to be pretty,
Just gentle enough to be sweet,
Just saucy enough to be witty,
Just dashing enough to be neat.

Just tall enough to be graceful,
Just slight enough for a fay,
Just dressy enough to be tasteful,
Just neat enough to be gay.

Just tears enough to be tender,
Just pride enough for the right,
Tones soft enough to remember
Your loving accents aright.

Just meek enough for submission,
Just bold enough to be brave,
Just pride enough for position,
Just thoughtful enough to be grave.

A tongue that can talk without learning,
Just mischief enough to tease,
Manners pleasant enough to be charming,
That put you at once at your ease.

Disdain to put down presumption,
Scorning to bend to a frown,
Contempt enough shown to assumption,
Proper dignity always the rule.

Flights of fair fancy ethereal,
Devotion to science full paid,
Stuff on the acts of material
That really good housewives are made.

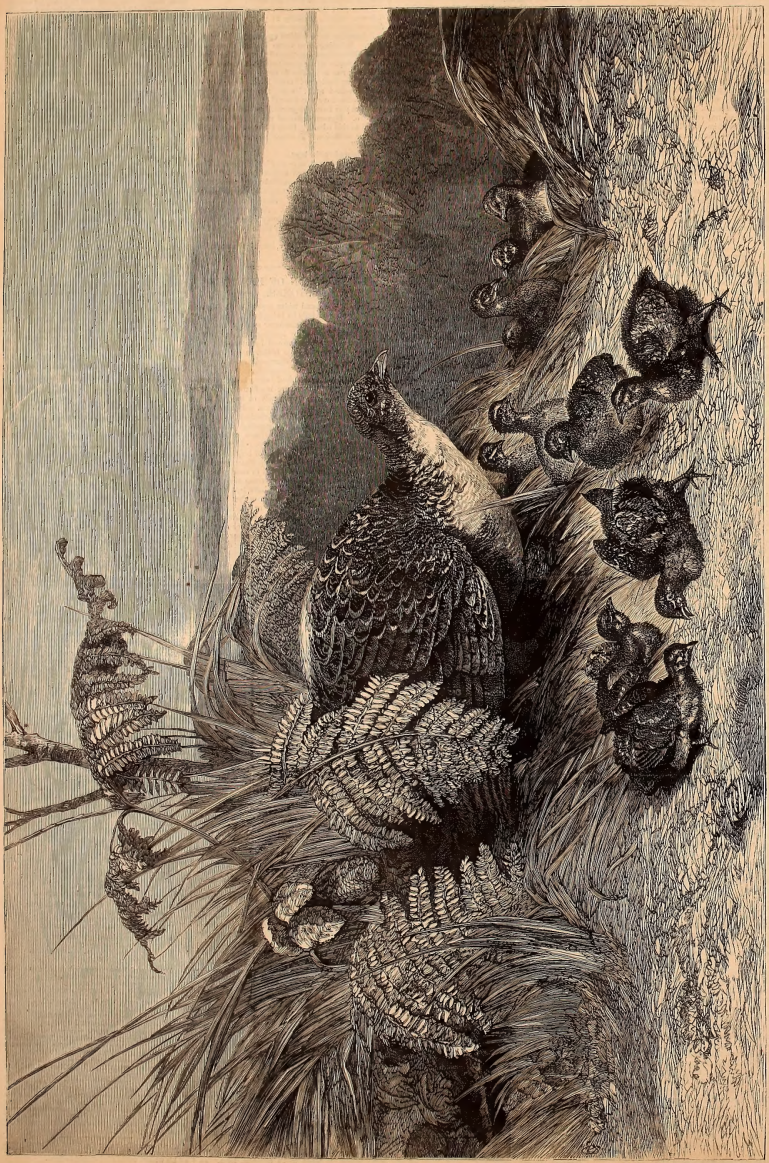
Generous enough to be kind-hearted,
Pure as the angels above—
Oh, I fear me that I never be parted,
For such is the maiden I love.

A writer asks, through the Farmer's Department of a contemporary, if any one can tell him why a poor man the best way to bring a little nursery. Get married!

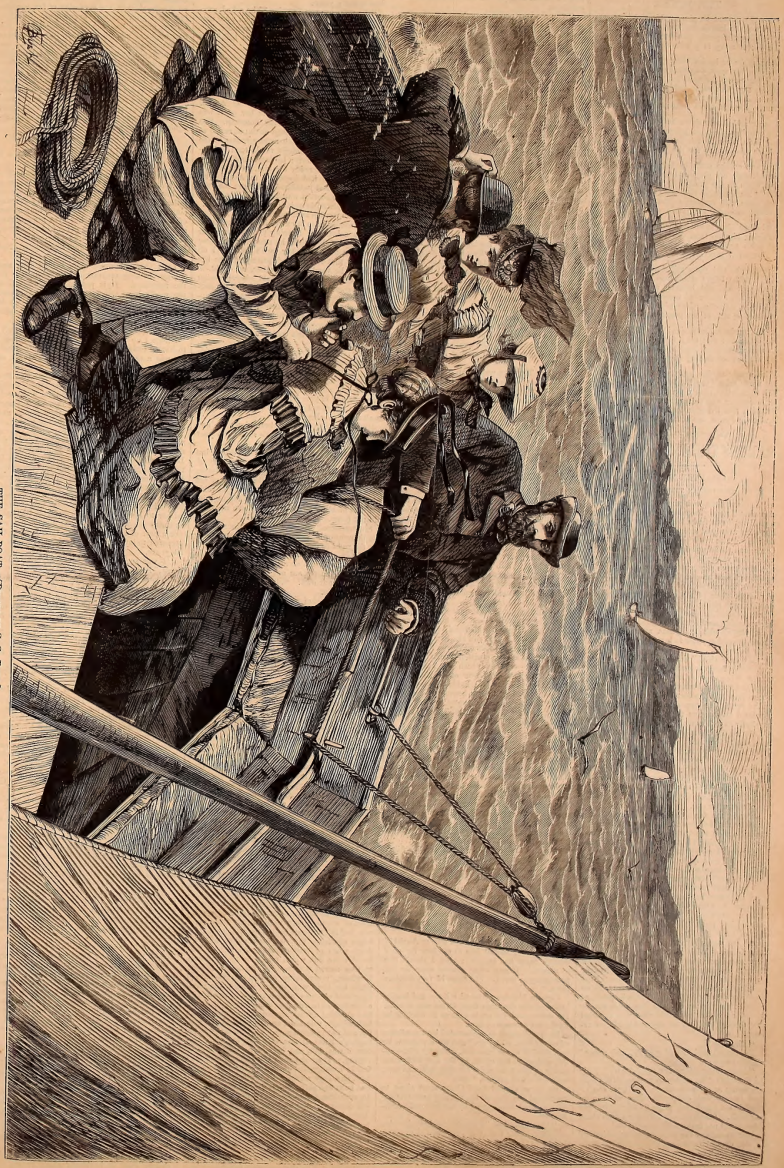
Ladies wear corsets from instinct—a natural love for being squeezed.

There is a story of a little girl who was affected to tears on being shown the picture of Daniel in the den of lions. On being told that she need not cry, for the people were dead, it turned out that she was distressed for fear that one little lion in the corner would eat many thing to eat, Daniel evidently being too small to go round.

Why is a candle-maker the worst and most hopeless of men?—Because all his works are wicked, and all his wicked works are brought to light.



HEN PHEASANT AND YOUNG.—[SEE PAGE 540.]



THE SAIL-BOAT.—[DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.]

THE MINER.

INTO the ground he plunges his pick,
And well he knows the artful trick
Of sliding the prong between the rocks,
To tear it away in piderous blocks.

Among the rocks his clear voice rings,
As over his work he merrily sings:
"What care I for wealth or power,
When the giant rocks before me cower,
And quiver and quake in dread alarm
At the powerful blows from my stalwart arm?"

Deeper and deeper down he goes,
As crumbles the rock before his blows;
For little heeds he the darkness and cold,
As he delves away for the precious gold.

The sun on the earth its bright rays sheds,
And Nature in luxurious beauties responds,
Yet down in the ground he burrows away,
While the trembling rock-elves cease their play,
And gaze with surprise at the mortal bold
Delving away for the precious gold.

And Hope alone with its feeble ray
Cheering him up from day to day,
Whispers again the tale oft told,
"To-morrow may bring the precious gold."

The months and years roll slowly along,
And still he labors steady and strong;
With pick and gad, hammer and drill,
Making the vein more beautiful still;
All alone save that voice of old
Whispering still of the precious gold.

In his lonely cabin at dead of night
He dreams of that fairy form so bright,
In the church-yard lying still and cold,
By his lust for finding the precious gold.

With steady strokes, and iron nerves,
He never once loses his labor reserves,
Till some giant rock upon him falls,
Or crumbling earth from mouldy walls
Entombs him living in its grave-like hold,
And ends forever his search for gold.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE WOMAN TEMPTED ME.

"I SOMETIMES wish that I were somebody else, that I might have the pleasure of finding myself out," said Lady Di, sotto voce, the morning after that brief interview with Thurstan on the stairs. She was looking pensively at Amelia Orme, and thinking how very obtuse and unintuitive that young lady was not to detect in Captain Mowbray's disengaged manner, and in the stealthy glances he cast toward the object of his thoughts, the real state of affairs. Amelia, happily unconscious of the events of the previous evening, was airing her prettiest allurements to attract Captain Mowbray's attention. She drank her tea with a coquettish air, she nibbled over her pet toast, played with her butter, and repressed a naturally good appetite in a manner that moved Lady Di's pity.

"My dear child," thought the latter, as she composedly made an excellent meal. "It is of no use giving up one's little comforts on the off chance of attracting a lover. I don't believe that a man likes you the better for your abstinence, and if you will wear designs on his heart it is a painful aggravation to your sufferings to feel physically as sad as mentally an internal blank."

Lady Di did not offer her appreciation of her breakfast to interfere with her keen observation of Thurstan's movements. She noticed that he looked moody and troubled, and that this trouble was not entirely of a nature personal to herself. With a little pang of jealousy which all but penetrated her enjoyment of a delicious morsel of pâté, she recognized the probability of his thinking of that other woman.

Later in the forenoon she scandalized Miss Orme by the deliberate manner in which she strolled out of the terrace with the evident intention of joining Captain Mowbray, who was talking over his perplexities with his cigar.

"Shall I take you to Auriol this morning, or shall I stay here, with—with—her?" Such was the burden of his thoughts. He had half promised he would take Amelia early that day, but then he knew he should feel sorry for himself when he found himself walking away from Holme. He was sure that if he sought Amelia's society he should still be yearning after that of Lady Di. "He could see Azalea any time," and herein lay some of the secret of Azalea's failure. With petty natures, security in possession is of more force than passion; the more he thought he ought to go to Auriol, the stronger grew his inclination to remain at Holme. Nevertheless, as the moment resemble one, he no sooner caught sight of Lady Di than he prepared to walk away in an opposite direction; but he moved at a slow pace, and that wily temptress saw through and smiled inly at his feint of retreat.

"Thurstan!"

He turned and bowed gravely, and seemed about to pass on.

"Men's explanations are very clumsy," Lady Di thought; "he wishes to go through the form of staying at my persuasion. Well, we can afford to save their dignity in trifles, when in essentials we grind their pride to powder beneath our heels. I have never yet known a man whom Love could not make a blackguard of."

Unconscious of the self-condemnation implied in this reflection, she proceeded gently with her work of demoralization.

"Look here," Thurstan said, abruptly, after she had urged various pleas to induce him to stay at Holme to-day: "I will stay, but on one condition."

"You are very peremptory."

"No master so brutal as the rebel who has been a slave," he said, with a short laugh. "Come in here; it is raining:" he pointed to a summer-house close by, and his companion obeyed his gesture, partly because heavy raindrops were beginning to splash her hair and shoulders, partly because she was awed into subjection by his imperiousness. If men and horses were but conscious of their own power, and knew how to use it, it would be a bad time for women and equestrians. The summer-houses at Holme were not the ordinary combinations of mouldy walls, sticky seats, green slime, and ear-wigs. As a rule English arbors seem built for the express accommodation of centipedal humanity, which lurks in the corners, wood-lice lurk under the stones in a perpetual state of squash, and toads meditate in the shadows. But this garden-house had more of the Italian than the garden in it. The floor and walls were dry; there was a comfortable cushioned lounge near the entrance, and in the grate a low clear fire was burning; a vase of hot-house flowers stood on a centre-table.

Captain Mowbray was silent for a space, and stood at the window staring moodily at the squalid landscape, and the pouring rain-drops.

"I think," said Lady Di, placidly, as she settled herself on the sofa near the fire, "that there is a storm coming up."

Then she unloosened her hair and shook it down over her shoulders, with the ostensible purpose of drying it.

He made no answer to her observation, but turned and looked at her long and steadfastly. Silence is sometimes a very powerful eloquence. Passion deepens in its still breath; hate smoulders and love grows mad in that lull of verbal expression.

Presently Thurstan walked up to his companion, and, taking both her hands, looked into her eyes. Lady Di dropped her head, and said, like a young (Lady Di winced) "and beautiful; but—"

"But what?"

"But I'm mad about you again, and so mad that I'd give up my liberty if I could only think you cared for me," said Lady Di, pretty much as I have passed the age of visions. I can no longer woo a shadow. Are you still to be a cheat, or a reality? Are you content to be the mere puppet of me by these pretty trickeries of yours if they mean nothing. Will you come away with me, for a little time, and—and—for a moment? I can not be away more than a few weeks, though," he added, with a sudden relapse into the prosaic, "unless, indeed, I sell out."

Lady Di meditated an instant—she could not quite decide what to do—a few moments since and she had caught a momentary glimpse of a renewed triumph. But still she liked him—she liked his dark, handsome face; she liked it the better for the strained emotion that was convulsing it—emotion which she had raised, and she only had the power of allaying. She looked at his eyes, and saw that they implored; she held out toward her, and she hesitated—hesitated long enough to turned abruptly away, saying, "I will go then;" and without looking at her he walked toward the door.

In another instant she stood before him barring his exit, with extended arms half veiled by her soft tresses, her eyes shining like stars dimmed by tears, and her whole face radiant with an expression which he had never before seen there. It was the expression of veracity—for a brief moment—of truth, of candor, of love. She felt, and, in its broader light, her beauty seemed transcendent. Lady Di had never looked so lovely as now, when, the genuineness of her emotion overasserting itself, she dropped her hands into those of her lover, and whispered, "Do not, go, Thurstan, for I love you."

Then she disengaged herself hurriedly from his grasp, thrust aside his reluctant arms, and resumed her ordinary demeanor, leaving him, the while, with expert fingers, the loose tresses of her hair.

Her sudden movement was explained by the approach of footsteps. Presently Lord Orme, with face innocent and serene, stood at the doorway, placid as a moonbeam playing on a conflagration.

"Will you join us, but the way to Auriol?" he asked. "I should like to see if I can save father's house has suffered; also, I should like to ascertain if any thing can be done for the poor girl you saved, Thurstan. She very desolate there."

Captain Mowbray flushed a little, and hastily indicated the direction Lord Orme was to take. He deliberated for an instant as to whether he would not accompany him.

His good angel, as represented by a modicum of conscience, said "go," and for a moment he half yielded to the mandate. Then he looked, and, sitting on the couch by the fire, looked radiance at him from under her deep lids, and said, with voice and gesture, "stay."

So he staid, and Lord Orme went alone to meet the child who all her life had been orphaned, and was now widowed by her husband's faithlessness.

"Poor little dear," Captain Mowbray thought, as he sat at the feet of the lady in the summer-house. "It's lucky she does not know! For myself I am of opinion that ignorance is the basis of nearly all the bliss which we poor mortals enjoy."

Meanwhile Lady Di smiled at her lover, and then stifled a yawn.

"To what are you listening?" he asked, anxiously, after one of those pauses which were now no longer tragedies but delicious interludes.

"I thought I heard the luncheon bell," she said. "Shall we go in?"

CHAPTER XL.

AZALEA READS SOME OLD LETTERS.

THE dull, gray day was passing heavily enough with Azalea among the ruins of Auriel. During the early morning hours her heart was a little with the hope of seeing Thurstan. She hummed little wanton songs as she attended to her birds, and made such arrangements in the sitting-room as she though would tend to Captain Mowbray's comfort; his easy-chair and footstool were placed ready for him. One or two books which he had imported to Auriel—an army list, the last published volume of the stud book, and the current number of Daily's Magazine—were placed on his writing-table.

The true woman is maternal even in her love affairs; she delights in exercising little cares for her lover's behoffs. Nothing pleases her better than to spend her time in removing the rose leaves that may ruffle her lord's repose. I do not think that she has adequately returns her civilities; he would fight for her, no doubt, if it were necessary, but he would scarcely resign his easy-chair to her, nor strain to clutter the fireirons because she had a headache. Azalea, having completed her arrangements, sat and looked wistfully out of window, watching the avenue until her eyes grew pained by the intensity of her gaze, and her heart felt cold and sick with disappointment.

"Lor, Miss, don't take on so," old Sally said, philosophically. "What does a man master when you've got a bit of meat for dinner, and a warm fire to sit by? Oh, there's nothing like the sight of an empty stomach for driving the men folks out of doors, I do say."

"But, you see, I never have been so hungry as all that," Azalea said, sadly.

"Then until you have been don't go and fancy you've got all the world's sorrow on your shoulders."

Azalea paid little heed to the old crone, but sat and watched until she grew very weary of her vigil, weary of the copper-colored leaves that whirled round in the puddles, weary of the wind's ever-recurring sigh, weary of the robin that tried to drown the noise of falling rain by the nearest of all of that long path down which he did not come.

She wondered what had delayed him so long; the thought of business, of illness, of every thing but the right cause.

Lady Di would have suspected inconstancy in delay, but distrust is an attribute of age and experience. And we are apt to gauge the faults of others by our own. Sally broke in once more on her solitude.

"Here's a box of papers and all sorts of rubbish I found among the things that Master Mowbray room; won't you amuse yourself in looking them over, Miss Azalea, and in burning what you don't like to keep. Maybe you'll find some little thing that might be of use—to me," the old woman added, with a lingering glance at the corner of a faded shawl which lay on the top of the box.

And Azalea, glad of any occupation which would require no mental exertion, sat down before the box, opened it, and commenced emptying it of its contents.

She removed the shawl with reverent hands, for to it was attached a scrap of paper, on which was written, "My dear Mary's wedding shawl." Then came a pair of worsted articles of woman's dress—a neutral-tinted ribbon which had once been blue, and a pair of mittens. There was a little bag of lavender, which crumbled into dust when it was moved. "The poor she gave me when we made up our quarrel" was inscribed on the paper that enveloped the sapless stalks; then came a tiny shoe, emblem of a bitter pain, the pang which is most grievous of all to endure, the pang which wrenches a mother's heart from her when the parent sees the flesh of his flesh, and the blood of his blood, wither and pale in death, and in anguish mourns the discovery, and in anguish begins the Providence which seems to him to sin against nature.

"I can't look at these any more," she said; "they make me miserable;" but as she prepared to close the lid, her eye fell on a packet which was labeled, "Letters." Her own, addressed to her mother whom she never remembered to have seen, of whom Moore would rarely speak, and who had left her husband and child when the latter might cherish. Was it possible that, after all those years of estrangement, she had at last found some link which would bring her nearer to that sacred presence? She forgot Moore, Thurstan, every thing in the surprise which made her thrill with strange delight, the awful delight of one who, after long years, meets with a dear face he had deemed to be sleeping in death. She unfolded a small square paper which held a lock of soft, pale hair, and this she kissed gently, and put in her bosom. "Perhaps it was her mother's hair; it was very like her own, only that it was dull, and hers had all the sheen of vitality. The letters, the letters; they were few in number, but they were the keys of the past, and they revealed to her secrets which it had been well perhaps that she had never known. In searching for memories of her dead mother she discovered the existence of a living father. These letters had been written by Lord Orme to the love of his youth in years long past, and they not only afforded unmistakable evidence that he was the father of the girl who bore the name of Azalea Moore, but they also seemed to indicate that the unpardonable outrage had been bound by lawful ties to the person's daughter whom he had loved so hotly in the days when he had neither wealth nor title. As the truth dawned on Azalea through the confusion of her surprise her heart grew hot with excitement. She had sought manna, and she had plucked rue; the first blight of age fell on her in this bitter hour of mortification. She had a father, then; not that dear old man who had supplied the place of one, and who lay in the church-yard yonder; but one who living was yet dead to her. It was not death but unkindness which had orphaned her. She had no love, no reverence, to yield to this new-found tie; the passion had perished that he should be a stranger to his child, and should be unable to make possible that neither would recognize the other's face.

CHAPTER XLI.

FATHER AND CHILD.

AZALEA rose from the perusal of these letters —her eyes dark with wrath. She was angered to her soul's depths. She revolted against the wrong she had done her the injury of renouncing her, and she felt shamed by the humiliation of his long neglect. As her eyes grew darker and her face paler with the pain of her thoughts, old Sally broke in once more on her solitude.

"Here's a gentleman wants to see you. Not Master Mowbray; an older man."

Lord Orme followed close behind her, and Azalea, looking up, saw a man hesitating on the threshold. It is possible that even then she might have fallen at his feet and craved his blessing and his love, but his first words fell like lumps of ice on the fever of her emotions.

"I am glad to find you in," he said, suavely. "I hope I do not disturb you. I was very wished to have a little talk with you about your father. He was a very old friend of mine. May I sit down?"

And Azalea, bowing, pointed to a chair, and said, with composure and dignity equal to his own, that she was happy to see him, and would listen to any thing he had to say. She seated herself opposite to him, and thus father and daughter met, after an absence of five years.

For a moment there was a pause. For a moment human nature held civilization by the throat, and choked down the glib courtesy of Lord Orme's tongue. He could see even in the dim light how fair the girl was—how like her mother in her beauty, how akin to himself in the refinement of her air and manner. Had he believed in the prompting of that brief impulse he would have held out his arms to the child called her to him. Then he remembered himself in time—remembered that such a revelation was not a part of his scheme, and that he was not prepared to lay bare to the world the scandal of his youth.

"I was so grieved to hear of your father's death," he began.

"Thank you."

Was it his fancy, or did her voice convey an expression of scorn? It was a hard voice, he thought, in addition to her mother's; she had ever sounded gently in his ears. He felt repuffed; he scarcely knew why.

"I knew him so well," he continued, apologetically. "You must allow me to feel an interest in you in his behalf. He was one of my earliest friends."

"He was my only friend," she said, quietly. Her companion winced.

"You do not forget that I would have been a friend to you had you permitted it. For your mother's—I mean for your father's—sake, I would have been a friend to you."

"You proposed that which was a sin against nature, my lord. You proposed to separate father and child. No advantage could compensate for such a disruption of flesh and blood; no child would willingly consent to such alienation. I was but a child, and so I was helpless when to resign the only human love and protection God had vouchsafed me."

Was this a beautiful, beautiful woman the child who, when he last saw her, had craved a forbidden kiss, blushing and trembling at her own audacity?

He guessed nothing of the tie which linked her with Thurstan Mowbray, nor of the discovery she had just made with regard to herself. Love had made a woman of the girl, and the woman had developed something of masculine power into the profundity of her self-possession.

"A parent is not always able to be all that he would wish to his child," Lord Orme said, with a flash of self-vindication. He added, more gently, "I desired to benefit both yourself and yours by that suggestion. Had you consented to it—"

"Had I consented to it," she interrupted, "I should have been a party to my father's misery. Lord Orme, you, who are yourself a father, can not forget all that the name means?"

He answered her unsteadily. He feared to meet her eyes, even though their brightness showed dimly through the shadows. Involuntarily he held out his hand toward her, and as she felt that contact with kindred flesh and blood the intonation of harshness melted from her voice, and she answered gently:

"To be a father means, does it not, that a man is responsible for the birth of an immortal soul? Something lives and breathes, and, in consequence, is damned or is saved, which, but for him, need never have existed. His blood runs in the veins of this something; this duplicate of himself owns his trick of eyes, of voice, of gesture; his heart beats in its bosom; his evil passions are echoed in its vices; or, happily, his virtues are pastured in its well-doing. Can a father pluck this thing from his bosom? Can he cast it forth from him as it is helpless and conscienceless? Can he, who should be its prop and its safeguard, leave it, a chance waif, to be blown about by the great breath of the world? As I was watching at the window just now I saw a laboring man going home from work. He was tired and stiff with the strain of hours of weariness; he could scarcely crawl to where food and rest were awaiting him; but when a child, a few years old, who toddled by his side, cried out that its foot was hurt against a stone, and put up its arms to "daddy," daddy shouldered it, with a look which almost seemed to make ill-favored poverty divine, so lovely was the love with which he kept the sore distress of fatigue when he carried the added burden as though it were a blessing. I think, that had I known such love as that, it would have pleased me better than all the advantages of the education your lordship was so good as to offer me."

He sat mute, overpowered by shame and wonder. Shame at the keen reproach her words implied, and wonder at the fervor and power of her language.

"It is a pity you were not a man," he muttered at last. Perhaps the thought passed his mind that it would have been well had foolish, bird-witted Conrad possessed the powers of mind which were so wasted on a woman.

"Forgive me if I have expressed myself too strongly," she said, flushing. "I have only had men to watch how to work and how to play. Is there any thing more you wish to say to me?"

"Have I say any thing which will give you pleasure?"

He had risen from his chair, but he still held her by his hand.

She bent down her head meekly on his wrist and wetted it with her tears. There was nothing defiant in either her manner now. She was the woman, and filial in every gesture.

"There is one word," she faltered, "which might yet atone for all."

Perhaps he did not hear her, for her voice was very low. She felt shy of asking for what had been withheld from her so long.

"I am intruding on your time," he continued, hurriedly. "I will leave you; but if you would allow me to think of me so glad to atone for any means in my power. For your dead father's sake, will you not let me be your banker?"

She recoiled from him with the same shy palsick with the pang of this last insult.

"O God, hearken to him!" she murmured. "I prayed to my father, and he has given me a stone!" Then, with a desperate effort, she regained sufficient composure to speak calmly. "My lord, orphans are not men," she said; "the poor and the solitary have few expenses. Circumstances have occurred which make my independence dearer lordship's bounty. I will now bid you good-by."

He hesitated. How much did she guess of his love? Could he confess all, and make experience of its burden? He thought he would, if he could see his way to such a course—but not yet. In two or a few weeks. Besides, how could he go back to Holme and announce to his daughters and his friends that the girl who kept the house at Arnel was his eldest and legitimate daughter, and, failing male succession, the heiress to his title? His error had never seemed so black to him as now, when he was summoned to expose it to the world. He shrank from the idea of such exposure. He could not face it yet, he thought, but he would do it eventually. When he got back to Brighton she should come and stay with him. Rosa and Amelia should become familiarized to her, and better able to bear the shock in store for them; and she, on her side, might learn how to love him, and forget in that love the neglect that she had sustained at his hands.

Meanwhile her coldness of manner repressed any further demonstration of interest. He held out his hand, but she did not seem to perceive it.

"You will hear from me again," he said; but she answered not a word. He was confused and troubled to pay much attention to her manner; but he walked slowly from the house, feeling very much as if he had suffered a severe moral flagellation.

He bowed with mechanical courtesy as he passed the window at which she was standing, and then he went out toward the avenue. He paused once, fancying he heard a cry which sounded like "Oh, father!" but he reasoned with himself out of the delusion. "It was probably a trick of his imagination, or the wail of a bird. He decided that it was a bird, and pursued his way toward the misty gloom of the avenue. He moved toward the gate, and in another moment would have passed it, when she suddenly darted to his side, and clasping his arm with her hands, cried, in an agony of entreaty:

"Father—if you be my father—own me as your child! You have offered me alms when I wanted your love. Can not you give me a little love? Do you care to me as a sacred right?"

He hesitated.

"Oh, speak!" she urged. "Tell me the truth, Lord Orme; am I an orphan? Will you not own your own flesh and blood? Are you not, in truth, my father?"

"No!"

CHAPTER XLII.

A PAPER DAGGER.

WHEN the day came for Thurstan Mowbray to rejoin his regiment his faith in Lady Di was re-established, his admiration of her beauty was increased tenfold; and she, while she could not but scorn him for his folly, was yet sufficiently enamored of her triumph to wish to retain it a little longer. She left Essex some few days before he did, and, after she and the Orme party had made their address to their host, a parting took place in a secluded nook of the back drawing-room, of which no one was cognizant save the two principal actors.

"You will come and see me next week?"

"How can you doubt it; but may I not come sooner?"

"No," Lady Di said, she should not be free to see him alone until then. "Amelia and Rosa come ere a week to me; which was true, Lady Di having inflicted herself with the company of the Misses Orme for policy's sake. She wished to keep them under their father's eye for the present; she wished him to feel as lonely as possible for the first two or three days after parting with her.

"I shall write to you," Thurstan said; and then he kissed her, whispering, "The joy of my life henceforth will be to write you; you are the only woman I ever loved."

She disengaged herself from his embrace and hurried away. Ashe said to him,

"Good-by, my darling."

In her heart she whispered,

"What fools men are!"

Captain Mowbray wrote his letter, and, as illluck would have it, he wrote it at Auriel, and then he dropped it, and, being one of those letters in his pocket, he went off to the post-office, and never missed the most important epistle of his life. Truly, as Lady Di said, "Men are such fools!" As he rode off, old Sally, standing in the doorway, saw the white envelope flutter into a puddle of black mud. She picked it up, and, in her vigorous efforts to cleanse it, she rubbed off nearly all the golden outside. Having done what mischief she could, she quietly placed it on the table in Azalea's little sitting-room, and retired without saying a word to the young mistress and explain how it came in her possession.

Thus it happened that when Azalea came in from a morning walk her attention was struck as any rose that gets brighter and more perfect every day in the sunshine, she saw only a crumpled letter, upon which was a good deal of Thurstan's handwriting.

It was a long letter, full of adoration to his absent love; slightly tinged by compunction on the poor little girl, "of whom you needn't be jealous, Di, for I swear to you that I never loved any woman but you." He then touched on the repentance he felt at having so shackled him self before he knew that he might yet be happy enough to win the one he most loved; a delicerated as to whether it would ever be possible for him to get free from this poor child, whom he would endeavor to make happy in some other way—any way, in fact, but that which necessitated his being severed "from you, who are all to all to me;" and then he signed his name.

"To-morrow, oh my darling! I shall see you again."

A brutal letter—could he have dreamed of whose eyes would have seen it; but he did not —and, moreover, he probably did not mean half of what he said—in all the excitement this woman had for him had warped his better nature, but surely he would never have written such a letter to Azalea if he could have seen it as she read his words and realized what they meant.

Drifts of purple-gray clouds floating over the face of a yellow wan sky, a blaze of crimson behind the moving shadow of the mill, spectre-like groups of trees, and the dark, gaunt, gnarled branches, broken off by the wind's fury; a throng of rooks blackening the shadowy summits of the elms, and, in the midst of all this, with the movement of their frail homesteads; all these Azalea saw without heeding. Her inner mind not only seemed blind to all surrounding objects; yet for days after she sickened at the glow of sunset, and was startled in her dreams by the movement of the wind-mill.

Now as the gray clouds deepened to purple, and the sun sank behind the mill, and the dark day, Azalea was only conscious that the night was coming, and that the increased gloom accorded with the darkness of her soul.

Rage, the quick flash of passion which fires a generous heart when it first leaps with anguish at the sight of sudden evil, had died. It had died away in her breast, and dull anger smouldered in its place; to pierce its density came such withholds of anguish as left her in a state of unconsciousness, for death, that she might lose the knowledge of her pain; she loathed the quiet pastures and the still, that stood with changeless expression at her hot living agony. She could have beaten the air with her hands, to force it away from her nostrils, and she beat at her face against the window-pane, looking with blank face at the dull sky, and cursed in her thoughts all the pale lustrous stars that had been dear to her lost youth. She laughed at their remembrance with a bitter scorn; the sunshine, the love, the happiness, all, all, that made up that cheat; the thought of those old hours might never make her cheek glow, her eyes shine with tenderness again. The sweetness of her mouth was gone, now her own cruel self-contempt mocked her credulity.

The touch of the letter in her hand seemed to wither her heart, as a green leaf is shriveled by fire. Horror had been heaped since she read those few careless words which had changed so her face. Tired out by excess of mental suffering, she laid her head down on the locked sofa, which stood in the window recess, and fell into a sort of stupor. She remained motionless for some little while, lying in the gray twilight in the air, and looking mechanically at the last wan streak in the western sky, when a distant sound of clattering hoof-treads and the barking of dogs brought back vivid consciousness of her pain.

"How shall I meet him?" she thought; "how look at his face, knowing all I know?"

Her soul rebelled against him, as she heard the cheerful whistle, the quick, light step, that heralded his approach through the long corridors.

She withdrew further into the shadow of the alcove, and watched the door through which he must enter.

He came in speaking bright and cheerful.

"I thought I never should get back!" he began; "the mare lost a shoe, and—oh, Azalea, where are you, Azalea?"

His voice fell at his disappointment at not finding her there. At any previous time she would have felt her heart bound with pleasure at such a tone, and would have rushed to meet him, with arms clasping round his neck, with lips pressing soft quick touches on his brow, cheeks, and mouth; now she cut crouched in that far off shadow, her hands stiff, her eyes fixed and bright; and in her mind nourishing an evil thought against the unconscious man who was basking in the kindly light of the fire. Hitherto she had been like one under the spell of a night mare. Ay, before she had known she had often felt her feet and arms paralyzed in the fear of some awful peril, from which they would fain fly. But now she had swayed in vain her power to move her helpless limbs, and had only been released from the oppression of her position by waking in the brightness of the morning sun. But this was pain no happy dawn could ever clear away. And when the full consciousness of her misery burst on her mind, when the sense of his soft voice broke on the amazed silence of her sorrow, when she knew that for evermore she must look down at his cheek once so dear to her, must shrink from that face—for the sight of which she had longed with inexpressible tenderness when absent—must kissed with kisses that took her whole heart with them to his cheek when present; then indeed she felt as if the earth had suddenly opened to hell; that unseen powers were scouring her with pain sharper than the scythe of death.

"Oh!" she moaned, "let me die, let me die!"

Her hands fell by her side, and the slight rustle of her dress attracted Mowbray's attention. He moved from the hearth-rug still whistling a snatch of song which had haunted him all day; it was a song Lady Diana had taught him, and the thought of how soon he should meet her in London naturally brought this remembrance of her to his lips.

"Azalea!" once more he called; but Azalea fled by the door, and without stopping his mad a snatch at her dress, he could not succeed in stopping her.

"The little cat!" he said, half amused, half indignant; "does she think I am going to hunt after her all over the house?" Then, with a smile of mirth, he added, "Azalea, if you don't come back again;" he settled himself comfortably in an arm-chair, and as he watched the leaping flames with fresh fuel, they, in thought, traveled pleasantly away in the direction of London. In a delicious reverie he fancied himself sitting with Lady Di in her box; his own crestring round her waist, his lips hovering near her ear. Then he would start suddenly, fancying he felt Azalea's arms round his neck, and her head holding his; but it was only the curtain flapping against the back, and when he looked at his hands they were empty. So he dozed again, and at last settled into sleep with the happy conviction that Azalea was somewhere concealed on him, and that yet he was sorely puzzled, thinking "What a rage they'll both be in when I wake up!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE Mechanics' Institute of Buffalo is making arrangements for holding an International Agricultural Exhibition in that city, commencing early in October, and to continue a month. The Skating Rink, a fine building, with a floor area of 50,000 square feet, has been selected as an appropriate place for the exhibition. It is the design to inaugurate, by this undertaking, a series of annual exhibitions, in which the mechanical art of the United States and Canada may be exhibited, and encouragement given by studying it, and for subjecting the productions to competent criticism. Articles are to be classified in the following manner: Arts and education; the dwelling; dress and handicraft; chemistry and mineralogy; machinery; engines; instrumentation; agriculture and horticulture. By special arrangement, railroad, steamboat, and express companies will transport free of charge all articles to be on which freight shall have been paid to Buffalo, provided they are consigned to the Secretary of November, and have not meanwhile changed ownership. Such an exhibition must meet with encouragement from the people, whose enthusiasm which will lead to many valuable new inventions and improvements at an early day.

"Avitor" is the name of an air-ship which has lately been subjected to a public trial in San Francisco. The machine is a balloon inflated with hydrogen gas, about 60 feet long and 12 in diameter, with a light frame-work of bamboo and pine, and muslin sails and planes. A ribbed propeller of bamboo and muslin is on each side of the centre, and the power is an alcohol engine, made of brass. The machine has also a rudder. At the second trial of the "Avitor" it was propelled at a speed sufficient to keep the buoyant building in which it was exhibited. A larger air-ship is now in process of construction, 100 feet long, and its engineers are confident that it will be a success.

The Saratoga races have brought together a motley crowd, who do, in truth, themselves about the exquette of a fashion, 'le watering-place, but gratify the love of excitement in betting—otherwise than at the springs—gambling, betting, and talking "horse." Undoubtedly the "season" at Saratoga is the best time for the extremely rich and the people who really care for comfort will choose some other time to patronize the Springs than in mid-August.

The financial editor of an exchange reports mariages, duli; engagements, depressed; courtship, good and prime; scandal, convicted; belles, plenty; beaux, scarce and of poor quality.

"Cancerine" is a new fertilizing compost of dead crabs. The shores of Delaware Bay abound with a species of crustacean known as the horse-crab, or the horse-foot crab. The eggs cover the sand so thickly that they are shoveled up by the wagon-load, and carried away to feed chickens. The young fish are taken to fatten hogs; the old ones are gathered into pens, where they soon die, and then they are dried, ground down, and packed up in bags to be sold at the rate of about twenty-five dollars per ton for manure. The fertilizing power of "Cancerine" is reported to be double that of guano.

The invitation cards used on the occasion of a recent wedding in Atlantic City, Wyoming Territory, were rather novel, but the best the market afforded. They were of the superior style of playing-cards. On the ace of hearts was written the hour of the ceremony and reception. On the deuce of hearts was written the name of the bridegroom, and on the queen of hearts the name of the bride. The wedding was the first which has taken place in Atlantic City.

Relic vendors do not hesitate to multiply valuable articles in their line to an indefinite extent, as is well known. It is said that the "original" hammer which drove the last spike of the Pacific Railway is now in the possession of seventeen different cities!

On many of the city railroad lines clean and comfortable wooden seats have been introduced into the cars. It is a most impossible contrivance to get generally done—to keep cushioned seats in a public car in a cleanly condition. Vermin secrete themselves in the hidden crevices, and the danger of contracting malignant diseases is manifest. The health and comfort of the public would be increased by banishing all cushioned seats from public vehicles.

Raymond, a town in Minnesota, has been the scene of a fierce tornado, which in depth of horror has proved most disastrous. About midnight a farmer, in whose house twelve persons were spending the night, awoke and received indications of a storm coming. Almost immediately the tornado burst upon them, with such fury as to tear in pieces and scatter to the distance of a quarter of a mile the entire house and its contents. Several persons were killed, and others severely injured. The night-blinding dark and stormy added to the horror of the catastrophe. The house was a block or log house. In the "original" and interiorities high, well dovetailed at the corners and pinned with two-inch oak pins.

It is now computed that there are 8431678864421 8431897648348139978994734359112929 more flies this year than last; or to put it more simply to those who find it too much trouble to engage in a thanksgiving paper, the excess of flies this year is 843 quintocdecillions, 897 quattuordecillions, 648 tredecillions, 348 duodecillions, 389 undecillions, 884 decillions, 328 nonillions, 976 octillions, 429 septillions, 491 sextillions, 129 quintillions, 99 quadrillions, 982 trillions, 134 billions, 359 millions, 191 thousands, and 929. An extensive calculation, which will expert and scientific difficult computations, says that it would require just 99 tredecillions, 483 duodecillions, 972 undecillions, 129 decillions, 348 nonillions, 976 octillions, 429 septillions, 193 quadrillions, 134 trillions, 907 billions, 309 millions, 421 thousands, and 81 years from this date, working at the rate of ten hours per day, to count these flies; and that if they were all gathered together in a mass they would make a pile 471 times as large as the New York Custom-house!

Niagara is to experience another sensation. It is to be "Blondined." Andrew Haswell, who in memorable times called the Canadian Blondin, intends to cross the chasm of Niagara on a rope, on the 17th or 18th day of August, by means of a velocipede ridden over a tight-rope. The place of crossing will be a little below the present Suspension Bridge. The distance—the length of the spanning cable will be about one thousand feet. The vehicle to be used is the peculiar construction. The wheels are grooved, and it is propelled by the hands, a balance-pole being carried on the feet. It is said that Haswell expects to pass the gas surmount a considerable grade. Nothing of the sort has ever been attempted in public, and the recent thought skilful surgery saved one eye, she has suffered the total loss of the other.

The far-famed Parisian artist of fashion, Mr. Worth, is very summary in his dealings with his customers. He refuses to give credit, or ever to bow-bow with weeks. Before he devises a costume for a lady he examines her as he would a horse he was going to purchase, and he makes his estimate, and sticks to it down, and not around until he finally issues his fiat. Then the costume is made in the most perfect style, and every article he indicates. Before the lady exhibits her new attire to the world, after it is entirely finished, she must go to Worth to get the great man to see if it does not require a touch of his magic hand.

Fulton Market is not an elegant structure, nor are some of the stalls always scrupulously clean; nevertheless a walk through it of a morning at this season is not unentertaining. The quantity of fruit displayed is marvelous, and the variety charming. Luscious blackberries, huckleberries, melons of various kinds, peaches, pears, apples, bananas, and, prominent above all, peaches. Huge piles of this velvet-skinned fruit are to be seen at every stall, assorted and carefully sorted, according to size and quality. Peaches promise to be very abundant this year. However we may hope that they will be correspondingly cheap, though that does not always follow so naturally as we might suppose. The railroad companies' cars are of wonderful service in transporting perishable fruits from the South to our markets. Steamboat lines have already begun to come bither as fresh as if raised in our own State.

In 1850 a sugar-planter of the Hawaiian Islands commenced the method of providing water for his plantation. He had a large quantity of arid land, destitute of streams of water. So he planted thousands upon which grew rapidly under his care. Soon clouds hung over the new forest, and the rich fruitclouds hung over the new forest, and the rich fruitful soil, the planter insured against drought. Now he has a very flourishing sugar-plantation. A group of forest trees may thus answer a very valuable purpose.

Ghosts can be conquered. The famous "haunted house" in Watertown, Massachusetts, has been such a mystery and terror to the credulous far and near, is now reported to have been transformed into a very pleasant home. A gentleman not afraid of spirits having purchased it at a bargain, and improved its surroundings.

REV. GEORGE WHITEFIELD.

REV. GEORGE WHITEFIELD.

We publish on this page several illustrations relating to the conclusion of the Rev. GEORGE WHITEFIELD's career in America. September 30, 1870, will be the centennial anniversary of the death of this eminent pulpit orator,

The Church of England in the early part of the eighteenth century had sunk into a state of moral and spiritual lethargy. A converted minister of the Gospel was looked upon as an exceptional wonder. The doctrine of the divine right of kings to implicit obedience on the part of their subjects; the principle of priestly control over the minds of men in all religious matters; and clerical influence, sustained by royal authority, thrown upon the side of immorality, had produced their natural results. The expulsion from their pulpits by the "Act of Uniformity" of two thousand of the most able and useful of the English clergy had led to great ignorance and neglect of religion; and though men like LEIGHTON and OWEN, FLAVEL and BAXTER, with BUNYAN and a host of others, had continued, in spite of opposing laws, to preach when they were not shut up in prison, and to write their immortal practical works, yet these men had been called to their reward, leaving very few of like spirit behind them. Thus infidelity, profligacy, and formalism almost universally prevailed. Bishop BUTLER, within six months of WHITEFIELD's ordination, wrote thus: "It is come, I know not how, to be taken for granted by many persons that Christianity is not so much as a subject of inquiry, but that it is now at length discovered to be fictitious. And accordingly they treat it as if in the present age this were an agreed point among all people of discernment, and nothing remained but to set it up as a principal subject of mirth and ridicule, as it were by way of reprisal for its having so long interrupted the pleasures of the world." Bishop WARBURTON, who commenced his ministry a few years before WHITEFIELD, says: "I have lived to see that fatal crisis, when religion hath lost its hold on the minds of the people."

GEORGE WHITEFIELD was born December 16, 1714, in Gloucester, England. It was here that ROBERT RAIKES, the founder of Sunday-schools, was buried, and here that Bishop HOOPER was burned in MARY's reign. The father of WHITEFIELD died when the son was only two years of age. The latter entered Oxford University in his eighteenth year. Here he became acquainted with a little brotherhood of Methodists, among whom were JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY. He was ordained at the Cathedral in Gloucester, June 20, 1736. Soon we find him preaching in London to vast crowds, and exciting an unusual degree of attention among persons of all ranks. About this time his attention was drawn to the colony of Georgia, in America, whither the WESLEYS had gone. He soon made his first voyage to America. In 1738 he returned to Europe, and instituted open air preaching in England and Wales, where he had remarkable success. In 1739 he made a second voyage to America. WATSON, in his "Annals of Philadelphia," speaking of WHITEFIELD's first visit to that city, tells us that he preached to a crowd of 15,000 persons on Society Hill. In that city his sermons exercised a wonderful influence. "The change to religion here," says a gazette of the day, "is altogether surprising, through the influence of WHITEFIELD; no books sell but religious, and such is the general conversation."

His wife, whom he married in England in 1741, died August 9, 1768. He made, in all, seven voyages to America, and both in New England and in the South his ministerial labors were attended with almost miraculous results. His last visit was made in 1769. His health was failing; but he came from Georgia to New England, preaching every where by the way. His last sermon was delivered in Exeter, New Hampshire, September 29, 1770. He had engaged to preach at Newburyport, Massachusetts, on the morning of the 30th; but that very morning he died at the house of the Rev. JONATHAN PARSONS.

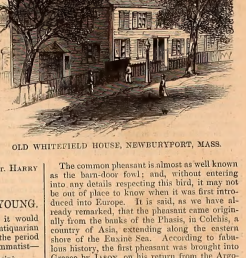
It was owing to the labors of Mr. WHITEFIELD that the first Presbyterian church in Newburyport was formed, and, whatever may be thought of the peculiar opinions of Mr. WHITEFIELD, certain it is that his eloquence as a preacher was unrivaled, and his zeal for the cause he taught of the highest character. The fruits of his ministration here were great and striking; and the establishment of the society under consideration afforded proof of the permanency of its effects. He was buried beneath the pulpit in the church in Federal Street, in which a cenotaph was erected to his memory, in 1828, by the munificence of WILLIAM BARTLETT, Esq. In this house of worship is also a remarkably fine whispering gallery. We know of none which compares with it save that of St. Paul's, in London.

The following is the inscription upon WHITEFIELD's cenotaph:

"This cenotaph is erected, with affectionate veneration, to the Rev. GEORGE WHITEFIELD, born at Gloucester, England, December 16, 1714. Educated at Oxford University; ordained priest in the ministry of thirty-four years he crossed the Atlantic thirteen times, and preached more than eighteen thousand sermons. As a soldier of the cross, humble, devoted, intrepid, he put on the whole armor of God; promoted the honor of Christ to his own blessing, repose, reputation, and glory. As a Christian orator, fervent, affectionate, disinterested and zealous, his deep piety, plastic gave unexampled energy to his look, utterance, and action. Bold, fervent, pungent, and popular in his eloquence, no other unimpaired man ever poured to so large assemblies, or enforced the simple truths of the Gospel by motives so persuasive and awful, and with an influence so powerful on the hearts of his hearers. He died of asthma, September 30, 1770, suddenly exchanging his life of unparalleled labors for his eternal rest."

The house where WHITEFIELD died, now known as the Whitefield House, is situated on the lower side of School Street, in an ancient portion of Newburyport.

The sketches from which our interesting engravings on this page have been made were furnished by Mr. HARRY REMICK.



OLD WHITEFIELD HOUSE, NEWBURYPORT, MASS.

THE HEN PHEASANT AND YOUNG.

In these days of erudite research it would form a very interesting theme for an antiquarian naturalist to trace the pheasant from the period alluded to by the great Spanish epigrammatist—

"Argivâ primum sum transportata carinâ;
Auto mihi notum nil nisi Phasis erat"—

down to the present time. He could describe how these birds were abducted from the borders of the celebrated Asiatic river to the classic land of Greece, and how they have spread nearly over the whole globe. Pyrrhus, Colchis, Mingrelia, and other countries bordering on the Caspian, they have proceeded westward through Greece, from the shores of the Baltic to the Cape of Good Hope and the island of Madagascar. Eastward, they have extended through Media to the most remote parts of China, Japan, and Tartary. In Africa they are known on the West Coast. In Europe, too, they have colonized Spain, Italy, the islands in the Gulf of Naples, Germany, Silesia, Bohemia, France, and England. The ancient writers give us a vivid sketch of how the pheasant formed one of those gastronomic victims which were sacrificed to the whim of the depraved and gormandizing HELIOGABALUS as a beau-hachée for his pet and pampered lions. We may remember the anecdote of the King of Lydia, who, when seated on his throne, adorned with royal magnificence and all the pomp of Eastern splendor, asked SOLON if he had ever beheld any thing so fine. The Greek philosopher, unmoved by the objects before him, replied "that, after having seen the beautiful plumage of the pheasant, he could be astonished at no other finery."

The common pheasant is almost as well known as the barn-door fowl; and, without entering into any details respecting this bird, it may not be out of place to know when it was first introduced into Europe. It is said, as we have already remarked, that the pheasant came originally from the banks of the Phasis, in Colchis, a country of Asia, extending along the eastern shore of the Euxine Sea. According to fabulous history, the first pheasant was brought into Greece by JASON, on his return from the Argonautic expedition. ARISTOPHANES, who lived 400 years before the Christian era, mentions the bird in his play called "Nubes," where Strepsiades says, "Not if you would present me with the pheasants fed by Leogoras"—Leogoras being an Athenian roué and epicure of the first class. ARISTOTLE, MARTIAL, and PLINY frequently allude to the pheasant; and MARTIAL, who, in one of his epigrams, calls it "Phasiana Colchorum," thus writes:

"Si Libyca nobis volucres et Phasides esseut, Arcipenses: et nunc accipe sortis aves."

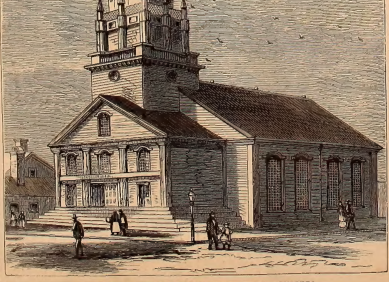
The modern Italians call it "Fasiano," the French "Faisan," the Germans "Fasan," in old English "Fesaunt." It seems more than probable that the pheasant was first introduced into England by the Norman followers of WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR, although we can only trace it to the time of EDWARD I. (A.D. 1300). In the days of RICHARD II. this bird was esteemed a princely delicacy; and when GEORGE NEVILLE was created Archbishop of York, in EDWARD THE FOURTH's reign, "two hundred pheasants appeared on the table as one item in that goodly banquet.

The hen pheasant is smaller, and does not exhibit that brilliancy of plumage which distinguishes the male; the colors, instead of being a glossy purple, green, blue, and reddish chestnut, variegated with black and white, and mixed with deep orange, are light and dark brown, mixed with black, the breast being finely freckled with small black spots on a light ground, while the space round the eye is covered with feathers, free from that mark, in appearance like scarlet cloth finely spotted with black, which the male bird possesses. The hen makes her nest on the ground, like the partridge, and lays from twelve to fifteen olive-colored eggs, which are smaller than those of the domestic hen. The young follow the mother as soon as they are freed from the shell. In her natural state the female makes her nest of dry grass and leaves. The young birds are very difficult to rear, and they must be supplied with ants' eggs, which is the food the old one leads them to gather when wild in the woods. In our illustration some of the brood may be seen indulging their appetites in insect luxury, while the mother is evidently listening to the sound of an approaching footstep. Should it be that of a poacher, armed with a net, she will realize that grief Macduff describes: "What, all my pretty chickens and their dam, at one fell swoop?"

WHITEFIELD'S MONUMENT.



OLD SOUTH CHURCH, NEWBURYPORT, MASSACHUSETTS.

THE FAMILY RELIC.—[SEE PAGE 542.]

"THE NIGHT OF AUGUST 24, 1572," THE EVE OF THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW.—[SEE PAGE 542.]

THE FAMILY RELIC.

THE scene rendered by MR. BEARD in our illustration on page 541 is full of pathos. The old farmer is reduced to an extremity, and is compelled to sell the old white horse. The bargain is being concluded, but the family stand around in dismay at its loss. One of the girls urges the father not to let the dear old relic go; some of the children are weeping; and even the baby seems to put in its protest against the sale. The picture is very suggestive and full of feeling.

THE EVE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW.

THE subject of the picture from which our engraving is taken having once and once again been attempted by artists who sought a scene in which intense human interest might be expressed, great credit is due to any one who may succeed in treating it from an original standpoint. In this M. EUGENE FICHEL has displayed genuine ability by the adoption of a method of treatment which may be described as realistic and historical. The whole scene—the marking of the doors, the reading of the list of victims, the momentary conference in the streets so soon to be made human shambles—every thing is depicted with an appreciative power which at once suggests the true sense of truthfulness. As one looks at the picture the figures seem to move. We listen for the tolling of the bell of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, which is to give the signal for the massacre to begin. A page of history is presented to us in a form unusually attractive, and we can not forbear congratulating the pupil of PAUL DELAROCHE on the vigor of design and excellence of composition which he has so successfully acquired from his eminent master.

SAMUEL SHARPE in his "Egyptian" thus describes the events of this memorable night:

"Between two and three o'clock in the morning of the 24th of August, 1572, as the king sat in his chamber with his mother and the DUKE OF ANJOU, the great bell of the church of St. AUXERRE on the early prayer, was the long arranged signal for the massacre to begin! At most immediately after, the first pistol-shot was heard. The husband of the royal nurse, who had been held in readiness during the night, rushed out into the streets, shouting 'For God and the King.' To distinguish themselves in the darkness, they wore a white sash on their left arm, and a white cross in their hats.

"Before leaving the palace, a party of the guard murdered the retinue of the young KING OF NAVARRE, from the gates of CHARLES IX. in the LOUVRE. They had come in the train of their chief, to be present at the celebration of his marriage with the sister of the King of France. One by one they were called from their rooms, marched off down unarmed into the quadrangle, where they were cut down before the very eyes of their royal host. A more perfidious butchery probably not to be found recorded in history.

"At the same time, mischief was afoot throughout Paris. LE CHARRON, provost of the merchants, and MARCEL, his ancient colleague, had assembled a large number of sequestrators, to whom respective quarters had been previously assigned, and they now hastened to enter upon their frightful morning's work. The DUKE OF GUISE determined to anticipate all others in the murder. CORLIGNY: Hastening to his hotel, the duke's party burst in the outer door, and the admiral was roused from his slumber by the shots fired at his followers in the court-yard below. He rose from his couch, and though scarce able to stand, fled to an upper chamber. There he was attacked by his assassins, who stabbed him to death as he stood leaning against the wall. His body was then thrown out of the window into the court-yard. The DUKE OF GUISE, who had been waiting impatiently below, hurried up to the corpse, and wiping the blood from the admiral's face, 'I know him well,' he said; 'then, spurning the body with his foot, he called out to his followers, 'Courage, comrades, we have begun well; now for the rest; the king commands it.' Then they rushed out again into the street.

"Firing was now heard in every quarter throughout PARIS. The houses of the Huguenots, which had long been marked, were broken into, and men, women, and children were ashed or shot down. It was of no use trying to fly. The fugitives were slaughtered in the streets. The king himself joined his aquebuse, and securely fired upon his subjects from the window of the LOUVRE. For three days the massacre continued. Corpses blocked the doorways; unburied bodies lay in every lane and passage; and thousands were cast into the SEINE, then swollen by a flood. At length, on the fourth day, when the fury of the assassins had become satiated, and the Huguenots were for the most part slain, a dead silence fell upon the streets of PARIS.

"These dreadful events at the capital were almost immediately followed by similar deeds all over FRANCE. From fifteen to eighteen hundred persons were killed at LYONS, and the dwellers on the Rhone believe that city were horrified by the sight of the dead bodies floating down the river. Six hundred were killed at ROUEN, and many more at ORLEANS and HAVRE. The numbers killed during the massacres throughout FRANCE have been variously estimated. SULLY says 70,000 in a slain, though other writers estimate the victims at 100,000.

"CATHARINE DE MEDICIS wrote in triumph to ALVA, to PHILIP II., and to the Pope, of the results of the three days' dreadful work in PARIS. When PHILIP heard of the massacre, he is said to have laughed for the first and only time in his life. ROME was thrown into a delirium of joy at the news. The cannon were fired at St. Angelo; GREGORY XIII. and his cardinals went in procession from sanctuary to sanctuary to give God thanks for the massacre. The subject was ordered to be painted, and a medal was struck, with the Pope's image on one side, and the destroying angel on the other immolating the Huguenots. Cardinal ORSINI was dispatched on a special mission to PARIS to congratulate the king; and on his passage through LYONS, the assassins of the Huguenots drew, the blood on their hands scarce dry, knelt before the holy man in the cathedral and received his blessing. At PARIS, the triumphant clergy celebrated the massacre by a public procession; they determined to consecrate to it an annual jubilee to be called the Bartholomew; and they too had a medal struck in commemoration of the event, bearing the legend, 'Piety has awakened justice!'"

SINGULARITIES.

THAT man sprang originally from the dust of the earth, through the creative power of the Almighty, is a certain and unquestionable truth. Yet as out of that dust was also produced an infinite variety of trees, plants, and flowers, with different forms, colors, and virtues, so, though all human bodies are formed of the same materials, yet some have been possessed abnormal and peculiar properties and qualities so removed from the generation of others that every man may, in fact, be pronounced in a greater or less degree a moving miracle. Records of these exceptional cases go back to the days of PLINY and PLUTARCH. Pliny, in his natural history, and also Plutarch, mention some families or generations of such marvelous constitution that poisonous serpents would hurt them, but, on the contrary, shun all contact. The spittle of these men, or their suckling babes, was said to be a cure for the bite of a bitten or stung. Of this race were the Psylli and Marsi; also those of the Island of Cyprus, who were called Ophiogenes. ALEXANDER, the ambassador from that island, was, by command of a Roman consul, put into a huge barrel or pipe, wherein were many serpents, in order more to make experiment and trial of the truth of this asserted property. The issue was, the serpents licked his face, fed out of his hand with their tongues, as if they had been puppy dogs, while he sustained no injury, to the great wonder of all who were looking on. Averroes writes of another that when he pleased he could put himself into a deep, and almost deathlike sleep; command creatures to bite him, of which they died, while he remained unhurt. Saint Augustine (De Civitate Dei) says that in the province of Epidaurus spire intensely, if his own accord, as often as he pleased. In Lloyd's "State Wordhies" we find it written of Lord Cromwell that he had one peculiar temper of body, which was that he always fainted at an eclipse of the moon, though he had no previous knowledge that such an event was about to happen.

Pontanus tells a story of one Colano, of Catania, in Sicily, surnamed the Fish, who was even more than amphibious, and lived longer in the water than on land. He was constrained every day to pass many hours in the sea, and said that if he was much absent thence he could scarcely breathe or live, and that it would be his death to forbear. He was in fact a prodigious swimmer that he preferred storms and tempests, and could swim twenty or thirty miles on a stretch. At last, in the year 1560, attempting, during a tempest, to bring a vessel from Messina, he was caused to be cast on as a prize to him who could fetch it from the bottom. He undertook it, for he never rose to the surface again, being either pierced with the rocks (percis spudo), or entangled in the cavities of a rock.

On the 14th of March, 1729, was born Charles, the son of Richard Tawney, rector of Formby at Longnor, in the county of Stafford. At his birth he was under the common size, but he grew so amazingly fast that in the time he was four years old he was near four feet high, and in strength, agility, and bulk equal to a fine boy of ten. At five he measured four feet and upwards, weighed eighty-seven pounds, could with ease carry a man of fourteen stone weight, had every sign of puberty, and was in all points at his father's business. This was the time of his full vigor, from whence he began gradually to fall away in strength and bulk, and was in the decline of life. At the age of seven his strength was gone, his body totally emaciated, his eyes sunk, and his head grown so large that all the signs of extreme old age, and as if the months he had lived had been years. The above is exactly from the account published by Dr. Short, sometime a surgeon at Longnor, by whom it was transmitted to the Royal Society, and by them confirmed in the Gentleman's Magazine for December, 1734.

Dr. George Cheyne, a celebrated physician, who died in 1743 at the age of eighty-two, wrote a celebrated work called "The English Malady: A Treatise on Various Nervous Disorders," we find the following singular recital: "Colonel Townshend, a gentleman of honor and integrity, had for many years been afflicted with the asthmatic complaint. His illness increasing and his strength decaying, he came from Bristol to Bath in a litter, in autumn, and lay at the Bell Inn. Sir Raynard and I" (Dr. Cheyne) "were called in to him, and attended him twice a day, but his vomitings continued, and all remedies against all remedies, we despaired of his recovery. While he was in this condition he sent for us one morning. We waited on him with Mr. Skrine, his apothecary. We found his senses clear and his mind calm; his nurse and several servants were about him. He said he wanted us to give him some explanation of an old sensation he had for some time observed and felt, which was that he could die or expire when he pleased, and yet by an effort, or somehow, he could come to life again, which he had more than once tried before he asked our opinion. We heard this with surprise; but as it was not to be accounted for on ordinary principles, we could hardly believe the fact as he related it, much less give any account of it, unless he should please to make the experiment before us, which we were unwilling he should do, lest in his weak condition he might carry it too far. He continued to with very distinctly and sensibly for above a quarter of an hour respecting this surprising sensation, and insisted so much on our seeing the trial exact that we were at last forced to comply. We all three felt his pulse first; it was distinct, though not strong, and little above the usual beating. He then composed himself on his back, and lay in a still posture for some time. While I grasped his right hand, Dr. Bayard laid his on the left side, and Mr. Skrine held a clean looking-glass to his mouth. I found his pulse sink gradually, till at last I could not feel any by the most exact and nice touch. Dr. Baynard was unable to distinguish the least motion in his heart, or his pulse the slightest soil or breath on the bright mirror he held to his lips. Then each of us by turns examined his arm, heart, and breath, but could not by the closest scrutiny discover the least symptom of life in him. We ressoned a long time on this odd appearance as well as we could, and all of us, judging it inexplicable and uncontrollable, and finding he still continued in the same condition, we began to conclude that he had indeed carried the experiment too far, and at last were satisfied that he was actually dead, and were preparing to leave him. We continued about half an hour. As we were going away we observed some movement about the body, and, to our unspeakable surprise, found his pulse and the motion of his heart gradually returning; he began to breathe and gently speak softly. We immediately applied to the last ence at this unexpected change; and, after some further conversation with him and among ourselves, were satisfied he was in his perfect senses. ticulars of this fact, but confounded and puzzled, and not able to form any rational scheme that might account for it. Some have believed, or pretended to believe, that he possessed this same faculty; and Celsus, in the reign of Tiberius, mentions the case of Apollo who, he says, was similarly endowed.

ANIMAL MECHANISM.

STUDENTS of natural history have a perpetual feast in the contemplation of the economy they observe in the construction and lodgment of the various organs which give perfection to the body. The packing of the liver, to have it occupy the least room, but, above all, the manner of arranging the brain so as to have it exactly fill the skull, excites the highest admiration of those most familiar with the system of economical room in Nature's handiwork. The human brain, for example, is supposed to be made up of distinct cells, lying side by side, too numerous and too delicately small to ever be clearly displayed, but rolled up in balls, under the name of ganglia, and thus compactly occupying the least possible space consistent with their appropriate functions. If each cord were carried out in a straight line, it would be from fifty to a hundred feet in length! There is one important characteristic gland in a man which is scarcely ever thought of, which is made up of packed tubes exceeding thirty feet in length. In the nasal cavities of carnivorous animals which hunt their prey by means of smell, the olfactory nerves, occupying apartments hardly the size of the little finger, if they could be unrolled and stretched out, would form a broad sheet of nervous surface several feet square. There are but a few examples of the various arrangements discovered in animal organization, where more important and complicated machinery is put into the smallest imaginable space, so as to insure compactness, security, and symmetry by economy in packing. Birds present very marked examples of this kind of economy of construction, but especially in an additional contrivance by which the weight of their bodies when at roost acts upon a contrivance which secures a firmness of their legs during such that their toes clung to a limb while they are unconscious or asleep.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WEDLOCK;

OR, THE RIGHT RELATIONS OF THE SEXES, is a new and popular Summer Book, giving practical—scientific instruction—as to who should, or should not marry. Booksellers have it: $1 50, or in extra gilt, $2. Sent, first post, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

GET IT PURE.

A pint of Pain for $5, a quart for $8, or a gallon for $20, double strength, with full directions, will be sent to any person free of express charges on receipt of the money at DR. R. L. WOLCOTT'S Office, 161 Fulton Street, New York; or of your butcher or apothecary, for Catarrh and Colds in the head, on receipt of $6. Small bottles sold at all Druggists.

PIANOS and ORGANS.

Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of first-class makers, for $375 and upward. New Cabinet Organs for $46 and upward. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $40 to $175, at 481 Broadway, N. Y. HORACE WATERS.

CHARLES READE'S

FOUL PLAY,

HIS

WHITE LIES,

AND THE

SEVEN CURSES

OF LONDON

By JAMES GREENWOOD, the "Amateur Casual."

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Sent Post Ready:

FOUL PLAY. A Novel. By CHARLES READE and DION BOUCICAULT. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

II.

WHITE LIES. A Novel. By CHARLES READE. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents. Uniform with Harper's Popular Editions of "Hard Cash," "Griffith Gaunt," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," "Love Me Little, Love Me Long," &c.

III.

THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By JAMES GREENWOOD, the "Amateur Casual." Author of "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "Reuben Davidger," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above books by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

FOR BOSTON

VIA FALL RIVER DIRECT.

The world-renowned steamers

BRISTOL and PROVIDENCE,

Com'r BRAYTON, Com'r SIMMONS,

Will Leave (Alternate Days) Daily,

FROM PIER—20—NORTH RIVER,

(Foot of Chambers Street),

AT 5 P.M.,

DODWORTH'S CELEBRATED ORCHESTRA

Grand Promenade Concert

EVERY EVENING.

THE ONLY LINE RUNNING SUNDAY NIGHT.

PROVIDENCE Passengers by the above steamers will leave Fall River at 5:30 A.M.

ARRIVING in BOSTON at 9:30 A.M.

RETURNING will leave Providence at 5 P.M., making direct connection with the Fall River, and allowing a good night's rest on board each way.

To better accommodate the public,

THE SPLENDID STEAMERS

NEWPORT and OLD COLONY,

COMMANDER LEWIS, COMMANDER MILLER,

WILL LEAVE (Alternate Days) DAILY,

(Sundays excepted),

FROM PIER—28—NORTH RIVER,

(Foot of Murray Street),

AT 6:30 P.M.,

FOR

BOSTON via NEWPORT.

FREIGHT received at Pier 36 up to 5 P.M., and at Pier 28 up to 6:30 P.M., each evening.

JAMES FISK, Jr., President,

M. R. SIMMONS, Managing Director.

CHAS. H. VAILE, General Passenger Agent,

H. H. MANGAM, Freight Agent.

NARRAGANSETT STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

H. A. HALL'S

Patent Improved India-Rubber Ankle Protector,

Lined with French Patent-Leather, to prevent removing Dust.

For Interfering or Close-Traveling Horses and Colts.

The best article ever introduced, for by their use the horse will immediately widen his gait. They can be cleaned in an instant, and will last forever. Sent to any part of the world, by express, on receipt of $1 25. Also, every description of Rubber Boots, Shoes and Goods, and all kinds of Rubber Goods adapted to mechanical purposes, with every useful article ever manufactured of Rubber, at manufacturers' prices, at

H. A. HALL'S Rubber Warehouse,

35 Milk Street, Boston.

CYPRESS HILLS CEMETERY.

OFFICE, No. 124 BROWERY, N. Y.,

(Corner of Grand Street).

OFFICERS:

EDMUND DRIGGS, President.

WM. J. PEASE, Vice-President.

WILLIAM WILSON, Treasurer.

WILLIAM EDWARDS, Secretary.

A. S. BARNES, HERVEY G. JOHN I. VAN ALST, ALFRED M. WOOD, Trustees.

N. G. PALMER, Supt and Surveyor.

The Interments in this Cemetery exceed 50,000.

Agents Wanted.

THE PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; illustrating by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 882 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1094 pages, large 8vo. Price, Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

The author has traveled more than ten thousand miles in the Atlantic and the Canadas, and has sketched and pencil in hand, visiting places of historic interest connected with the War of 1812, from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, gathering up, recording and delineating every thing of special value for these pages, books and making himself familiar with the battle-fields of the country. Access to the private and government, state and national, and to private collections, was freely given him; and from the lips of those who in the events of that struggle he received the most interesting information concerning which might have perished with them.

The results of the author's researches and labors are given in one imperial octave volume of over a thousand pages, containing eight hundred and seventy-two engravings in the style of the Field-Book or our Revolution, to which this magnificent work is in every possible comparison. It takes up the narrative of historic events where the former work leaves off, and in a careful manner gives a lively account of the perils of the country, the heroic successes and the final termination; the struggles of the new nation with the allied powers of Great Britain and Indians in the Northwest, the origin and growth of political parties in the United States, the political relations to the end of 1815 to the influence of the French Revolution and of French politics on the growing opposition to the party in power; the first war of the Barbary powers; the effects of the wars of Napoleon on the industry and trade of the United States; the Embargo and kindred Acts, and the kindling of the war in 1812.

The events of the war are given in greater detail than in any work ever published on the subject, and the narrative brings to view scores in the scenes whose deeds have not been hitherto recorded. The account it is specially interesting to many of the older families of the country.

The illustrations of this superb work are similar in character to those of the Field-Book on the Revolution. The construction of the narrative differs from that only in having historical events arranged in chronological order. It forms a continuation of the history of our country from the close of the Revolution, in 1783, to the end of the second war with Great Britain, in 1815. Nothing has been spared by the author and publishers in their endeavors to make it the most perfect, attractive, and useful volume on the subject ever offered to the public.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Removed to 335 Broadway.

$15. THE COLLINS WATCH FACTORY. $20.

The Collins Metal and Jewelry Factory has removed from 37 Nassau Street to their splendid New Offices,

No. 335 BROADWAY.

These superior Watches have now been in use over three years, and give universal satisfaction; and although sold at so moderate a price are not surpassed in time and accuracy by those costing $100 and $200. They have recently been improved, but the price remains the same, $15. Those of extra fine finish, $20. Gents' and Ladies' sizes. Jewelry of the choicest styles, in every respect equal to the finest gold, at one-fourth the price. We have but

ONE OFFICE, NO AGENTS,

and are not responsible for the bogus and worthless goods sold in cheap jewelry establishments. Our Factory is the ONLY PLACE where the Genuine Collins Metal Watches and Jewelry can be had.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.,

No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth Street, (Up Stairs).

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

The Novelty is the best Press ever invented with which to do your own printing, and is second to none for the use of General Job Printers.

Price of Presses, $10, $30, $60, $80, $500.

Send to BENJ. O. WOODS, Proprietor, 331 Federal St., Boston, Mass., for descriptive circular containing testimonials from all parts of the country, with specimens of work done on the press, and specimen sheets of Types, Cuts, Borders, &c.

SWEET QUININE.

SWEET QUININE is unrivaled equal—does for those—to the sulphate (bitter) Quinine, with the important advantage of being perfectly tasteless.

SYAPNIA is OTTER PERFUME of the sickening quinsaponaceous properties. It is the most perfect Quinine Substitute ever yet discovered.

SYAPNIA.

Sold by druggists, prescribed by best physicians.

STEARNS, FARR, & CO., Chemists, New York.

$100 PER DAY DISCONTINUED.

Having obtained an extensive and wide-spread sale for our "CENTURY" brand of Fine-Cut Chewing Tobacco, we desire to announce that we shall not pack daily $100 in the small tin-foil cases after the 4th July 1st, 1869, its merits being so favorably recognized that this inducement is no longer necessary. To avoid misapprehension, however, we would add that we shall continue to pack daily $100 in our other Merchants Plugs in our "YACHT CLUB" and "EUREKA" brands of Smoking Tobacco.

The "YACHT CLUB" is devoid of Nicotine, and can be used by ladies with perfect safety, recommended to people of sedentary occupations or nervous constitutions.

The trade are invited to send for circulars.

P. LORILLARD, New York.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze Watch Cases are entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even Judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the attention of the press in consequence of its superior properties, but also obtained a Gold Medal at the late Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all three grade are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

Price from $16 to $22.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.

Goods sent C. O. D. by Express, to be with charges.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN, No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

"As natural as Thackeray, and more real than Dickens."

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

have just published:

My Daughter Elinor.

A NOVEL.

8vo, Paper, $1 25.

In some respects it will be justly regarded as the most successful attempt at fiction which has truthfully the aspects, traits, and tendencies—in a word, the novel characteristics—of our manners and social characters.—Boston Transcript.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

$10 PER DAY GUARANTEED

Agents to sell the HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. It makes the LOCK STITCH, ALIKE ON BOTH SIDES, has the under-feed, and is equal in every respect to any Sewing Machine ever invented. Price $40. Fine stitch of the 5 years. Send for circular. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; or St. Louis, Mo.

PARLOR STEAM ENGINE, made entirely of Metal; Boiler and Furnace complete; will work for hours if supplied with water, &c.; free from danger; a child can work it. Sent free, with instructions, for $1 00. Three for $2 50. Address WALTER HOLT, No. 102 Nassau Street, New York.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $50 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

EMPLOYMENT that pays. For particulars, address S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

GRAND EXCURSION TO

LAKE SUPERIOR.

The splendid steamer METEOR leaves Cleveland, Ohio, on Tuesday, August 24th, and every 10th, 20th, and 30th, at 4 o'clock, P.M., and Detroit, Mich., the following mornings at 10 o'clock, touching Port Colborne, Sault Ste. Marie, and all points of interest on Lake Superior.

Rooms secured and other information obtained by application to

HAND & PORTER, Ag'ts, Cleveland, O.;

BUCKLEY & CO., Ag'ts, Detroit, Mich.;

or J. T. WHITING, Manager, Detroit, Mich.

ONLY ONE DOLLAR

FOR ZION'S HERALD to Jan. 1st, 1870. A first-class Illustrated Religious Journal of 16 pages. 208 Contributors: 5 Editors. The cheapest paper in the land. $2 50 A YEAR—Specimen copies free. E. D. WINSLOW, Publisher,

11 Cornhill, Boston.

Good Boys like Excellence better than Cheapness. Send for Circulars.

RIVERVIEW MILITARY ACADEMY.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N.Y.

A wide-awake, thorough-going School for Boys wishing to be prepared for Business, for College, or for West Point or the Naval Academy.

OTIS BISBEE, A.M., Principal and Proprietor.

GENTS WANTED—$75 to $300 per month, sure, and no risk. We want to engage a good agent in every county in the U. S. and Canadas to sell our Everlasting Patent White Wire Clothes Line. Warranted to last a lifetime and never rust. For full particulars to Agents, address the Manufacturers, SAMUEL C. HILL & CO., New York, or 16 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

DO IT NOW—Don't delay, but send 25 cents at once and get a package of Flint's Lead Pencils that will write months. It is the cheapest, the best, and the most useful Pencil ever offered. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a stamp. Address

O. A. ROORBACH, No. 103 Nassau St., N. Y.

THE ESTEY COTTAGE ORGAN is the best and cheapest. Contains the latest improvements—Vox Humana and Vox Jubilante.

J. ESTEY & CO., Sole Manuf'rs, Brattleboro, Vt.

AT THE HERO'S SCHOOL for YOUNG LADIES, Hudson, N. Y., Miss E. J. Smith in her other school in the world, EMILY A. RICE, Principal. Send for circular.

DR. J. HIRO, Westboro, Mass.

$9 A DAY FOR ALL. Address J. FULLAM, 59 Broadway, N.Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each; or one twentieth copy gratis.

Copies for $30 00, without extra copy.

The postage which HARPER'S PERIODICALS United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable quarterly, semi-yearly, or yearly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the June Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number issued next after the receipt of his order.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied with the Back Numbers from the beginning of each subscription expires. Back period is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting, make Drafts or Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Bills, because, should the Draft or Order be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the owner.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250: Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion: or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 00 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have just Published:

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 882 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing and Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1094 pages, large 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By JAMES GREENWOOD, the "Amateur Casual" of the Pall Mall Gazette and "The True History of a little Ragamuffin," "Reuben Davenger," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

FAMOUS LONDON MERCHANTS. A Book for Boys. By J. R. BEARD, D.D., with Portrait of George Peabody and 24 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

SIGHTS AND SENSATIONS IN FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND; or, Experiences of an American Journalist in Europe. By EDWARD GOULD BUFFUM. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SANDS'S PHILOSOPHY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, the Pupil, the School. By NATHANIEL SANDS. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of Agriculture, and a Careful Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss to be Invested in Amusing Farming, with Many Valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Large or Small Pieces of Land for Pleasure. By ROSSAR B. ROOSEVELT. With Characteristic Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

THREE SEASONS IN EUROPEAN VINEYARDS. Treating of Vine-Culture: Vine Diseases and its Cure: Wine-Making and Wine-Tasting: Wines and Wine-Drinking as affecting Health and Morals. By THOMAS HYLAND. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

RHETORIC: a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Colleges, and for Private Study. By Rev. D. MORTON, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Old Testament Literature in the Presbyterian Board of the Northwestern University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

A PARSER AND ANALYZER FOR BEGINNERS, with Numerous Examples for Practice. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, Author of "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language," &c. 16mo, Cloth, 40 cents.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE. With Maps, Plates on the Amazon and Rio Negro, " Palm Trees of the Amazon, &c. With Text Illustrations of Remarkable Animals. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By GEORGE BENGOUGH. With 176 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, Greece, Ireland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain. Revised and Corrected. Entirely New corrected up to 1869. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Revised Edition. Eighth Year. Large 18mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and easy Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

The New Novels

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HETTY. By HENRY KINGSLEY, Author of "Stretton," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

CORD AND CREESE. By the Author of "The Dodge Club." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

STRETTON. A Novel. By HENRY KINGSLEY, Author of "Hetty," "Ravenshoe," "Ravenscar," &c. 8vo, Paper, 40 cents.

THE DODGE CLUB; or, Italy in 1869. By JAMES E. MCCARTHY, Author of "Cord and Creese." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS:

New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.

VANITY FAIR. 24 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.

THE VIRGINIANS. 150 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE NEWCOMES. 163 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 64 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above New Editions of Thackeray's Novels, Illustrated by the Author, at correspondingly low prices.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

☞ To be followed by Charles Reade's other Novels.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S LAST NOVELS:

PHINEAS FINN, the Irish Member. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.

HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Complete. With 64 Illustrations by Marcus Stone. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. Part II., separately, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

NON-RESISTANCE.

BIG RED BROTHER. "Ough! ough! ough! Scalpee—ough!"
FRIEND OBED. "Take all thee finds, friend—thee's quite welcome."

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMPSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS THIVE, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KUNKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; J. E. GOTLIB, Philadelphia, Pa.; MRS. C. BEYER, Pittsburg, Pa.; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; CLEETT & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HARMICK, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; J. H. HUNTEMEISTER, Ithaca, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; C. M. MUSIC, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.

A Seven per Cent. GOLD LOAN.

$6,500,000.

The Kansas Pacific Railway, now in successful operation from Kansas City to Sheridan, proposes to build an extension to Denver, Colorado. The Government has granted Three Millions of Acres of the finest lands in Kansas and Colorado, which are mortgaged for the security of a loan of $6,500,000.

This loan is secured in the most effectual manner. It represents a road in profitable operation, and will open the trade of the Rocky Mountain Country, and connect it with the great markets of the East. It is considered to be one of the best loans in the market,

EVEN BETTER IN SOME RESPECTS THAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

The loan has thirty years to run, principal and interest payable in gold, semi-annually, seven per cent.

The coupons will be payable semi-annually in either Frankfort, London, or New York, and will be free from Government taxation. The bonds for the present are sold in currency at 86, with accrued interest.

Circulars, maps, and pamphlets sent on application.

DABNEY, MORGAN, & CO.,
53 Exchange Place, N.Y.
M. K. JESUP & CO.,
12 Pine Street, N.Y.

WE PUT GENUINE WALTHAM Watches into the hands of purchasers in any state, territory, town, village, or frontier settlement, at the lowest New York wholesale prices. The Express Companies take them from us and deliver them to the customers in any part of the Union, however remote. The package can be opened, and the watch examined, and NO SALE is the purchaser required to pay for it; and if on examination it is not satisfactory, there is no obligation to receive it. Our descriptive and illustrated Price-List gives full information in regard to the watches, and our plan of sending them by express. Every one should have a copy. We send it postpaid on application; no return stamps required. When you write, please state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly.

HOWARD & CO., Jewelers and Silversmiths,
No. 619 Broadway, New York.

PATENT OFFICES
OF T. H. ALEXANDER, No. 428 Seventh St., Washington City, D.C.
Please send for Circular on Patent Laws, &c.

NOW THEN!—"Here is an article in which we have the fullest confidence."
HENRY'S INSECT POWDER
Is WARRANTED to destroy ROACHES and Bugs of all kinds. Sold by all Druggists. Price only 25 cts. per bottle. Ask for HENRY'S, manufactured by JOHN F. HENRY, at his great United States Medicine Warehouse, No. 9 College Place, New York.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous Plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Sold by Druggists.

Agency, Brandreth House, New York.

TO SPORTSMEN!!

A very superior selection of fine Breech-Loading SHOT-GUNS, RIFLES, and PISTOLS of our own Manufacture and Importation. FISHING TACKLE, POCKET CUTLERY, and Sportsmen's Articles. Sole Agents for W. K. FAFE'S Celebrated Muzzle and Breech Loaders.

HERWIG & HULBERT,
Circulars supplied.] 285 Broadway, N. Y.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

POLLAK & SON, Manufr's of Genuine Meerschaum goods. Stores: 519 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 37 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 8546. Repairing and Boiling also done.

PRETTY WOMEN.—A comparatively few ladies monopolize the beauty as well as the attention of society. This ought not to be so, but it is; and will be while men are foolish, and single out pretty faces for companions.

This can all be changed by using HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM, which gives the bloom of youth and a refined, sparkling beauty to the complexion, pleasing, powerful, and natural.

No lady need complain of a red, tanned, freckled, or rustic complexion who will invest 75 cents in HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM. Its effects are truly wonderful.

To preserve and dress the Hair use LYON'S KATHAIRON.

GROCERS, DRUGGISTS, HARDWARE and FURNISHING STORES sell

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' SAPOLIO
FOR CLEANING AND POLISHING

TIN, BRASS, IRON, WINDOW GLASS, MARBLE, KNIVES, FORKS, MACHINERY, and general METALLIC WARE.
Removes all Rust or Stains. Gives a Brilliant Polish. Better, cheaper, quicker than any other substance. Contains no poisonous or injurious ingredient. Is elegantly wrapped. It is to the interest of Storekeepers to sell it.

Depot, 211 Washington St., New York.
SOAPS OF ALL KINDS FOR FAMILY USE.
Established 1809.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties by nearly every Steamer. Fine Supply of Fancy Goods, Swiss Carved Goods, Fine Gold and Silver Watches. M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 BROADWAY, N.Y.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES to Agents, to introduce the Wilson Sewing Machine. Stitch alike on both sides. Samples on two weeks' trial. Extra inducements to experienced agents. For further particulars, address the WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO., Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

$20 A DAY MADE.—Agents wanted to sell the Novelty Pocket Knife, the Slate-Pencil Sharpener and Pen-Holder combined, and the Yosemite Pen. Samples sent of all, including a box of pens, for 50 cts., postage paid. Address MORSE ERASER CO., 404 Library St., Philadelphia, Pa.

GOING UP TOWN!

On the 15th of August we shall remove to
747 BROADWAY, near 8th St.,
and now offer our present stock of
CHINA, GLASS, AND FANCY GOODS
at very low prices.
Davis Collamore & Co.,
479 Broadway, near Broome St.

IVORIDE
KNIFE-HANDLES.

EQUAL IN BEAUTY and DURABILITY
TO THE GENUINE
IVORY,
AND AT HALF THE PRICE.

This material is guaranteed to resist the action of heat and cold, whether of water or of the atmosphere.

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS.

J. Russell & Co.,
Green River Cutlery Works,
83 Beekman Street, New York City.

NATURE'S GREAT RESTORER.

GREEN MOUNTAIN MINERAL SPRING WATER, Mount Holly, Vt.

This celebrated water cures Dyspepsia, Rheumatism, Piles, Scrofula, Urinary Diseases, and Female Weaknesses. "It is a tonic and general builder-up of the system." Send for Descriptive Circular. Sold by Druggists.
McKESSON & ROBBINS, No. 91 Fulton St., N.Y., GEO. C. GOODWIN & CO., Boston, Mass., Agents.
F. PENN & CO., Proprietors, Rutland, Vt.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Or the Multitudes whose Avocations restrict them to a sitting posture, more than two-thirds suffer from Constipation. Do they not know that an occasional resort to TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT would prevent all their misery? Its regulating properties are unparalleled.
FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS IN MEDICINES.

STEVENS' POCKET RIFLE.

With Detachable Shoulder-Rest.
Most popular arm made for Sporting and Target-Shooting. SMITH & WESSON'S REVOLVERS, in any quantity, for cash, at lowest price.
WILLIAMSON'S DERRINGERS, and other Pistols.
J. W. STORRS & CO., M'F'R'S AGENTS,
232 Broadway, New York.

BUT if you want to make money, sell our New Patent Fountain Pens—sample box, 12 pens, 25 cts.; Patent Penholder and Pencil combined, 10 cts.; Patent Eraser and Pen-Holder combined, 15 cts. All postpaid. 40% at retail. $10 a day. 300 per cent. profit. Address CITY NOVELTY CO., 404 Library St., Philadelphia, Pa.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK OF FOREIGN TRAVEL.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1869. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Revised Edition: Eighth Year. Large 18mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form. $7 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a new and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 4to, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

328 Knight II 1 82

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 661.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 28, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

SOLAR ECLIPSE, 1869.

TOTAL eclipses of the sun are very rare. HALLEY computed in 1715 that up to that date not one had occurred in London for a period of 575 years. And since that date London has not been favored with this singular phenomenon. In this country since 1834 no total eclipse of the sun, until the recent one, has occurred, and there will not be another during this century.

The total eclipse of this year was visible along a track about 140 miles wide, and more than 6600 miles long. When this track is laid down on a map, throughout its whole extent, it looks like a narrow ribbon, stretching across North America and a portion of Asia. It begins in Siberia, where it takes a northeasterly course, till it crosses a little south of Bering Straits, after which it turns its course southeasterly, traversing portions of the Territory of Alaska, thence into British America, and through Montana, Dakota, Nebraska, Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina. It ends in the Atlantic Ocean, off the coast of the last mentioned State. On the central line of this track the total obscuration of the sun lasted for a period of from two and one-half to nearly four minutes.

To various points along the line of total eclipse scientific parties went to make observations—some sent by the Government, and some by private enterprises. But the principal point to which the attention of these parties was directed was the corona, observed in previous eclipses, and about which there is much curiosity among astronomers. We now know that the sun is surrounded by an atmosphere of flaming gas, which is the principal source of the light he sends us. This incandescent atmosphere is called by astronomers the sun's photosphere. During a total eclipse of the sun, his whole sphere, including the photosphere, is covered and hid from view by the interposed body of the moon. Nevertheless, at the very crisis of the central eclipse, there is seen a brilliant white corona or halo around the moon's dark body, like that which painters place around the heads of saints. In this corona, moreover, are frequently seen red or rose-colored projections of irregular form and position, around the disk. The explanation usually given of the white corona is, that it betokens a transparent, non-luminous atmosphere, extending beyond the photosphere or luminous atmosphere, analogous to our own atmosphere. The white light of the corona is accounted for by the reflection of that of the photosphere, very much as our own evening and morning twilight is produced by the reflection of the solar rays in our atmosphere. The irregular red masses seen projected into the white corona may prove to be immense volumes of thin cloudy smoke, or solid vaporous particles precipitated from the hot gaseous atmosphere which forms the corona.

Another question to be settled, if possible, was whether there is a planet between Mercury and the sun, as LE VERRIER supposed there was, on account of extraordinary perturbations of Mercury not otherwise explained.

The corona, or luminous ring around the moon in a total eclipse, was observed at Montpellier, in France, 1706, and at London, by HALLEY, in 1715. In the latter case the red protuberances were also observed. In 1724, MARALDI observed, for the first time, that the luminous corona was not concentric with the moon. At the beginning of the eclipse it appeared larger on the eastern than on the western side; at the end, on the contrary, it was larger on the west than on the east. The northern border was also somewhat larger than the opposite. The importance of these observations was that they proved the corona to be concentric with the sun instead of with the moon; that it is a phenomenon closely connected with the sun's physical constitution. Important additions were made to these observations during the total eclipses of 1778, 1806, and particularly in 1842. On the 8th of July in the latter year, ARAGO and other astronomers observed the luminous corona in all its splendor. The distinguished French astrono-

THE SOLAR ECLIPSE, AUGUST 7, 1869—HARVARD ASTRONOMICAL EXPEDITION MAKING OBSERVATIONS AT SHELBYVILLE, KENTUCKY. [PHOTOGRAPHED BY J. A. WHIPPLE.]

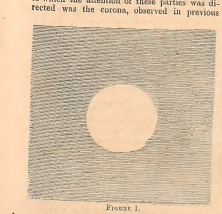

FIGURE 1.

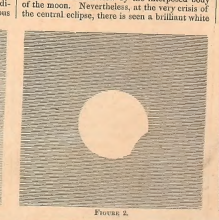

FIGURE 2.

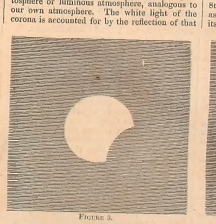

FIGURE 3.

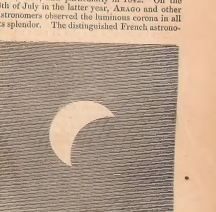

FIGURE 4.

FIGURE 5.

FIGURE 6.

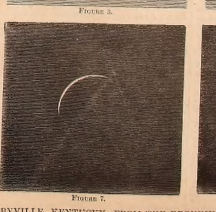

FIGURE 7.

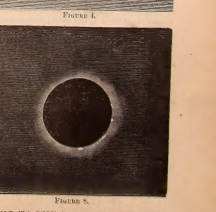

FIGURE 8.

SOLAR ECLIPSE, AUGUST 7, 1869—PHASES OF THE ECLIPSE, AS SEEN AT SHELBYVILLE, KENTUCKY, FROM THE BEGINNING TO THE POINT OF TOTALITY. [PHOTOGRAPHED BY J. A. WHIPPLE.]

mer describes it as composed first of a circular zone contiguous to the dark border of the moon, and of a second fainter zone contiguous to the first. The light of the second zone continually diminished from its interior to its exterior limit. That of the first was nearly uniform throughout. In the direction of the line which joined the points of the solar disk where the eclipse would begin and end, there were two large wings, which might be considered as emanations of the second luminous corona. The sides of these wings were terminated by curves that were concave outward, and which seemed to be produced by matter which would be tangent to the moon's disk. ARAGO saw this corona both with his telescope and with his naked eye.

Next to the corona, the phenomena demanding particular attention are the prominences, protuberances, flames, or red projections, which are usually seen in the lower portion of the white ring, near the edge of the moon. These curious appearances were particularly studied by the English and other astronomers who went to the coasts of Sweden and Norway to observe the eclipse of 1851. MR. AIRY, the Astronomer Royal of England, observed the protuberances on the western side of the sun to increase, while those on the eastern side diminished in extent and disappeared before the end of the total phase. Just before the western limb of the sun reappeared he saw a large number of small protuberances of a very red color, touching the edge of the moon, and embracing an arc of its circumference of about degrees in extent. They are generally of a red or rose tint, and are sometimes large enough to be visible by the naked eye.

The eminent English astronomers who so carefully observed in Sweden the great eclipse of July 18th, 1851, Professor Donkin, of Oxford, and University, saw the wonderful corona, and also the red prominences or flames upon different points of the moon's disk. During the memorable eclipse in India last August, which was total for nearly seven minutes, the numerous French, German, and English astronomical observers attracted thither observed these prominences with great care, by the aid of the spectroscope, and came to the conclusion that these phenomena were due to the presence of an incandescent or highly heated hydrogen gas surrounding the sun's disk, and extending upward apparently a distance of 50,000 or 60,000 miles.

An article in the August Number of Meenthal's Journal of Chemistry by J. NORMAN LOCKYER, F.R.S., contains some important results hitherto reached as regards the physical constitution of the sun. The spectroscope has thrown light upon the spots of the sun. This is an instrument whose special function it is to deal with radiation and absorption. It tells us that the light radiated from different bodies gives us spectra of different kinds according to the nature of the radiating body—continuous spectra, such as we see in a rainbow, without bright lines, in the case of solids and liquids; and bright lines with or without continuous spectra in the case of gases and vapors. It tells us also that absorption dims the spectrum throughout its length when the absorption is general, and dims it here and there only when the absorption is selective. The Fraunhofer lines in the sun's spectrum afford an instance of the latter kind. So that we have general and selective radiation, and general and selective absorption.

The observations made in 1866 showed that there was abundant evidence of absorption in the sun's atmosphere, and no indication of gaseous radiation. The light which came from the spots was like all the rest, but it was dimmed, as the sun's light is dimmed in a fog. It seemed to prove that the solar spots are dark because the solar light is absorbed—stopped—by some less luminous, absorbing atmosphere pouring down on the sun's photosphere.

The spectroscope has also in some measure determined the nature of the rose-colored protuberances. These are not observed every day by means of the telescope, because they are cut out by the tremendous brightness of our atmosphere near the sun. There is, as it were, a battle between the light proceeding from the prominences and the light reflected by this atmosphere, and, except in eclipses, the victory always remains with the atmosphere.

The lines as seen in the spectroscope vary in height but never disappear, showing that for some 500 miles in height all round the sun there is an envelope of which the prominences are but the waves. This envelope MR. LOCKYER calls the "chromosphere," because it is the region in which all the variously-colored effects are seen in total eclipses. The decision from the spectroscope in regard to the protuberances proves that they are due to hydrogen.

It is found, as we said without reason, that the observations made by our most prominent scientific men during the late eclipse will prove of great value in reflecting the knowledge already gained concerning the physical constitution of the sun.

Our illustrations are from observations made at Shelbyville, Kentucky. The photographs were taken by J. A. WHIPPLE, of Boston.

The Courier-Journal of Louisville contains the following account of the observations at Shelbyville:

> The observations here to-day were very satisfactory, and in many respects gratifying. The following persons comprised the Joint Board of Observation for Shelbyville: Professor GEORGE BRANNER, of Indiana University, in charge of observations of phenomena, assisted by ADAM G. CLARK, Professor of Landscape; Assistant GEORGE W. DEAN, of the Coast Survey, in charge of observations of precision, assisted by T. BLAKE, Jun., of the Coast Survey; J. A. WHIPPLE, of Boston, assisted by GEORGE CLARK and J. PETERSON; and charge of the photographs: Professor G. R. SKINNER, of New York, devoted himself to observations of general phenomena, and during the total phase was to attempt for later-numerical analysis the Assistant T. H. AGNEW also devoted himself to observations of general phenomena and had charge of the Observatory arrangements, being assisted by R. E. SHARROD, of Louisville. The meteorological observations were made by PROFESSOR STEINER, of Louisville, and ROBERT LEWIS, of Shelbyville. Among the amateurs present was MR. BOWDITCH, of Boston, son of the celebrated astronomer.
>
> One of the most important discoveries made by PROFESSOR WILLOCK, at the spectroscope, was eleven bright lines in the spectrum of the protuberance of the sun—only five having heretofore been determined. The Professor also observed a second envelope between the earth and moon. The party are jubilant over the success. Photographs were taken at 14 different times during the partial obscuration. The beautiful corona, or solar appendages, were visible to the naked eye. "Bully's Beads," as well as the dark and illuminated shadows, were also visible, away through the air, were noted by a party of amateurs stationed on the top of the Observatory. The sky was perfectly clear, and every thing seemed to promise the success of the observations. There were ten or twelve mounted instruments in use on the grounds. The principal one of these was the Shelbyville College telescope, which was handled by Professor WILLOCK, assisted by MR. ALEX. MCADAM, of Cambridge, Massachusetts. This is a fine instrument, costing $3000. It once visited by MR. MAURY, United States. Arcturus, Vega, Venus, and Mercury were visible to the naked eye during the total phase. MR. SHARP, whose duty it was to search for inter-mercurial planets, did succeed in discovering, reporting nothing fainter than Regulus near the sun. When the sunlight commenced to become dim a large number of citizens rushed to the College grounds, the best-positioned for observation. Some minutes before the total phase the usual phenomena of distraction among the birds and animals occurred. Six minutes before totality a deathly solemn hue overspread the countenances of all present, and for a while the faint-hearted were terrified. The scene during the totality was a most awful one, and the daylight appeared again a shout of exultation went up from the great crowd in the College grounds.

The telescope used for photographing was one from Cambridge. The glass was 6 inches diameter with 7½ feet focal length. The sun was ranged for photography, giving an image of the sun about three-quarters of an inch in diameter. The exposure during totality was 2½ seconds. Professor WILLOCK devised a plan by which the same motion that exposed the plate to the sun's rays made an electrical connection with a chronograph; and thus the exact instant was recorded.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 28, 1869.

THE SOUTHERN POLITICAL SITUATION.

IT is very important to estimate correctly the political condition of the Southern States and the late elections in Virginia and Tennessee show at least one fact concerning it all will agree. It is that those who are not Republicans control the balance of power. Upon all other points there is no agreement of opinion whatever. The Times says that the result in the lesson in Tennessee is that universal amnesty must be conceded. But it does not deny that the election was carried by the Democracy to those who have been always hostile to the Republican party, and who are not friendly to the Administration. An election which apparently represents no other question than amnesty, whether it secure amnesty or not, is as decisive a defeat of Republicanism as the election of MR. PACKER would be in Pennsylvania. The talk about "old Whigs" is nonsense. There are no hopeless "hunkers" are old Whigs. Meanwhile the World says that, although WALKER and the Union were elected chiefly by Democratic Republicans," yet that "Democrats supported, elected, and will advise them;" and, in fact, the World hails the result as an old-fashioned Democratic victory. And the Democratic Gov. BINGHAM as Governor of Ohio would be, or of WADE HAMPTON or JAMES M. MASON or JEFFERSON DAVIS in the Senate of the United States.

But the Richmond Whig retorts that "it is nonsense to suppose that the election in Tennessee was a Democratic victory. The ticket was not Democratic, and the platform on which it presented was liberal Republicanism." This assertion is certainly favored by the address of MR. SEGAR, issued just before the election, in which he said that he wished to see the political equality and rights of the colored population as American citizens recognized by the supreme law of the land; that he was ready "fully and frankly" upon the Chicago Republican platform of May, 1868. But that his election can not be regarded as an adoption and approval of those views is evident from the fact that he was warmly supported by ANDREW JOHNSON, and by every enemy of the Fifteenth Amendment in the Democratic party of the State. As in Virginia, where those who despise and hate the negro voted for MR. WALKER, who favors their political equality, so in Tennessee they voted for MR. SEGAR, who declares himself their friend. In the general uncertainty the Savannah Republican advises the Southern States to avoid the Bourbon stupidity of the Northern Democrats, while a Virginia Republican writes to the Tribune that the result of the election forebodes the extinction of Republicanism in that State.

It is plain, therefore, that the situation is complicated. Republican Governors have been elected, and Republican principles have been apparently sustained by the bitter opponents of the Republican party, allied with some undoubted Republicans. The explanation offered by the New York Times is, that the majority of the Democratic voters in the Southern States have renounced the old Democratic party without consenting to accept the Republican party, and are seeking "new non-partisan" alliances in the hope of forming a new political organization. It is a combination, the Times thinks, which "stands squarely upon a Republican foundation," and which should be kindly regarded by Northern Republicans. But however desirable and promising such a situation might be, the Times fails to bring any positive proof of its existence. Democrats did undoubtedly vote for MR. WALKER and MR. SENTER; but in so doing they voted for their own enfranchisement, with a tolerable certainty of defeating at the same time the political control of their States. Such a vote was merely the bluntest horn of the dilemma. A majority of such Democrats, neither in Virginia nor in Tennessee, advocated the Republican doctrines of the candidates for whom they voted. They merely announced frowning and grounded enfranchisement. As one of them wrote to the World, they were compelled "to swallow the black dose of negro suffrage" as the condition of obtaining their own. Where the Times asserts that "in respect of principle this new born alliance is identical with the out and out Republican party," it is certainly looking at events through its rosy fingers. If what it says be true, the new Virginia and Tennessee Legislatures will send out and out Republican Senators to Washington.

The more probable explanation of the Southern elections is, that the late rebels and Democrats, persuaded that they could do nothing whatever to obtain or restored to political rights, decided to accept the situation so far as to do what was necessary to obtain that restoration. That they are weary of slave, or are very large number, have relinquished their old convictions and animosities, or would refuse to combine again with their old allies in the Northern States, if a fair prospect of success, we do not believe. As we remarked two or three weeks since, the great Democratic dogma of a white man's government can be defied to be maintained; for the condition of the vote of the restored States is a renunciation of that folly. In this respect the Democratic party has been necessarily demoralized by the success of reconstruction. But that the equal rights of the citizens of Virginia or of Tennessee will be practically respected, or the amendments cordially sustained, by such an alliance as that which has succeeded in the Southern States, is painfully problematical. We should be very sorry if all the friends of Republican principles and of General GRANT'S administration were of the same kind.

We have no wish, however, to repel true friendly advances, and we very far from undervaluing what has been gained. The suffrage is legally equalized; colored citizens are unquestionably eligible; and colored children are entitled to education. These concessions are great; but they have been wrung from those chiefly who are sullenly opposed to them. This can be proved by the fact that the new alliance is so wholly Republican as the Times believes. If its assumption were correct, this equality would be as sure in Tennessee as it is in Massachusetts. The political and humane exasperation is not so rapid. The gains are indeed nominally great, but their reality depends upon a change in the sentiment which must be very slow. If the alliance be really as the Times supposes, "on a Republican platform," we shall rejoice. But this is altogether too much to assume, and can be proved by the judgments of leaders. It is certainly the duty of Republicans to await in no hostile, if also in no sanguine, spirit.

THE ADMINISTRATION.

IF the most forcible objection that could be made to the administration of Governor HOFFMAN were, that he goes to Saratoga and dances quadrilles, it would be equally appalling fact were repeated day after day in every form, it would be tolerably clear that nothing serious could be urged against his conduct of affairs. The insistent violence of the Democratic journals about the President's summer excursions shows in the same way the absence of any serious complaint. The most significant and fatal act could be truly alleged of the President as the signing of the Erie bill by Governor HOFFMAN, he would be allowed, as the Governor of the Church, if he confessed, to repent. By the veto power, says MR. C. F. ADAMS, Jun., in the last North American Review, Governor HOFFMAN was not only a legislator, but a judge, and, and the fact will not be forgotten. He used it to stop a drop, and he refused to use it against a torrent. But of the administration of General GRANT no grave accusation has yet been made by the Opposition. The key-hole gossip of the papers that record the hour when the President rises and the number of cigars he smokes, is the characteristic effort of Jenkins in politics. He should confine himself to describing MISS A'S ribbons and MRS. B'S slippers.

MR. WENDELL PHILLIPS, indeed, holds the President responsible for the result of the Southern elections, and for the injustice which is still shown to the colored population; and MR. PHILLIPS so early and so closely fixed the dereliction of ANDREW JOHNSON that he has earned a peculiar right of speaking upon the subject. The men whose example he quotes would unquestionably have carried them by the sword—and GRANT is a constitutional President. If he had given every office in those States, as MR. PHILLIPS had advised, if he had written the strongest letters, could he have cajoled the votes of those who hate the negro? Could he give or withhold the suffrage? If MR. BOUTWELL had been President and MR. PHILLIPS think that the Democrats would have been elected in Tennessee? The system of government upon which MR. PHILLIPS latterly insists is the aberrant Cæsarism. He is impatient of the necessary frictions and delays of a free, popular government. He names RICHELIEU, BONAPARTE, WALPOLE. He might as well name GENGHIS KHAN and TIMOUR THE TARTAR. If, as MR. PHILLIPS says, Northern property is nowhere safe at the South, if Texas reeks with outrages, if Southern men will not believe that there can be a change at Washington or they must fly, is it his duty to tell us what RICHELIEU would have done or what President GRANT may do? MR. PHILLIPS seems to us to overestimate the Executive power in this country, and to underestimate the element of time in producing changes in public opinion.

Those who supposed, as certainly MR. PHILLIPS took care to tell us in advance that he did not suppose, that a universal and general will were instantly to prevail in the South, the public debt to be paid, the West Indies to be annexed, and taxation to be abolished by General GRANT'S election, have been naturally disappointed. He became President when there was a deplorable social condition in the Southern States, a heavy debt and taxation, and perplexing foreign questions. Two years after the end of the first half year of his administration the debt is materially reduced, and the national credit improved; the questions of the Republican Reconstruction and the Fifteenth Amendment have been formally, if not from conviction, approved in the Southern States that have voted; the English questions, if not settled, is not embittered; the universality laws of the United States have been most firmly and successfully enforced; and the efficiency and honesty of the public service have been promoted. On the other hand, there are some mistakes to record. General SICKLES should not have been appointed Minister to Spain, and a more decided protection of the country of its neutrality in the Cuban revolution should have been issued. As we write, nothing is certainly known of any negotiations with Spain in regard to Cuba. If the Administration has made an offer with a menace, it has done what the character of the President and of the Secretary of State forbid us to believe to be possible.

The American people see in the conduct of the Administration thus far a steady regard to honesty and economy, a true appreciation of the honor and best traditions of the country in its foreign relations, and strict fidelity to the principles which the War of Secession. Contrasted with all the later Democratic administrations, it is free both from crime and from "Buncombe;" while in what condition at home and abroad the country would have been if MR. HORATIO SEYMOUR and FRANCIS P. BLAIR had been elected, with WADE HAMPTON and his allies controlling the Democracy in Southern States, is plain enough to every thinking man. The foolish abuse of the President by those who could not find words contemptuous enough for him when he was a candidate, is appropriately expressed by the pen of JENKINS and the tongue of MR. A. OAKEY HALL. But when MR. PHILLIPS accuses the Administration of disloyal apathy or honest incapacity" he ought certainly to give some proof of his charges.

EUROPE IN AMERICA.

THE Spanish Cortes will reassemble in October and elect a king. Meanwhile the Carlist demonstrations continue, and the Government has summoned the priests to explain their connection with the disorders. The situation of the country naturally excites great attention in Europe, and it is undoubtedly felt that the Spanish bold upon her colonies cannot much longer be relaxed. Indeed, after a contest like that in Cuba, the most sagacious Spaniards must anticipate no other result. If Great Britain had repeated the revolution of this country in 1776 the independence of the colonies would have been only delayed; and if Spain should resume an apparent sovereignty in Cuba it could only be for a brief time, and the next movement upon the island would angrily shake off her hand. England is evidently learning the lesson which the history of Spain should have been long urging. In his introductory lecture upon History at Oxford a dozen years ago, Professor GOLDWIN SMITH pointed out with what confidence and utter scorn to England for having lost the opportunity of parting friends with her American colonies. The late speech of Sir JOHN YOUNG in Canada shows that the mother country does not intend to alienate another colony by struggling to retain it against its will.

It is harder for Spain to learn the lesson; harder both because of her political backwardness and because of the greater profit of her colonies. Indeed, it seems almost hopeless to expect in the policy of the most advanced nations the simple good sense that marks private affairs; and, since it is hardly to be expected that England and the United States will treat the Alabama question as such a difference would be treated by two honorable men, it is useless to wish that Spain might have submitted the question of separation to the Cubans when the revolution began. If it be impossible for a European state to hold its American possessions forever, it might certainly provide for the parting without such anarchy as now prevails in Cuba. Points of pride and supposed honor are always in the way. LOUIS NAPOLEON, for instance, finds an insurrection in the streets. He declares that he will not treat with insurgents in arms. Every body is right if they demand injustice, but foolish if their claims are just. He suppresses the insurrection, restores what he calls his authority, and then yields what was demanded. Does he suppose that it has not been gained by the baffled insurrection, and that every insurgent does not know it? Spain is traditionally haughty, and will of course not treat with rebels. But is there any Spanish statesman shrewd enough to see that Spain must soon yield what her rebels demand?

Undoubtedly some kind of proposition has been made to the Spanish Government by the United States, and made unsuccessfully. That it was a wholly honorable proposition there can be no doubt. It is reported, that a proposition has failed, the United States reserve every right, and it will be for them to decide when circumstances and the general welfare require positive action. Spain will not doubt, as the country has had no reason to question, that whatever may be done will be done in no spirit of hostility to a nation which is honestly attempting to pass peacefully from the most degraded monarchical system to the most enlightened and liberal popular government.

THE PRESIDENT AND MISSISSIPPI.

The President has declared himself very emphatically in favor of the Republican party in Mississippi. This, we hope, will surprise no one who have imagined that he was neutral, or who suppose that in a system like ours the President will cease to sympathize with his party until, like TYLER and JOHNSON, he has decided to woo the Opposition. But as we have never heard any such intention upon the part of General GRANT, we did not expect any change in that he should expressly declare himself. Will our friends insist, also, that it is necessary for him to express his sentiments in regard to the election of Mr. PACKER in Pennsylvania, and of Mr. PENDLETON in Ohio? May it not be presumed that he sympathizes with the principles that brought him into power and position? But there is no more doubt who represents those principles in Mississippi than there is in Ohio. The term "Conservative Republican" is merely a new Southern phrase for Democrat, as we have elsewhere suggested. If there is a new party proposed, what are its principles?

In his interview with Mr. TARBELL, the Republican representative from Mississippi, the President very properly said that he preferred his administration should speak by acts rather than by words. But it was perhaps natural that, under all the circumstances, he should be willing, in this instance, to state verbally what no Mississippi Republican ought ever to have doubted. General GRANT, indeed, has not been the kind of partisan that General JACKSON was, who would certainly never have been asked to declare in what direction his sympathies in any election lay. But he has never swerved from a fidelity to the principles and policy of the party that finally and properly elected him, and the immeasurable abuse of the Opposition should alone be sufficient to show how faithful to those principles he is apparent. If his political foes had suspected him of party infidelity their tone would have modified as it is with ANDREW JOHNSON. Five years ago that gentleman was, in the opinion of the World, for instance, more brutal than the Roman Consul's horse. He was then a Republican impossible. Even those who, in the degree that his real political sympathies reappeared, the tone of that discriminating and independent journal softened, until, having betrayed the party that elected him and which will come upon the whole the least respectable of American politicians, the same authority declares him to be "a true man."

Our friends in the Southern States ought to see that if there is any doubt whatever of the President's position and sympathies there is every doubt. And it is really necessary that he should state his preference for the success of his friends, the statement would be suspicious. But no man believes now, more than a year ago, that General GRANT could possibly imitate ANDREW JOHNSON. He is necessarily more a Republican to-day than ever; and it is an superfluous to ask him to say so as to ask Mr. COLFAX to say it. With all other Republicans in the country he understands that the "Conservative" party in the South is the party which hopes to hear that Mr. PENDLETON and Mr. PACKER are elected, and whose success at home will be heartily hailed by Mr. VALLANDIGHAM and by Tammany Hall. To satisfy overanxious friends the President has consented to speak. But no protest against an importunity which necessarily throws a doubt upon his position.

REMEDIES FOR DISABLED HONOR.

A few weeks ago in Paris a gentlemen, conceiving himself insulted by another, challenged him to a duel, and one of them was wounded, but will recover. At about the same time, in Boston, a gentleman under a similar impression seized the nose of another and "turned it moderately and quietly" for which he was sentenced to two months in the common jail, but has appealed. Now if there were really an offense of honor in the first case, the remedy was obviously unfair, and therefore dishonorable. It is very true that there is a class of serious offenses—those that are described as mortal insults—for which the law furnishes no redress. When DR. JOHNSON told the Billingsgate dame that she was an interjection and a vigar fraction, her mortal wrath outrage might have been a thousandfold more intelligible than if he had stolen a sole from before her, and no actions for libel or slander was possible. She had but two proper remedies—one was to strike him; the other to "saree" back; unless indeed she were of the true Christian temper, and could offer the other cheek.

It is for the satisfaction of these suits which no court will entertain that the duello has been maintained. But its extreme absurdity is gradually abolishing it. A duel between gentlemen like Boston it is already ridiculous, and it will be so in Paris as the French city advances in civilization. Yet even when the formal duello has disappeared a substitute is left in the system of corporal correction upon the supposed offender, of which the moderate and quiet turning of the culprit's nose is the latest and certainly the most pleasing illustration, as conveying the impression of a higher civilization than the blood of the hot and furious wrenching of that feature. But the duello will not die even in this, is essentially unfair, as we have remarked, and therefore dishonorable.

The Pennsylvania Central Railroad were GUSTAVE FLOWRENS and PAUL CASSAGNAC. Let us suppose that M. FLOWRENS is an accomplished swordsman or shot, and that he knows M. CASSAGNAC to be perfect at those boisterous manner. In the civilization of Paris the duello, under such circumstances, is imperative. The challenged must choose swords or pistols. But obviously in the duello, as it exists in Paris to-day, as in the cities of every citizen, and he has by no has only the choice of methods for his own murder. The consequence of such a system is, that every body's honor or life is at the mercy of a bully. Nor is it essentially different in the other case, except that hot blood may be an excuse; although whether hot blood can excuse a moderate and quiet outrage of the nose is questionable. But here again a bully may follow, in the cars or elsewhere, may put as many imaginary claps upon his shoulder as he pleases; and what is to become of them gone, may quietly turn his small neighbor's nose ad libitum. What is a small neighbor to do? If he tries the contretemps he probably thrashed. Clearly he, also, has no remedy, and is equally at a bully's mercy. So that really if there are no better remedies for insulted honor than small swords and pistols, or than the turning of the nose, isn't it perhaps better not to suffer your honor to be insulted?

A PUBLIC DISGRACE AND DANGER.

In the late proceedings at Albany and along the line of the Pennsylvania Central the people of this State and of the country have had an opportunity of seeing the consequences of the growing power of enormous corporations. The courts of law, which are theoretically the last and passionless resort, and whose rigid impartiality is the sole hope of peaceful solutions of exciting questions between citizens, are dominated to these bodies. They retain judges, and the gravest functions of law are so much merchandise as are fruit in the market. There are judges in this State with whose probity there is no more confidence than in that of Reddy the Blacksmith; who belong to certain corporations and receive as the rolling stock of a railroad belongs to the Company. Under such circumstances, private rights and public convenience are totally disregarded. And now it is not enough that there should be open and shameless prostitution of the forms of law, but the corporations proceed to open war upon the soil of the State, and the Governor issues a proclamation threatening to call out the entire military force at his disposal to restore order.

It is not the least suggestive fact that one of the belligerents in this unnatural war against the enormous power to whose dictation the same Governor yielded under the universal suspicion in the public mind that the political Ring with which he is connected needed money for its operations could furnish. In the present case, however, of the most flagrant and inexcusable breach of the peace, it was impossible that the Governor should so far outrage public sentiment as not to assume the attitude of a rigorous enforcer of the law. He has done what he ought to have done; but the official action of Governor HOFFMAN since his proclamation has been virtually leaving fraud at the polls, and his signing the Erie bill, inspires no confidence either in his principle or his courage.

The State of New York will soon fall, if it has not already fallen, under the absolute control of these great moneyed powers. One railroad has the Legislature, Harvard New Jersey, and there are at least two vast and unscrupulous corporations in New York. Whether they fight or whether they combine, the people suffer. Their purposes are their own aggrandizement and advantage. They rule by an iron will, and they are masters who can inspire fear only. The noblest incentive of action which a despot can offer, personal faith and loyalty, are unknown to them. Their sway is a gross, sordid, material influence. But, however this may be, every reflecting man sees the signs of the times advance to political supremacy of great corporations in this country. The present Connecticut legislature is under the press. How many hundreds of thousands of dollars has the Erie Railroad spent for advertising? and how much does the country really know of the inner history of the Pacific Railroad? A newspaper naturally no more wishes to alienate immense and liberal advertisers than a clergyman wishes to send a wealthy parishioner out of church.

Mr. PARTON informs us that the corporation in Congress is an illusion. We hope it is so. May we believe the same of the New York Legislature and of the New York judges? And are the same system that elects the judges elects the representatives to Albany and Washington. Is there no power in the people? and is every member of Congress selected for his power of resisting "influence?" The member is virtually elected by the causes. Does corruption never appeal primary? What a dangerous suggestion can possibly be made of a letter like that of Mr. ASHLEY to Mr. CASE? Mr. ASHLEY's letter to the Ohio certainly did not account for it satisfactorily; and we do not suppose that Mr. ASHLEY was the only member who sophisticated himself?

The corruption of these vast moneyed organizations can not be overestimated, nor can that of the evil of that power. Their conduct is the credulity and credit and the reports in the papers of their pocketing judges and marshaling their followers for votes. It is not an amusing spectacle; it is a menacing spectacle. It should warn us to do what we can to correct public opinion, and to promote honesty in legislation by attaching public disgrace to bribery. For many a year we shall pay the penalty of having so long forgotten that our government rests upon the purity of public opinion, and that the condition of its purity and permanence is cure and conscience upon the part of every citizen.

NOTES.

It was to be expected that the eclipse would produce fine writing, but we hardly expected any thing so fine as that of a correspondent from a certain Western city. "The city re joiced," says this admirable chronicler, "for almost every man, woman, and child was prepared during the day with smoked and colored glasses." But it was not the outward eye only that was to be gratified.

"Business was deferred for this day, and every mind's eye was directed to the grand and unexpected wonderful celestial phenomenon. The following is a full line of demarcation, and estimate with us in parity of atmosphere; science will no doubt furnish more advanced views, but I prefer to convey to the human mind a more satisfactory idea of the grandeur and sublimity of the scene."

The course of events is faithfully followed in the description until

"At 3.15 o'clock there came a sudden dash, as from a star, for more than a minute, and one of the last remnants, and vastly more intricate, and the luminary lineaments, and the rays, and the corona, and the halo, and vision the corona, encircling the opaque moon, and the sun and the moon combined into view, and the grand exclamation of joyful admiration burst involuntarily from the lips of groups of by-standers—ladies, gentlemen, and children.

"At eighteen minutes and sixteen seconds past five o'clock, with the most splendid star-like beam, that it had shown at the commencement, the totality disappeared, and the peerless sun emerged from obscurity again, and was hailed by exclamations of delight."

The climax of this glowing author is incomparable:

"Cows continued to graze in the fields, and horses stood unmoved during the eclipse; but chickens crowed, fluttered, and went to bed. Mr. LOUIS JAY, of Philadelphia, on a visit to her son GEORGE JAY, Esq., has witnessed three total eclipses, and thinks this the finest of them all."

THE new Republican City Committee, of which we spoke last week, opens its campaign by a most vigorous exposure of what must be called the rascality of other similar organizations in the city. It will undoubtedly claim recognition at the State Convention, and whether successful or not, it should be regarded as a protest too powerful to be disregarded, against the present bodies that assume to represent the party in this city, and to dictate to the responsible officers of the United States Government whom they shall select as assistants. Every such officer, under our present system, will naturally listen with respect to the respectful suggestions of his party associates, as he will instantly repel any assumption of such dictation as was attempted with MARshal BARLOW. The Republican majority out of the city is tired of these little city wrangles which are transferred to every State Convention, and will now undoubtedly insist that the wishes of all honorable and candid members of the party in this neighborhood shall be sustained and a new organization effected. If the formation of the new Committee does not attain that result, we trust that others and still others will be formed until the present organization is wholly destroyed. The Tribune suggests that the Committee appointed by the last State Convention to attempt the troubles in the city should arrange them. It is a very good suggestion; and we beg to add to it that the root of the difficulty is that the city Conventions have become mere office brokerages, and the business of a Republican Committee is not to procure offices for its members.

"THE SEVEN CURSES of London," just published by HARPER & BROTHERS, and by CHARLES GREENWOOD, so well known as the "amateur casual," it is a thorough exposure, by a master hand, of the evils of gross idleness in London and New York. It treats of neglected children, professional beggars, professional beggars, fallen women, drunkenness, gambling, and indiscriminate almsgiving. While it investigates these evils, it also suggests methods of reform. The Messrs. HARPER have issued this book at the low price of twenty-five cents.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE Ohio Democratic State Convention, on August 11, nominated the Hon. George H. Pendleton for Governor of that State, General Rosecrans for Lieutenant-Governor. Pendleton has accepted.

Governor Sentter's message to Tennessee was over 100 pages.

On his return to San Francisco from Alaska Ex-Secretary SEWARD is to be presented with a cane valued at $1000 by the Society of California Pioneers. The head of the cane is composed of forty-one triangular pieces of gold-bearing quartz from forty-one mines of different counties in California.

There is no end of railway accidents. On the Pennsylvania Central Road a passenger train was thrown from the track by a rock, which had been placed there by a tramp. The engineer killed and several passengers wounded. On the Delaware and Lackawanna Road a train ran off the track on the evening of the 19th, near St. Mary's, in Pennsylvania, and both the engineer and baggage-master were injured.

The fiercest battle yet fought between the Modoc Indians and the United States troops occurred on the 10th inst. The fight lasted from 10 A.M. to 4 P.M., and was terminated by the arrival of reinforcements. The loss was severe on both sides.

The Astor Library will at the St. Louis Insane Asylum has at length been obtained by the Sisters of Charity. The well is to be of a depth of 3845 feet, and was costing the city $35 per foot. The work has been going four years, and is to take two years more to finish. The water found is bitter within 120 feet of the mouth of the well. At the depth of 1200 feet pure water was found in small quantity, and more will be gained by "piping off" the well at that point, by which means the cracking water will be kept out, and the fresher water secured for the use of the asylum. The work has been in progress for a number of years, and will cost the city heavily.

The boilers of the steamer Cumberland, for Evansville, Indiana, exploded near a place called Shawneetown, in Illinois, on August 14, and eighteen or twenty lives were lost.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE British Parliament was prorogued August 11. The Queen, on the closing message, assured them that she continued to receive from foreign Powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition in regard to the suspension of the negotiations with this country for the Alabama claims, and that she trusted this delay would tend to maintain relations between the two countries on the friendly basis of mutual esteem. She noticed the several important acts of the session, framed in the interest of the welfare of the people, and promote the work of peace in Ireland; regarded the appointment of a new Lord Lieutenant as a wise selection; and hoped the measure for the purchase and management of the Irish railways by the Government might facilitate the great commercial and social object of rapid, easy, and economical communication, and prove no unworthy sequel to the excellent system of Irish railways.

We have a report from Spain that a reinforcement of 20,000 men will be sent to Cuba in September. The Spanish Cortes will assemble in October.

The Russian Government has arranged that Oxford and Harvard crews has been fixed for August 27.

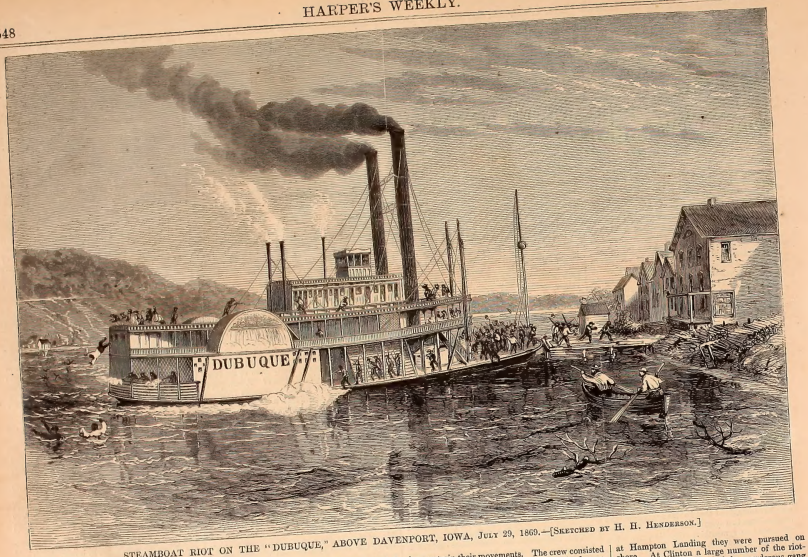
The Queen of Spain arrived at Biarritz August 9, having made her trip from this city in 23 days, 9 hours, and 30 minutes.

Marshal Neil, of France, died on the 14th of August. The commemoration of the anniversary of the birth of Napoleon I. was celebrated in France August 15; and on Sunday a grand review took place at Paris. Peace and political offenders, and to army and navy deserters.

The harvest in the Valley of the Garonne, in the south of France, is reported to be almost ruined by the excessive rains. At Bordeaux the wheat crop is the effect that that General has given the Spaniards a severe thrashing.

The horrible cruelties practiced upon the unfortunate Christians in the province of Candia, the object which Europe has been ringing ever since their disclosure, have spurred the Christians to desperate resistance. A commission has already been appointed by the Austrian Government to propose a full list of the monastic institutions, like all other corporate associations, under strict Government supervision and inspection.

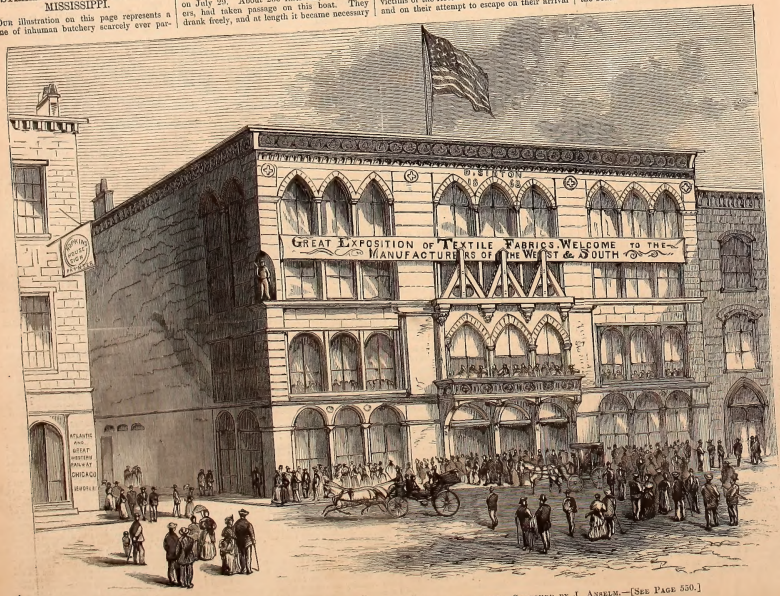
M. Ferdinand de Lesseps, after having connected two seas, is now engaging to connect a third. It appears that some enterprising explorers of Central Africa have proved that the Nile and the Niger have in the bed of an old sea displaced by a convulsion of nature. An Italian of that adventurous race, Negrelli, a little time ago sent some engineers to examine the configuration of the land. He is, therefore, the first, or opinion that a canal seventy-five miles in length would suffice to put the Red Sea and the Sahara in communication, restore to the latter its original fertility, and create a new method of inland course with Central America by means of these arteries. It is proposed that such an operation be seriously taken in hand it is to be hoped that due notice will be given to the Powers interested, that no unnecessary fear, or the consequences to the traveling public in Africa might prove highly disastrous.



STEAMBOAT RIOT ON THE "DUBUQUE," ABOVE DAVENPORT, IOWA, JULY 29, 1869.—[SKETCHED BY H. H. HENDERSON.]

STEAMBOAT RIOT ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

OUR illustration on this page represents a scene of inhuman butchery scarcely ever paralleled. The tragedy occurred on board the steamer Dubuque, just above Davenport, Iowa, on July 29. About 250 raftsmen, or harvesters, had taken passage on this boat. They drank freely, and at length it became necessary to restrain their movements. The crew consisted of about thirty negroes, and, as it devolved upon them to repress the tumult, they became the victims of the rioters. Six of them were killed, and on their attempt to escape on their arrival at Hampton Landing they were pursued on shore. At Clinton a large number of the rioters were arrested. Two of the murderous gang were seriously wounded during the conflict on the boat.



EXPOSITION OF TEXTILE FABRICS AT CINCINNATI, OHIO, AUGUST 3–7, 1869.—SKETCHED BY J. ANSELM.—[SEE PAGE 550.]

PEABODY STATUE, LONDON.

The ceremony of publicly unveiling the bronze statue of Mr. George Peabody, the American benefactor of the London poor, was performed by the Prince of Wales on July 23; and the Lord Mayor and other civic dignitaries, with the new American Minister and many of the leading citizens, took part in the proceedings.

The Prince of Wales, before unveiling the statue, honored the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress with his company at luncheon, which was served with much splendor in the great saloon of the Mansion House. A select company had been invited to meet the Prince, among whom were Mr. Motley, Miss Burdett Coutts, and Mr. W. W. Story, the American sculptor.

The ceremony of unveiling the statue took place at the Royal Exchange, the Prince of Wales officiating. Sir Benjamin Phillips, as chairman of the Peabody Memorial Committee, addressed the Prince, stating that it was designed by this statue to commemorate an act almost without parallel in English history, and to express the gratitude of the English people for Mr. Peabody's gifts to the poor of London. "It will tell," said he, "to future generations, and, for all time, to our children and our children's children, how a plain and earnest man, born in another country, settled among us, and by a long, prosperous, and honorable career, became one of our merchant princes, and, having realized a kingly fortune, conceived the desire of distributing it in his life, not with the object of self-aggrandizement, but for the Godlike purpose of ameliorating the miseries, assuaging the woes, and elevating the social and moral condition of his fellow-creatures." He further stated that the committee had chosen Mr. Story for the sculptor of this statue, as a distinguished countryman of Mr. Peabody, in order to show their regard for the United States of America. They hoped it would be symbolical of the peace and friendship that should always exist between the two countries, inhabited by people of the same race, speaking the same language, and inspired with the same love of freedom.

WHICH OF THE THREE?—(See Poem, Page 550.)

In reply to this address the Prince of Wales said: "Among the many duties which I have the privilege of performing none could have given me greater pleasure than to assist and take part in the unveiling of this statue on this occasion. The name of George Peabody is so well known to all of you that really I feel some difficulty in saying any thing new of that remarkable man; but, at the same time, it affords me the deepest gratification to join in paying a mark of tribute and respect to the name of that great American citizen and philanthropist—I may say that citizen of the world. England can never adequately pay the debt of gratitude which she owes to him, London especially, where his wonderful charity has been so liberally distributed. For a man not born in this country to give a sum, I believe, of more than a quarter of a million of pounds sterling for purposes of benevolence is a fact unexampled. His name will go down to posterity as one who, as Sir Benjamin Phillips so justly remarked, has tried to ameliorate the position of his poorer fellow-citizens, and especially to benefit their moral and social character. I have not yet had the opportunity of seeing the statue which is about to be unveiled; but, having had the privilege of knowing the sculptor, Mr. Story, for a space of now about ten years, I feel sure it will be one worthy of his reputation, and worthy also of the man to whom it is dedicated. Before concluding the few imperfect remarks which I have ventured to address to you, let me thank Mr. Motley, the American Minister, for his presence on this occasion, and assure him what pleasure it gives me to take part in this great, and, I might almost say, national ceremonial of paying a tribute to the name of his great and distinguished countryman. Be assured that the feelings which I personally entertain toward America are the same as ever they were. I can never forget the reception which I had there nine years ago, and my earnest wish and hope is that England and America may go hand in hand in peace and prosperity."

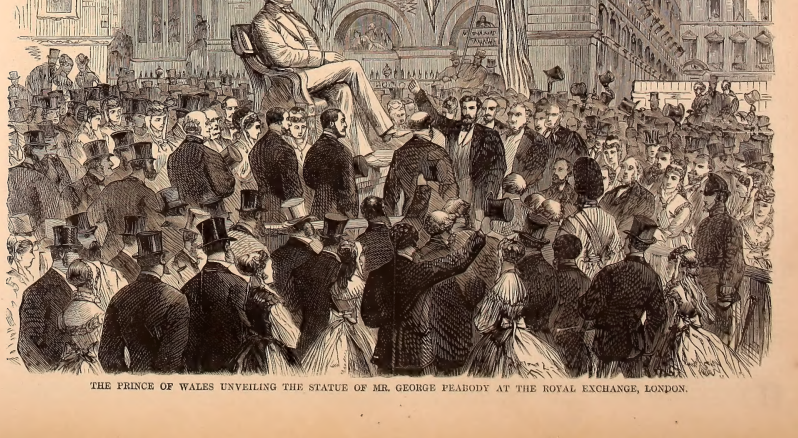
Mr. Motley afterward spoke, and in the course of his remarks said that the name of Mr. Peabody needed no eulogy. "Most fortunate as well as most generous of men, he has discovered a secret for which misers might sigh in vain—the art of keeping a great fortune for himself through all time. For I have often thought in this connection of a famous epitaph, familiar, no doubt, to many who now hear me: 'What I spent I had; what I gave I have; what I kept I lost.' And what a magnificent treasure, according to these noble and touching words, has our friend and the poor man's friend preserved for himself till time shall be no more,

'And tongues to be his beauty shall rehearse
When all the brethren of this world are dead.'

Of all men in the world he least needs a monument." Mr. Motley went on to speak of the statue, which he had seen in Mr. Story's studio at Rome, and which he praised as a faithful likeness, having once seen Mr. Peabody and his statue seated side by side.

Mr. Story, the sculptor, having been called for, said, modestly, he had no speech to make. He added, significantly, pointing to the statue, "That is my speech," a remark which occasioned much merriment. The ceremony was then brought to a close, and the Prince took his leave. His Royal Highness, as he did so, was repeatedly cheered.

A letter which Queen Victoria wrote to Mr. Peabody on his leaving England is published by the Boston Post. Her Majesty wrote: "The Queen is very sorry that Mr. Peabody's sudden departure has made it impossible for her to see him before he left England, and she is concerned to hear that he is gone in bad health. She now writes him a line to express her hope that he may return to this country quite recovered, and that she may then have the opportunity, of which she has now been deprived, of seeing him and offering him her personal thanks for all he has done for the people." The note was transmitted by Mr. Arthur Helps, the Clerk of the Privy Council, who adds that the Queen also commanded him "to be sure and charge Mr. Peabody to report himself on his return to England." The design, inaugurated by Mr. Peabody and Mr. A. T. Stewart, to become during their lives the executors of their own estates for philanthropic purposes, will, we hope, be imitated by others who, like them, have been so fortunate as to accumulate vast wealth.



THE PRINCE OF WALES UNVEILING THE STATUE OF MR. GEORGE PEABODY AT THE ROYAL EXCHANGE, LONDON.

WHICH OF THE THREE?

See Illustration on Page 549.

WHICH of the three so sweet, I wonder,
Do sensible bachelors long to woo,
By wavelets' wash and ripple, and under
The haze of a sky which is blue—so blue!
A magnet thrill at the heart should beckon
The passionate boys to the rocks to see
Such deep-sea treasures, and pause to reckon
Their chance of choice of the maidens three.

Which of the three? 'tis weary choosing.
A tale which Paris of old begins,
For two must bitterly hate for losing,
And only one can adorn who wins.
A golden apple, the swain on Ida
Bestowed on the fairest maid, but he
Would please how few did he dare decide a
Reward for the best of my maidens three.

Which of the three? their faces surely
Are best of books for a man to read;
When Millicent's eyes look down demurely,
My butterfly gentlemen, pray take heed!
For eyes of blue, though the dark lash hide them,
Declare like songs which a siren sings;
But blue or black let us sit beside them,
And, like the butterflies, burn our wings.

Which of the three? the long wave brushes
Its voice in pleasure about their feet;
The sea-gull soars, and his white wing brushes
Their golden hair; on the rocks, their seat,
The sea-anemones bloom; their dresses
The impudent breezes love to toss
In sweet disorder, and toy with tresses
Which sit too truly a sibbon's loss.

Which of the three? De query's idle,
Twixt dark and fair, or short and tall,
Would any one choose if he dared to sidle,
And sit in propinquity amidst them all?
A Mormonite tone the ozone instilleth
To those who are happily surnamed "young;"
For those who are old, to the sea we willeth,
Is a throne three beautiful maids among.

Which of the three? if I needs must choose one,
To rank all maids in the world above,
If take, you'd think, of the world all those one,
That maid whose attitude whispers love.
And then, when summer returned, I'd wander
No more to pray by the shrine of one
But all that was best in the world I'd squander
On her—the best of the maidens three.

EXPOSITION OF TEXTILE FABRICS, CINCINNATI.

AT this time, when ocean cables and international canals are in process of construction, and the chief source of a share of the public attention, there is great danger lest in our absorption by these more general aspects of commerce we should forget those interests by which the great sections of our common country are bound together. The recent exposition of textile fabrics at Cincinnati, Ohio, was a brilliant conception. It was an invitation of the South to unite with the West in the opening of a new era, which promises unparalleled prosperity to both those sections.

This exposition revealed the weakness of Southern and Western manufactures, not to the extent of their operations; but is also clearly proved that in the quality of the articles produced there are not shrink from a comparison with their Eastern rivals.

It seems strange that in a city like Cincinnati, numbering 200,000 souls, there should be but a single woolen-mill. But such is the fact.

The rooms in which the exposition were held were spacious, extending back from Vine Street 150 feet; and with their great width, high ceilings, and good light, nicely furnished ample facilities for the display of goods. In the rear of the first room, connecting the visitors as they arrived, were the words, "Welcome to the Manufacturers of the West and South."

Looms of the best kind were on exhibition. There were those that would compare with any manufactured in the world; cassimeres superior to much that is manufactured in New England and long ahead from the prairie of the West; and Northwest that were equal to any produced on this continent.

This is the second exposition of textile fabrics in the Northwest. The peculiar characteristic of this second convention is the invitation to cooperation extended to the South. In this matter of manufactures the West and the South are natural allies. And why should they not avail themselves of the vast water-power of both these sections answers the question. The West must, from the necessities of the case, be, in a large measure, occupied in interests purely agricultural; and as for the South, so long as slavery existed only agricultural pursuits were followed. But why should the past be repeated in the future? GOVERNOR HAYES, of Ohio, put this affair in the right light when he said, at the opening of this exposition:

"Where fuel, and food, and land, and building materials, and minerals are abundant and cheap, and where the climate is healthful and friendly to labor; where the raw material can be produced profitably; where the consumption of the manufactured article is large; where the best facilities are offered for transporting both raw material and the fabric, by land and by water, to and from the great markets of the world—it would seem that the only remaining elements essential to the successful establishment of any desired manufacture are capital and labor; and that, with the conditions here supposed, both capital and labor are bound to appear at the command of intelligence, enterprise, and will. Now I need not pause to marshal facts and figures to prove that in the States represented by the gentlemen whom we are glad to welcome to-day are land, and fuel, and food, and materials for building, and the wealth, and health, and intelligence in which it is good for man to work; roads, canals, rivers, lakes, railways, for easy and rapid transportation to and from all the earth. All of these things, if we would see them, we have but to open our eyes and look around us. The wise farmer, traveling through a new country looking for good land, knows when he has reached it by the forests which covers it. The soil is known by its trees. Judge this favored region, which we still call the Northwest, by the farmer's rule. Behold what has grown up on this land during the few years since civilized man first began to possess it! Louisville, Memphis, St. Louis, Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Cleveland, and the host of smaller cities, towns, and villages which are dotted all over it, and the centers of whose growth and prosperity are in its matchless soil, denote the high intelligence and enterprise which are its fitness to be the home of that varied industry which is always found in the highest civilization. The possessor of a country like this have only themselves to blame if they fail to come up to the full measure of their pursuits, without which a general diffusion of knowledge and culture is impossible."

This exposition is a more important affair than at first it would seem. It suggests the conflict of the future. The great question of the age to agitate the public mind relate to finance and commerce. And upon these questions the West and South are to be for the most part united.

Twenty thousand persons visited the exposition on the second day. The characteristic event of the day was the arrival of an invoice of goods from the mills of BRIGHAM YOUNG, Salt Lake City, Utah. These were principally cassimeres. On the evening of August 5, there was a sumptuous banquet at the Burnet House. A trade—she was inaugurated on the 6th, at which the goods on exhibition were disposed of.

THE BAR OF GOLD.

BY ANNIE THOMAS.

GERALD ADAIR had lived a very useless, careless, selfish life for many years; but until after he had met with Violet Leigh, he had never committed any thing that could be stigmatized as a crime, either by the best or the most censorious of men. After that meeting it would have been hard for the most lenient or the most lax to pronounce him inoffensive any more.

The meeting took place in this wise: Down in the luxuriant, ferny depths of South Devon a richly wooded and watered gorge, between two lofty ridges of hills, had been made the scene of a picnic that had been organized on a colossal scale by a couple of the most renowned hot hand givers in the neighborhood. The place was a very picnic-suggesting one; and when Mr. and Mrs. Arbuthnot called their house party, and such fashionable people at the end of the London season, it (the place) naturally occurred to them as one that would be a fitting stage for the enactment of one of those diversions which were absolutely necessary for the diversion of the already overdiverted leaders.

"We must have a picnic at Ivy Bridge among other things," Mrs. Arbuthnot had said while scratching a memorandum that was ordained to be "static" from the first. She made this suggestion in the presence of Mr. Adair the morning after their guests arrived, and as he consumed is impossible.

"Those are all silly, groundless complaints that have been leveled against the time-honored institution a thousand times, and refuted. I expected something more original from you," Mrs. Arbuthnot said.

"Refute them now. I will be easily convinced that I am wrong."

"Well," she said, laughing, "the majority of the girls who will be at our picnic are too pretty to need to be considered, and the men will always be as well iced as if you were dining at home, and the hampers shall not disgrace Gunter or Fortnum and Mason. You shouldn't grudge us an enjoy it, and confess to me afterward that Violet Leigh would have made all the evils even you can picture to yourself tolerable."

"Who is Violet Leigh?" he asked.

"She is the most perfectly lovely girl it has ever been my lot to meet," Mrs. Arbuthnot, who was by way of being a beauty herself—said, warmly.

"Ah!" he said, with his most insufferable air, "I don't like your country beauties."

Mrs. Arbuthnot suppressed her impatience. "If you will you will," she said, coldly. "You shall then say what you imagine her to be. She is the only daughter of the late Sir Aymott Leigh of a careless, improvident race, who knew how to spend money, but not how to get it, and who, for even you may own to having heard of Sir Aymott Leigh, were famous. Violet's parents, without loss of caste, have been adopted by the Vincents, old friends of her father's; and rumor says she is the richest heiress in the county. You needn't turn up your nose at her; she is the belle of every place at which she appears; she caused a sensation in Paris last year."

"So she tells you, I suppose," he said, laughing.

"No she doesn't tell me, scoffer, but so I happen to know. Now picture her."

"Thanks; but the remuneration of being right would be too great for me. You needn't lessly. "However, I will go to your picnic, not to be charmed with Miss Violet Leigh, but because you desire me to do so."

Kate Arbuthnot laughed. It was a well-understood thing among them all that Mrs. Adair's golden loneliness and neglect were of her own doing. Her husband liked the man. "Not that I have any good of him," Mr. Arbuthnot said to his wife; on the other hand, I don't know any harm of him, you see; and he likes Kate, and Kate can keep any fellow from liking her too much." This being the state of the case, Mr. Adair was willing enough to bury himself in the solitudes of Glade much more frequently than in any other of his numerous country haunts. He was even willing to go the length of attending that which most London men who have passed their "salad days" would most sedulously eschew—namely, a country picnic—for the sake of pleasing his fair pleasant hostess. The lady smiled a smile of gratified satisfaction now. "After all, why should you feign to be above most things, and weary of the rest?" she said. "I don't believe you to be either, remember; but the great majority accept your own estimate of yourself, and think that you are sated with pleasure and saddened with grief."

"Decidedly I am not sated with pleasure," he said.

"Are you saddened with thought? No, I don't believe it, Mr. Adair."

"I do think sometimes, though you think me incapable of the effort, I know."

"But you're on the top of the tide: you're well off, and you don't deserve to be otherwise than well off, now that you've come off with your name to date. You're young and good-looking (you know the latter fact so well that I needn't scruple to mention it to you). You're tolerably clever, and you have no wife to worry you."

"Yet a wife is the very thing you are always advising me to get. I am not other mortals, for instance, have you in putting Miss Leigh in my path?"

"Yes, I should like you to take her," Mrs. Arbuthnot said. "A wife like Violet, but not any wife."

"What day do you say your picnic is to be?" he said, suddenly.

"Next Wednesday."

"Ah! a thousand pities that business should call me away on Tuesday," he said.

"Now, Mr. Adair, you are trying to trifle with me, you know it. Ivy Bridge is a charming place. If you don't like the actors, you will approve of the stage and the scenery. I won't say another word about Violet Leigh to you. I won't even introduce her to you. You shall be free as air to neglect my beauty; but you shall go to Ivy Bridge."

So it came to be an understood thing (during the interval that elapsed between this conversation and the day of the picnic) all Mrs. Arbuthnot's intimates that Mr. Adair was staying for the picnic as a favor, and that the favor was a very great one. It was the height of it from a mutual friend of hers and Mrs. Arbuthnot's, and Violet Leigh derided the fact.

"A favor! what should it be a favor? What is there in the man that Kate makes herself absurd about him?"

"Kate, my hostess, my friend, my husband, my brother, my sister, and an acquisition to any set, the friend replied.

"Do I? I never do like the Admirable Crichtons that are discovered by my friends; I hope Kate won't attempt to go into similar ecstasies over him, and to regard his dancing with me as a great favor."

The day arrived almost as if the two whom Mrs. Arbuthnot had designed the picnic for, in the hope that each would be so much struck with the oddity of the other with them both repugnance, were prejudiced against each other from the very first.

Wednesday, the day of the picnic, dawned broiling, bright, and beautiful as it is possible for a July day in South Devon to be. The traveling party was to be known was in the heart of the country town, just opposite to the ivy-covered bridge which gives its name to the place. Here the guests were to be mustered by Mrs. Arbuthnot met, and held a consultation as to where they should wander and when they should dine. What the most important matter was definitely fixed upon, that ardent search after the picturesque which characterizes most picnic committees was begun, which apparently can only be properly conducted in pairs.

The picturesque does not render the search after food in March—Egypt round about Ivy Bridge. In the first place there is the river Erme, which comes rolling down from Dartmoor over boulders that are like polished marble when looked at through the crystal water—rolling down over boulders and between high banks, hedged with every shade and form in matchless profusion and endless variety. No sweeter place for a stroll than the banks of this stream can be found in the whole of this naturefavored district. And if the quiet, secluded beauty palls upon you, there is the wide, open Dartmoor, which civilization has left untouched and unadulterated.

One of the last to arrive was Violet Leigh. She came up driving a pair of handsome small Shetland cobs, and looked very lovely. She was to be chaperoned by her hostess, and she feared being late. Mr. Adair was standing by Mrs. Arbuthnot's side as the young lady checked her cobs, and leaned forward to excuse herself for the delay she fancied she had caused. "I was afraid you would be worried for me," she said, "and that I should have enacted the part of unprotected young lady all day."

"Why were you not more punctual?" asked Mrs. Arbuthnot.

"You know I am not mistress of my own time, nor yet of my own actions," the girl answered, hastily, and Gerald Adair looked at her with interest for the first time.

She was worth looking at. She was—he longed to openly confess that she was—utterly different to the preconceived notions of the country beauty and heiress. A graceful, elegant, thorough-bred looking girl, with a world of quiet, courtly self-possession in her air. Slender in figure, exquisitely dressed, pale and fair complexioned, with soft masses of wavy brown hair dressed far forward, nearly on to her wide brow in front of her chignon. A delicate, slightly aquiline-featured face, with dark violet eyes fringed with long, curly black lashes. A very lovely young lady, "but something better than lovely, too," he told himself. "She might be a peeress in her own right, indeed, to judge by her looks."

True to her promise, Mrs. Arbuthnot made no attempt to introduce Mr. Adair to Miss Leigh; and he felt half annoyed with his favorite friend on account of that strict observance of her word on which she was accustomed plainly herself. "They are the two best adapted to each other in all the party," she thought; "and it serves them both right that I should be taken according to the letter of their request." This was the thought that flashed through her mind before they started for the nine-times-nine mile drive. By the time the caravan was imminent Mr. Adair lowered his flag.

"I wish you would make me known to Miss Leigh," he said, quietly.

"You're not asking this to please me?" the gratified little matron asked.

"No, indeed; entirely to please myself," he answered. "She shines like a star amidst all these people you have collected. What wonder that I desire to have her shine upon me alone!"

"I wish I had the strength of mind to punish such selfish conduct by refusing your request; but I haven't—Violet, allow me to introduce our friend, Mr. Adair, to you; I want you to make him comprehend that truth—that my picnic was worth waiting for."

Miss Leigh smiled rather languidly; rather too languidly, Mr. Adair thought, as their hostess moved away.

"A man convinced against his will, etc.," she quoted presently. "Why should I be punished, moreover, to upset what is perhaps a pet theory of yours? You like to imagine yourself superior to this crowd, and why should I try to prove to you that you are not?"

"You have proved it to me already," he said, adroitly quoting the words of the last speech of the others had taken. And Mrs. Arbuthnot, keenly glancing after them, felt happy when she saw them disappear around a corner together.

A fortnight after this they were alone with each other once more. By this time, though, being with her seemed to have become to him the whole world to them. During this fortnight Mr. Adair had pursued Violet incessantly, "madly" even, Mrs. Arbuthnot declared it (and "madly," the man felt it to be in reality. He was born to attract women. His normal insouciance and frequent assertions upon upon, flattered, bothered, and beguiled them. He was handsome, accomplished, well-bred. The graceful beauty, the Queen of Glade, as she had been called, surrendered to him after a brief struggle. She could not suppress the slight flush which would rise to her cheek, or the slight throbbing which would affect her heart, when he approached her. And, as for him, there seemed to be nothing of exaggeration in the impassioned words which he was addressing to her now as she sat enbowered in flowers in a deep bay-window in Mrs. Arbuthnot's drawing-room.

"Thou wast that all to me, love,
For which my soul did pine—
A green isle in the sea, love,
A fountain and a shrine,
All wreathed about with flowers,
And all the flowers were mine."

"Are all the flowers mine?" he continued, passionately. "Tell me! No other man has plucked roses as these into bloom?" and he lightly touched her cheek with a sprig of myrtle as he spoke.

No other man has ever said such words to me. I should never have listened to them," she said, softly. He was going to leave Glade on the morning of the next day, and Violet was feeling so sure in her love and happiness; so sure that he would not go without asking her to be his wife.

Suddenly, to her surprise, he half knelt at her side, and, looking, to her horror, he touched an anathema against that fatal picnic party.

"What is it, Gerald?" she said, in a whisper. It was the first time she had ever called him by his Christian name. At the same time she put her hand down and touched his hand.

He took it in his, and, grasping fiercely and firmly; "how will your dear eyes look at me after this day? How will your dear voice ever name me?" he said.

"Always kindly," she said, trembling a little.

"No, no; you will despise and disown me, as I deserve. I know you now, and that any woman must expect—would be wrong and unwomanly not to expect, in fact. I ought to ask you to be my wife to-day. I would give my life to be able to do it, and I dare not!"

"Oh, Gerald! why?"

All her pride and dignity sweet grace were gone as she rang out the piteous entreaty. She felt so sure of his love. There must be some hideous mistake at the root.

"There is a bar between us, darling," he said, looking up, miserably.

"A bar! What bar? No bar strong enough to keep us asunder," she said, impetuously.

"A little bar of gold—a wedding-ring: have a wife already!"

"For all that my eyes will never look, or my voice ever name you less kindly than they have already done," she said, recovering her sweet, outward calm, but feeling her heart to be wounded, broken, bleeding.

"You do not reproach me, Miss Leigh," he said, rising to his feet.

"Reproach you! We must not reproach each other, say rather. Tell me of your wife before I go; and I go, must go soon."

This was the last time he had been invigled into marrying a woman older than himself while he was still a mere boy. "She was beautiful then," he said; "but she was not a woman I may dare to talk to you about. I never suspected her. I never loved her after the first few days of mad passion were over. I have disliked her for years; but I never so loathed her as I do now that she stands between me and you, the brightest vision of my life."

"Why do you not live with her?" Violet asked, with more of sternness than he had ever heard in her tones before. "Why do you neglect her, and go about under false colors, feigning to be free man, when you are—"

"A very bond slave," he interrupted. "Why do I do it? This is why: I have it in me (as you have told me more than once) to be a good and great and useful man. She does not know my better nature does not care for it.

"Have you any children?" Violet said, shortly.

"One child only, thank Heaven."

"What is she—boy or girl?"

"A girl; she's about ten years old, by the-way."

"You have a daughter, and you can treat her mother as you do; I told you just now that I forgave you freely all I had to forgive you," she said, blushing, "and I can not now, while I think you have no heart for your daughter. What is her name, and where is she?"

"Her name is Beatrix; she is at school at St. Leonard's. Don't look harshly at me, Violet; if it ever comes out that I have a wife—such a wife as I have, and a child—I shall cease to be my uncle's heir."

"And that is your whole fear," she said; "I can't bear to think it. Do you not see that your child may grow up careless of you; that she may turn out badly from sheer parental neglect? You ought to be her guide, her friend, her protector. Think of it; she is your own flesh and blood, Gerald." And as she pleaded for his child Violet's sight burst into tears.

An hour after, when Mrs. Arbuthnot came home from her drive to dress for dinner, she found a note from Violet Leigh, instead of seeing the happy face of the girl whose love-dream had seemed to be so near realization.

"Dear Aunt"—Violet wrote—"I have gone home instead of staying to dine, as I really promised you I would do; pray ask no questions of Mr. Adair, or make any jokes about me: we have had an explanation, and I have decided in our mutual interests to bring each God-speed. Your affectionate VIOLET."

"My affectionate Violet might have been a little more explicit with me, I think," Mrs. Arbuthnot said, musingly. "I should like to ask him what all means; but she has asked me not to do so." Still, though her loyalty to her friend forbade her asking any questions that that friend had forbidden, her curiosity was not easily stilled.

Nor was it set at rest by Gerald Adair's telling her that evening that his farewell on the morrow would be a long one. "I am going abroad," he said.

"For how long?"

"For an indefinite period: before I go I ask this one favor of you. Here is the address of my agent in town: he will always know where or whereabouts I am. If Miss Leigh should ever wish to me through him and tell me. Will you?"

Still wrestling with her curiosity, Mrs. Arbuthnot promised.

"And give this note to Miss Leigh when I am gone," he said; "it contains an address she wants. I will say good-by to you now to-night," he added, holding out his hand.

"My picnic was fatal to you both," she interpered; and he bowed his head and went out of the room.

For the next eight years Violet Leigh alternately puzzled and annoyed all her best friends by refusing to marry. She had many brilliant offers—a woman is only at her best until eight or nine and twenty, and her beauty was unimpaired by the self-elected guardian grew morose and gloomy with years. "You don't call me his heiress," she would say sometimes to Mrs. Arbuthnot, when pressed for her hand; "I am not a thought out of the room."

For the next eight years Violet Leigh alternately puzzled and annoyed all her best friends by refusing to marry. She had many brilliant offers—a woman is only at her best until eight or nine and twenty, and her beauty was unimpaired by the self-elected guardian grew morose and gloomy with years. "You don't call me his heiress," she would say sometimes to Mrs. Arbuthnot, when pressed for her hand; "I am not a thought out of the room."

But

DUCKS IN THE WATER.

A TEN-STRIKE.—[DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.]

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XLIII.

LOVE TURNED TO TEARS AND TEARS TO FIRE.

AZALEA passed, with stumbling feet and bent head, through the dark passages that led from the room where Mowbray basked by the fire, to the back door of the house; habit, that trick of custom which asserts its supremacy even during those periods when human souls are sustaining the keenest agony they are capable of experiencing—habit made her put out her hands before her to guard her head from concussion with any unseen foe.

She reached the back-door at last, and pulling back the heavy bolts, passed on the threshold, awed for an instant by the calm beauty of the scene before her. The moonlight was shining brightly down the court-yard; the deer's knoll, the antlers of its which stood in shadowy abruptness over the old-fashioned clock, was steeped in the cold brightness; the sombrous greens of forest that rose up behind the old-fashioned gables; the distant bay of a sheep disturbed in the fold—all spoke of sorrowful peace.

A heart less bitter would have been calmed by the solemn loveliness of the scene. But Azalea was suffering an agony keener than death. It may be cruelly hard for one who yearns to live to yield up the last breath that divides the living day and awesome darkness of the night which "knows no morning." But when death is in your heart: when the last throb of faith is sobbed out, and the warmth of a great love turns to ashes; when passion, treacherous and subtle, still lingers to sting the old wound into agony, is not that harder to endure than a mere agonizing fear of failing breath, a simple surrender of all physical sensation? Azalea walked quickly through the court-yard, the shielded observations of a moment on her movements. She need not have feared either. Her lover was still dozing by the fire. Old Sally was peering over her needlework in the kitchen chimney corner. The watchdog barked as she passed. The cold worm on the path writhed under her hasty feet—but these were the only living things affected by her movements. She passed quickly through the dewwet gloom of the avenue, and only paused when she came to a shadow more dense, a spot more secluded than any which she had yet penetrated, and there she flung herself down on the grass, she clenched her hot hands in the cool herbage, and turned the agony of her eyes upon the stars; their serene indifference exasperated her. She asked herself, fiercely, why all should be so calm when her heart was in torment. She moaned aloud in her pain, and then she cast her face to the earth and cried, "Oh, my love, my love!"

The adjuration was addressed to a memory rather than a reality. The words had no sooner past her lips than she knew them to be a lie. She had no love now. All was frustration and barrenness.

"Oh," she said, "is there no end to this? Can not I die and cease to feel?"

Looking up she caught sight of the light that glimmered in the library window; her eyes softened for an instant as she involuntarily pictured to herself the grizzled head of her lover, thrown back on the cushioned chair, the eyes closed in sleep, the full lips half opened under the shadow of the drooping mustache. She was seized with an irresistible longing to go and look in at the window. Her love was outraged, her heart bruised, but she was a woman, and she could not keep away from the hand that had dealt her mortal agony.

Thurstan was still sleeping when Azalea reached the house. She leaned back in the framework of magnolia leaves which fringed the casement, and watched him long and steadfastly. Presently he stirred and called her name.

"Are you not coming?" she heard him say.

A strange look obeyed round her pallid face as she passed round the house and re-entered the portal.

"Yes, I am coming," she said, softly, to herself.

Thurstan was in high spirits that night. He hummed snatches of song as he lolled out by old damask sofa, his arm folded round Azalea's waist, his head pillowed on her breast.

The fire blazed cheerily on the hearth. The revolving shadow of the mill, the darkening night, and the fierce gusts of wind that wailed through its cloudy gloom, were shut out by the ruddy sheen of high crimson satin curtains.

A faint smell of dead flowers came from a vase that stood on a small table near Azalea.

"You have not put fresh ones in to-night," Thurstan said, referring to the shriveled leaves he was crumbling in his disengaged hand.

"No," she answered, quietly. "I did not pick any flowers to-day."

"What have you been doing, sweet?" he asked, yawning slightly. He was so good-tempered, he could afford to feign an interest he did not feel in her proceedings; but he might have spared himself this little effort of politeness, for she would not hear, or, if she heard, did not heed his question.

Could any form wayfarer have peeped in at the casement he might have would have trembled with envy at the apparent luxuriousness of the scene within.

Dusky grapes were piled up in an old china dish near Thurstan's hand; in the exuberance of his content he dangled the pinky berries before Azalea's face, rubbing off the bloom against the red lips which refused to open and receive them, and then swinging them himself, between the pauses of his song.

The room seemed o'erbrimming with comfort. Even Thurstan was dimly affected by the sensuous repose of the hour.

"I almost wish that I were not going to-morrow," he sighed.

"Stay, then," Azalea said. They were the first words she had spoken this evening, but Thurstan had been too preoccupied to observe her silence.

"Do you wish me to stay?" He looked into her face with a sudden access of passion thrilling his heart and brightening his eyes. He would have drawn her toward him, but she averted her head, and quietly disengaged his arms from her waist.

"I do not know," she said; and this time he was struck by the faintness of her tones.

"You are tired," he said, kindly. "It is bedtime. Shall I carry you up stairs?"

She shook her head; so he passed before her and bounded up the dark oak steps, singing and smiling as he went.

His heart was holding festival that night, while hers was black with storm.

CHAPTER XLIV.

HOW THEY PARTED.

THE night was far advanced, and Thurstan slept soundly, happily unconscious of all the tragedy in the wakeful face bent over him.

She had watched him for some hours; for he had drawn her head to his shoulder and bade her lie there, and she obeyed him; but as soon as he slept she got up again, feeling as if she were suffocated by his touch. The blank dullness of her pain was passing away. She no ness of her pain was passing away. She no longer smiled. She face without meaning. She no longer asked herself "Is it so?" In those dark hours the doubt had merged itself into certain disillusion. She looked at his hand still warm with the clasp of her own, at his lips which had lately sought hers with the passion of their kiss; in her heart she repelled the treachery of his caresses, and loathed the cheat he put on her.

"You are false—false—false," she said. "Your face is hateful to me."

He turned his head into the line of a moonbeam, that streamed across his pillow, and a wilt thought came into her mind.

"Supposing that moonbeam could kill you. Supposing that it were to do so—gently, that you could not move again. Suppose, Thurstan, that I were to make you so that she could never hear your footing, your voice, your eyes, or return your kisses excepting in memory, should grudge her the memory, though, and should love to kill her so that she might not think of you."

How handsome he looked as he slumbered there—the moonlight touching his clear curled head, round throat, and noble outline of chest, the somewhat stern character of his beauty softened by the pallid tenderness of sleep.

"He was not meant to die yet," she mused, as she leaned her chin on her hand and watched him with white fear and repugnance.

He was not meant to die yet, she thought, not until he had worn out all that strength, until his full voice was crushed and broken, his eyes dull, and his firm steps feeble; but if he died now he would tell no more lies, would die in the bloom of manhood, in his prime, here would be the last kiss he felt—he should never rise from that bed to meet another woman's welcome!

The dark thought was standing so clear in her mind now; that which her heart forbodied when she heard his careless laugh by the fireplace down stairs was now fashioned into a determination.

"He must die, he must die!" she repeated to herself, and the clock that chimed on the stairs, and the branch that beat against the windowpane, seemed to echo the words. She stood when she heard a faint chirrup and stir in the elm-tree outside. "It will soon be morning," she thought. She had been there all night—rose from her arm, and laid it by his side; then she slid away from the bed, and felt her way to the pistol-case that stood on the drawers near Mowbray's head.

"I always said it was dangerous, keeping loaded pistols in the room," Thurstan has liked to have some protection in this lonely old house —he did not think who would use them against him—but then he should not have murdered me first."

She stole back noiselessly, her delicate little hand overborne by the weight of the deadly instrument it carried, and then she crept into bed and looked again at the sleeper.

"Why should he not die?"

This man had been the only human thing she had ever cherished. No mother's hand had ever blessed her head or caressed her cheek, and swept by her side during youth's April season of blithe joy and impulsive sorrow. But she did not feel that she had missed any thing from life after she knew Thurstan Mowbray. She reverenced in his character the vivid sympathies that made his wishes her own. She loved her fine intellect by striving to bring it to the level of his narrow capabilities. She cared not for heights he could not ascend. She took no pleasure in perceiving a poetical when he could only see the practical aspects.

So far from feeling discomfort at being misunderstood, it was the constant endeavor of her heart to restrain the soarings of a mind that was apt to range above the scope of her lover's mental vision.

Some women had loved Thurstan Mowbray for the benefits they had reaped from his hands; others had fed his vanity with ephemeral devotion, born of lust and idleness; many had given him love-tokens worth gold and silver; but this woman had trampled down her mind at his feet, and every faculty of her soul had been a sacrifice—if sacrifice it could be called; for her whole heart glorified its consummation. He was all in all to her; she prized even her beauty only because it pleased him; she exulted in life only when the day was brightened by his presence. She would not have cared if all the hours of his absence had been struck out of her total of existence; without him, her heart ached with heaviness; with him, she was as a bird mad with joy because spring has come.

All the divine fervor with which a southern worshiper lays her best and purest thoughts at the feet of some imaged deity: all the intense half-savage tenderness with which a wild animal cherishes her mate—this desolate woman had lavished on him who was the idol of her life, the alpha and omega of her existence. And now she was tired! Now she was dizzy with the hours slipped into gray, and asking her heart why her hand should not murder all the beautiful part of him, now it had turned into treachery, foulness, and falsehood. Why should those dark eyes open again to tell a lie into her own? Why should he ever know light or speech again, since he had made light loathsome, and sound intolerable to her?

Between his face and hers kept rising the glitter of two sentences. She could even see the shape of the letters, and recognize his handwriting; but they quivered perpetually, so that they made her eyes ache. So she hid her face in her hands, and tried to get the words up by rote—got them and heard them singing in her ears.

"I never loved any but you"—to-morrow I shall kiss you again.

"To-morrow I shall kiss you again," Azalea repeated, vaguely; then she touched his lips with a sort of mockery. "To-day will never kiss any living thing again; they will be too cold and stiff; but I shall kiss them, for then they will not be able to ask me with lies, to dishonor me by inconstancy."

The clock struck four. She looked hurriedly round.

"Supposing he were to wake," she thought; "he would not let me do it."

She put her hand on the trigger of the pistol and lifted it to a level with his breast. She leaned over him, so that her hair fell in shadowy profusion round him, and over the warm heaving bosom it almost touched.

He had deceived and injured her; but her huge heart could not comprehend him that wrong. He might have withered her body with physical torture, and she would have kissed him, smiling in the while; but he wounded her mind, and she had hugged the mental fetters, judging them to be sweeter than crowns of honor; but against this injury to her soul her passionate nature rebelled; in proportion to the greatness of her love was the mightiness of its wreck.

When the first shock of reflected themselves from the miserable chaos of confusion and despair in which the discovery of his falsehood had plunged her, Azalea prayed, "Let me die."

But afterward, when she again felt the magic of his touch, the caress of his lips, a fierce thrill of jealousy kindled her dull anguish into fury.

"Rather than have you touch her, rather than he left time to have loved over her love-passages with my other self, I would pass eternity in torment."

She never moved her eyes from his face when she put her hand down on that cold little toy of iron, which was to turn sleep into death.

Her pale face was convulsed; the madness of much thought, the rack of intolerable suffering, had blighted all softer signs of emotion from her face. The tension of her agony found expression but in one idea:

"He shall die."

He lay there a model of manly strength and human beauty, helpless in his unconsciousness as a feeble child. She handled her hold on the pistol, and put the other arm about his neck. She thought she would kiss him and pull the trigger at the same moment. She would have the last embrace of his living lips.

She slid her fingers round his throat, and (Thurstan had forgotten or knew how near he was to solving the great peut-être in the gray dawn of this autumn morning) disturbed by the movement, awoke. He moaned her name, and he turned toward her with a smile, and putting out his arm, drew her hand and the deadly instrument in it held, over his bosom; then dropping his head on her breast, he relapsed again into deep slumber.

She stared at him with wild eyes while he gathered her in his arms. She felt the hand and that which it held sliding over the beating pulses of his heart. She raised herself and looked first at it, and then with a deep-drawn breath she bowed her face on his hands, and covered them with kisses, and her slender form was shaken by husky passionate sobs and tears. The unnatural strain had given way; the fierce jealousy, the vindictiveness, the hatred, all melted into murmurous sound of caressing words, a rush of bitter tears.

"Oh, my love, my love; how can I help loving you? Can I tear my heart from my body? Can I live out of the days and hours when I lived, and when you were my life; for it is I that am dead. I am dead, Thurstan, and you have killed me."

She removed the pistol gently from its proximity, so perilous to the sleeper, and replaced it in the case. She bowed down and kissed him as he slept; by cure thanks to Heaven for having preserved her from the commission of a great sin, with its inheritance of bitter remorse; but in her heart she knew that it was not an inspiration of repentance, but her lover's unwitting caress that had held her hand from his destruction, and she did not dare to lift up her face to God; but after murmuring a mechanical formula of prayer, she leaned and once more regarded her lover's head.

"I will never see you wake, not that I would hurt you," she added, with a shudder, at the memory of what her thoughts had been half an hour since; "but because I could not bear to hear your voice or to meet your eyes—the old frenzy might come back, and then you would not be safe from me."

Then her pale face, passion-warped and stained with tears, hovered an instant above the sleeping man, and her lips closed on his in the last kiss she was ever to give human creature.

How much of despair, how little of sweetness lived in that caress, those who have known the sore trouble of a broken heart can best tell.

Later in the morning, when Thurstan awoke and found there was no Azalea to attend him at his morning meal, he was naturally disturbed and irritated. He supposed that she had gone out for one of those early walks she was so fond of; he thought it very unkind and inconsiderate of her. She might have remembered that he would be obliged to leave by an early train. He grumbled and fretted all breakfast-time; he even went to the window once or twice, to see if she were coming, but then he swore, drank down his coffee, which was smoked (this adding to his feeling of injury), and taking out his watch, calculated how long he could afford to linger ere it would be necessary for him to set out for the station. He waited until the last moment, and then started off; he would much like to have kissed her ere he went. He would have liked by his caresses to atone in some measure for the injury of which he believed she was unconscious; but he had appointed with Lady Di to meet her in town at a certain hour, and if he missed this train he would be too late. So he scrawled the following note to Azalea:

"Dearest little woman. Why are you not here to bid me good-by? I miss you dreadfully. If you want to write to me, address to the Club. I would not leave by this train, but I have an important business engagement in London" (how mean a detected lie makes a man seem!) "which I can not postpone. I do not expect to be able to get away again for some time, as I've had all my long leave out; but be sure I shall come back to you as soon as I can.—Your ever loving, T. M."

CHAPTER XLV.

THE END OF ALL THINGS.

THAT night Douglas received a scrap of paper on which was written the word "Come."

The only words he uttered when he read this appeal were, "So soon!" and then he hastened to Auriel.

"Miss Azalea seems very ill," old Sally said, meeting him with a face more wearish than alarmed. Sally's life had been such a long continued weariness that she was deadened to any keen pleasure or pain. Her heart was dull as she, the lightning flash of emotion is rarely felt: the cloud only deepens.

"She was in excitement of the last twenty-four hours had been fatal to a naturally delicate and highly sensitive organization, and Douglas found the presentiment verified by the symptoms of the fever called inflammatory.

"My head aches so, Robert," she moaned, as he stood beside her, "and I feel, oh, so weary!"

He offered to send for Mowbray, but she shook such distress at the idea that he did not again repeat the suggestion. It was not until she had been ill for several days that it was noticed in the house keeping, and his own heart stood still with fear—that he thought it his duty to acquaint Thurstan with the fact. He wrote to the latter's address in London, but gained no answer, the truth being that Captain Mowbray had, by a series of unfortunate accidents, induced the authorities to grant him a week's more leave, which week he was spending pleasantly at Paris, whither Lady Di Merton was also gone.

As Azalea's fever increased and delirium disordered her mind, Douglas could not but rejoice that Mowbray was away. He wrote to repeat

Douglas than her wildest hallucinations. His heart felt to be breaking. Flinging himself on his knees, he looked up with all his soul's agony concentrated in his eyes. "O Father!" he cried, "restore her mind. Give back the one godlike attribute of our nature. How can I comfort her when her thoughts have wandered beyond the pale of human reason? How can I tell her of Thee, when she is as heedless of my meaning as the vilest brute creature of Thy earth?"

"Are you looking at the moon?" Azalea said, softly. "I think there will be rain to-morrow; she sun is setting behind a bank of clouds. It is very late. I shall go to sleep."

She turned on her side, and Douglas lifted away, reverentially, the long trails of loose dark hair that fell from her face with the movement. Her beautiful tresses had the dull blight of illness on them; but to Douglas they were lovelier now than in the old days, when they glistened like spun gold in the sunshine, and danced in every sigh of the wind.

She slumbered for a while a short uneasy sleep; and Douglas sat watching her, his face calm, but dark with restrained pain. He dared not believe the savage agony of his grief by allowing his breast to shake with one sob, or his eyes to be moistened for an instant, lest she should wonder at and ask the cause of his trouble. He could only sit there, assuming a look of content whenever she opened her face to gaze at him, or meeting the wistful doubt in her eyes with a reassuring smile.

Such smiles they were!—they seared his face with deeper wrinkles, and mocked him in the opposite mirror with their ghastly reflections of assumed calm. Such smiles as a mother must use to the terrified glances of her babe when it sobs out its innocent life in the agony of a fell disease:—such as those with which the Divine Father of all real may have greeted the welcoming eyes of his doomed daughter. Such smiles as are fraught with sharper pain than our human natures—even these which this man gave as a tribute to the last and greatest love of his life.

For the next sixty many minutes Azalea awoke, panting, her eyes dilated and anxious.

"Oh!" she cried, "Topaz is running away with the mare over the hills, and I can't catch him, he goes so fast; he will run into the clouds, and then he will never come back."

"I will stop him," Douglas said, soothingly; "I will go after him at once. But oh, Azalea!" he added, with a breaking voice, "why do you look at me so—don't you know me?"

She turned the strangely lustrous eyes on him, and, staring at him fixedly, said:

"Not in the least; but I am happy to make your acquaintance. I suppose they have sent you to take me away? It is too soon; I will not go yet."

"Oh! not yet—not yet; God forbid that it should be so!" Douglas said, burying his face on her hands, and kissing them with despairing tenderness.

At last she irradiated her wan face.

"You must be Thurstan," she whispered. "No one but Thurstan loved me like that; he was my husband, you know."

"It is—it is time for you to sleep," Douglas stammered, as he gently let her hands free. "It is bedtime; try and sleep now."

"I always seem to be going to bed," she muttered, impatiently. "Why do I never get up in the morning? I shall get up to-morrow and feed the birds myself."

Presently she flung her arms up in a paroxysm of terror.

"I can not see!" she cried; "take me to the light."

The room was ablaze with candle-light; and Douglas became nearly frantic at the sight of her vehement agitation, and the inefficacy of his efforts to soothe her that she should be in darkness.

"Oh, it is all dark—so dark," she moaned; "and I shall be lost. He will never find me any more."

She struck her arms out wildly, crying that "it was coming after her again." Then she clung convulsively to Douglas, entreating him to save her—not to let it take her away down the dark road between the clouds.

"Azalea, my child, it is nothing," urged Douglas, in the agony of his distress. "Nothing shall touch you; nothing shall harm you."

But his heart stood still when he remembered how more than silent enemy was in darkness—form in his arms—an enemy no prayers could appease, no terror move; an enemy from which not all the strength of his imploring eyes, nor the passionate throbbings of his aching heart, could shield her.

She sank down, at last, shuddering violently; still clutching his hands and entresting to be taken to the daylight. Douglas looked at the dark shadows on the deepening sky, and knew that she might sleep away the long, dreary hours that must elapse before the first gray tint of dawn crept up behind the black fir grove.

She was quiet at length from sheer exhaustion, but her eyes were still alert and anxious; and the dreary, pale face quivered painfully as her gaze followed every waver of the flickering candle-flame. The miserable, heart-weary watcher pointed out the drops of melted wax that fell to her lips. The kindly draught lured the troubled spirit to rest, and in a few minutes Douglas had the negative satisfaction of seeing the features relax, and the distended eyes soften in the shadow of sleep.

During the lagging hours that followed, Douglas sat motionless, his haggard face turned toward the window. He dared not look long at the wreck of the creature he so loved, lest his composure should give way, and she be startled from slumber by his passion of lamentation.

He cursed the hours that were slipping away so fast, bearing with them the last minutes of her numbered hours; he cursed the darkness that crawled so heavily over tree and meadow, sky and water; and yet more he loathed the thought of the dawn, which might rise for him alone.

She was dying—his darling "was dying—dying—dying," he repeated the word to himself in a monotonous whisper; and he whispered it as he locked his hands one in the other until the indentation of his finger-nails drew blood. He had sat motionless for hours when it came to strange chances to men when they had been full of life and manhood in strength; he had seen it waste their noble limbs to skin and bone with the weakness of a child's limbs. He had seen it met with resignation and with blasphemy—with mad terror and with peaceful joy. He knew its every aspect, and he had learned only too well to recognise its fatal signs.

He would have given all his worldly wealth to say man who had said to him to-night, "Yet a few days" but he could not speak. He took the lad come to Azalea's face which comes but once in life, and that when life is ebbing into death —a look wind-like, yet not unlike sun-full of strange pathos, as if the perishing flesh rebelled against its approaching dissolution, yet with the foretaste of immortal peace on the serene brow and in the traced, lustrous eyes.

For some hours she slept quietly, undisturbed by the blending of the sunset-colours with the glow, or by the loud surging of the rising wind. A storm was thickening the cloudy, dense darkness, and without all was chaos and confusion. Sudden bursts of rain and hail dashed violently against the window-panes; streams whirled down the water-pipes, and swayed, like snakes by their monotonous splash. With that curious cognisance of detail which a mind tense with suspense suffering unconsciously takes in, Douglas now perturbed must be all the thousand tiny incidents of the pipe's hollow, which, having nestled there for years, were suddenly and rudely dislodged by this unexpected deluge. How fast the flat wood-louse was running over the leaden ridges—how rapidly the spider was changing his fight from that dreadful chasm, leaving his dust-dissected fly to be swept away by the torrent!

Then his thought wandered away to far-off scenes. He imagined the same storm where the sea must now be roaring over sands and rocks. He pictured wild flights of sea-gulls whirling amidst the foam, portents of storm and disaster. He remembered one dark night of storm years and years ago, when he had seen strong men shrieked down like women at the wrath of the great waters. He thought what they must be now, his whilom friends and companions, and wondered at the thought that he, Douglas, should rest at peace in an earthly bed; he would know where to seek her; her sleep should be guarded by gay Neptune and his sea-nymphs. Better so than to be tossed in annihilation by the eternal recurrence of moaning waves.

He was aroused from his vague meditations by the sound of a low, mirthless laugh. His heart seemed to grow suddenly numb, and then to bound into tumultuous throbbings of pain. It was awake, and was pointing with her finger toward a distant corner of the room.

"Isn't it funny?" she whispered; "he dances there every night with the princess. He says he does it on purpose to amuse me, but it does not amuse me; it hurts me dreadfully. These last words escaped her lips with a sharp cry of pain.

"Oh!" she moaned, "it hurts me so much, so much!" She put her hand to her side, and panted with agony.

Douglas brought a flannel steeped in embrocation, and placed it gently over her chest.

"That is better," she sighed. Then she turned herself on her side, and faced the window.

"Open the shutters, Robert," she said, presently; "the light is coming. I hear the birds singing."

It was a dreary scene the opened window revealed to them.

The wind was still storming through the wet leaves, and flinging the rain-drops to a sullen mist, which hung thickly over the upland. The golden-brown and dapple-skinned cattle moved, dark, huddled masses, through the white desolateness of the meadow; on the lake the flat leaves of the water-lilies were ruffled and torn from their stems by the rush of the swollen stream. The moving sound of waters and the faint chirp of a bird were all that broke the stillness of the deadest sleep.

"Will he come, do you think?" Azalea said, in the hollow voice that had become habitual to her. "Do you see him anywhere?"

Then observing Douglas hesitate and look perplexed, she added, with asperity,

"Take me to the window, and let me look for myself."

He pushed her bed in the direction she indicated, and she rolled over on her back, and fell back, weeping with weakness and vexation.

"Lift me up," she wailed. "I can not move by myself."

He propped her up on her pillows, and she inclined her head toward the casement, and rested her cheek on the pane.

"I can't see him," she said, after she had looked out in every direction, except that in the direction of the avenue. "But perhaps it is because there is no sun."

She drooped down again among the cushions, and cried a little to herself. Douglas bent down to hear what it was she was murmuring. The word was choked by quick breaths and sighs heavy with tears, but it sounded like "Thurstan," and Douglas drew back, stung by intolerable pain.

"Is it always to be so?" he thought, bitterly. "Is love and faith which endure to the end to be nothing compared with the passion which engulfed an hour, but left the whole of her life desolate? Will she never repay me for all, by giving me at least one of her dying thoughts?"

He felt stifled and weary of sound the power of endurance. He rang the bell and summoned old Sally to come and take his place for a few seconds by the sick-bed. Bidding her beckon to him immediately, should any change occur in the patient, he ran down stairs, and went into the wet outside, keeping, as he had promised, within sight of Azalea's window. The sullen coolness of the dim morning assorted better with the feelings than the gayety of sunshine could have done. He stooped down among the reeds, and dipped his head into the gray waters. Then he went into the old dilapidated summer-house, and felt about the tangles of the vine until he had detected the grapes riper than the others. She could not swallow them, but they might serve to refresh her dry lips. He did not dare pluck her one of the pears that drooped heavy with rain-drops over the conservatory wall. For her distempered imagination, the beautiful physiology of her youth appeared something menacing and fearful.

Who could ever have thought that Azalea would be afraid of flowers?" Douglas reflected, sadly.

"Sir, she is asking for you," a feeble voice called from one window in another second. It was up stairs again at her door. He was fain to pause when there. Something like dread held back his footsteps, and accelerated the hurried beatings of his heart.

When he entered he met Azalea's eyes, and understood from their expression that she was conscious.

"I am better," she said, smiling sweetly as she spoke.

The old woman hurried from the room, weeping.

"Oh dear, dear!" she sobbed. "To see that poor child smile with a face like that quite breaks my heart."

"Will you please give me a looking-glass?" Azalea continued, speaking the more deliberately from the difficulty she had in articulating.

His brought the looking-mirror, and, taking it between her wax-like fingers, she looked at herself intently.

It was with a kind of wonder mixed with pathetic self-pity that she surveyed the reflection of her altered features. What she beheld were their pinched cheeks; drawn, colorless lips; eyes gleaming with unnatural fire from their purple shadows; and the pale, dull hair drooping forlornly over her shoulders.

"I don't look like me," she gasped. "Take it away."

Douglas removed the mirror, and she fell back on her pillow, and remained motionless for some time. Then, suddenly turning upon him her unnaturally lustrous eyes, and with a great effort, she uttered one word distinctly. It was—

"Percy!"

At the same moment she endeavored to clasp her hands together, and Douglas understood that at last the veil was drawn to her, and that she knew she was near to death.

He helped her to twine the poor wax-like fingers together, and then he knelt down by her side. He judged that a familiar, well-loved formula would be sweeter to her ears than any other form of words, and he said the Lord's Prayer very slowly, for she was following the words with her lips, although they made no sound.

Her eyes had closed, and such a change came over her face that he leaned over her, crying:

"Azalea! oh, my darling—my darling!"

She looked up at him with a gleam of recognition in her eyes, and, putting out her hand, patted his bowed head feebly.

"Dear—old—Robert," she said, slowly; "God—bless—"

She bent off with a low sigh; but in these few words lay the recompense of all the years of suffering Robert Douglas had endured.

The dreamless sleep was creeping on her very fast now.

She did not speak again until the warm splendor of the sun streamed into the room and over her face.

Then she raised herself a little, and looked out at the brightening day.

"The storm is over," she said; "and even this—oh, Robert—this is death!"

As she spoke, her brow contracted and earth's last pang seized her.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The peach crop this year promises to be immense. It is said that Delaware alone will yield over two million bushels. Orchards painting from the streets on our city will readily believe, from the abundance of the blossoms, that the reports from the peach districts may be correct; already, that the trees are weighed down with ripening fruit. Now is the time for provident housewives to can the luscious, velvet-coated beauties. It will cost but little to lay in a good supply, and when carefully canned, they preserve their freshness perfectly.

A minister who has been recruiting among the Scotch Presbyterians of Canada, and who in that region wears a dress valued at the amount of his salary for two years, and a set of diamonds equal in value to the cost of a country residence, drives with infinite room attached, gas-fixtures and cabinet-organ included!

The Alum Springs, located in Rockbridge County, Virginia, are becoming quite fashionable. In connection with the principal hotel there are eighteen one-story brick cottages, each thirty-two feet square, and also several other two-story cottages—all pleasant and airy, and furnished with perfumes. Rockbridge Alum Springs are about eight miles from Lexington, on the Richmond and Ohio Railroad. There are five springs within a space of twenty-five feet, but only one is used, one having lost its efficiency a few years ago. Alum gives the predominant taste to the water, although free sulphuric acid, lime, magnesia, protoxide of iron, and other medicinal agents are present. The water is not distasteful, and is drank freely by visitors.

In the way of personals it may be mentioned that Bayard Taylor has been elected non-resident Professor of German literature in Cornell University, a post for which he is well fitted.—Mrs. Stowe's "Oldtown" folks reached a sale of twenty-five thousand copies.—Ida Lewis is overwhelmed with visitors.—Mr. Greeley, they have on "Ida Lewis" in Oslo. A gentleman and his wife, in going to the ferry near Cleveland, Ohio, got into water fifteen feet deep. Miss Lenora Smith, hearing their cries for assistance, hastened to the rescue, and in an old skiff, half full of water, propelled with a stick, succeeded in saving the man, and with his help rescued the woman, two horses, and wagon.—Louisa Muhlbach has recently received a splendid tea service from some of her admirers in Germany.—At the ball given to the President at the Stetson House, Long Branch, Mrs. Grant's dress was reported by an observer to have been "a white tarlatan over white muslin, also pronounced about her with dresses cut in such fashion that even the most loose eye could not fail to note their shameless immodesty."—Tennyson is said to be engaged on another poem. Subject, the ancient legend of the Quest of the Holy Grail—a cup said to have been made of a single emerald, out of which the Saviour drank at the Last Supper, and which was gifted with His blood at His crucifixion.

The great Colorado Canon, into whose mysterious depths the brave Powell descended, is yielding, by report, about five hundred miles long—a subterranean river, with rapids and cascades, flowing between walls of rock from two to three thousand feet high.

The excavation for the Hoosac Tunnel is going forward rapidly. During the month of June the drills drove the heading in 160 feet at the east end, and could have driven 200 feet in July. The new machines are having drills made to operate on the roof, which will be ready in September, and by which they expect to increase their progress very materially. They are also erecting buildings near the mouth of the tunnel for four additional compressors. They will be on by steam. They have now 900 men at work at the east end, divided in three gangs, which work night and day continuously, with the exception of Sunday, Saturday to midnight Sunday. The central shaft is down about 190 feet, and it is said at the rate of more than a foot a day. At the west end they have just got fairly at work, and they expect to make over 160 feet a month.

A ragged little damsel who viewed the awe-inspiring eclipse from the steps of the City Hall, seems to have been deeply impressed by the sensational spectacle with which the moon asserted her feminine rights. "My!" she exclaimed, as the dark intruder pursued her malevolent course, "how I wish I was married to it!"

It is announced that, in consequence of the spurious issue of 40 greenback notes, Secretary Boutwell has concluded to have a new form of all denominations of greenbacks, from $1 to the $1000 notes. The designs are entirely new, and the likenesses of any living man will be placed on any note.

The Cornhill Magazine contains a long and entertaining article entitled "Friends in High Latitudes," which gives a very good idea of life in Greenland. Their language is curious; it appears to be composed of humanity's long words. What would an Esquimaux merchant think if an "intelligent foreigner," clad in fur, five feet four in height, and with very long black hair hanging over very fat shoulders, were to come into his shop, and in a voice loud enough to be heard at the North Pole about, as he made his sequence on the counter, "Sanctissimarretorsenatibusmarmaladeh?" Yet this is done every day in "polite latitudes," and all the "sanctissimas" and "retorsenatibuses" together mean only, "You must try and get me a good fit." This is one of several words; but it is in vain that you ask any native to separate them. While shirting is known to the Greenlander as atterpaitsiarnakumitillisarnek, which the factful form of disputandumnakumitillisarnek; a pocket-knife is known as nakumitillisarnek, and a large skin is called umeriujaakomitillisakoh.

A new phase of medical practice has been developed at Jefferson, Wisconsin. A German physician, thinking an infant could not live, consulted the parents, and all agreeing that the sufferings of the child should be ended, he administered poison, which killed it.

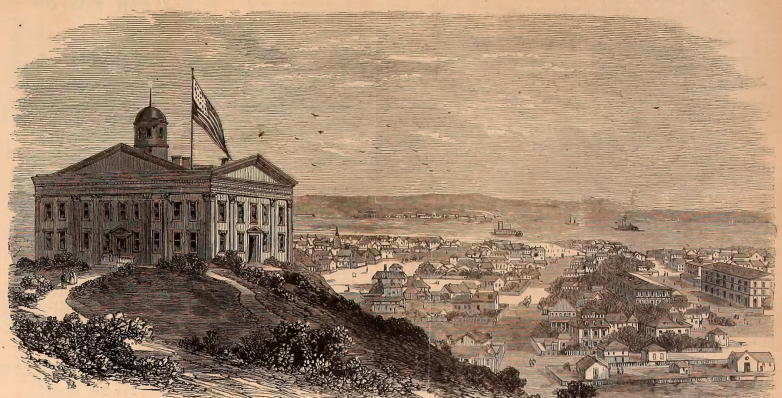
The most remarkable "happy family" hails from Chicago, and consists of one wife, two husbands, and four children, all living quietly and peaceably in one small cottage! The woman has been married in the usual form to but one, but it was only after the first husband was reported killed in battle that she married the second. The first husband returned after a long absence from Rush Creek, and, failing to die of a broken heart when he found his wife the spouse of another, A council of war was held, and it was mutually agreed that they would all dwell together, both husbands continuing to be the "liege lords" of the woman on equal terms.

A lion, belonging to a menagerie in Madras, threw its tail one day into the window of a tiger's cage, and the infuriated animal was severely injured. The lion became sick, and his keepers judged that his tail must be amputated at once. After the operation was performed not many weeks ago, after his assistants had inhaled five ounces of chloroform. The compound arrived at Boston after he had been put to a deep sleep and took off the diseased appendage. But so deep was the lethargy that his friend had to be stamped into action by mortal aid before he could be aroused.

It has been computed that in the United States no less than seven pounds of coffee are annually consumed for each person; while in England the average for each person is two pounds and one-fourth. In England tea is largely used as a breakfast beverage; and, among the middle classes, coffee is comparatively seldom drunk; while in the country, although it is distressingly common among us. In the "old country" barracks, hospitals, and prisons, and sailors' coffee-rooms, are sold as coffee; and it is said that more than half of what is retailed as ground coffee never grew on a coffee plant.

Statistics show that the proportion of deaths among the infant population is, as compared with the total number of deaths, far greater in New York than in any city in Great Britain, if it does not surpass that of any city in Christendom. And she, despite superior newspaper diet, and overcrowding, are the chief causes of this excessive mortality.

AN HEROIC BOY.—[SEE PAGE 557.]



THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD—OMAHA, NEBRASKA, THE EASTERN TERMINUS, AS SEEN FROM THE OLD CAPITOL.

AN HEROIC BOY.

A FEW weeks ago, on board an English steamer, a little ragged boy, aged nine years, was discovered on the fourth day of the voyage out from Liverpool to New York, and carried before the first mate, whose duty it was to deal with such cases.

When questioned as to his object in being stowed away, and who brought him on board, the boy, who had a beautiful sunny face, and eyes that looked like the very mirrors of truth, replied that his step-father did it, because he could not afford to keep him, nor to pay his passage out to Halifax, where he had an aunt who was well off, and to whose house he was going.

The mate did not believe the story, in spite of the winning face and truthful accents of the boy. He had seen too much of stowaways to be easily deceived by them, he said; and it was his firm conviction that the boy had been brought on board and provided with food by the sailors. The little fellow was very roughly handled in consequence.

Day by day he was questioned, and re-questioned, but always with the same result. He did not know a sailor on board, and his father alone had secreted him and given him the food which he ate.

At last the mate, wearied by the boy's persistence in the same story, and perhaps a little anxious to inculpate the sailors, seized him one day by the collar, and dragging him to the fore, told him that unless he told the truth in ten minutes from that time, he would hang him from the yard-arm. He then made him sit down under it on the deck. All around him were the passengers and sailors of the midway watch, and in front of him stood the inexorable mate, with his chronometer in his hand, and the other officers of the ship by his side.

It was the finest sight, said our informant, that I ever beheld—to see the pale, proud, sorrowful face of that noble boy, his head erect, his beautiful eyes bright through the tears that suffused them. When eight minutes had fled, the mate told him he had but two minutes to live, and advised him to speak the truth and save his life: but he replied, with the utmost simplicity and sincerity, by asking the mate if he might pray.

The mate said nothing, but nodded his head and turned as pale as a ghost, and shook with trembling like a reed with the wind. And there, all eyes turned on him, the brave and noble little fellow—this poor boy whom society owned not, and whose own step-father could not care for him—there he knelt with clasped hands and eyes upturned to Heaven, while he repeated audibly the Lord's prayer, and prayed the dear Lord Jesus to take him to heaven.

Our informant adds that there then occurred a scene as of Pentecost. Sobs broke from strong, hard hearts, as the mate sprang forward to the boy and clasped him to his bosom, and kissed him and blessed him, and told him how sincerely he now believed his story, and how glad he was that he had been brave enough to face death, and be willing to sacrifice his life for the truth of his word.

THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

WE give in this Number two illustrations of the Union Pacific Railroad. One of these is a view of Omaha, in Nebraska, the eastern terminus of the railway, situated on the Missouri River. The laying of the track was commenced from this place in 1865, and the first section, 100 miles in length, was finished within a twelvemonth. A great railway bridge across the Missouri at Omaha is now in process of construction, which will connect together the Chicago and Northwestern and the Union Pacific railroads. This bridge is to have twelve piers—eleven of them being iron of tubular construction, and the twelfth being of stone. The river at this point runs between the two rival towns of Council Bluffs and Omaha: it is a muddy, shallow, and shifting stream. At present the traveler is conveyed by omnibus and steamboat between the two towns; and the steamboat carries the omnibus, or sometimes as many as a dozen wagons and omnibuses, horses and all, boldly across the stream. The city of Omaha has a population of 16,000 people—one-fourth of the entire population of Nebraska, of which it is the principal town. It was formerly the capital, but has been superseded by Lincoln. Omaha has twelve churches, at one of which—the Roman Catholic —the pews were lately sold by auction for $200 each; there are good schools, also a daily and two newspapers. The Union Pacific Railroad has here large machine-shops and carriage factories.

THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD—A PRAIRIE ON FIRE IN NEBRASKA.

The Union Pacific line, traversing the vast prairies of the West, rises quite imperceptibly to a high level. The gradients not being more, on the average, than 30 feet in a mile, and nowhere steeper than 96 feet to the mile, throughout a length of 600 miles. It seems like a boundless plain; at first of grass, then of alkaline sand. Few bufflaoes are now to be seen; but a herd of antelopes now and then, and plenty of the little animals called prairie-dogs.

Our chief information shows a prairie on fire, as seen at night from the Union Pacific Railroad. The grass is almost annually burned off in some sections of the country. The lurid flames, the everhanging smoke, an occasional tree or settler's homestead standing dimly blackly against the night, the stars looking down calmly over all, make a scene not easily forgotten. A curious fact has been observed in connection with these prairie fires. In spots where the progress of settlement has prevented such conflagrations as the above-named, trees of many varieties spring up spontaneously, in what was before considered a treeless district. It appears that there were living roots of trees in the ground before: and, though burned off when shooting, the vitality of the roots has remained intact.

WHO KILLED COCK ROBIN?

A CLAIM is made by one of the daily papers that some ten years ago British birds were first imported into this country for public purposes: and, furthermore, that to the Commissioners of the Central Park belongs the credit of their first importation.

Without at all desiring to withhold any merit which of right appertains to the aforesaid gentlemen, truth requires us to state that as early as 1846 Mr. Thomas Woodcock, President of the Natural History Society of Brooklyn, at his own expense, brought over in the spring of that year not only many English singing birds, which were freed on their arrival, but also some hundreds of eggs, which boys were hired to deposit in the nests of our own birds in Greenwood and around Brooklyn. It may also be stated that from this importation a colony of English Sky-larks was established at the Wallabout, the merry occupants of which survived two of our winters, to some of the inhabitants of that vicinity can now testify.

The Brooklyn Advertiser, a paper then edited by Mr. Lee, contained an allusion to the circumstance last related in the following poem, which was published in its columns in 1847. It is headed:

THE HUMBLE APPEAL OF A LOVER OF BRITISH SKY-LARKS TO THE GENEROUSNESS OF NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN. SUNG AT THE WALLABOUT ON THE FIRST OF MAY, THE MONTH OF SWEETEST BIRDSONG.

Awake! 'tis morning prime!
High on a fleecy cloud,
From an air-built crag his crimson flag
Our monarchy waving proud!
Then list to the cheering call,
Around the skies and sing;
His heralds we—with minstrel glee—
To usher in our King.

Chorus.

Mount, mount the azure heights,
Our carol to begin;
Hail to the dawn of rosy morn!
Hail to the Rising Sun!

Far from our native land,
Our stormy ocean's roar,
We've brought for us trump, but a peaceful pipe,
Which sounds no note of war.
Then list our soft lutes,
Nor seek to do us wrong:
In us you entertain
The Pioneers of Song.

If, in its infant state,
Our College you shield,
We'll peal our thanks in after-years
From man's fertile field.
Manhattan's lands shall hear
Our wild-wood strain,
Our isles of love, by dell and grove,
Shall cheer with echoes sweet.

Now, at his Eastern Gate
Our monarch's concerts prance,
We know his splendid chariot wheels,
We know his golden glance.
So flagging fancies are ours,
Our voices clear and sweet,
And, soaring high from earth to sky,
'Tis thus our King we greet!

Chorus.

Mount, mount the azure heights,
Our carol to begin:
Hail to the dawn of rosy morn!
Hail to the Rising Sun!

LOVE-LETTERS.

A COLLECTION of the more remarkable precedents of love-letters, well chosen, would be both useful and interesting; and it would be not impertinent to examine how far the modern facilities of intercommunication may not have induced some deterioration in the style of amorous composition. Southey, apropos of the love of Leonard Bacon and his cousin Margaret, observes that theirs were not times in which a sigh could be wafted across the country by mail-coach at the rate of eight miles an hour. What would he have said of these days, in which, for three cents, half an ounce of assurances of unalterable affection may be transmitted from New York to Boston in a few hours, or, indeed, the sigh (if under twenty words) may be wafted instantaneously by electric telegraph? Here we may observe that, in actions for breach of promise of marriage, written evidence of the promise, though its absence may weaken the plaintiff's case, is far from being a sine qua non. For example, in a case tried some years ago, in which a married woman was the defendant, and a damsel of Portsmouth the plaintiff, defendant's counsel insisting very strongly that not a single scrap of love-letter was produced on the other side, the learned judge warned the jury against attaching much significance to that deficiency, observing very pertinently that it was absurd to expect that the man would occupy himself with writing love-letters to the woman whom he had all in his hand to do vva to go round into the street and put his arm round her waist." We must not, however, underestimate the ingenuity of a pair of poor lovers who managed to correspond gratis by a regular system of unpaid letters. The communication conveyed on the outside of the letter by an ingenious cipher of inkblots and variations in the address. After an interval, during which the letter was invariably handed back to the postman, with a gentle murmur at the poverty which forbade the damsel to claim the right of opening it by paying the postage.

PAT'S INTRODUCTION TO KI-HI;

OR SAYRIOUS REFLICTIONS ON THAT SAME,

BY THE MELIGAN OF BALLY MELIGAN, JUN.

For Illustrations see Supplement.

SHURE, Sam, is this the naygur
They're blathering all about,
That's come from San Francisco
By the Pacific route?
Is this the ugly spalpeen,
Wid th' umbrella hat,
That lives on spiders, dogs, and mice,
And ates his ould tom-cat?

Oh, wurrah! Biddy, darlint,
Twill be all day wid you—
He'll sweep the chimbleys, and the leds,
And ate cockroaches too.
He cares for nothing but his tail,
Which he hangs on to stout;
The baste, he niver goes to Mass,
And needs no Sunday out.

And, Mickey, you're entering omadhawn,
Ye'd best throw by the pick;
D'ye twig this mollanoily chap?—
He'll get your job, I'm sick.
And Dick the tailor, too, might well
Be scared to see the knave:
He'll cut your Jim the cobbler's corns,
And thin the barber shave.

Thin, whin he looks upon the hand,
Twould make a gardner cry
To see the nails of his call,
Rise in their majesty.
He bates Sam Slick the clock-maker,
And sings the miner's breath;
He's nate on culd tin pots and pans,
And on tobacky—death.

Oh, wurrah! for my father's son!
That av I've come to strife
Wid one who, just for frolic, puts
The divil in his pipe.
And, wurrah! for our childer dear,
And for my darlin' wife;
Wid naygurs black, and naygurs brown,
I'm harried out of life.

A HERETIC'S GRAVE IN SPAIN.

THE Revolution is not a year old, yet it begins already to bear fruit in Spain. The devotees of monarchy cursed it for a barren tree, and priestly politicians foretold the speedy withering of its withered boughs over a field of blood. But the prognostics of neither sycophants nor bigots have their accomplishment. Without a Bourbon throne, the Spaniards retain their preference for a strong government in the hands of a single magistrate, and since massacres, when the refusal of the rights of burial to Protestants, or the payment of the Papal Nuncio out of the Civil List, the nation still cherishes the traditions of its ancient faith. The mass of the community have not discarded feelings of reverence; they have not cast off the decency and the discipline of intolerance. In every cathedral the imposing ritual is still performed; and at eventide, from every church tower, the Angelus vespre bell. Some of the hoarded treasures of the sacristy have been sold that the price may be given to the poor, or to meet the pay and the pressing debts; but there has been no hunting down of priests, no desecration of shrines. Bishops and canons have been permitted to appear abroad in the Constituent Cortes, and these patiently heard in advocacy of their special interests of government and law. The humble heretic is no longer denied a Christian grave, and the mourning relatives, instead of the sad stealing away the body, bore it undisturbed to the public cemetery without disguise or fear. It is but yesterday that the influence of the British Minister at Madrid was invoked to obtain the concession of a burial-place for certain Protestants long domiciled in Spain, and against whom there was no other imputation than their contraband creed. Now all is changed; creeds are no longer contraband. There still are bigots every where who would, if they could, put out the true light of the world, and offer men instead their horn-lantern and rushlight. Father Ignacio had to pay no costly £200 damages in an action brought at the Wicklow Assizes by a national schoolmaster whom he had cursed from the altar for conspiracy, and announced as certain to come to grief in this world and in the world to come. We can not wonder that the Archbishop of Toledo should have entered his protest against the public interment, at Madrid recently, of a young lady of Protestant family and faith. M. Rivero, the new Minister of the Interior, acknowledged the justice of the complaint, and with polite formality, and polite reference to the police to guard against any attempt at molestation of the mourners assembled round the Heretic Grave. Freemen from interference in the performance of this most sacred rite by members of a religious minority was a fact of social, moral, and political importance, which the new government could not, and would not, suffer to be overshadowed by any doubt. It was the visible and tangible seal set of one of the great principles of the Revolution that had overthrown absolutism in Church and State; and it became necessary, the new government was prepared at any hazard to vindicate it. Their precautions were superfluous, for no attempt was made. The populace of Madrid are no longer what they were. Railroads, telegraphs, and a cheap press have Europeanized them. They may not have outgrown all prejudices and passions; where are the mobs that have? But in Spain the odious and debasing sentiment of fanaticism, of religion, of which their fathers were the dupes and tools, no longer exercise dominion over them. The dust from the human ashes that the Queen Isabella still daily seems to them to rise to heaven, making the most ignorant and frivolous loiterer in the Puerto del Sol ashamed of the recollections of national bigotry in times gone by.

ARTIFICIAL LIMB MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

A NUMBER of one-legged veterans, remnants of the late war, have procured a charter under the above title, and are located at 61 Penn St., Pittsburgh, Pa. They make the "ADJUSTABLE LACING SOCKET" LEG (patented), which is an ingenious combination of a number of plies or layers of leather, so crimped over a Plaster-of-Paris cast of the stump that it is adjusted by a lever, and the change conforms exactly to the shape of the injured member. These legs are very highly praised by all who have used them, for their great comfort and durability. As each shareholder wears the leg, they are thoroughly competent to produce what is required; and we would advise any one needing the article to write to this company for a circular.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MESSRS. GREELEY, of the Tribune, BRYANT, of the Post, BENNETT, of the Herald, BROOKS, of the Express, RAYMOND, of the New York Times, of the Times, and DANA, of the Sun—their Portraits, Biographies, and Characters given in the Annual of PHRENOLOGY and PHYSIOGNOMY for 1870. Also, LAMBERT, Tweed, and Peggy Mc Ville: How to choose a Helpmeet. All for 25 cents. Newsmen have it. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

GET IT PURE.

A pint of Pain Paint for $3, a quart for $5, or a gallon for $20, double strength, with directions for making 100 gallons of paint. Agents wanted. Send for circular of the manufacturer, DR. R. L. WOLCOTT'S Office, 181 William Street, New York. Or a pint bottle of Antidote, or Exhilarator, for Catarrh and Colds in the head, on receipt of $1. Sold by druggists, and at all Agencies.

Bloomington Nursery.

600 Acres. 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.

Fruit, Ornamental and Nursery Stock, immense and reliable assortment, and very low for cash.

Apples, one of the most magnificent stock of yearlings; also Beauty, Northern Spy, Rawle's Janet, Smith's Cider, Hubbardston, Baldwin, Nansemond, and other Crab Apples—1, 2, and 3 years.

Peaches, Pears, Cherries, Plums, Quinces, Grapes, Small Fruits, Asparagus, Rhubarb, Osage Orange Hedge Plants, Roses, own roots; Tulips, Hyacinths, Double Dahlias, Gladiolus, Tuberoses, Amaryllis, Iris, Spirea, Ivies, Deutzias, Arborvitæs, &c.

Also superior Seedling Potatoes at all Agencies.

Send 16 cents for Catalogue.

F. K. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

CYPRESS HILLS CEMETERY.

OFFICE, 96 BROADWAY, N. Y., (Corner of Grand Street).

EDMUND DRIGGS, President.
WM. J. PEASE, Vice-President.
WILLIAM MILLER, Treasurer.
WILLIAM EDWARDS, Secretary.
A. S. JARVIS, HERVEY G. LAW, JOHN I. VAN ALST, ALFRED M. WOOD, Trustees.
N. G. PALMER, Sup't and Surveyor.

THE ESTEY COTTAGE ORGAN is the best and cheapest. Contains the latest improvements—Five Hundred and Four Jubilants.

Circulars sent free. ESTEY & CAMP, Brattleboro, Vt.

EMPLOYMENT that pays. For particulars, address S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

AUGUST 28, 1869.

FOR BOSTON

VIA FALL RIVER DIRECT.

The world-renowned steamers

BRISTOL and PROVIDENCE,

Com'r BRAYTON, Com'r SIMMONS,

Will Leave (Alternate Days) DAILY,

FROM PIER—39—NORTH RIVER,

(Foot of Chambers Street),

AT 5 P.M.,

DODWORTH'S CELEBRATED ORCHESTRA

Grand Promenade Concert

EVERY EVENING.

THE ONLY LINE RUNNING SUNDAY NIGHT.

PROVIDENCE Passengers by the above steamers will have Full Sunday in Boston.

ARRIVING at 6:30 A.M.

RETURNING will leave Providence at 5 P.M., making direct connection with the boat, and allowing a good night's rest on board each way.

To better accommodate the public.

THE SPLENDID STEAMERS

NEWPORT and OLD COLONY,

COMMANDER LEWIS, COMMANDER MILLER,

WILL LEAVE (Alternate Days) DAILY,

(Sundays excepted),

FROM PIER—28—NORTH RIVER,

(Foot of Murray Street),

AT 6:30 P.M.,

FOR

BOSTON via NEWPORT.

FREIGHT received at Pier 39 up to 5 P.M., and as Pier 28 up to 6:30 P.M., each evening.

JAS. FISK, JR., President.

M. R. SIMONS, Managing Director.

CHAS. H. VALE, General Passenger Agent.

H. H. MANGAM, Freight Agent.

NARRAGANSETT STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

For a Million American Homes.

THE COMPLETE ART OF

DRESS-MAKING

For Ten Cents!

☞ Public attention is called to the great practical value of the forthcoming number of

Harper's Bazar,

Dated September 4, 1869,

which will contain a FULL COMPENDIUM OF THE ART of DRESS-MAKING, consisting of 51 Diagrams and Engravings, accompanied with clear and simple instructions, whereby every lady can become her own dressmaker, and cut, fit, and make her entire wardrobe. Directions are also given for the measures to every figure; for sewing various seams, making trimmings, etc., etc.; and, in a word, all the details that pertain to the making of wearing-apparel.

The number of HARPER'S BAZAR is also enriched with various other attractive features, especially with a DOUBLE-PAGE CARTOON,

"HUSBAND HUNTING,"

BY

THOMAS NAST.

Harper's Bazar,

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

10 cents a Number. $4 00 a Year.

A Supplement containing numerous full-sized Patterns of useful articles accompanies the paper every fortnight, and occasionally an elegant Colored Fashion Plate.

From The Nation, July 29th, 1869.

HARPER'S BAZAR is the most successful trivial paper that one might hastily suppose, is an excellent one. Like all the periodicals which the Harpers publish, it is admirably well edited, and the class of readers for whom it is intended—and whose numbers and purchasing power families—can not but profit by its good sense and good taste. Whether we have or not, we sadly-looking very many homes happier than they may have been before, now women begin to have the time for personal and household and social management which the high-colored mirror. Then, apart from its claims to feminine respect and liking, the paper contains a number of humorous articles, one more important and much obliged to it for its services to the properly be called literature, and especially for helpful case of dressing well at not too great an outlay on the score of money, or of ruinous expense. Of the beauty which to-day makes American women the envy of the fashionable world, and a chief glory of our native land, is due to little hints that they glory of our native land, is due to little hints that they get from the BAZAR. Of the WELL and the MORAL there is nothing that our readers need to be told.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is free for MAGAZINE (a cents a year, for WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 12 cents additional for each MAGAZINE, 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft, payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS, is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per line; Cuts and Display, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

The Novelty is the best Press ever invented with which to do your own printing, and is second to none for the use of General Job Printers.

Price of Presses, $15, $20, $25, $50.

Send to BENJ. O. WOODS, Proprietor, 351 Federal St., Boston, Mass., for descriptive circular and testimonials from all parts of the country, with specimens of work done on the press, and specimen sheets of Types, Cuts, Borders, &c.

VICK'S
Illustrated Catalogue
OF
HYACINTHS, TULIPS, LILIES,
AND OTHER
Hardy Bulbs for Fall Planting,
IS NOW PUBLISHED,

And will be sent free to all who apply.

Address JAMES VICK,
Rochester, New York.

GRAND EXCURSION TO
LAKE SUPERIOR.

The splendid steamer METEOR leaves Cleveland, Ohio, on Friday, July 16th and 30th, August 13th and 27th, at 4 o'clock P.M., and Detroit, Mich., the following evenings at 10 o'clock, for Superior City, Duluth, and all points of interest on Lake Superior.

Rooms secured and other information obtained by application to

HANNA & CO., Ag'ts, Cleveland, O.;
BUCKLEY & CO. Ag'ts, Detroit, Mich.;
or J. T. WHITING, Manager, Cleveland, O.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.
Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $8, $13, $16. Offices, $18, $20, $30. Send for a circular to LOVE PRINTING CO.,
18 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

PSYCHOMANCY, Fascination; or, Science of the Soul, applied to the purposes of life. Price, in Paper Cloth. By Hersbee Hamilton, B.A. A curious book for leisure hours. It contains many valuable suggestions to acquire this wonderful power over men or animals. Can be obtained by sending postage stamp and address to T. W. EVANS & CO.;
41 South 8th Street, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR SEPTEMBER, 1869.

CONTENTS:

PHOTOGRAPHS FROM THE HIGH ROCKIES.
Illustrations.—Traveling above the Snow-Line.—The Photographer's Outfit.—Gold Hill and Silver City.—Mule Trains.—Crossing the Range.—Strange Tells.—The Carson Sink.—High Water.—The Ruby Range.—Action in the Ruby Range.—Shifting Sand Mounds.—Above the Shoshone Falls.—Natural Bridge.

THE EYE AND THE CAMERA.
Illustrations.—The Photographic Camera.—Photographing in Open-air Scenes.—The Inverted Image.—The Eyeball.—The Dark Chamber.—Section of the Eye.—Reversed Image in the Dark Chamber.—The Three Aspects of the Hand.—Stereoscopic Picture of Three Objects.—Stereoscopic Camera.—Sliding Stereoscope.

OUT IN THE STREETS.

BORDER REMINISCENCES.
Illustrations.—Dismounted Cavalry.—A Demoralized Negro.—"Look-a-yere, Mister!"—A Scene in Texas.

A SUMMER FRIEND.

A HEALTH TRIP TO BRAZIL.
Illustrations.—Street Scene, Pernambuco.—Charlotte Amalie, St. Thomas.—Hauling in a Dolphin.—Palms, from the River.—The Return of Peru.—Scuba Merchant.—Monkeys for Sale.—Pernambuco.—Street in Pernambuco.—Cart.—Pack Horses.—Fleet of Jagandas.—Suburbs of Pernambuco, Bahia, from the Bay.—Avenue of Palms.—Market Scene, Bahia.

BOB WHITE.
Illustrations.—Hunting Bob White.—The True Quail.—Head of Bob White, Life Size.—Cover Alarmed.—Head of California Valley Quail, Life Size.—Head of California Mountain Quail, Life Size.

IN QUIET DAYS.

A SHAVE LADY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."
Illustrations.—"Mamma, you bring Good News."—"Marriage is a Great Mystery."

CHANGE.

AN AUTHOR'S MEMORIES OF AUTHORS.
Illustrations.—S. C. Hall.—Mrs. S. C. Hall.

THE FOSTER-BROTHERS.

TOO CLEVER BY HALF.

THE PROGRESS OF ELECTRICITY.

LEANDER DOOLITTLE.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. By Justin McCarthy.
Chapter XXVI. Lilla gone.
Chapter XXVII. The Conspirator.
Chapter XXVIII. "Ah, bear in Mind that Gardoia was Enchanted."
Illustration.—Salaris and I.

GOING OVER TO THE ENEMY.

THE FURTHER CAPTAIN.

THE NEW TIMOTHY. Part X.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

Magazine, One Copy for One Year.....$4 00
Weekly, One Copy for One Year.....4 00
Bazar, One Copy for One Year.....4 00

Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and Harper's Bazar, for one year, $10 00; any two for $7 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Removed to 335 Broadway.

$15. THE COLLINS $20.
WATCH FACTORY.

The Collins Metal and Jewelry Factory has removed from 37 Nassau Street to their splendid New Offices,

No. 335 BROADWAY.

These superior Watches have now been in use over three years, and give universal satisfaction and although sold at so moderate a price, are not surpassed in appearance and time by gold watches costing $100 and $200. They have been greatly improved, but the price remains the same, $15. Those of extra fine finish, $20. Gents' and Ladies' sizes, of the Celebrated Key-wind, in every respect equal to the finest gold, at one-tenth the price. We have but

ONE OFFICE, NO AGENTS,

and are not responsible for the bogus and worthless goods sold at many jewelry establishments. Our Factory is the ONLY PLACE where the Genuine Collins Metal Watches and Jewelry can be had.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.,
No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth Street, (Up Stairs).

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., 80 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

SWEET QUININE.

Sweet Quinine is warranted equal—dose for dose—to the sulphate (disulphate) quinine, the important advantage of being sweet instead of bitter.

SVAPNIA.

Svapnia is Opium Purified of its sickening and poisonous properties. It is the most perfect Anodyne and Soporific Opiate yet discovered.

Sold by druggists, prescribed by best physicians.
STEARNS, FARR, & CO., Chemists, New York.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only received from the engineers of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time keepers.

Prices from $16 to $22.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.

Goods sent by Express, C.O.D., with charges.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

PIANOS and ORGANS.

Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of first-class makers, for $275 and upward. New Cabinet Organs for $45 and upward. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $40 to $175, at 481 Broadway, N. Y. HORACE WATERS.

HARPER & BROTHERS'
SPECIAL TRADE SALE, 1869.
From August 16 to Sept. 25.

Franklin Square, New York, August, 1869.

We invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books, which we will sell on the following Terms, for Cash, from the 16*th of August to the* 25*th of September, after which our Terms will positively be as heretofore.*

On Orders of $ 100 at one time, 25 per cent. Discount, and Five per cent. for Cash.

" $ 500 " 30 " " "
" $1000 " 33½ " " "
" $2000 " 35 " " "

We shall not sell at any of the Trade Sales this Fall. The SPECIAL LIST will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have just Published:

FICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 882 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing and Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1044 pages, large 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 00; Half Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By James Greenwood, the "Amateur Casual," Author of "The True History of a little Ragamuffin," "Rambles Daylight," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

FAMOUS LONDON MERCHANTS. A Book for Boys. By H. E. Rye Browne. With Portrait of George Peabody and 34 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

SIGHTS AND SENSATIONS IN FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND; or, Experiences of an Americus Journalist in Europe. By Edward Gould Buffum. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SAND'S PHILOSOPHY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, the Pupil, the School. By Nathaniel Sands. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Careful Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss as involved in Amateur Farming, with much Valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Large or Small Pieces of Land. By Edward Roe. By Robert B. Roosevelt. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THREE SEASONS IN EUROPEAN VINEYARDS. Treating of Vine-Culture; Vine Disease and its Cure; Wine-Making and Wine Trade; Adulteration; Wine-Drinking as affecting Health and Morals. By William B. Fowle. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

RHETORIC; a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Colleges, and for Private Study. By Rev. E. A. Hayes, D.D., Professor of Rhetoric in the Northwestern University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

A PARSER AND ANALYZER FOR BEGINNERS, with Copious and Progressive Exercises. By Francis A. March, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, Author of "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language," &c. 16mo, Cloth, 40 cents.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By Alfred Russel Wallace, Author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro," "Palm Trees of the Amazon," &c. With Map and Numerous Elegant Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By Genio C. Scott. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Hassia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1869. By W. Pembroke Fetridge. Revised Edition. Eighth Year. Large 18mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 00.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Students. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. Pembroke Fetridge. Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and explicit Rules for Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

The New Novels
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HETTY. By Henry Kingsley, Author of "Stretton," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. 8vo, Paper, $1 25.

CORD AND CREESE. By the Author of "The Initials." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

STRETTON. A Novel. By Henry Kingsley, Author of "Hetty," "Geoffrey Hamlyn," "Ravenshoe," &c. 8vo, Paper, 40 cents.

THE DODGE CLUB; or, Italy in 1859. By James De Mille, Author of "Cord and Creese," &c. With Nine Hundred Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS:
New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.
VANITY FAIR. 89 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.
THE VIRGINIANS. 100 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
THE NEWCOMES. 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 64 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will issue immediately New Editions of Thackeray's other Novels, illustrated by the Author, at correspondingly low prices.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:
HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.
GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.
IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.
LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.
WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

☞ To be followed by Charles Reade's other Novels.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S LAST NOVELS:
PHINEAS FINN, the Irish Member. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.
HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Complete. With 64 Illustrations by Marcus Stone. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. Part II., separately, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above Books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

PARLOR STEAM ENGINE: made entirely of Metal; Boiler and Furnace complete; will work for hours if supplied with water, &c.; free from danger; a child can run it. Sent free, with directions, for $1 00; three for $2 50. Address WALTER HOLT, No. 102 Nassau Street, New York.

$9 A DAY FOR ALL. Address A. J. FULLAM, 650 Broadway, N.Y.

THE COMING MAN—JOHN CHINAMAN.

Uncle Sam introduces Eastern Barbarism to Western Civilization.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,

46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ill.; H. N. HEUSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRIPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KUNKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MIX, C. BLUME, Pittsburg, Pa.; BARNARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; CUTTER & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HANNICK, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; J. H. HUTCHINGTON, Ithaca, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; C. M. MYRICK, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.

A Seven per Cent. GOLD LOAN.

$6,500,000.

The Kansas Pacific Railway, now in successful operation from Kansas City to Sheridan, proposes to build an extension to Denver, Colorado. The Government has granted Three Millions of Acres of the finest lands in Kansas and Colorado, which are mortgaged for the security of a loan of $6,500,000.

This loan is secured in the most effectual manner. It represents a road in profitable operation, and will open the trade of the Rocky Mountain Country, and connect it with the great markets of the East. It is considered to be one of the best loans in the market,

EVEN BETTER IN SOME RESPECTS THAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

The loan has thirty years to run, principal and interest payable in gold, semi-annually, seven per cent. The coupons will be payable semi-annually in either Frankfort, London, or New York, and will be free from Government taxation. The bonds for the present are sold in currency at 96, with accrued interest.

Circulars, maps, and pamphlets sent on application.

DABNEY, MORGAN, & CO.,
63 Exchange Place, N. Y.
M. K. JESUP & CO.,
12 Pine Street, N. Y.

STEVENS' POCKET RIFLE.

With Detachable Shoulder Rest.

Most popular arm made for Sporting and Target-Shooting. Sarrs & Wesson's Revolvers, in any quantity, for cash, at hundred price. WILLIAMS'S DERRINGERS, and other Pistols.

J. W. STORRS & CO., MFR'S Agents,
302 Broadway, New York.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.

MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
J. W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

A, 1.—TRUTH WILL PREVAIL.

Barry's Tricopherous removes scurf and dandruff, and renders the Hair soft and brilliant. I believe it to be the best preparation for the Hair now offered to the public.

A. G. BUELL,
70 Nassau St., N. Y.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES to Agents, to introduce the Wilson Sewing Machine. Stitch alike on both sides. Simplest, cheapest, and best. Extra inducements to experienced agents. For further particulars, address the WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO., Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

KELLOGG'S WORM TEA.—This standard old Remedy for Worms is the safest and best ever known. It is purely vegetable, will positively destroy worms, and does no injury to the patient. Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents.

Sold at the Great United States Medicine Warehouse and Mineral Water Depot of JOHN F. HENRY, No. 8 College Place, New York.

Forestall Bilious Attacks by regulating the stomach, liver, and excretive organs with TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT. Persons of a "bilious habit," by acting upon this hint, may save themselves many pangs, mental and bodily.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

FISHERMEN! TWINES and NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,

☞ Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

ADDRESS TO SMOKERS.

In reply to the many inquiries made daily in regard to Meerschaum Pipes, we wish to state that we recommend, especially for home and office use, the plain Hungarian and Egg Bowls, with Wrighed Stems. They hold the most tobacco, and are the most durable and practical ones, being the easiest to clean. Or the Hamburg Bowls, having the largest surface to show color. For traveling and street smoking, we recommend the London Straight and London Bent.

Being represented extensively throughout the country by our goods, we are desirous to have our Pipes—which are considered equaled by none—all more extensively known; those who relish a good smoke, and find Cigars too expensive. Therefore we have reduced our prices to the following:

We will sell a No. 3 Pipe for $5, and charge $1 additional for every number higher; therefore No. 4 costs $6, No. 5, $7; No. 10, $15, &c. Pipes from No. 4 to No. 8 are considered full-sized ones; from No. 9 upward, large ones. In the price is included a Case and Stem.

Nice Amber Mouthpieces for Weichsel Stems we are selling from $1 to $3 a piece.

We send by Express to collect, on delivery, amount and charge; but suggest that the amount be sent in Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order in advance, to save consignee the express-return charges.

In conclusion, we wish to state that we warrant all our goods (which we stamp with our name) to be real Amber, genuine Meerschaum, and to color, and will readily give every information in regard to it, based on Thirty years' experience in the trade, having received our Diploma in 1839 by the respective commissions in Europe; and we will ever uphold the fair fame we have acquired in the introduction of the MANUFACTURE OF GENUINE MEERSCHAUM GOODS into this country.

We cut Pipes and Cigar-Holders of any shape or design, mount them, do repairing, boiling, and polishing. Also, Amber Work done. And, main of all, do not charge exorbitant prices. For reference, we are in possession of commendations from thousands of our customers, representing all classes of society.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Genuine Meerschaum Goods.

STORES: 519 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel, and 27 John St., 27 John.

SEND FOR DIAGRAMS, CIRCULAR, AND PRICE-LIST to LETTER BOX 5846.

PRETTY WOMEN.—A comparatively few ladies monopolize the beauty as well as the attention of society. This ought not to be so, but it is; and will be while men are foolish, and single out pretty faces for companions.

This can all be changed by using HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM, which gives the bloom of youth and a refined, sparkling beauty to the complexion, pleasing, powerful, and natural.

No lady need complain of a red, tanned, freckled, or rustic complexion who will invest 75 cents in HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM. Its effects are truly wonderful.

To preserve and dress the Hair use LYON'S KATHAIRON.

GROCERS, DRUGGISTS, HARDWARE and FURNISHING STORES sell

TIN, BRASS, IRON, WINDOW GLASS, MARBLE, KNIVES, FORKS, MACHINERY, and general METALLIC WARE.

Removes all Rust or Stains. Gives a Brilliant Polish. Better, cheaper, quicker than any other substance. Contains no poisonous or injurious ingredient. Is elegantly wrapped. It is to the interest of Storekeepers to sell it.

Depot, 211 Washington St., New York.

SOAPS OF ALL KINDS FOR FAMILY USE.

Established 1569.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL

Perfectly Safe.

Send for Circulars.

OIL HOUSE OF CHAS. PRATT,

Box 2059. 108 Fulton St., N. Y.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

Agents wanted. Knits every thing. Send to office, 176 Broadway, for Circulars.

IVORIDE

KNIFE-HANDLES.

EQUAL IN

BEAUTY and DURABILITY

TO THE GENUINE

IVORY,

AND AT

HALF THE PRICE.

This material is guaranteed to resist the action of heat and cold, whether of water or of the atmosphere.

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS.

J. Russell & Co.,

Green River Cutlery Works,

83 Beekman Street, New York City.

NATURE'S GREAT RESTORER.

GREEN MOUNTAIN MINERAL SPRING WATER, Moore Holly, Vt.

This celebrated water cures Dyspepsia, Rheumatism, Piles, Scrofula, Urinary Diseases, and Female Weaknesses. "It is a tonic and general builder-up of the system." Send for Descriptive Circular. Sold by Druggists.

McKESSON & ROBBINS, No. 91 Fulton St., N.Y., GEO. C. GOODWIN & CO., Boston, Mass., Agents. F. FENN & CO., Proprietors, Rutland, Vt.

THOMSON'S

PATENT

"GLOVE-FITTING"

The Most Popular Corset ever introduced into the American Market.

The strongest proof of the excellence and popularity of this Corset is found in the numerous attempts to palm off worthless imitations as the genuine imported "Glove-Fitting." We therefore call special attention to our stamp, which is always to be found on the genuine goods, and of which we give a fac-simile below.

N.B.—All infringers of Patent or of Copyright in Name, "Glove-Fitting," will be prosecuted.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
391 Broadway, N.Y.,

Sole Importers and Patentees for the United States.

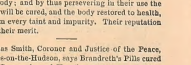
BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

Their great value consists in this: They may be used so long as any disease affects any of the organs of the body; and by thus persevering in their use the disease will be cured, and the body restored to health, free from every taint and impurity. Their reputation proves their merit.

Thomas Smith, Coroner and Justice of the Peace, Hastings-on-the-Hudson, says Brandreth's Pills cured him of Dyspepsia and Heartburn when every other medicine had failed to relieve him. Certificate dated April 5, 1868.

Dr. Turner, of Savannah, Ga., says he has, for nearly forty years, recommended Brandreth's Pills as a specific in Yellow Fever; that he never knew a patient to die who took them for this malady, being otherwise sound. Their prompt use takes out of the body three matters which feed the fatality of the disease. As a general family medicine he considers them far in advance of all others, and here he speaks from personal experience of their qualities.

TO SPORTSMEN!!



A very superior selection of fine Breech-Loading SHOT-GUNS, RIFLES, and PISTOLS, of our own Manufacture and Importation. FISHING TACKLE, POCKET CUTLERY, and Sportsmen's Articles. Sole Agents for W. R. PAGE'S Colonraised Muzzle and Breech Loaders.

HERWIN & HULBERT,
Circulars supplied.] 285 Broadway, N.Y.

SILK DRESSES, WATCHES, and SEWING MACHINES GIVEN AWAY to any person getting up a small Club to ARGOUR'S FAMILY MAGAZINE. Only 50 cents. Sample Copies sent free.
H. S. ARNOLD & CO., Riverside, N.J.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 662.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

GOVERNOR SENTER, OF TENNESSEE.

We publish on this page a portrait of Governor SENTER, of Tennessee. The election took place on the 6th of August, and it turned mainly on the question of the disfranchisement of white citizens. If this point had been yielded by the Radical Republicans, the State might have been carried the other way. As it was, SENTER had a majority of nearly 50,000. If it should happen that, as a consequence of this election, ex-President ANDREW JOHNSON should be elected to the United States Senate, then we must indeed feel that the wrong party has triumphed in Tennessee.

THE TROT AT BUFFALO.

The recent trot at Buffalo, August 12, deserves to be commemorated. It took place at the Driving Park, where three years ago Dexter made the unprecedented time of 2.18 under the saddle. There, two years ago, Dexter made the best time ever recorded, in harness—2.17. Last year, on this course, a mile was paced in 2.14 by Billy Boyce.

There were 25,000 people present at the Park to witness the races on the 12th. Goldsmith Maid won the $10,000 purse in three straight heats, the time being 2.19¼, 2.19¼, 2.19¾. This gives the Maid a place by the side of Dexter. The latter was bought by BONNER, who ought now to buy the Maid also. American Girl has trotted a single heat faster than the Maid, it is true, but for a sustained effort the performance of the latter exceeds any thing yet done upon the turf.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACE.

The great event of August, in England, is the International Boat-race between the Harvard and Oxford crews. By the time that this number of our paper shall have reached its readers that race will probably have been decided. But we write, of course, in ignorance as to the result.

On the 6th of April, 1869, WILLIAM H. SIMMONS, then Captain of the Harvard University Boat-Club, sent to the President of the Oxford University Boat-Club a challenge to row a race in out-rigger boats from Putney to Mortlake, some time between the middle of August and the first of September, 1869, each boat to carry four rowers and a coxswain. A similar challenge was at the same time sent to Cambridge. Oxford accepted—and so did Cambridge, but conditionally.

Mr. LOWNE, after some delay, consented to participate in the race on the side of Harvard. He has had the most brilliant record that has fallen to the lot of any American gentleman to display. To him Mr. SIMMONS magnanimously offered, not only the captaincy of the Harvard crew, but the stroke-ship also. But Mr. LOWNE decided after all that the boat would go best with Mr. SIMMONS as stroke, and himself at the bow, thus keeping the two less experienced, though by no means inexperienced, waist men thoroughly in hand.

The course chosen is the best known race-course in the rowing world—the time-honored track on which Cambridge had beaten Oxford so repeatedly that it seemed hopeless and foolish to try again, and on which suddenly Oxford beat Cambridge, and for the last nine years has, without one interruption, continued to win, so that the latter is annually in doubt whether to attempt it any more or not. It is known as the Metropolitan, or, more properly, as the Putney to Mortlake course, and nominally extends from Putney Bridge across the Thames, about four miles west of London, to the ship at Mortlake, four miles and one-third up stream. These figures and four miles three furlongs, also four miles and a quarter, have each been frequently given as its length, but the English papers have often stated that the distance is not accurately known.

THE OXFORD CREW.

The four men of the Oxford crew, all Etonians, and all, when taking the usual initiatory training at the great college which flourishes under the shades of Windsor, took their places in the Eton eight—all except Mr. DARBISHIRE, who takes rank as having rowed twice against Cambridge. All have rowed in their college matches at Oxford; all have rowed in the winning boat at the great amateur regatta for gentlemen and scholars at Henley; all have been in the winning boat against Cambridge in the great race on the Thames.

Chief among them in rowing, name, fame, and rank, though not in nominal position in the boat, stands F. WILLAN, of EXETER College. He has rowed four times in the winning boat at the great race, and has contributed in no small degree to its success. Mr. WILLAN is a sturdy and well-knit man of not more than middle height, about twenty-five years of age. A southern complexion and well rounded face are set off and deepened by black hair kept short and neat, and small mustache; deep-set eye and beetling eyebrows give to Mr. WILLAN an aspect of hauteur which is not in keeping with his genial nature, for he is a frank, hearty, and manly English gentleman. With great breadth of chest, sound lungs, and splendid physique, he combines massive shoulders and powerful arms. He has somewhat of the style of a man who has served at sea, and shows a degree of coarse, powerful combination, and endurance not often found in one man. He weighs eleven stone nine pounds.

GOVERNOR SENTER, OF TENNESSEE.—[PHOT. BY C. C. GREEN, NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.]

GREAT TROT AT THE BUFFALO DRIVING PARK, AUGUST 12, 1869.—[SKETCHED BY J. P. HOFFMAN.]

Mr. J. C. TINNE, of University College, the President of Oxford University Boat-Club, is a younger and heavier man. He weighs thirteen stone seven pounds. Mr. TINNE is tall, youthful-looking, and shy. His power is latent rather than apparent; but with that reboat and as yet not fully-developed form, it is not difficult to associate long reach, flexible motion, and vast strength. Mr. TINNE is of light complexion, has not yet cultivated a beard nor taken occasion to be particular as to what turn his mustache may be required to take, but he has a pleasant look and an open-hearted manner. Mr. TINNE has rowed three times in the winning boat.

Mr. A. C. YARBOROUGH, of Lincoln College, has rowed twice in the same boat. He seems to be about twenty years of age, and weighs over eleven stone seven pounds, being not much lighter than when he rowed in the great race in the spring. Promptitude, activity, and determination are expressed by his sharp face, bright eye, and firm build. Less strong apparently than either we have just described, Mr. YARBOROUGH is probably not less effective as a single man, and would certainly seem to have more staying power than either, because he is more compactly formed, and is likely, on that account to do his work with less wear and tear of material than either of them. As a sculler, he carried off the Diamond sculls, over the same course as the present contest.

Mr. A. DARBISHIRE, of Balliol, eleven stone three, has rowed for two years against Cambridge. He was stroke on the race this spring by an eleven stone eight. Mr. DARBISHIRE may be described, as to age, but, being smooth faced or clean shaven, he may be more than that. In stature he is less than either of those already mentioned, and in figure smaller, but more firmly built than any. Once in his day Mr. DARBISHIRE must have been a good oarsman. Now he is a smart, sharp, and vigorous stroke, a man who will keep a pretty sharp eye on a boat creeping up, and will not spare himself or his men when there is need for an extra call upon their powers. Judgment of pace and time, and estimate of skill and endurance, are qualities that abundantly fit this gentleman for his position.

Mr. J. H. HALL, the coxswain, at seven stone three pounds, of Corpus man, who has not yet steered the boat in the annual contest, and has thus a grand opportunity of winning golden spurs and becoming "all marked."

THE HARVARD CREW.

Comparisons, however odious in a general way, can not in particular instances be avoided, may be as well to say at once that, if all the Harvard crew are equal to Mr. WILLIAM H. SIMMONS, of Concord, Massachusetts, and if his skill be at all equal to his power and physique, a most dangerous four-oar never appeared on Thames water. There is not a man in the Oxford boat who, as a specimen of manhood, could compare with Mr. SIMMONS. His bust, head, limbs, contour require a sculptor to do them justice, and should the crew win, a good statue of Mr. SIMMONS, either in classical or modern similitude, would do credit to any sculpture-gallery of Europe or America. We refrain in this connection contest of this kind from hinting at an international mooting of another and baser sort which roused England during a few years since, except just to say that there, too, was a splendid man who wanted nothing but absolute fair play to exhibit him to the best his own in his vein against any man in the world. It has long been a slur upon the Thames that, in these great matches, should the Londoner, whoever he may be, be in danger of defeat, the steamers and the small boats do their worst to discomfit his antagonist. Hence it was that when Mr. HAMILL, of Hillsdale, and KELLEY, the best English oarsman of his day, the Tyne was chosen as the scene of contest, because there, among the sturdy Northmen, a clear course was sure to be maintained. In that race, it may be remembered, as pointed out, that the training, skill, and experience of KELLEY completely vanquished the comparatively untutored strength of Hill. In this the same conditions will, no doubt, to some extent apply. On one side there is prestige, training, style, and experience. On the other durability, strength, freshness. The Harvard men have had their races, but these have not been traditional. Their manner of rowing is different from that of their rivals. They have not been accustomed to a coxswain. They row in a strange land, on a strange river, among strangers. Whatever their sympathies may be, can not but wish for the success of the English boat. Oxford is noted for a long and powerful swing, and for great strength, good style, and stamina or staying power. Of the Harvard we have, at this time of writing, heard so little that we can at present only sum them up thus:

ALONZO FOSTER LOVERING, captain and bow oar, aged twenty-three, of Boston, ten stone thirteen pounds.

WILLIAM H. SIMMONS, twenty, Concord, thirteen stone; a very powerful oar.

SYLVESTER WARREN RICE, twenty-six, Roseburg, Oregon, eleven stone six pounds; great length of reach and power of endurance.

GEORGE BASS, Chicago, twenty-four, stroke; a splendid athlete.

ARTHUR BUTSHAM, Chicago, coxswain, eight stone four pounds.

Our last advices are that RICE and BASS are to be displaced by FAY and LYMAN, on the ground that with them better time could be made.

The Harvard crew took with them to England a boat built by ELLIOTT, of Greenpoint. But upon trial the boat was found inadequate, and a new boat was ordered from the SALTERS of Oxford. Thus both the boats will be of English manufacture, and the international rivalry of the race will be confined to the styles and sinews of the competitors.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1869.

GENERAL CANBY'S DUTY.

IN dealing with so new and difficult a subject as reconstruction, and in the midst of a constant conflict with the Executive, it is not surprising that Congress did not provide for every emergency. The consequences, however, became the less to be regretted, and should be treated reasonably, and not with mere party purposes in view; and if a solution at once conciliatory and just can be found, it should gladly be adopted. A difficulty has arisen on the interpretation of the act approved April 10, 1869, under which the late election was held in Virginia. The reconstruction measures acts make certain persons ineligible to election as members of the Legislature. The act of April 10, however, submitted to the registered voters the question whether disfranchisement should be continued under the new Constitution. It also empowered those voters to elect members of Congress and of the State Senate at the time of voting upon the Constitution. The election was held, the disfranchising clause of the new Constitution was rejected, and members of Congress and of Assembly chosen. It now appears that many of the members of Assembly so elected are incapacitated by the original reconstruction acts and it is claimed on their behalf that the act of April 10 repeals the disfranchising clauses of the original acts, and that therefore the members-elect are entitled to seats. But General CANBY, commanding in the State, is of a different opinion, and it is understood that he intends to require the test oath.

This is a difficulty which would have been avoided if the latter act had expressly declared the repeal of any part of the earlier. But this is not in such a matter essential, the repeal of any restriction ought to be assumed; and to make that assumption still less proper in the present case, the necessary operation of the new Constitution, if approved by Congress, will hereafter, but not for the purposes of this election, supersede the old provisions. The act of April 10 authorizes the election for Members of Assembly simultaneously with the vote upon the disfranchising clause. But that act necessarily contemplates the election of members who were under existing laws, and of those to be qualified under a Constitution which may or may not be approved. The existing laws were known, and they designated the persons who might and might be voted for. If they were disregarded, it was not from ignorance. It was no more competent for unqualified voters to vote for the Constitution because it would qualify them than for qualified voters to vote for ineligible candidates because the Constitution would make them eligible. If the Assembly-men were elected without the disfranchising clause, and if the Constitution, with the Legislature of qualified members, were accepted by Congress, then, of course, they become the Legislature to frame and the legal Assembly of the State; and at subsequent elections the voters now unqualified might vote, and the candidates now ineligible be voted for. General CANBY's duty is plain. He must obey existing laws, not propositions of law not yet approved. If a Legislature assembles he must take care that it be qualified according to law.

But if he does this it is unquestionable that the Legislature so qualified would not be elected. It may be said, indeed, and undoubtedly with a great deal of truth, that ineligible candidates were intentionally and defiantly selected. But, on the other hand, the omission of the act to provide distinctly for the emergency must be conceded. It is an unfortunate dilemma, and it is one which should be avoided hereafter by Congress; but it is by no means a case for denunciation or fury. Those who voted at the late election were qualified. They therefore represent the State of Virginia which Congress has declared itself, in determining the qualification, willing to recognize. It can not desire that their wishes should be defeated. Yet if the Legislature meets before the assembling of Congress, General CANBY must, in obedience to law, unseat so many members as to give the power to the Radicals. Whether they would elect two United States Senators in sympathy with the minority. But what would be the result? Those Senators could take their seats only when Congress had approved the new Constitution of the State. But that Constitution abolishes disfranchisement; and if party advantage be considered, the election of majority Senators would justly be regarded with a bitterness which would hurt the cause of the minority infinitely more than the Senators could help it.

The honorable and proper solution of the difficulty is evident. The act of April 10 provides that the Legislature shall not assemble until four weeks after the General commanding in the State proclaims that the Constitution has been ratified by the legal voters. Let General CANBY delay his proclamation until the meeting of Congress. Then let Congress, upon his certificate of the facts, order new elections in the place of the ineligible members. There will be ample time for such elections, for the meeting of the Legislature, and the choice of Senators, before the session of Congress is re-adjourned; and there could be no just complaint upon any side, for all laws will then have been satisfied, and the will of the majority of the voters will have been respected.

THE LOCOMOTIVE AND THE COW.

AMONG the minor blessings which the country owes to the Democratic party is Judge M'CUNN, of New York. His lofty character, his profound legal learning, the universal respect and confidence which he commands, are all shining proofs of the superior claims of that party to the control of the country. Indeed, the character of a party which receives its policy from a SWEENEY, which calls a M'CUNN to the bench, and elects an A. OAKEY HALL for Mayor, is sufficiently perceived from those facts. Ex pede Herculem—from a M'CUNN, you may construct the Democratic party. This party cherishes a peculiar jealousy of the national government, and asserts very stoutly what it is pleased to call State sovereignty. And it was only natural that Judge M'CUNN should attempt to illustrate the party tendency upon this subject by his proceedings in the late case of the Texan PRATT. The matter was promptly settled, but it should be remembered.

PRATT was arrested upon a charge of abducting an apprentice girl in Texas last October, and was held for examination by the United States Commissioner. A writ of habeas corpus was issued by Judge M'CUNN, addressed to the Sheriff, who returned answer that PRATT was held by the United States. The Judge then required the personal appearance of PRATT before him. The United States officers, not recognizing any authority upon the part of M'CUNN, but anxious to avoid even the appearance of offense, and with the understanding that PRATT would be immediately remanded to them, carried him before Judge M'CUNN, who, instead of instantly resigning all claim to jurisdiction, which it was his bounden duty to do, heard an argument upon the merits of the case, and at the end "remanded the prisoner to the Marshal"—as if the Marshal had been one of his subordinates. PRATT was at the understanding had not been observed, to prevent any further actual interference by M'CUNN, placed PRATT in the hands of the Sheriff.

The Judge then ordered him to release the prisoner under the writ of habeas corpus, which had been addressed to the jailer. The Marshal declined to do so, and of the order, both because he was no party to the writ, and because Judge M'CUNN had no jurisdiction in the case. Thereupon Judge M'CUNN issued his arrest for contempt, and the President of the United States ordered the Marshal not to allow the execution of the laws to be defeated by his arrest. If the Marshal then summoned the military protection of the United States, and at the time specified by the Commissioner the prisoner was brought before him for examination, and was released by him upon the ground that there was not sufficient legal evidence to hold him, the order of release being accompanied by the decided declaration of the Commissioner, that his decision had been delayed by the interference of the State Court.

Judge M'CUNN has much right to order the release of PRATT and the arrest of the Marshal as any old apple-woman, and no more. The point has been long settled, both by the Supreme Court of the United States and by the State statutes, that when return is made to a writ of habeas corpus, issued by a State Judge, that the prisoner is held by the United States authorities, the State Judge is to remand him to their custody. The mistake of the authorities in this case was in consenting to appear before Judge M'CUNN at all. That should be done with the best intention, with the intention of avoiding the very objection of discourtesy that was raised, and was raised; but the difficulty was, that when the United States officers appeared before M'CUNN they gave color to his claim of jurisdiction, and to suppose that that excellent Judge would not improve the advantage thus given him was to be at least unwary. As he had no authority whatever, any such advantage should have been made, and no form of recognising any further claim tolerated. After Judge M'CUNN knew the facts, the attempt by his writ to arrest the Marshal was nothing else than lawless violence to prevent the execution of the laws of the land.

The SUN, in its bitter hostility to Marshal BARLOW, whose vigilant and successful enforcement of the Neutrality laws it can not forgive, declared that if Mr. SEWARD had been Governor of the State he would have called out the whole military force to sustain a writ which Judge M'CUNN had no more authority to issue than the reporter of the SUN. The SUN is good as a citizen and too sound a lawyer to attempt any such unpardonable crime. If a New Jersey or California Judge had issued his writ for the Marshal's arrest in New York, would Mr. SEWARD, as Governor, have called out all the militia to enforce the writ if the Marshal refused to acknowledge it? The SUN well would be just as lawful under the circumstances as Judge M'CUNN's. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that no judicial process can have authority beyond its jurisdiction. The whole affair is another illustration of the eagerness to bring the national and State authority into collision, which is constantly displayed by the advocates of State "sovereignty." The attitude of the United States officers was respectful and conciliatory until the audacious attempt of a Judge to impede the execution of the law. Then their conduct was firm and prompt in asserting the just authority of the United States.

THE MASSACHUSETTS PROHIBITIONISTS.

THOSE who anticipated a rupture in the Republican party of Massachusetts by the action of the Prohibitory Convention are disappointed. The President, upon taking the chair, remarked that the purpose of the Convention was not a multiplication of candidates; and with a hearty greeting to all delegates who might be Democrats, but assuming that the great majority were Republicans, he announced his intention to discharge his duty "within the limits of the Republican party."

The address of the Convention asserts that the people of Massachusetts have for thirty years approved prohibition upon the ground that what could clearly injure the State or City may be forbidden by the State. Experience, it says, teaches that the drunkard-maker is a criminal; so the sale of liquor as a beverage will be prohibited by law, according to the address, was most successful. But the pressure of opposition repealed it. "A great and trustworthy Governor, the Hon. JOHN ALBION ANDREW"—foremost in the work of a kindred and not inferior reform, who had given the State a triumphant record and himself an immortal reputation—"signed the bill which made great powers and greater name in the scale of run." License replaced prohibition; but the pauperism of the State increased within the succeeding year nearly fourfold, and the jails were so crowded that the Governor declared their enlargement would be necessary if the license system were continued. The result was a restoration of prohibition by the last Legislature; and the address concludes by stating that the party which pronounces for prohibition will receive such support as it never knew.

The address was followed by a series of resolutions. In reply to the argument that such a law is an invasion of personal liberty the resolutions affirm that it is no more so than the suppression of gambling, lotteries, and duelling; that it is no infringement of personal liberty to forbid the sale of what is the cause of general suffering and crime; that it is inconsistible that one-half of the pauperism and crime in the community is caused by the free sale of liquor as a beverage, and the State which supports paupers and criminals has a right to forbid the sale of that which makes them so—which is proved by the fact that States have the right to prohibit do for the very same purpose restrict and limit.

The resolutions are much too diffuse. The strength of the position of the temperance men lies in the universally conceded and exercised right of restriction by license. The extension of the limitation becomes then a question of expediency; and if it can be established that an extension even to prohibition really keeps the peace better than the old license law, they will have gained an immense advantage. Rev. Dr. MINER, who replied to Governor ANDREW before the Committee of the Legislature, in a speech to the Convention, said that the new prohibitory law, during the forty-eight days in which it had been enforced, had done more for temperance and morality than all the licenses ever had ever done. The good Doctor's assertion certainly proves the ardor of his faith, if it is less serviceable to his cause than a few figures would be; and when he declared that there was joy in hell over every issue of certain newspapers which do not agree with him, he did not certainly commend his cause to hearers at this distance.

The Massachusetts prohibitionists will not within the Republican party, and, of course, will endeavor to secure their proper plank in the platform at the September convention. We doubt if they will succeed. They are a powerful and persistent, but it is not probable that they are yet the controlling, element of the party. Some of the most influential and able Republicans are as resolutely hostile to prohibition as a party tenet as Governor ANDREW was; so that if the prohibitionists can carry the Convention they can by no means command the whole Republican vote of the State. If they are a clear majority of the Convention they will undoubtedly insist upon a distinct prohibitory declaration; if they are not, they will be obliged to accept a compromise.

THE COAL QUESTION

If the Pennsylvania authorities are unable to maintain public order in the mining districts it is their duty to demand assistance of the United States. It is useless to say that the President ought to interfere, for the President can do nothing except upon a constitutional request from the Governor or the Legislature. If the miners have a real grievance, mobs and riots are not the proper remedy, and should no longer be tolerated.

The people of Pennsylvania have an unquestioned interest in collecting from the Northern and Eastern States as large returns for anthracite coal as possible, in order that they may be distributed over the State, and this interest will have great effect in determining its policy. The amount exacted from local consumers of coal in Pennsylvania by reason of strikes bears but a small proportion to the excess over usual profits which a successful strike produces for local distribution. Many Pennsylvanians, therefore, if they weep at all over these alarming disturbances, weep with only one eye, as they view the opposite scale the pecuniary advantage. The miners are a powerful body in a political sense, and would wield their united strength against the Governor who should be the means of calling out the forces of the Union to keep them in order. Pennsylvania will probably hesitate before taking this decisive but necessary step.

The demand on the part of the miners, which they prosecute with force, is, to be admitted to such participation in the profits of the mines as they think advantageous; and as much of this property is owned by persons and Companies located out of the State, the motive appears not to be an unjust one for restraining the free assertion of this demand as if the mines were owned exclusively in Pennsylvania. It is not improbable, that the policy which would reduce the price of coal to unreasonable limits has some support from the Companies which share in the advantage, or we should hear of demands openly and loudly made on Governor GEARY as if the State were unequal to the task of preserving order, to require the General Government to carry out the measures of protection against domestic violence. In the absence of such demands, whether exploited by selfish considerations or not, it is for the Governor to consider whether the lawless condition of the coal districts can be safely endured.

It will be found that the object of this strike has no strong sympathies outside of the limits of Pennsylvania, and, on the contrary, that there are powerful interests which would combine to support the Government of the United States if it should be required to intervene. Coal is of such general use and necessity that the interest is extensive and powerful which calls for putting down the armed combination which has raised a high price to a large group of all the various industries of the country. It is of the highest importance that fuel for domestic and manufacturing purposes can be furnished at a cheap rate. It constitutes one of the elements for successful competition with foreign industries; and as the mines are owned in great proportion by Pennsylvanians, and as roads have been chartered to run their cars from the mines across State lines, there is nothing in the way of the general enjoyment of these deposits of coal except the disturbances at the mines; and the miners should be unmistakably taught that they must seek redress, like other citizens, of the laws and not of force.

Notwithstanding these troubles in the anthracite districts it is pleasant to know that the Cumberland mines in Maryland are worked with regularity, and that the Baltimore and Ohio road, which carries coal at the lowest rate per ton, has refused at this juncture, though strongly urged, to increase the labor of transporting freight which is charged. The policy is the reverse of that of some roads running out of New York, for it looks to permanent results and to substantial interests.

The question what Congress can do for relief will engage attention. The duty on bituminous coal—385 bushels to the ton and 80 pounds per bushel—is $1 25 per ton, and upon all other coal it is 40 cents per ton. Although it is higher on bituminous than upon other coal the bituminous is really the competing coal with the anthracite, for it may be used for manufacturing purposes, and for consumption in open grates and Franklin stoves. The description of coal at 40 cents per ton is very little imported, although it would appear to be the competing article with anthracite. Except for these incessant difficulties in Pennsylvania the manufacturing States which have no coal beds might refuse to touch this duty; but it would be manifestly wrong to continue it under the circumstances. If the duty were removed an immense amount, suitable for engines, would be received from Nova Scotia.

The fear expressed in some quarters that the owners of Provincial coal mines may purchase those of Nova Scotia to secure themselves in a monopoly need not be entertained. The Cumberland and Pictou fields in Nova Scotia are estimated at a hundred square miles, but seams having a thickness in the whole of fifty feet, while the available seams in Cape Breton are estimated at a hundred and twenty square miles of a thickness of from one to twelve feet. As the coal-beds are convenient to numerous harbors it will be impossible for monopoly to command districts so extensive and available.

If the duty on coal should be taken off, which is the evident policy, our manufacturing industry would have one of the obstacles removed which prevents competition with others; and as Nova Scotia does not extend further north than parts of Maine and convenient to our coast, it is easy to foresee the combinations upon us which large supplies of coal would produce; and it would appear to be putting aside one of the great forces of Providence in maintaining a state of duty which practically denies us the benefits of this fortunate provision.

THE DUTY OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

GOVERNOR PALMER, of Illinois, has recently made a speech in which he very well defines a party as an agency for the public good, and remarks that no party will be sustained on account of its past services. He then proceeds to speak of the questions of the time upon which parties must express themselves; of the common concern in politics, and of the necessity of restoring the proper relations between the National and State governments, which the war and the policy which it necessitated have naturally disturbed. This is the point upon which he chiefly insists, evidently with the fancy that there is a tendency toward forgetfulness of the just rights of the States. Senator MORTON, of Indiana, has made a speech in which he reviews with pride and pleasure the career of the Republican party, and declares that, great as its history has been, it is not yet ended. It has done one thing at a time, and done it well; and it will continue in the glorious path of progress. Senator MORTON also shows his chief interest to be in the two parties, and that the Democratic party has nothing to offer but negations and dissatisfactions.

Senator SHERMAN, of Ohio, also has given his view of the political situation. He claims that the Administration is reducing the public expenditures within the appropriations, and that a firm policy will without difficulty pay the debt within twenty years. The condition of the currency, in Mr. SHERMAN'S judgment, is due to the timidity of public opinion which opposes its reduction; and he holds that the responsibility can not be charged upon any party. He thinks the Democratic party entirely useless, because at present there is an undoubted preference of an indirect to a direct tax. The present tariff is designed to raise about $150,000,000 upon imported goods and its protection is purely incidental, and not so great as to prevent a healthy competition between foreign and domestic manufactures. Mr. SHERMAN sums up his views upon this point in these words: "The question of protection is purely incidental; and until our debt is so reduced that the Union's revenue system will be ready to discuss the mere policy of protection as a measure of national economy. It is enough for us that now the duties is paid in money; and before this necessity ceases the manufactures of this country will be on so stable a footing as to defy the competition of the world." Mr. SHERMAN does not show a specific and flexible knowledge of the exact question, which is the true method of levying duties.

The general tone of these speeches show a perception of the fact that the party in which they are all conspicuous must address itself with such vigor and intelligence to the actual issues as to command the confidence and guidance which it now enjoys. For eight years it has had a positive, progressive, and therefore a responsible policy. It has dealt promptly with its doubts and fears, but with its faith and hope. For however courteous, however conciliatory, the tone of party discussion may be, a party policy must be clear, intelligible, and heroic. Whether the object be, with WALPOLE, internal peace, or, with CHATHAM, foreign victory, the policy must have the force of universal assent. It is not necessary that the Republican party now unroll a dazzling programme of annexation and foreign hectoring to propitiate the worst part of the population; but it is necessary that it grapple at once with evident and increasing evils. Corruption is one of them. Let the party pronounce upon it by a vigorous support of a reform in the civil service. The complexity of the tariff and of the system of internal taxation also demand reform. Mr. SHERMAN says that he hopes soon to see all internal taxes repealed except those on whisky, tobacco, and incomes. Let the party demand a simple and efficient system. As for the currency, its regulation, under existing circumstances, is so entirely a matter of experiment that it would be useless to proclaim the details of any method. While the country sees a steady reduction of the debt, and an increasing economy of administration, it will not insist upon specific theories.

The Republican party is master of the situation, and if it will not retain control of the country if it remembers its own history. Principle, intelligence, boldness—these have been its conquering agencies, and with these it will continue to conquer. The Democratic party is strong only by the faults of the Republican. In all the Democratic platforms that have been put forth for the canvass an electious there is no system of principles except such as are no less odious to honest and intelligent men than they were when first announced. The only positive proposition that appears in those platforms is some kind of repudiation, a revelation of the tendency and sympathy of the party. Upon the question of repudiation, which the Republican party is happily and justly settling, these platforms are contradictory. For unconditional free-trade they do not distinctly declare, because Pennsylvania holds an election. They sneer and denounce and declaim, but the only reason that any voter should prefer a Democratic to a Republican ticket in any of the States in which an election is pending is, that he thinks the Republicans need the spur of defeat, not that the Democrats have any honesty, economy, or constitutionality of administration would be secured by the ascendency of the party from whose supremacy sprang the corrupt system which have disgraced the times and immortalized assailed the Government. It is for the Republican party to show that it does not need such a spur by the character of the principles it proclaims upon its platforms, and of the candidates whom it nominates to office.

EMIGRATION TO LOUISIANA.

THE State of Louisiana devotes great and intelligent attention to the subject of immigration, and appointed Agents to further that purpose. Gov. DR. JAMES O. NOYES is President, take care to furnish the most ample and various information for all who are looking for a new home. Thus it appears that Louisiana, contrary to the general impression, is shown by the statistics to be one of the most healthy States in the Union. Louisiana is as healthy as Massachusetts, and the climate is delightful, the mercury seldom rising above 90° in summer or falling below 30° in winter. The mean temperature being about 70°. The rate of annual mortality, also, even in New Orleans, which has had a bad reputation upon that score, is much less than that of cities in the Northern States to be much healthier. In Boston the ratio is 1 to 41.26; in New York, 1 to 27.84; in London, 1 to 40; in Paris, 1 to 32; in Havana, 1 to 23, and in New Orleans the mean of three years unaffected by yellow-fever is 1 to 47.48. The Commissioners pass rather lightly over the yellow-fever, speaking of "occasional epidemics," as confined to certain localities and cities, and which scourge we shall in time learn to obviate altogether." There has been no yellow-fever since 1858.

Louisiana has a remarkable system of natural means of transportation in twenty thousand miles of navigable rivers and bayou navigation. To supply the transports the whole northern part of the State produces cotton; the rice lands of Louisiana are incomparably the best in the United States; the results of the cane sugar produced in the United States come from the delta of the Mississippi. The orange grows in the most virgin soil. The orange crop on 85 acres containing 600 trees, and belonging to a poor man, was sold last year for $7000. Many sugar planters realized last year a profit of more than $150 per acre; many, also, cleared a net profit of $1000 or $1500 per hand. Indeed, the Commissioners set forth several appetizing facts of this kind; and then add, as if to make temptation irresistible, that sugar plantations cleared, ditched, and fenced, with comfortable and convenient buildings, can be bought at less than half the cost of the improvements. Sugar lands are to be bought at $5 to $75 per acre; cotton lands from $3 to $30. Rice lands are offered by the United States Land Office at 3,000,000 acres in Louisiana at $1 25 per acre; and there is about the same quantity of State land at 32 cents per acre. If the immigrant is too poor to buy, there is the Homestead law to befriend him. In no other State, says the Board, will a dollar buy so much; in no other State can a man live so well.

Such is the mildness of the climate that there are about 250 fair working days on the farm in Louisiana against less than 150 in New York or Wisconsin; and the Commissioners could immediately find places on plantations for 10,000 able-bodied men at $20 per month, with house rent and the principal articles of food included. Indeed the natural resources of the State are remarkable, and with intelligent labor and enterprise its material tranquillity, prosperity would be among the most prosperous of States.

NOTES.

LOUIS NAPOLEON is a sagacious man, and in his case the only question is whether he is as sagacious enough to keep his word. He has established many of the fundamental forms of a constitutional and responsible government in France; and upon the hundredth anniversary of the birthday of his uncle he granted a complete amnesty to press and political offenders, and to sundry other classes of delinquents. But M. THIERS, now an old man, who has seen much struggle in France, and who is the author of Frenchmen, shakes his head and says that the republic is coming in France, but coming in blood and revenge. M. THIERS, however, is a disappointed Orleanist, and was always a man of little faith.

THE discovery of the shocking abuse of a nun in the convent at Cracow has so stirred the Austrian people and Government that the Minister of Public Worship has informed the Governor of the Province that the Government believes itself bound to stop the payment of the annual subsidy to the convent, and also to propose an inquiry whether the convent should not be suppressed. The feeling with which an event like that of the Cracow convent is received shows how profound is the popular doubt and jealousy of the ecclesiastical régime.

IT is quite time that Congress relieved from legal pursuit the military officers of the United States who, during the rebellion and the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, arrested and imprisoned suspected persons. JOHN MITCHEL, whom to name is to describe, has brought an action against General DIX for illegal imprisonment, and the General was arrested under a MCCUEN writ and held to bail in twenty thousand dollars. It was easy for General DIX to procure the bail, but an ingenious system of such actions might cause the most serious annoyance to officers who are also fortunately situated than General DIX, and who are as guiltless as he.

SENATOR BROWNLOW has written a curious letter in regard to the Tennessee election. It is curious from the moderation of its tone, and from its admissions. MR. BROWNLOW says that a majority of the Republican Tennessee SENTER men, and that SENTER is a sound Republican, but he is very careful not to claim the result of the election as a Republican victory. Indeed, he admits that the Legislature is not Republican. MR. BROWNLOW does not explain why it is that the Tennessee Republicans preferred to take a course which gave the State to the Democrats. If the reason was that the Republicans preferred Democratic ascendency rather than continued disfranchisement, it was, if a mistaken, certainly not a discreditable motive, and he ought not to have omitted to state it. In MR. BROWNLOW silent because that was not the reason, which is to be found in political jealousy? If so, he would do his party friends elsewhere a great service if he should clearly and briefly explain the reason why he refuses to call himself a Republican?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

IN July 839,877 citizens of Boston—men, women, and children—availed themselves of the cheap fares and advantages afforded by the various public baths established in the city.

THE Labor Congress, recently assembled at Philadelphia, voted that they would favor the law introduction of coolie labor into this country. It also voted that the Labor Reformers should support no man against their employers. It was proposed to organize a political party in favor of labor-reform.

MR. Peabody has donated $60,000 to Washington College, Virginia, in memory of ROBERT E. LEE its President of that institution. This gift is alluded to in terms of grateful gratitude by the Virginia papers. It is the feeling shown rather than the money given that is important.

IT is reported that several mills in Rhode Island that have been running on cotton will shut down until the new crop of cotton comes into market. At WOONSOCKET, however, they are producing this fall will soon run on "short time."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Senatus Consultum, recently presented to the Senate, proposes to the Legislature to take the means of proposing laws. It makes the Ministers dependent upon the Emperor alone; for it gives to the legislative body a much larger share in the government than it has hitherto possessed. The Session of the Senatus Consultum commences August 30.

THE Spanish troops from Cuba include many cheering prospects for the patriots. A strong Spanish force, under General Jordan, defeated the rebels in Victuba by General Quesada. One hundred and eighty-two rebels were taken. In another engagement, near Trinidad, General Jordan defeated the Spaniards, capturing 200 rebels, prisoners. Two hundred of the Spaniards deserted and joined the Cubans. It is reported that the Spanish volunteers have petitioned Captain-General De Rodas as they formerly treated Dulce, that he will expel the priests from Holguin.

A complete reconciliation has been effected between the Pope and the Viceroy of Egypt. The Spanish and French Consuls at Alexandria have congratulated the Viceroy on the termination of his difficulties with the Pope.

THE Rome correspondent of the Prussian Crux Gazette asserts that the late Syllabus of the Pope will form the principal text of the deliberations of the Œcumenical Council. The paragraphs concerning the relations of the Church and State will be specified, and probably intensified. The dogmas of the infallibility of the Pope and of the bodily and corporeal assumption of the Virgin will be promulgated. The Holy Father has expressed his regret that no Schismatic or Protestant bishop has offered to take part in the Council.

THIRTEEN hundred stores and three hundred dwellings-houses have been destroyed by fire in the town of Junina, Turkey.

THE Rev. Mr. Hughes—the well-known "Tom Brown"—of Rugby, has been chosen referee in the international boundary dispute between the Oxford and Harvard crews.

General Lebœuf has been appointed Minister of War to succeed Marshal Niel deceased.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACE—THE OXFORD CREW.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACE—THE HARVARD CREW.—PHOT. BY JOHN A. WHIPPLE, 297 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

OUR NEW CURRICULUM.

AS TOM SEES IT.

A rio for your Latin, and less for your Greek,
No longer with Euclid we'll trouble;
The pets of the "Varsities" now, for a week,
Are the boys who exhibit the muscle.

Of all the formations, since Chaos was drowned,
As marked by geologists graves,
The very best stratum that ever was found
Is the new one of wherry on waves.

The student of nature may dive after fish,
If he likes, to the depths of the sea;
But the chap who just covers his blade with a swish,
Why, he is the boss for me.

The chemist who catches a crab in his boat,
And throws a precipitate there;
By-'gones astronomer he never can float,
Nor pass the professional chair.

The sage engineer, with his sector and square,
May study his best to begin it,
But he can't find a power with his to compare,
Who can go forty-eight to the minute.

Hurrah for the steersman that pulls with a will,
Hurrah for the swell of the oar!
And good-by to Loomis, and Anthon, and Mill,
Old codgers, he's all up with you.

A fig for your Latin, and less for your Greek,
No longer with Euclid we'll trouble;
The pets of the "Varsities" now, for a week,
Are the boys who exhibit the muscle!

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book I.

CHAPTER I.

A NEW VICAR FOR SHIPLEY.

THE Church Intelligencer announced one day, much to the fluttering of the village of Shipley, and also to the fluttering of some disappointed hearts in clerical breasts, that the Reverend Charles Levincourt was presented to the vacant living of Shipley-in-the-Wold.

The Reverend Charles Levincourt was presented to the living of Shipley-in-the-Wold by Sir William Delaney, to whose only son he had been tutor.

Sir William had always expressed his sense of obligation to Mr. Levincourt for the unremitting and judicious care he had bestowed on his son James's education. The young man was sickly in body and inert in mind; nevertheless he had passed through his university career in a fairly creditable manner. This was mainly owing, in every one minuted, to his tutor's talents and zeal. Therefore when he was very inexplicably left himself sincerely grateful. But neither Shipley-in-the-Wold nor the world out of the Wold by any means understood the mainspring of this sincere gratitude.

James was the baronet's only son, but Sir William was also the father of two daughters. While the elder of these young ladies—Hilda—was going through the gayeties of a London season (at the end of which she became Lady Tallis), Clara—a girl of seventeen—was quietly falling in love with her brother's tutor in the country.

The Delaneys were Irish people. They lived chiefly at the place which bore their family name—an estate called Delaney Park, in the South of Ireland. James passed the long vacation at home, and Mr. Levincourt came with him. Clara was a delicate, shy, sweet-natured creature; motherless, and more innocent of worldliness in her eighteenth year than many a precocious inmate of a Belgravian nursery.

Charles Levincourt loved her better than he was destined ever to love another human being. But he "behaved admirably," Sir William always declared.

How? Well, in a word, he went abroad with a rich minor to whose guardians Sir William Delaney warmly recommended his son's tutor.

Before years were over the Delaney family knew Park learned that Mr. Levincourt was married in Italy, to a foreign lady of great beauty, but no fortune.

Soon afterward Clara yielded to her father's solicitations, and accepted the hand of Sidney Power Digwell, Esquire, of Digwell Court, County Cork: a gentleman of good family, whose estate adjoined her father's. On his second daughter's wedding morning, Sir William wrote to Charles Levincourt, promising him the next presentation, then likely to fall in a year shortly, to the English living of Shipley-in-the-Wold. No one save her father knew that it was Clara who had asked and obtained this favor.

But she had said to Sir William in her quiet sweet voice, "Papa, James had a letter the other day from Mr. Levincourt. He has not succeeded in getting appointed to the foreign chaplaincy he was trying for. His wife has just had a little girl. I am afraid they are very poor. I wish you would promise him the next presentation to Shipley. You could not do better. He is so clever and so learned, and—and he was very good to James, papa dear."

In this way the Reverend Charles Levincourt became vicar of Shipley-in-the-Wold.

CHAPTER II.

SHIPLEY VICARAGE.

The small and obscure village of Shipley-in-the-Wold stands in one of the westernmost of the midland counties.

Its name was given in days before the whole of that part of England had been marked by the plow and spade, like a page by the tracings of a pen. Generation after generation has left its sign-manual on the face of the land: each writing the record of its labors in straight furrows on many a fertile field: furrows effaced and changed and renewed, from season to season, and from age to age, as are the waving ripples on a seaside sand washed by the eternal tides.

A stretch of furze-grown common is, perhaps, the only remnant of that characteristic aspect of the country which gave Shipley its distinctive appellation.

There are wide, flat meadows all round about it, where herds of cattle graze on the dew-fed grass. The principal farms in the immediate neighborhood of Shipley-in-the-Wold are grazing farms. All the land is flat and monotonous as far as the eye can see: save to the westward, where the horizon line is broken by a range of low furze-covered hills, called by the inhabitants of those parts emphatically "the Hills." Behind "the Hills" lies another Shipley; Shipley Magna, a tiny market-town.

If it could be reached by a direct line cut through one of the swelling gray hills, Shipley Magna would not be more than two or three miles distant from Shipley-in-the-Wold. But the road winds about and round the hills; and it is six miles from the village to the town. Southward the landscape grows prettier and more smiling. There are trees, and there is arable land where, in summer, wide fields of sun-burnt grain wave, and rock, and change color in the breeze, as a lake ruffles and pales in a sudden whisper.

But Shipley-in-the-Wold only beholds these things from afar. The stretch of furze-grown common already mentioned, and beyond that a considerable extent of coy marshland separate it from the smiling southern country.

In the winter season bleak winds sweep scythe-winged over Shipley; the snow lies deep about it; and often a single track of hoofs, and wheels, and feet may be traced in long black lines and uncouth dots, for miles across the otherwise unbroken whiteness of the level.

The village straggles over a considerable extent of ground, but the number of its actual inhabitants is scanty. There is nothing which can be called a main street belonging to it.

The dwelling-houses are scattered irregularly; here a cottage, and there a cottage, and each one is set within its own little patch of kitchen-garden.

The place is remote from any extensive centre of commerce and activity. No railway passes near it.

Twenty miles to the southward, among the trees and the corn-fields, lies the cathedral city of Dunecester: with its bishop, and its dean, and its manor, and its canons residentiary, and excellent institutions. But Dunecester is, after all, but a silent, sleepy, old-fashioned city; and it was there, and only there, that Charles Levincourt had chosen a small, wind-swept flats.

There is a very ancient church in Shipley: a low-roofed, stone church with massive Norman pillars of disproportionate thickness, and a square, squat tower. It has a deep porch, to enter which you descend two steps from the churchyard. The laboring centuries have piled their dust high around the massive masonry of St. Gilda's church, and the level of the churchyard mold is considerably above that of the stone pavement within the little temple.

The grave-yard is inclosed by a low wall, and its gateway is a relic of antiquity coeval with the church itself. The said gateway is of brown stone, with a projecting pediment, and beneath it on one side is a large stone slab, cracked, weather-stained, and half sunk in the earth. Here, in the old time, the coffin-bearers were wont to set down their burden, and a preliminary prayer for the dead was said before entering the church-yard.

There is no beauty in St. Gilda's grave-yard. It lies defenseless and unsheltered every wild northeasterly gale that sweeps over the flats. Its clustered mounds are turf-grown. Sheep graze there sometimes. There are few fine grave-stones, as yet undefaced by time and weather, bear humble names of yeomen and peasants, born, living, and dying at Shipley, generation after generation.

There are some rank flaunting marigolds growing beside the porch, and a few dark cypress-like thymum nises its head to peer over the low rough wall of the grave-yard. Other growth, save nettles, and leaves, and dank, shadow-loving, nameless weeds, there is none.

Hard by the church stands the vicarage house. It is a lonely dwelling. There is no habitation of any kind within a mile of it: none above the rank of a peasant's cottage within two miles.

Shipley vicarage is altogether a modern or too old to be picturesque. It was built in the middle of the last century, and is remarkable for the ugly age; the period, namely, during which the four Georges successively occupied the throne of these realms. It is a square, substantial pile of yellowish-brown brick. Its rooms are oblong and rectangular, its windows mean, its staircases narrow. There is no beauty or regret here for the wall-surfaces, nor in the blank desert of the whitewashed ceilings.

Behind the house extends a large garden, the high wall of which skirts a by-lane branching from the main high-road to Shipley Magna. In front is a lawn, cut in two by a long, straight gravel path that leads from an iron wicket in the box hedge up to the hall-door. This lawn is only divided by a paddock from St. Gilda's church-yard.

Two quivering poplars whisper to each other and nod mysteriously from either side of the iron gate: and the windows of the lower rooms look in front of the house on nothing but clumps of evergreens, among which an old yew-tree rises gloomily conspicuous.

The vicarage faces due south, and looks across the common and the marsh to where tufty woodlands break the level and hide the distant spires of Dunecester.

The Reverend Charles Levincourt, vicar of St. Gildas, arrived to take possession of his new home on a dreary day in the latter autumn, when the rain dripped sadly from the limber evergreens, and low, lead-colored clouds were melting into slant showers over the common.

"It is not a hopeful thing," said he, as he looked about him and shivered.

He afterward saw the scene under a countless variety of aspects; but that first disquieting impression of Shipley struck the key-note of the place, and became an abiding under-tone, sounding through all subsequent changes.

CHAPTER III.

A WARD.

Mr. Levincourt had been established some years at Shipley, when one day he received a letter from the junior partner in a London firm of solicitors, Frend and Lovegrove, informing him that he (the Reverend Charles Levincourt, vicar of Shipley-in-the-Wold) had been appointed coexecutor with Mr. Lovegrove (Augustus Lovegrove) of the will of the late Mrs. Desmond, relict of Sidney Power Digwell, Esquire, formerly of Desmond Court, county Cork; and further requesting the vicar's presence in town as soon as might be.

Communication between the country clergyman and the family of his old pupil had long since been very shy and distant. The old pupil himself had died, at five-and-twenty; his sorrowing father had not long survived him; and this was the first intimation Charles Levincourt received of the widowhood and death of his old love.

He journeyed without delay to London, and saw Mr. Lovegrove. The latter informed him that their joint responsibility, as regarded the administration of Mrs. Desmond's will, would not be an onerous one: the property she had had to leave being very small.

"But," added the solicitor, "your share of the business will be more troublesome. Here is a letter which I solemnly promised our poor friend to deliver into your own hand. She informed me of its main object. It is to request you to undertake the guardianship of her daughter."

"Her daughter?"

"Yes; a nice little girl about nine years old. The only survivor of a large family. But I thought you knew all the circumstances. You were one of Mrs. Desmond's oldest friends, were you not?"

"I—yes; I was a friend of Mrs. Desmond's family many years ago. But Time flies away very fast, Mr. Lovegrove, as he hits him. Was not Mr. Desmond wealthy? I had always understood so."

"My dear Sir, Sidney Power Desmond ran through a fine fortune, and sent his paternal acres to the hammer. I saw a good deal of him, and of her too, poor thing, when I was professionally engaged in 'winding up his affairs,' as he would persist in calling it. He tangled a wonderful relation of affairs, I can tell you. Mrs. Desmond was a sweet woman. She had a bad life of it, I'm afraid. I don't think he treated her ill. He was fond of her, in his way. But he shook her children's inheritance away out of the table-boy, and left them beggars years later than he ought to have done for the welfare of his family."

The vicar declined Mr. Lovegrove's proffered hospitality, and went back to his dingy hotel chamber to read Clara's letter in solitude.

The best part of an afternoon had to be appealed to him, on the ground of old friendship, not to decline the trust imposed on him.

"My dear husband," she said, "that it ran, "have long been estranged from us. Papa and poor James are dead, and distant cousins who know little and care less about us, possess my old home. My sister, Lady Tallis, is childless, and she would gladly adopt my little one, and would, I well know, be very kind to her for the orphan. But her unhappy domestic circumstances render this impossible. Neither, to say truth, is Hilda's present husband a person whose roof I should like my daughter to be brought up, even were he willing to permit it. Hilda has her own troubles, for I know her kind heart is in any spirit of bitterness, but simply that you may understand how utterly friendless my Maud will be when I am gone, for I know her helplessness will appeal strongly to your kind heart.

The letter was commonplace and prosaic enough—a mere expression of what Charles Levincourt, sitting there with the sheet of folded paper in his hand, thinking of the writer as a woman he once loved so well, there was both pathos and eloquence in the sharply written characters. It was touching and sadly to the point of the past years that had so strangely resulted in giving Clara's only surviving child to his care. He felt no reluctance or regret beyond the misgivings awakened in his mind he imparted to no one.

The next day the vicar returned to Shipley, bringing with him a new inmate to the vicarage house. The little orphan was kindly received by the new mistress of her new home. Mrs. Levincourt was an Italian by birth. Her mother had been an Englishwoman, her father a Neapolitan. She had lived abroad all her life until her marriage; was very uneducated, very frivolous, and very beautiful. She had perhaps as small a share of imagination as ever fell to the lot of a human being. The self-confidence arising from this total inability to conceive another person's point of view, was, perhaps, her short, low-roofed municate a certain bent to his mind, and even a certain aspect to his body. But the work which a man does grudgingly, without thoroughness and faith, will be to him as irksome as an ill-fitting garment, and will, like such a garment, be laid aside and put out of sight altogether, whenever its wearer can get rid of it.

People did not get intimate at the virange. The neighborhood was but sparsely peopled with families of the rank of gentlefolks. Without the command of some vehicle, visiting was out of the question.

At first Mrs. Levincourt had gone out rather frequently to formal dinner-parties at great dull country houses, and also to some county balls that were not dull. The hosts sent their carriages for the vicar and his wife, if they lived at a great distance from Shipley. And the Shipley old chaise was hired from the Crown at Shipley Magna.

But gradually such intercourse dropped. Mrs. Levincourt was not strong. Mrs. Levincourt did not care for dinner-parties, Mrs. Levincourt had her little girl to attend to. The vicar knew that Stella liked society, and she was by no means conscious of the surprise which her sayings and doings were apt to excite among the Danesbire magnates. But her husband was very thoroughly conscious of it. And, as the only kind of visiting they could have afforded for amusement, their life became more and more secluded.

When the two girls were aged respectively seventeen and fifteen Mrs. Levincourt died, and then Stella returned home to "take charge," as they said, of her father's house.

Maud also came back to Shipley vicarage, having "completed her education" in other words, having learned all that they could teach her at the Duneester school.

For two years Veronica reigned mistress of her father's household. Perhaps the burden of the song, Veronica being nineteen, had only so far changed as to run thus: "Now that I was grown up, I won't stay at Shipley."

We shall see.

CHAPTER IV.

AN ACCIDENT.

SOME subtle influence—a sight, or sound, or smell—touched the long-drawn links of association in the lawyer's mind as he walked his own door one February afternoon, and made him remember that dreary autumn day on which he had first seen Shipley.

His thought flashed back along the past years, as the electric spark thrills through a long chain of electric links.

"Poor Stella!" he said, half aloud.

Mr. Levincourt was apt to spend a good deal of his waking hours of composition in soliloquy. But there is no more effectual check to the indulgence of our own failings and weaknesses than the unexpected manifestation of the like defect in another. That which in us is only a reasonable and well-grounded dissatisfaction, becomes mere selfish unjustifiable repining in our neighbors.

So long as his wife lived, therefore, Mr. Levincourt was not aware by her look and by her compliments from expressing one-half the distaste he really felt for his life at Shipley-in-the-Wold, although he had secretly deemed his wife far less entitled to pity than he was, whose qualities of mind and refinement of education enabled him to understand much better what he had lost in being thus buried alive at Shipley.

But Stella Levincourt, born Bartlett, slept in St. Giles's churchyard, and a white tablet shimmering out of the gloomiest corner in the dark little church bore an inscription to her memory. And since her death he had unconsciously felt much retrospective sympathy with his wife.

"Poor Stella!" he said again; and, shutting the door behind him, he walked down the gravel pathway, passed through the iron wicket, crossed the paddock, and proceeded thus through St. Gildas's churchyard to the Vicarage.

It was not a day to loiter in. It had snowed a good deal the previous night, but since early o'clock the weather of a strongly thaw had set in. The roads were deep in mud, whose chill penetrated the strongest shoe-leather. An icy cold dew seemed to exude from every thing one touched, and the sky spread a lead-colored canopy from house to zenith.

Mr. Levincourt made for the school-house. This was a bare lath-and-plaster building, erected at the close of the late vicar's reign on the Sunday-school. The present incumbent, while adhering to its founder's first intention, had found an additional use for the vicarage school-room. It served, namely, as a place for the choir of St. Gildas to practice in.

Before Mr. Levincourt's day the music at divine service in St. Gildas consisted solely of portions of Tate and Brady, bawled or shuffled out in monotonous succession. Mr. Levincourt had refined and critical ear suffered many a shock from his congregation's strenuously uplifted voices. He resolved to amend the singing, and he applied himself that he would find support and encouragement in this undertaking. But folks were as loth to be schooled in Shipley as in most other places; and Mr. Levincourt's first attempts to teach them harmony resulted in chaos and riot.

By degrees he lowered his pretensions. He had begun with high-flown ideas of foreign massmusic adapted to English words. Then, some of the simpler compositions of our English cathedral writers were attempted. At length he resolved to be satisfied with Martin Luther's Hymn, and Adeste Fideles, sung in parts. Things began to go better. The younger generation, trained to some knowledge of music, became capable of succeeding in such modest attempts as these. Nor was it, indeed, from the younger generation that the great difficulties had arisen.

Farmer Meggitt, and Farmer Sack, and other middle-aged farmers and graziers, could not be got to understand that it behooved them to be passive listeners to the music during service.

"What do ye mean then, by 'Let us sing to the praise—I' Let us," Farmer Meggitt said oos, "sing! Not 'let the little lads and wenches in the organ-loft, sing to the praise!' Parson Lavincourt's on a wrong tack altogether. And as to his new-fangled tunes—why they're Popish; that's what they are: and I don't care who hears me say so!"

The implied slight to Farmer Meggitt's vocal abilities made him very Protestant indeed. And the choir-master, who had been originally only supposed to be a very colorable and serious one, losing that he had a foreign wife.

However, from a wrong tack to the right of new-fangled things into old-fangled. And the congregation of St. Gildas had long grown very proud of their singing. Farmer Meggitt led a class of village children to whom she taught some of the mysteries contained in the queer black-handed book brought from Italy by her aunt, and the choir met to practice every Saturday afternoon. And on this one special Saturday afternoon in February, Mr. Levincourt having floundered through the thick mud of the lane, arrived at the school-house door, turned the handle, and walked in, when the sound of voices here ceased.

The children were making ready to troop out. Some of the little things—many under the stern glance of Mr. Mugworthy—were putting on their hats, others were pulling on the parish shoes, which sat on the wooden benches, from which their corduroy-clad owners had, with a sound, as unceremoniously as the pendulum of the big wooden clock that ticked away the hours above the door.

At a little distance from the stove, and in front of it, Mr. Mugworthy, the choir-master, was standing, one hand on a rich Danecester banker. This young gentleman had been educated in Germany, and had brought home with him

His dilettantesim was strong enough to induce him to make the journey from Duneester every every week, during the winter months, on Saturday relearsals, the place of the professional organist, who was only engaged to come to Shipley for the Sunday services.

Not far from him stood Mr. Plew, the village doctor, talking to the vicar's daughter. Mr. Plew had the smoothest and whitest of fat, rosy cheeks, and gave the choir the benefit of his assistance whenever his professional avocations would permit him to do so.

Then there were Kitty and Cissy Meggitt, with their governess, Miss Turtle. Mrs. Meggitt was not at aspiring mood herself, but encouraged her husband to engage a "real lady" to teach her girls manners. Farmer Meggitt paid the "real lady" five-and-twenty pounds per annum, and he thought in his heart that it was an exorbitantly high price for the article.

Then there were Captain and Mrs. Sheardown, of Lowater House. They did not sing; but they had come to fetch their son, Master Philip Sheardown, who was on a high school-bench among the trebles.

Lastly, there was Maud Desmond.

"Good-evening," said the vicar, walking into the room.

Immediately there was a shuffling and scraping of feet. Every boy slid down from his bench, and drew each one a hob-nailed boot noisily over the bare floor in front of him, and took about time a bunch of sun-burnt knuckles to his forehead. The little girls ducked down convulsively by the smaller ones standing behind, and rose again with an odd struggling movement of the elbow.

This was the ceremony of salutation to a superior among the rustic youth of Shipley.

"How have you been getting on, Herbert?" said Mr. Levincourt, addressing the pale, dark Sheardown? Captain, when I saw that the West Danesbire were to meet at Hammick, I scarcely expected to have the pleasure of seeing you this evening!"

"No; I didn't hunt to-day," answered the captain.

Captain Sheardown was a broad-shouldered man of some five-and-fifty years of age. His red face was fringed with short gray whiskers. His eyes were surrounded by a net-work of fine lines that looked as though they had been graven on the face with by an engraver's tool. He was generally good with his legs somewhat wide apart, as one who is balancing himself on an unsteady sea floor.

The gentlemen gathered together into a knot by themselves while they waited for the ladies to get on their cloaks and bonnets.

"I wonder what sort of a run they had with the West Danesbire?" said Herbert Snowe.

"I heard, by the way, that a fox was killed in the field," said Mr. Mugworthy, who had edged himself near to the group of gentlemen.

"An accident?" said the vicar. "What was it? Nothing serious, I trust?"

"No, Sir; from what I can reap out of the rumor of the boy, there was no very serious accident. Jemmy Sack, he seen it, Sir. It happened close up by his father's farm."

"Sack's farm, eh?" said Captain Sheardown.

"Why that's at Haymoor!"

"Well, sir, it is," rejoined Mr. Mugworthy, after a moment's pause, as though he had been casting about in his mind for some reasonable means of contradicting a statement. But finding none, was resolved to be candid, and make a clean breast of it. "It is, Sir, at Haymoor, is Sack's farm. And it is quite as near, as anywhere."

"Whew!" whistled the captain. "Who'd have thought of a fox out of the Haymoor coverts coming for Haymoor! With the wind as it is, too—and as it has been all day."

"Why shouldn't he?" asked Herbert Snowe, whose foreign education had left him lamentably ignorant on certain matters of which Captain Sheardown conceived that an English gentleman ought to know a good deal.

"Why shouldn't he?" echoed the captain, screwing up his eyes and mouth into an expression of comical vexation, and thereby deepening the finely-grave lines before mentioned. "Why shouldn't he? Bless my soul, Herbert! Because a fox going from Hammick to Haymoor to-day must have run straight up wind the whole time! That's why. Why shouldn't he? Tshah!"

"A dog fox, Sir," put in Mugworthy, solemnly, "will sometimes run up wind at this time of the year when he's agoing home, Sir."

"Well, well," said the vicar, with the slightest possible air of contempt for the whole subject: "we will suppose that this was a Haymoor fox, who had been visiting his relations at Hammick. But about the accident, Mugworthy?"

"Jemmy Sack, he seen it, Sir. Come up here, Jemmy, and tell the gentlemen and the gentleman as was precipitated off of his horse alongside of the five-acre field."

Jemmy Sack, a boy of thirteen, came and stood before the vicar, and with many writhings, and in agonies of bashfulness, delivered himself of his story.

The story simply amounted to his having seen a gentleman flung from his horse with a good deal of violence, and then the horse ran on, either not seeing or not heeding. After a while the gentleman's servant had galloped up to his assistance. When the gentleman had risen again—not again: but not the same horse. He took the beast that his servant had been riding, and sent the groom away on the animal that had thrown him. The gentlemen had then ridden after the rest of the hunt toward Upper Haymoor.

"Ah! Well, then, not much harm done, I'm happy to find. If the gentleman went on following the hounds he could not have been much hurt," said the vicar. "I didn't know the gentleman by sight, Jemmy, did you?"

Jemmy did not know the gentleman's name: but he knowed that he was a-staying at the Crown Inn, Shipley Magna, and that he had four horses in the stable-yard. And the people about the inn, he was a friend of Lord George Segrave's, him as had taken Hammick Lodge for the hunting season. And after becoming more confused by the sound of his own voice addressing gentlefolks, and finding himself listened to, began to grow loquacious and to volunteer his opinion that the gentleman had a-got a cogsly spit, for he turned welly green and seemed all queer in the head like. So when the groom come after him, for he would go on a-horseback again, and he (Jemmy) had run nigh enough to hear him a-cussin' and a-swearin' at the groom like fun.

In fact so loquacious and graphic in his narrative did Jemmy become that Mugworthy perceptibly grew alarmed, and he held his tongue and he gone with the other lads.

The boys shuffled out, glad to be released, and then presently heard a shouting down the lane after the manner of their kind.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

WHEN the visitor at Saratoga begins to weary of the set routine of drinking Congress water to the music, and the promenade of the Lake in the afternoon, he may break the monotony by a little excursion to Lake George. We say little—for although seven miles is spent agreeably in the steamboat on that lovely Lake, a rapid but pleasant trip may be made in twenty-four hours, with the loss of but one evening's entertainment. The "constitutional," the gaze of a charming will upon the "silvery waters," the pine overhanging the hotel—are all over by seven o'clock go to the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railway Depôt. Do not get impatient if, after having been hurried off to the depôt, you wait long and wearily for the cars. Probably you will do so. Such, at least, is our experience, and we have had a little more than an hour brought us to Glen's Falls, nine miles from Caldwell. Three coaches were awaiting the arrival of the train, and we secured ample accommodations. Alas for our expectations! All the passengers bought tickets for the steamboat, and though upon a single coach, until there was not an inch of room to spare, and trunks upon trunks were fastened with cord to the top, we were left to ride on the platform—in scorn!—and so it is: but if tourists are like to be left behind, as we were, by the Lake steamboat—built the railroad is extended—purchasing tickets to Glen's Falls only, and taking a private carriage thence to the Lake House.

Fort William Henry Hotel, the largest at Caldwell, stands on Lake George, commands superb and splendid rooms, and the interior arrangements are fresh and elegant. The Lake House also gives pleasant accommodations at reasonable rates. A walk through the grounds, a good supper, a chatty promenade on the long piazza of the Lake House, a night's sound sleep, a nice breakfast; then at eight in the morning, the pretty Minnehaha starts on her trip down the lake. Two days—a little more than one day's sail—in a day steam North without hesitation. Lake George is about 36 miles long, and from one to three miles in width, and the shores are mountainous, and other fancy titles have no longer been used. Trout Pavilion, Holiday Point, Bolton, etc., are favorite resorts for those who delight in fishing. The "365 islands" rise up fresh, green, and lovely, from the deepest frost and the hottest dog-days; a nice breakfast; then at eight in the morning, the pretty Minnehaha starts on her trip down the lake. Two days—a little more than one day's sail—in a day steam North without hesitation. Lake George is about 36 miles long, and from one to three miles in width, and the shores are mountainous, and other fancy titles have no longer been used. Trout Pavilion, Holiday Point, Bolton, etc., are favorite resorts for those who delight in fishing. The "365 islands" rise up fresh, green, and lovely, from the deepest frost and the hottest parest depths; some quite large, others mere dots, but every one beautiful in its own peculiar style. At Black Mountain encircle the Lake, their wild heights rendering the landscape most picturesque. Indeed, the whole scene is picturesque—no less wild and romantic completeness of its romantic and lovely beauty. A brief description can give no idea of it—it must be seen.

At the foot of the Lake we took stages, roomy and comfortable, and fine scenery and historical reminiscences made the four miles' drive to Ticonderoga short. It appears to be a part of the regular programme, when in sight of "Old Fort Ti," for the agent of the route, mounted on the wheel of one coach, to deliver a pithy little address, which causes great merriment, while the passengers gaze at the ruins.

We chanced to take passage on the Adirondack, a new and elegant steamer on Lake Champlain. Sailing from Ticonderoga up to Whitehall is a curious contrast to the trip on Lake George. The scenery is fine—the Green Mountains appear in the distance on the left, the Black range on the right; rugged cliffs sometimes loom up on either side, and then low, irregular border-lines appear; but the water has none of that peculiar clearness which marks the other lake. Flags, smiles, trees, and bushes grow up lawlessly in the very midst of it—all the more noticeable after one has just viewed the chaste borders of that silvery sheet which in olden times was called "Horicon."

The boat will steam only half long enough when the Adirondack will be ready, which will make a ride of less than two hours brought us, well pleased with the day's, back to Caldwell.

The University Courses of Instruction at Harvard for the current year will be given to competent persons, "men and women," according to their attainment. The idea is good. The lessons of the course are to be given by such men as Professors Bowen, Peirce, Child, Longfellow, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Howells. They will be adapted to either sex, and will doubtless be alike appreciated by both.

The Macon Telegraph reports that the first bale of new cotton in that State was brought to market on the twelfth of the current. It weighed 498 pounds, and was to be shipped to Boston.

An Indiana barber attempted to dye a youth's mustache. Result, the total disappearance of the whole ornament. The youth brought a suit against the barber. But the barber's defense, that "the hide wouldn't hold the hair," was conclusive.

M. Laîche, a French inventor, proposes to do away with the nuisance of fresh paint in dwellings by preparing the wood-work with a solution of gelatine, selling the same by the yard, and pasting it on walls like paper-hangings. To prepare it he takes thin fin-foil, usually in glass, forming thus a sheet of gelatine upon which he paints or colors in oil. After drying the surface is varnished, and the foil or film is removed from the glass. When ready for hanging the wall or surface to be decorated is covered with the same water-mixture, the new covering is cut and applied, the flexible foil allowing it to follow all the irregularities of the wall mouldings without cracking the paint film.

One of the most singular cases of insanity known is reported from the Missouri Democrat. A boy only eight years old lost his reason from a blow on the head. Nothing can be learned from him; he declines every thing—in short, he is the ideal of saying no like chimney.

As a Boston merchant declined one of the new fifty-cent currency the other day, remarking to the man who tendered it that he "couldn't come that sort of thing on him," it may not be amiss to mention that the clean-looking "Fifteen Cents" now circulating moderately are genuine, and one may safely take as many as he can get—Greeley.

The Evening Mail gives a detailed account of the swindling ticket-offices of New York. There is a law which makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment for two years, in any persons other than railroad officers to sell railroad tickets, whether their employés, at their proper offices, to sell or issue tickets of passage on their lines, except agents, elsewhere, duly appointed and commissioned by them. Nevertheless, there are over thirty bogus ticket-offices in the city, open and well-known to everybody, whose business it is to plunder unsuspecting strangers, and who do a thriving trade in spite of the police. Frauds and robberies of these miscreants are of every occurrence, but it is a difficult and often an impossible thing for the victim to obtain redress or punishment.

The far-famed "Dexter" was a few days ago driven by Mr. Bonner on the Prospect Pair Grounds in Brooklyn, making the current season time of a mile in 2:17. This is said to be the fastest time ever made to a road wagon. Two years ago Dexter trotted a mile in a single race in 2:19, which was considered, on this fast occasion he carried nearly a hundred pounds more than on the former, proving that he is not losing any of his powers.

A religious impostor, who pretends to be Jesus Christ, has been attracting much attention in Peshad. He has chosen twelve followers, and promises to perform miracles. The Polish peasantry have been full of credulity, and the wily impostor is now turning his success into political capital.

A genuine "clam-bake" is said to be a Rhode Island institution. In a lately published Newport Newport, the special parades of clam-bakes. The first step preparatory to a clam-bake is to dig a hole in the sea-ground; next to build a huge fire upon them. When the stones are as hot as they can be the extinguished coals are raked off, and the stones levelled and piled on the stones. The mass is then covered with sea-weed. Then are cooked the delicious clams in an exceedingly primitive manner, with fingers instead of forks, and a mixture of melted butter and vinegar for a sauce. Hundred-fold quiet on their sharp edges while cooking, remain closed, and thus retain their liquor and flavor.

A Western journal has broken the key of his safe, and can not get his valuables. He advertises for a burglar.

"Hydrotherapia," or the cure of diseases by metals, as practiced by a physician of Paris, is the most astonishing new thing in medicine. The uncertain ache of the rheumatic is to be cast plates of gold, silver, zinc, steel, and silver are placed successively on the skin of the patient, and the rheumatic pain vanishes in a given time—say in two hours—produces the greatest smarting and redness, is chosen as the remedy agent to cure the rheumatism.

The biggest "bite" of the season was obtained by a young lad while fishing in the canal at Cincinnati. He cautiously drew in his line, when he found on the hook a small tin box, which he opened and found to contain $38 in gold, $12 in greenbacks, and two gold pens, worth about $10 each.

The telegraph is making progress—It is being introduced into private houses in the West in connection with a little box which contains a lettered dial with a steel pointer revolving and stopping at the letters of the message. It is much used for calling in the services of the physician.

Fire insurance in Japan is simple but effective. No paid-up capital required. The "Company" consists of the Mikado, who issues one general "policy," which he calls an edict. The chief condition of the policy is, that every person whose house catches fire shall have his head cut off. The losses have been very light.

ALONG THE DOCKS, NEW YORK CITY.—

K CITY—VIEW FROM WEST STREET.

LOOKING BACK.

Turn in the old farm-house
With its deep, rose-tangled porch,
Where hover and rise white butterflies,
And honey-bees hold debauch.
Oh, many a time and oft
In the dear familiar croft,
With a lifted eye to the summer sky
I have followed the lark aloft!
And my heart, my heart, flies back
On the dead years' shadowy track,
And now in a moment, on a loaded waste,
I'm a happy and hot little boy again!

Just such a windless noon
As this, is it not, Jane,
When the scented hay in the meadows lay,
And the locust-trees all in tune,
On the staggering load I, exultant, rode,
And the wain-ropes' wagoner "wo'p" and "wo'd"
Long ago in a buried June!

Days when to breathe was bliss,
Perfect, and free of sense,
No pulse of the heart amiss,
No best of the brain-work wrong:
When care was a word, and love an absurd
Fabrication of story and song.

It is so long ago,
This life of color and light?
Will it not show some after-glow
Ere day dips into the night?
O youth, have ye left me quite?
O years, have ye dimmed my sight?
Lo! the light is shade, and the colors fade
And the day dips into the night.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XLVI.

"FOR NOW WE SEE THROUGH A GLASS DARKLY."

WHEN the old servant next came to ascertain if her mistress required her services, she was struck by the solemn stillness that pervaded this chamber: a stillness unbroken by sigh or wail. On going near the bed she found Douglas lying senseless over the body of the dead. The girl hand twisted in her long fair hair, his cheek resting on the cold hand.

"How is she?" the doctor asked, as he stood in the hall that evening, taking off his hat and gloves preparatory to making his usual visit up stairs. He had asked similar questions for these last forty years, but his wrinkled face saddened when the woman answered—

"She's gone, Sir."

"How, and when?"

We all like to hear the end of a story. From the sportsman, who, from untoward accident, has been prevented seeing the finish of a run, to the Æschulapian who watched his patient's every halt on the road to death.

"Some time this morning. I can't rightly say when, for I was not in the room."

"No further use for me," he said: "I have some distance to go. Good-evening."

"Stop, Sir, stop!" the old woman cried, panting after him to the door of his carriage. "What ever am I to do with him?"

"Him! I suppose you mean Mr. Douglas—he isn't ill, is he?"

"I don't think he is altogether in his right mind," Sally said, looking uneasily toward the open window above. "When I first went into the room, I found him lying at unpleased near the body. My son, Sam, was down stairs, and I got him to come and lift the poor gentleman away, and attend to him while I dressed Miss Azalea for the last time."

"Well, now?"

"Mr. Douglas is sitting by her, and keeps stroking her hand, and talking just as if the poor thing could hear or answer him. I don't feel easy about it, Sir. I wish you'd come and t- him; perhaps you could give him something—or him good."

Dr. Randolph shook his head.

"I fear it's a case beyond me, Goody," he said. "Keep him quiet, but will not all at once heal the wounds he thinks fit to inflict on us; however, I will come."

He entered the house again, and the two ascended the stairs with stealthy steps. The hasty movement or violent sound would have jarred against the deep stillness of those lonely chambers.

They paused at the open door of the room where Azalea lay, and for some minutes stood in silent contemplation of the scene before them.

The time was sunset, and the face of the dead was all aglow with the red light; the fair girlish countenance wore an expression of ineffable peace. The soft, small mouth was partly open, and drooped at the corners. The brows were slightly contracted. Azalea looked to be weary even in death. Her hands had been crossed over her bosom, but one was now displaced; the other lay on her heart as if enforcing the repose it had so long known.

"Azalea, look at me—speak to me—oh, my love! let me hear one word! Were it ever so unkind I could forgive it, just for the pleasure of hearing its sound. Why do you not speak, Azalea? Are you to be voiceless forever? What have I done against you or Heaven that I should be cursed with this horrible silence?"

The speaker was Douglas; the harsh broken voice—the wild anxie ar gue—the living, suffering, mutable face war his. She whom he adjured had lain before him motionless ever since noon, neither stepping to r waking, neither grieved nor wondering at the strangeness of her state, neither hearkening to his plaint nor seeing the misery in his eyes.

The old doctor advanced to Douglas and touched his arm.

The latter looked round with his finger uplifted.

"Hush!" he said; "she must not be disturbed."

"She can not be disturbed," the old man said, gently. "She is dead."

"So they told me this morning." Douglas answered, with a bewildered look in his big gray eyes; "but how can that be?"

Then he lifted up the lifeless hand.

"It is very cold," he murmured; "the fingers will keep clasping as fast as I open them, and they seem, oh, so cold! Will you please feel her pulse?" he added, gravely.

"My Sir," the elder man replied, much distressed, "learn to know and bear the truth; this poor girl's pulse will never beat again."

"Then perhaps you can tell me where she is," the other said. "I do not know where she can have gone. You see she is not here, or she would speak or look at me, instead of lying, her mouth fixed like that, and her eyes always staring the same way. I have fancied that I had made some mistake—that this might be some one else; but these are the lineaments, this is the form that was Azalea's, only the face looks strangely sad, and the hand is shrank. Yet if this were she, it would arise and sing, and pluck flowers in the garden, and I should hear its laugh after off, and the sound of its happy feet."

"Come with me; come away a little while," pleaded Randolph.

"Excuse me, but I can not do that," Douglas answered, courteously. "While there is any doubt about it, I must stay and watch, in case it should move, and ask for me. A little while ago," he added, musingly, "I had no doubt but that it was she; but now I almost question her identity. If it were she, she would certainly answer me when I entreat it so earnestly. She has a passionate nature before she grew ill; but she was never long sullen. Where do you think she is?"

"With God," Dr. Randolph said, reverently.

"You mean in Paradise; but what is she doing there, and what is Paradise? We people it with earthly images, and fancy it a place where fair and angelic musicians, decked with wreaths of amaranth with which

The spirits elect
Bind their resplendent locks, inwreathed with leaves

But surely if the spirits are enshrined in earthly forms, no shape could be fairer than was Azalea's. Why should she change her lovely features here to assume some unfamiliar aspect in Heaven? Why did she not take with her the same face that I so loved? Then I should know to recognize it in the mighty realms of the awakened dead. How shall I know her, if she is naught but a shadowy spirit, with lilies instead of her hair and clouds hiding her dear little feet? If she is in Paradise, doctor, sentient, loving, and lovable as she was on earth, she will not be kinder of them to let her cease from pulling ethereal harp-strings, and from practicing celestial harmony, and long for to breathe down in the words of comfort to me, just to relieve my troubled heart? Oh, Azalea! my darling, be merciful; speak one word to me, and I will forgive the coldness of my soul. It is the uncertainty that maddens me."

"Will you come away, just for a few minutes?" Dr. Randolph said, earnestly.

"Why would I come away?" Douglas asked, fiercely. "What is there I should come for? The problem is here."

"At dead, dreary hour."

"I would rather not go to sleep," shrinking from him, and looking suspiciously at the profound draught. "I would be worse to go to sleep, and forget what she has been to me, the troubles me, doctor, is, that it is all so terribly commanding. Her eyes used to rule with expression, and now they are dim and sightless; her hands used to be so dainty and clever, and now they lie as helpless as if they were made of marble; her feet were so quick, but they have remained in the same place for six long hours." He seized hold of her hand and placed it on his forehead.

"Once when I had a headache," he continued, "you kissed it, your cool lips, and the touch was a heavenly balm which cured me; now your fingers are very heavy. I fear they won't make me well. Why, you are more like the leaden weight which is to drag me down to hell."

"You must drink this!" Dr. Randolph said, authoritatively. "Azalea would wish it."

"If she wishes it, she can't be quite gone away," Douglas muttered. "I'll take it, darling, if it were hell's own fire."

He swallowed the draught, and the old doctor gave a long drawn sigh of relief.

"I will call again in a few hours," he whispered to Sally, "and we will get him to bed if possible."

Then he went down stairs mourning.

"Had it been a woman, we could have wept away half her grief by this time. Being a man, he has ponderous work to brain, poor fellow! I wonder if he'll pull through."

When Douglas was once more left alone with the dead girl he bent over her and whispered in her waxen ear,

"I love you, Azalea, I love you."

And when, after some hours of very slumber, produced by the opiate he had taken, he awoke to find himself in another chamber, he arose, and stepped mechanically to the familiar room where the dead lay, calling,

"Azalea! where are you, Azalea?"

CHAPTER XLVII.

"The rest is silence."—Hamlet.

"It is a dreary hour for her to take her last good-by of Auriel in," Douglas thought, as he looked out of the window on the morning of Azalea's funeral. "Fate has not been kind to her, even on her burial day. I wish my darling could have been carried away in the sunshine."

He saw one or two dark figures looming through the mist in the avenue, and with a shudder he walked up to the coffin and kissed the plank that hid Azalea's face from him.

"I'll be ready to take you away," he said. "They will take me too, my own: I shall be buried with you as surely as though I were lying stiff by your side."

There was no father to bow his face in solemn anguish over the shrouded form, no mother to shed tender grief from the empty room where the dark burden had been carried out, and the dear presence had passed away forever. Only old Sally had placed a few bright flowers in the hands that knew not what they held, and but one token of affection was pressed on her forehead, and that was the last caress Robert Douglas ever gave to any living creature.

A few mourners, among them Jara, save for a few yellow leaves that shone and quivered in the stir of rain and wind; a dark shape carried down the pathway by those who knew how courtesies fell softly on the golden drifts of sodden foliage. Tombstones, dull grey in the wet, and vivid lued moss, that had crept over and obscured the humbler wooden records of the dead. The marble tomb of the Mowbrays, shining white in a small patch of sunlight in the open grave, with fresh scented heaps of earth crushing down the tall grasses by its side, and the low voices of a bareheaded priest, whose prayers were almost inaudible in the sob and rush of the storm. Douglas asked himself was this scene real, or was it a dull hideous dream—was the incubus of which death alone could relieve him?

"He is an old man, that Mr. Douglas. I suppose he has seen a good deal of a father of the deceased," the clergyman remarked to his clerk, when disrobing himself in the vestry.

"He did not look so long ago; he has got shrunk and bent lately. I don't think he's past the prime of life," said the clerk, who was himself about Douglas's age.

"He wishes to remain here alone for a while; you may leave him the keys, Smith. Good-morning." And as the words were darkening, and the rain falling more thickly, the priest and his assistant walked away as soon as possible to the comforts and shelter of home.

"They have gone to their firesides," thought Douglas, as he heard their receding figures disappear in the mist: "they have gone to be welcomed by the laugh of their children and the loving eyes that watch for them; they have their households on the warm side of the earth; with them the day is glad with sound and light; with you, my poor Azalea, it is all darkness and silence; your home is under wet weeds and sodden mould." For the first time since his great despair had come upon him he burst into a passion of weeping, and flinging himself down on the grave sobbed out hot tears and matriculate moans on the heaped-up mound that now was the only symbol of Azalea's presence. "Oh, child!" he cried; "have we parted forever to-day? and is not how and then to be when we meet the only grief? Will your face be transfigured into angel's, Azalea? and shall I distinguish the mortal features I loved so well in the splendor of your glorification? Will it seem but as yesterday that we parted? or shall I run to meet you with the same heart-rapture as when I saw you come forth from your grave now, and said, 'Robert, take me home again; it is cold.'"

"Oh God!" he added, bowing his face on his clasped hands, "make my heart strong with faith; let hope redeem the anguish of this hour. I am sickened with fear. My heart has gone down into the grave with this woman. I dread lest infinite ages should roll on, and I still be severed from her. Let not nonsensuless time and impenetrable silence should intervene between us. Thou knowest, and Thou alone, the last mysteries of the imperishable hereafter. Comfort me, O Lord! Comfort me and give me light!"

CHAPTER XLVIII.

LO! 'TWAS A GALA NIGHT.

DERE HOUSE was the wonder and admiration of Martin Forest for many months after Miss Orme's wedding-day. The windows sparkled with light, and the air was glad with jubilant music. Even the ragged children in the street were infected by the spirit of rejoicing breathed by the festal strains, and they took hands and whirled round and round in the pavement or the couth imitation of the gliding shadows within.

A prettier wedding, a gayer scene, had rarely been witnessed in Brighton," old gossips said, with approving nods of the head.

All the near friends of the family were present; the only absentees were Lord Lady Di Mertoun and Thurstan Mowbray. The day had been cloudless—sun and sky two vast sheets of blue; and in a blaze of sunlight, which harmonized well with the exultance o' the bridal party, Beatrice Orme had passed from her father's door, her fair hair gleaming among clouds of lace-work, which trailed over robes of flowing white, while bare-headed mourners shone like white stars on her head and bosom.

A scent of crushed flowers came from the flowery chaplet, and a glistening light of flowing draperies moved through the dim aisle, a bevy of fair faces were bent in prayer round the altar; and the ceremony having been performed by the bride's uncle with more than usual solemnity and more than usual assistance, the Hon. Amelia Orme had returned to her father's house the Marchioness of Grandacre.

The presents to the bride were magnificent. Had she married a poor man, and really required some substantial proofs of her friends' regard, she would have probably been inundated with kettle-holders, inkstands, and many other varieties of such-like "nice useful things;" but the future possessor of the Grandacre diamonds was not to be insulted by such paltry tributes; her gifts were of the costliest description; and every woman who looked at the superb bridal deflared that Amelia must indeed be happy.

She was very happy, and was the sharpest speech from Ross, who suffered somewhat from envy and its consequent uncharitableness, could ruffle her sister's serenity.

Joy of heart made Amelia amiable and comely. As Marchioness of Grandacre she was pronounced to be beautiful: while Beatrice was fain to remain that ordinary-looking girl, Ross Orme.

Lord Orme looked earnestly after the traveling carriage which bore away the newly-married couple.

"I never saw a better matched pair," he murmured; "nor a handsomer."

"Do you mean the young people?" said Lady Diana, coming up to him to see if any advantage could be taken of his apparently sentimental mood.

"No," he answered, with enthusiasm; "I mean the two grays. I chose them for Grandacre myself. How well they step together!"

All the same, Lord Orme was very proud and happy in his daughter's marriage; and he did honor to the event in one of the sumptuous entertainment given to celebrate the event.

That night, when the festivity was at its height, Lady Diana summoned Lord Orme to her side.

"They are all dancing," she said; "come and talk to me a little. I am tired."

Very lovely in her fatigue Lady Diana looked as she leaned back in her chair; her shoulders displayed to the dazzling relief by the dark crimson back-ground; her eyes half closed, her under lip drooping, and revealing a pearly gleam of teeth.

"You seem to have no handsomer lady," she added, with a significant glance at Ross, who was engaged in an animated conversation with a pretty, fair-haired young nobleman; a mere boy inexperienced and simple to know how to defend himself from the spirited assault the vivacious Ross was making on him.

Lord Orme followed the direction of Lady Diana's eyes, and for an instant looked pleased; then his face clouded over.

"No daughter left!" he repeated mechanically; the echo of her words smote him with pain. Those gay young noblemen in costume of the dancers rose up a pale face, whose questioning eyes seemed to demand, "And where, then, is she?"

"Of what are you thinking?" Lady Di said, gently.

"I was thinking that, should I ever meet in Paradise the two women my life was linked with on earth, her whom I most loved I should have most cause to thank."

"Why?"

"Because, by some strange perversity of my intentions, I have injured her who was dear to me, and exalted her whom I ha—I mean for whom I did not care."

"Lord Orme," Lady Diana said, with sudden energy, "why should you not marry again?"

"Eh! what?"

"And marry me," she concluded, leaning toward him, and trying, with all the power of each expressive feature, to make him feel her beauty. "You are alone—and I am alone; you are no longer a young man—and I have left girlhood far behind me. We are both of us easy tempered; of equal rank and—and circumstances. (Lady Di hesitated a little, remembering her millinet's bill.) I have many friends who love as well as yourself since (here her voice broke) I —lost my poor—Stuart. But that was a long while ago" (recovering herself); "and I am sure that if he could look on me now"—here Lady Di gave an upward glance at the brilliant lustres of; a chandelier—"he would approve my choice."

"But—" began Lord Orme.

"I know what you would say," she interrupted; "you would remember Azalea."

"No, no, Lady Diana, I am only too much flattered; but the honor is so great—I am overwhelmed—and pray will you not take some time to say to sacrifice—" He paused. What could he say? and how could he say it? All the ordinary expressions of astonishment would fail to convey his amount of surprise and perplexity.

It was a man averse to innovations. His first impulse was always to reject any proposition which bore the impress of novelty; he hated change; he was unhappy during the late Lady Orme's lifetime, but he got used to his unhappiness, and was sorely aggrieved when death relieved him of his tyrant. Now he had become accustomed to his liberty, and liked it in a sweet to him. What was he to say to this proposition, which took away from him with its magnitude? Lady Diana had played a bold stroke, but she knew the nature of the man with whom she had to deal. He was honorable, conscientious, tenderminded to judge her harshly if she failed. If she succeeded she should not regret the means she had taken to attain the end.

"If there is but one road to a place, one must take it; and in attacking a man who lives in a continual state of mental ess-say, one's only game is to frighten all the oscillation out of him," she said to herself. Nevertheless, she was feminine after all, and a genuine blush mantled her face when she spoke the words that were to decide all.

Lord Orme walked up and down with hasty nervous steps.

"I am aware that I ought not to hesitate for an instant," he said; "but—"

"It would be odd if you did not," muttered Lady Di, low.

"But I am so unworthy."

"Not so," Lady Diana said, rising and edging toward the conservatory. "Blame me as much as you will, but do not seek to escape—I mean, to evade—the position by self-depreciation; remember, Lord Orme, that by so doing you deprive me of the only excuse I have for my conduct. If any thing could justify my frankness, it would be my conviction and appreciation of your worth."

Lord Orme looked doubtfully toward the conservatory.

It was there Grandacre had proposed to Amelia, and perhaps my lord fancied there might be infection lurking in that sweet, heavily perfumed atmosphere.

"You are too beautiful to throw yourself away; besides—"

"Am I beautiful?" she said, softly; "do you really think me beautiful?" a quiver of joy seemed to run through her voice, her lovely gray eyes dilated with emotion. He was so perturbed to appreciate these delicate signs of tribulation, so she recovered herself; then she pleaded earnestly and calmly, as one man might reason with another.

"I am growing old, Lord Orme, and I dote on the thoughts of a lonely old age. The time comes a season—it is coming to us both—when pleasure turns to pain; when the vigorous grasp of life fails; when infirmities crowd on us in place of the graces of youth; then we wail over our failures, and yet dread their termination. The dark leader-reins are near us, and we shrink away yearning for companionship which may give us courage to face the enemy of life. We call this young and happy to our aid, but they are blinded with the glory of their own strength and joyousness. They rush by us, unheeding our plaint, and not perceiving its cause. When you and I grow older, Lord Orme, would it not be pleasant for us to clasp each other's hands as the darkness gathers? But I forgot—you have children—your fate is happier than mine. When I die there will be a single being who will care to listen for my last words, or—"

Here the feminine element reasserted itself, and Lady Dacre turned away her head and wept, or at least held up a lace handkerchief to her eyes.

Upon my word, this is most extraordinary! I really don't know what to say, Lady Dunn-Pray—pray don't agitate yourself. I am not worth it."

"But your wealth and title are," Lady Di murmured, sotto voce; and then she wept more.

"I tell you what it is," Lord Orme said, desperately; I will—"

"You will?" Then you do not despise me!" Lady Dacre cried excitedly.

"Dear lady," he said, "I am immensely flattered. I was unprepared, of course; but still your proposition has given me unutterable gratification. I am the happiest of men, and I will—" He paused; he looked at her with tenderness. How could he otherwise at such a beautiful face? "You will excuse me for a few moments; my guests require my presence in the supper-room. Believe that I retain your friendship, and have determined that I will—"

"What will you do?" she said, eagerly drawing nearer to him and laying a hand on his arm. "I will think it over." And Lord Orme vanished in the crowd.

Have you ever seen the baffled face of a cat when its intended victim slips from under its feline paw and darts into a sheltering hole in the wall? If so, you may picture Lady Di's expression at this juncture.

Nevertheless, she was not altogether dissatisfied.

"It is half the battle to get him familiarized with the idea," she thought. "I rather like to marry him if only for the personal long enough, far less me? I shall be Lady Orme yet."

"I want to speak to you, Lady Di!" The tone was imperative, such a tone as no man uses to a woman unless words of love have passed between them.

Lady Di looked up and hesitated.

"Where is he?" she said, ignoring the conservatory, which she had been so anxious to enter a few moments previously.

"I know you of the sex by this time to be aware that while no one can make opportunities so quickly as a woman, no one can evade them more dexterously when she cares to desire them," Captain Mowbray said, rather bitterly. "Did I not see you, just now, signifying by look, if not by word, to Lord Orme your wish to find yourself on the fauteuil in the shadow of yonder fern? Come."

He offered his arm, and Lady Diana accepted it with something very like a curse between her rose-pink lips. Your coquette is never very far from hating where she has loved.

Supposing that Lord Orme should return, swayed by his mutable inclinations, and she should find him absent?

"This comes of teaching one's mule how to drive," she murmured, discontentedly. "There must be an end to his: he shall have his final congé to-night."

She sat down in the seat to which Thurston pointed, and he placed himself by her side. For a while there was silence between them, such silence as is sometimes everything and yet means much more bitter than the harshest words.

Lady Di was resolved to give her companion no assistance. She sat still, so still, that a few overripe fuschia blossoms that dropped on to her shoulders rested there; and when he put out his hand toward her own with an entreating gesture, she did not seem to see the movement, for her little wrist never stirred from the fold of the dress where it reposed. Despite her annoyance at her position, she could not help feeling a soft sense of enjoyment in this luxurious atmosphere. The sharp edge of the world was closely excluded from this warm luscious recess, where the vivid hues of tropical plants were subdued by the dim light, and rare fragrance made the slumberous air heavy with sweetness.

"Will you valse?" Lady Diana said, suddenly.

"No."

She was conscious of the gloom in his eyes, of the harsh intonation of his voice, but she affected to perceive neither. The time was gone when she cared either to lull his doubts or soothe his anger.

"They tell me," he said, presently, in a voice that she felt grated sorely against the harmony of the scene, "that you are going to marry that old man."

"What old man?" she answered, indifferently, toying with the feathers on her fan.

"You know whom I mean. You have given me enough pain of heart: do not hurt me with small meanesses. What is the use of humbugging?"

"There is no use," Lady Diana said, quietly. "The old Lord Orme is quite convinced am I that, to be thoroughly comfortable, one should never take the trouble to humbug; it's much easier to be busy, and selfish to tell the truth."

"It can not be true" (leaning over her, and grasping her arm) "that you are going to give yourself to Lord Orme for the sake of his money?"

"Did he tell you so?" Lady Di asked, eagerly, with a vague hope that Lord Orme might have been more explicit to his friend than to herself.

"No; it is you who tell me so," Captain Mowbray said, gloomily. "Your own face is an index to the falseness of your heart. You never threw away your wiles. I was watching you just now, Lady Diana. I am only too well acquainted with the meaning of the various female features can express; but for once I must force the truth from you. Do you or do you not still love me?"

So strong is the force of habit, and so rarely did Lady Diana ever give such questions a definite answer, that she answered mechanically, "Yes." Then she thought better of it, and added, with an outbreak of genuine candor, "I is of no use my nursing any other delusion about myself, Thurston. I believe I love people sometimes, and a little time ago I quite thought I was very fond of you; but now I hate you—"

She hesitated. A glimpse of the young man's wrathful face, gleaming pale in the dusk, checked her for an instant.

"Go on!" he said, savagely: "the truth does not often grace your lips."

"Well, then, I hate no one but myself."

And Lady Diana sank back in her seat with a little sigh of relief. She was rather glad to be found out, and to give an unconstrained vent to disguises had become wearisome to her.

He looked at her for a while in silence; then he came near to her, and took her by the hands.

"You do not love me?"

"No, on my honor, I don't think I do now," Lady Di said, frankly.

"Have you ever loved me?" he repeated, with emphasis. "Are you sure, quite sure?"

"I don't know. I dare say I did, until you began to love me back again, and then it got so uncomfortable—really, I positively was not sure not ask such unpleasant questions, Thurston."

"Then you have sinned simply for vanity's sake?"

She looked uneasily round.

"Do not speak so loudly," she muttered.

"Do you know what the sin of you?" he said, with increased excitement, and tightening his clasp on her hands. "I think that if the Magdalen were living, you would be unworthy to touch the hem of her robe. When the day comes for you to be judged, Lady Diana, I would Lord Christ wrest which walks the street than you—you—"

The next word was whispered in her ear, and perhaps was the hardest word of all that passion had ever listened to during the whole course of her evil, pampered life. He kissed her as he spoke it, and for the kiss there was more contempt than even that bitter word conveyed.

In another instant he was gone, and the sobbing woman and gilt fan-sticks were strangely blended with the harsh echo of that parting word.

Lady Diana looked up pensively at the stars, which flashed through the thick black panes of glass.

"I'll never speak the truth again," she thought; "it had lied, he would still be thinking me an angel."

"Do you think I had better do it?" Lord Orme said, looking rather wistfully at Lady Diana, when, after a short interval, he rejoined her in the conservatory.

His disconnected phrase was perfectly understood by the person to whom it was addressed: but a hovering domestic fancied that he referred to coffee, and forthwith offered him that beverage.

Lord Orme took some, mechanically: but put his hand on the cream-jug when, in the agitation of the moment, Lady Diana filled her own cup.

"That is enough," he said, as he tilted back the creamer with a view to its economy. Then he pondered again.

"I am sure it would be for your happiness and mine," Lady Di murmured, softly.

"Ah, yes; I dare say it might be," was the doubtful response.

Lady Diana's heart began to fill with anger; but she concealed it under the guise of emotion.

"I am very unhappy," she stammered. "I have forfeited your respect, and—"

Here she sobbed, not knowing well what to say next.

"No; no: don't say that," replied the kindhearted nobleman, in distress. "Let it be Yes (if it will make your happiness); no doubt I shall get used to it, and no doubt I shall be very happy. Let it be Yes!" then, Lady Diana.

And, with a deep sigh, he gulped down the rest of his coffee.

Lady Diana dejected and Lady Diana elated were two very different persons. Never was a lowlier or brighter face than that which she turned to Lord Orme now. She caught her breath with a little quick sob of delight as she leaned on his arm, and murmured,

"I am so happy."

The game was won. Defeat would have been disgraceful; but victory brought a thousand honors in its train.

Pacified duns, angry rivals, wealth, comfort—all these luxuries would be secured when she was Lady Orme.

"I wonder if Amelia has got the family diamonds?" she thought.

Then she gave Lord Orme's arm a little squeeze, and said:

"I shall see my friends to-night. Come and dance this quadrille, won't you?"

"Don't tell them until after the quadrille, then," pleaded the other.

And then they went into the dancing-room, and Lady Diana did not tell her friends for the remainder of the night, through the figures of the dance with a little song of triumph in her heart, and the words of the song were—

"I am Lady Orme—Lady Orme!"

Her eyes shone, her lips kept moving into tremulous smiles of delight; her beauty irradiated by joy was almost queerly to-night. The flashing jewels, the showy sweep of her robes, the graceful languor of her movements, all appertained to her, seemed enhanced by the charm of her triumphant loveliness.

Lord Orme watched her with mild satisfaction. He was glad she was fair, as she meant always to live with him. He hoped she wouldn't want to ride—he hated to see women looking about valuable horses; and he should stipulate with her she wasn't to make the tea. Women were so wonderfully spoiled the tea all over the place, deluged it with water, then said it was weak, and rang for more.

And then there was one other thing he determined on. He would fetch Azalea home to live with him; the long dreamed and unsuspected-of event was to be named for at length—

Lady Diana to watch over and protect her, scandal would be in a great measure averted. His new wife could help him to place the neglected girl in her proper sphere. He would no longer be burdened with the sickly feeling of remorse which had haunted him since he rejected the duties of a parent, and cast his own flesh and blood away from the shelter of his love.

"I will have a real home," was the refrain of his thoughts as he walked restlessly through the great salons with Lady Diana on his arm.

"Will I be happy?" she said dear Rose?" Thurston whispered, as they drew near a brilliant group, in which Rosa's sharp eyes and Ross's shrill voice predominated.

It was indelicate of her, this precipitation; she felt that. And, then, she dared not let Lord Orme "sleep it over" without his making his decision public.

"I will have that pleasure myself," Lord Orme said, with a certain grave dignity not unbecoming to him.

He put his hand gently on his daughter's shoulder.

"Rosa," he began, "I have something very agreeable to tell you."

He paused, as a servant drew near to them, and presented him with a letter.

"If your pardon, my lord, a person left this here just now, and was particular about its being delivered to you at once."

Lord Orme glanced at the letter. "Immediate" was written outside; and he stepped quickly up to a small table where candles were burning.

"Pray excuse me," he said to those near him; "but it may be from my stud farm. I will only just look at it."

Rosa and her friends moved away. Lady Diana alone remained near him, furtively watching his face as he read the pencil-traced.

Then she suffered her glance to wander round the richly-appointed rooms; and her little foot beat time with the music as she exulted over the luxuries of her new home.

Look at Lord Orme now: such she is enjoying the dancing, and how devoted her partner seems. Unless I am much mistaken, Lord Orme, you will soon rejoice over the bridal of another daughter.

She turned laughingly toward him, and was about to put her hand on his arm to attract his attention; but when she looked round and saw his countenance, her heart quivered with a great pang of terror.

"What is it?" she cried. "Oh, tell me, what is it?"

Lord Orme did not speak. His face looked shrunk and livid; his eyes were fixed on the paper, which his fingers held with a stiff grasp, like hands that are dead.

The dance music swelled into a frenzy of jubilee: the dancers whirled faster and faster. Rosa and her partner circled near them, in a perfect whirlwind of diaphanous skirts. The girl's eyes were shining with happy excitement. She had forgotten her father she gave him a bright look of recognition, not observing the expression of his face.

"What is it?" Lady Diana reiterated, her alarm increased by a silence which seemed so full of pain.

"It is God's justice, I suppose," Lord Orme said, slowly, his words coming out, with an effort, from his drawn lips—"and my punishment.

Then he put the letter into her hands, and turning away as one who can not endure that his face should be seen, because of its sore trouble, he abruptly left the room.

She looked after him blankly, and then her eyes fell on the letter. It ran as follows:

"MY LORD,—Your daughter Azalea is dead. She died in my presence a week since, and I saw her buried this morning. The only reproach she ever made against you consisted in her not mentioning your name during her last hours.

"Her last words were for me who loved her; but she did not speak of the man who was once dear to her, nor of the father who was as nothing to her.

"Her foster-parent, George Moore, told me before he died, that he believed in his heart that you were married to the dead girl's mother. Whether this be true or false matters little now; for once you were married to her, that might bring her and you in contact, and for the honor of your name and wealth could reanimate my girl into the beauty of life.

"That she should never move again seems to me more wonderful than that she should have ceased to speak: for her heart was dumb even very silent, but her fingers were always restless, and her eyes continually sought the window, as though she expected some active duty that might bring her happiness; but no one came, excepting the old doctor.

"I am, my lord, your obedient servant,

"ROBERT DOUGLAS."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A LADY asked a gentleman how old he was. He replied, "What you do in every thing." What was his age? XL.

"Are you fond of tongue, Sir?" "I was always fond of tongue, Madam, and I like it still."

"Nineteen dresses in three weeks, and she said last night that she could not go to supper because she had not a rag to her back!"

"What did Gerry say?"

"Why, that he could not either; he had no coat to his stomach."

A GRECIAN BEND TRAGEDY.

At midnight in her chamber bone,
While round her form the lamp-light shone
A maiden fair did sadly moan.
She was a girl of mighty pride,
Her breast was heaving wild with passion,
She wore no bustle on her back behind
Because she couldn't catch the fashion.

"I'll do it, sure," the maiden said,
The while with wrath she shook her head,
"And that before I sleep in bed;
I'm bound to have the grecian bend:
No more I'll bear the idle scorning
Of other girls whom Heaven sends
Or break their necks the first fine morning."

But here she ceased, and with a sigh,
At thought she has would buy and cry,
Before the glass with courage high,
I'll fix the night before the noon,
Her lovely form she squirmed and twisted;
But with the duves she'll be "mooned to-morrow,"
And from her efforts vain desisted.

Then pouted on by wounded pride,
Nor knowing where her shame to hide,
In angry mood she left the room,
Yet though it sorely seems too bad,
Her sorrows should be soothing,
Her spectral form, a vision sad,
At midnight with the grecian bend-ing.

Young ladies who ply croquet are known as "maids all for lawn."

"William, my son, how came you to muddy your new boots?"

Willie stopped a moment, then looking his father in the eye, answered, with a sigh,

"Father, what am I made of?"

"Why, Willie, you know, says, 'Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.'"

Well, father, I'll be darned if how can I help being muddy when it rains on me?"

Archie and Tom sparked the same girl. One night Archie called on her and found her alone. After some conversation he burst out with "Miss Mollie, do you think you could leave this comfortable home, kind father and mother, your numerous brothers and sisters, and go to the far West with a young man who has little to offer you but a true heart and willing hands?" Then laid her hand gently on Archie's shoulder, with her eyes about to effect pity, and answered in a low, sweet and soft voice: "Yes, Archie, I think I could." "Well," said Archie, "I'm bound Tom to the Rocky West, and wants to marry. I will meantime it to him."

Her "Photo" album richly bound,
And shining fair with lustrous gold,
I from the table raised and said:
"Is this your album, Miss?"
"Ah, no!" she said, with happy smile,
"We wished to have, you know, all one,
And though devoutly pondered o'er,
We didn't like it Book of Mine."

"Pretty girl, Amanda is." "Ah! is she blonde or brunette?" "Oh, she has her days of both."

"I understand, Mr. Jones, that you said you could turn my thing nearer than any man in this town."

"Yes, Mr. Smith, I said so."

"Well, Mr. Jones, I never like to brag, but there is no man on earth that can turn a thing as well as I can with a lathe."

"Pish, nonsense, Mr. Smith, talk about your whittling—what can you whittle as well as I can turn it?"

"Any thing, every thing, Mr. Jones. Just name the article that I can't whittle, bet you one hundred, and I will give you a V if I don't do it to the satisfaction of the most unwilling purchaser."

"Well, Mr. Smith, suppose we take two grindstones, just for trial; you may whittle and I will turn."

Mr. Smith slid.

"Phil, my jewel," said Pat, "I'm mighty sorry you can't dine with me to-day."

"Indeed, and why can't I dine with you?" said the astonished Phil.

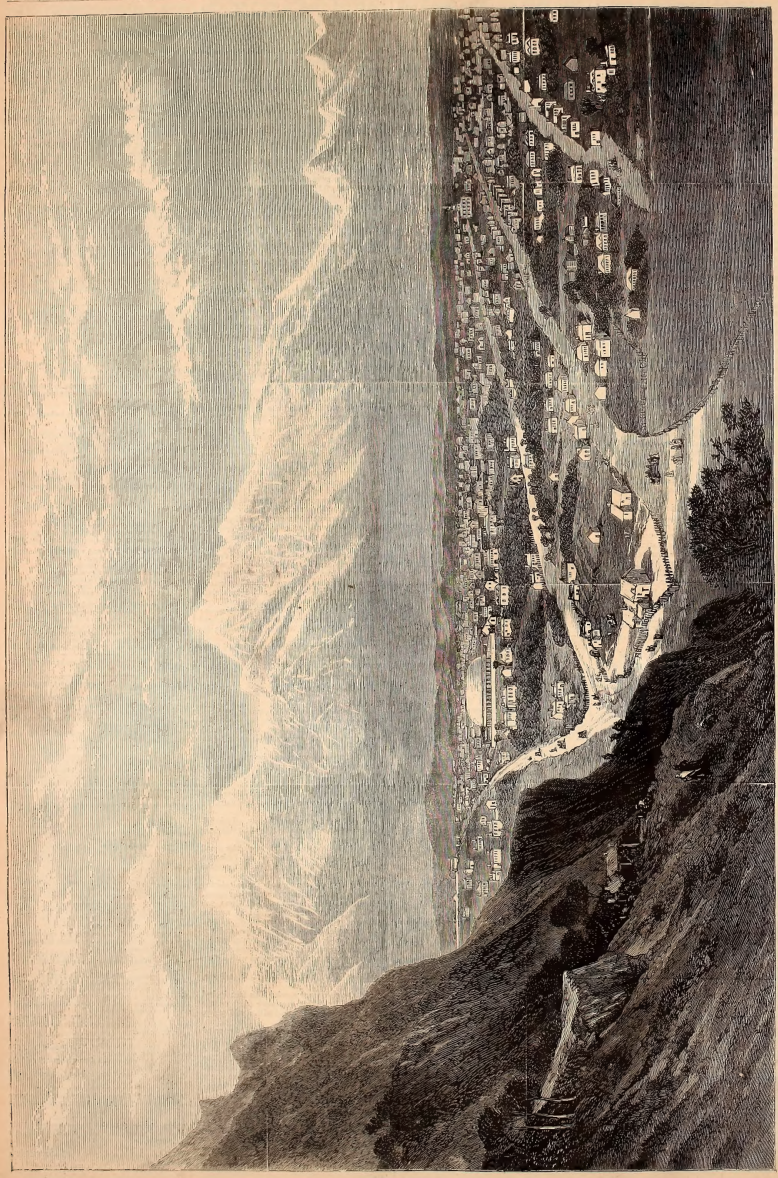
"Because, my dear," returned Pat, "I haven't asked ye as yet."

A man who had been sick away from home wrote back thus: "I am so changed that my oldest creditors would hardly know me!"

The provisions of the new Massachusetts Prohibitory law are so exacting that the Boston police are watching the tumblers in the circus.

The most reflection some young ladies have is in the mirror.

THE BEST DRAWING LESSON.—Drawing a salary.



UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD—SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.—[See Page 573.]

SALT LAKE CITY.

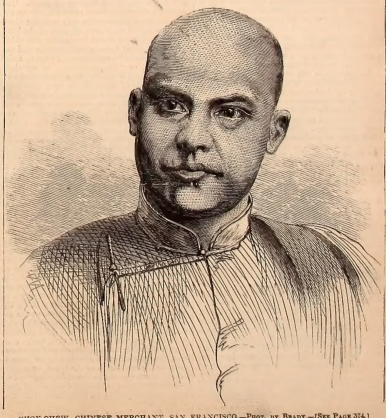
We gave in our last Number illustrations of Omaha, Nebraska, and of a Prairie on Fire, on the line of the Union Pacific Railway. On page 572 we give this week a picture of Salt Lake City. This settlement, situated in the Territory of Utah, was formed by the Mormons, or Latter-Day Saints, after their expulsion from the city of Nauvoo, in Illinois. Their prophet, JOSEPH SMITH, and his brother, were murdered in the jail of Carthage by an armed mob. In the beginning of 1846 the van of the Mormons, under the guidance of BRIGHAM YOUNG, the successor of JOSEPH SMITH, crossed the Mississippi on their journey for the Western wilderness; and, after enduring great privations on their journey, the pioneers reached, in 1847, the spot where they established the city, and in autumn were joined by the main body. During the winter and spring they suffered from famine; but on the arrival of harvest provisions became abundant.

There can be little wonder that the more ignorant of the Mormons, when they first see the "City of the Saints," believe that they have reached the promised land. The city site has been well chosen. It lies in a charming and almost entirely level valley, surrounded by hills and grand mountain peaks, watered by innumerable rivulets. The waters of "City Creek Cañon," divided into innumerable streams, run down every principal street of the city. The roads are wide, and, except in three or four business streets, each house has a large garden, and very frequently an orchard attached to it. Light and graceful trees line each street. The climate of the valley is good; peach and apricot trees are flourishing every where. So calm and tranquil is the course of life in the Mormon capital that the remark of the Shaker to Artemus Ward would seem to be applicable to it, "Here all is peas." And whatever may be said about those peculiar institutions which have made the Mormon religion a by-word and a jest, every visitor is constrained to admit that the industry of his remarkable people has made what was once little else than a barren alkaline desert to "blossom as the rose." Their local government is excellent. Crime, in the full sense of the word, is almost unknown among them, or is confined to the "Gentile" residents. There are but four bar-rooms and one billiard-saloon in Salt Lake City to a population of 27,000—a remarkable fact in this Western country, where there is usually a bar-room to each twenty or so inhabitants. Rapid changes will no doubt follow the progress of civilization in this community, and the completion of the Pacific railroads can hardly fail to inaugurate them.

Our illustration shows the general plan of the city. The Tabernacle, irreverently termed by Gentiles "the great egg-shell," from the form of its roof, is plainly seen in the middle distance. The building will hold 10,000 persons, and 7000 persons can be comfortably seated. It is one vast room, the dome being supported by a Howe truss, resting on stone columns. It possesses the second largest organ in the United States, and has an immense platform, with several desks for the president, the twelve apostles, and others. It is the place of worship for the Mormons of the city; and on every Sabbath they gather there to listen to exhortations often delivered by a dozen speakers. The roof is composed of wooden shingles, which, having turned somewhat gray with age, have the appearance of a dull metallic surface. The "Temple," of which we have heard so much, is a separate building, and its foundations, of granite, only are laid, although the work was begun fifteen years ago. The grand range of the Wasatch Mountains is seen in the distance.

"UNDER A PALM-TREE—WAITING FOR A SAIL."—TENNYSON'S "ENOCH ARDEN."

SING-MAN, CHINESE MERCHANT, SAN FRANCISCO.—PHOT. BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 574.]



CHOY-CHEW, CHINESE MERCHANT, SAN FRANCISCO.—PHOT. BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 574.]

Salt Lake City will be in direct communication with the Pacific Railroad in October next, by the branch line to be known as the Utah Central Railroad.

OUR CHINESE VISITORS.

THE visit of CHOY-CHEW and SING-MAN, the Chinese merchants from San Francisco, who arrived here on the evening of August 11, will further the influences of the recent visit of MR. BURLINGAME and his diplomatic party. It will even more directly promote the friendly commercial relations which it was a main object of the BURLINGAME mission to inaugurate. CHOY-CHEW, in his speech at Chicago on the 6th of August, admirably expressed the sentiments of the more enlightened among the great merchants in the Chinese empire when he said: "China must break away the dust of her antiquity, and, looking across the Pacific, behold and profit by the lessons of the New World." That she has already begun to do this is manifest from the facts stated by him that "steamboat lines have been established in our country, and the telegraph will soon connect us with this wonderful sovereignty, where the people rule, and where every thing proclaims progress and good-will to all." About thirty-eight years ago the Edinburgh Review exposed the falsity of the statements made by those interested in the monopoly of the East India Company as to the anticommercial character of the Chinese. It proved that they were on the contrary highly open to mercial people; that they were, as they still are, the great traders of the Eastern Archipelago; that vast numbers of them were settled at Batavia, Singapore, and other commercial emporia, all actively engaged in trade or in some species of useful industry. The Edinburgh Review predicted even then the growth of that American trade with China which now promises to assume such gratifying proportions, and the prediction in which will be materially helped by the visit of CHOY-CHEW and SING-MAN to our metropolis as representatives of Chinese houses in San Francisco.

These Chinese merchants have been long settled in California, and have practically become American citizens. They speak our language with perfect freedom, and are well acquainted with our country. Of course, they are particularly interested in the schemes lately projected for Chinese emigration to America.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN HEALTH-BOARD.

IN order to learn how to preserve health it is necessary, first, to understand what health is. A not inapt, though somewhat negative, popular description of disease is as a condition in which there is no consciousness of the existence of any organ or member—when we do not feel that we have a heart, a stomach, or any other organ or piece of mechanism within us. Professionally, it has been worded as "a state in which all the functions are exerted with regularity and harmony." A better and more scientific definition, however, would be—a state wherein the nutrition of all the tissues is properly performed, and we put it in language intelligible to the uninitiated —a state wherein every part of the body is repaired as fast as it is wasted.*

All the various textures of which the body is composed are built up of materials of food. No nution, no function can be performed without involving the destruction of some of these cells, and the organs called into play cause such a certain extent incapacitated for action until the worn-out elements are removed, and their place supplied with fresh and appropriate matter. Nutritional destruction and continual repair are the two; sus conditions of our being, and any disturbance of the balance between them more or less disastrous results. When St. Paul professed that he "died daily," his spiritual applied unconsciously a familiar truth of human physiological fact. The manual laborer with every stroke of his hammer or pickaxe commits infinitesimal suicide as regards some particles of muscular molecules; the brain-worker annihilates when he thought a portion of his nerve substance; each throb of the heart, each twitch of grief or laugh of mirth, implies the death of numerous particles of matter. It is evident, therefore, that the two most important pieces of business to be accomplished are, to dispose of these dead particles—to clear away the rubbish, and to incorporate fresh, vigorous ones in their stead. To these two great ends all the complex operations of the different organs are directed. The former—the removal of dead matter—is effected through the agency of the lungs, skin, kidneys, and intestinal canal. To the latter—the process of repair—it is necessary, to use a mercantile phrase, first, that the raw material should be required; second, that it should be converted into the manufactured product; and, third, that it should be sent to a market. These three desiderata are attained by the co-operation of the three grand functions of digestion, respiration, and circulation; the digestive organs being importers and, to a certain extent, manufacturers; the respiratory apparatus putting the finishing touches to the fabric; and the heart acting as wholesale dealer, while the arteries are jobbers of small lots to suit retail customers. The commercial microcosm thus figured is very much like its outside prototype. Under judicious legislation (on the "non-interference principle) affairs go on quite harmoniously, demand and supply are equalized, all classes are fairly represented, taxes are not burdensome, and the "general welfare, and fraternity" are peacefully maintained, the only "national debt" being the "debt of nature." But sometimes should be awarded requisite priority; whether force is a property of matter or matter a property of force—to sketch briefly what it is hoped intelligibly, the main conditions of health; and now, with the reader's permission, we shall point out a few very obvious inferences with regard to the means of fulfilling these conditions.

In the first place, wholesome food is sufficient but not excessive quantity, and containing the requisite proportions of tissue-making and heat-producing materials. Care must be taken at proper intervals. A normal appetite, and the ordinary mixed dietary resources of every household, will generally suffice to meet these two desiderata; but there are two errors frequently committed, against which we wish to give a mild warning. The first of these is the consumption of inordinate amounts of liquids, especially of cold water, during or soon after a meal. By this practice not only is the gastric juice diluted to some extent, but, what is of more consequence, the digestive organs are cooled below their working point; and it is to be borne in mind that the stomach, when called upon for action, must raise its temperature nearly three degrees above the heat of the rest of the body. The other bad habit to which we would call attention is the custom prevalent among business men of the protracted interval between an early breakfast and a late supper by "any thing to stay the stomach" in the middle of the day. Under the deceptive title of "lunch" the most outrageous injunctions are practiced upon the good nature of the internal economy. As though compounds hitherto named cake, or crude atrocities termed by imaginative vendors pie, not uncommonly form the staple of this refection-repast; or to the apple with which crews flesh-forming pabulum, its owner gives a "stone" in the shape of a half-cooked apple-dumpling! If we had our way, all such ill-judged apposés to perverted tastes—all pastry and confectionery of whatever grade—should be abolished by "reconstructive" act of Congress. While appetite lasts it is better to supply it with substantial, nutritive viands; after a longer time has been satisfied the stomach should not be overloaded with superfluous substances which merely tickle the palate.

For the process of respiration pure air, and plenty of it, is needed. With every breath we deprive the atmosphere of a portion of its oxygen, and replace it with a certain amount of carbonic acid. This latter gas always exists in the atmosphere in the proportion of from four to six parts in ten thousand (to an even greater extent in cities); and in addition to this, every pair of human lungs generates and exhales it at the rate of about three cubic feet in twenty-four hours. Now, air containing one per cent. of carbonic acid gas becomes unfit for breathing purposes; and that one man confined in an air-tight apartment of moderate dimensions would before long commit involuntary suicide merely by breathing; and when we add that, besides carbonic acid, a constant elimination of more positively poisonous organic matter is always occurring from the lungs and from the skin, and state the further fact that a cubic in burning roses as much oxygen and gives out as much carbonic acid as an average human being, and that an ordinary gasburner equals eight living adults in this respect, we trust that a homily on the importance of ventilation, or an inferential sermon against crowded hall-rooms and other similar poison vats, may be left to the good sense of the reader.

More especially is the precaution of securing a supply of fresh air to be observed at night, for then the processes of vegetation are reversed, the sunlight lasts plants under its influence possess the property of absorbing carbonic acid and setting free the other oxygen; but after dark they cease to perform this function, and the animal world is left to take care of itself until morning.

To maintain the blood in active circulation no better advice can be given than that conveyed in the old saw: "Keep the head cool by temperance and the feet warm by exercise." Without exercise (limited on the hither side of fatigue) no function can be adequately performed. It is not necessary, however, to adopt a stimulated for newer and better material; by it the blood is called to every portion of the frame, and that equilibrium of temperature produced which we speak of as "the glow of health." In speaking of exercise, however, we do not mean the too often overdone exercise of the gymnasium, where one set of muscles is monstrously distended at the expense of all the rest. Moderate training of this sort is well enough in the absence of outdoor practice; but an exaggerated training is a conclusive evidence of a perfect sanitary condition. Neither do we refer to dancing vehemently at thronged assemblies, where physical and sudorific activity are devitalizing the close atmosphere, and lending it with carbonic acid and organic matter. Under such circumstances exercise merely forces the lungs to contaminate the system by introducing impurities in excess of those already existing in it. A brisk "constitutional" walk, taken regularly in pure open air, and not prolonged to weariness, is all that is required in the way of exercise for most cases. In all cases, however, the amount or the violence of the exertion should be proportioned to the strength of the individual.

To sum up briefly: a good digestion and appropriate food; sound lungs and pure air to fill them withal; an active circulation and regular exercise to keep it in motion—these are the principal requisites of health, and if these be fulfilled by a man's physical condition and habits of life, the less he has to do with pills and potions the better for him.

A. L. C.

* This general definition is, of course, intended to apply to the mature period of life. During infancy and youth, while the process of growth is going on, the supply of material exceeds the waste proportionally. The opposite condition, in old age, when the waste exceeds the supply, indicates a decrease of the vital powers, and is therefore a departure from health.

UNCLE SAM'S REPLY TO THE MULLIGAN ON THE CHINESE QUESTION.

WHY, Pat, you grow, that's what's the row
You're making all the day, Sir?
Let Ki Hi pass, you silly fool—
He'll not be in your way, Sir.
Leave it to me to trot him out,
And show you all his tricks, Sir;
That done with me, you can move off work,
And only carry bricks, Sir.

And you, John Bull, don't strain yourself,
And of Hold Hengland prate, Sir;
For when he comes, depend upon't,
You'll sit in royal state, Sir.
Drink 'arf-and-'arf, and read the news,
And tell us all the figgers—
How, down in Abyssynny there,
You British whipped the niggers.

Monsieur Crapaud, my friend in red,
You need not feel alarmed, Sir;
The glory of the Louvre and Tuileries
Will not the least be harmed, Sir.
Of equal power and equal rights
You yet may see the day, Sir;
But till that period comes round
Let Ki Hi work away, Sir.

And you, my blue-eyed plodding cuz,
Just hauled from the Rhine, Sir,
You'll soon have leisure on your hands
To sing away your time, Sir;
For in the shops on one hand
He'll do your work quite clever,
While you lay off, and treat the wives,
And lager swill forever.

Ha! Sambo—you there—hi, this way!
I want a word with you, Sir;
So come along, my dusky friend,
And bring your banjo too, Sir.
Quick—step it out—and mind it off;
I vow, you're quite amazing—
Now can yourself the rest o' the day,
While Ki Hi does the slaving.

For by Jerusalem I swar,
By all the laws of nations,
He's just the motive pow'r we want
That civil need of nations.
A little rice, a little salt,
And work up to the handle;
To leave each dicker round
Would be a mighty scandal.

So, Ki Hi, bring your spade and pick,
And, while you dig or strike, Sir,
I'll sit and whittle you a pipe
And fix things as I like, Sir.
Then, first, we'll turn the country round—
The fields in level ranging—
And make the Southern end the North
To stop their cussid wrangling.

Next, we might level off the farm
(When you've had time to rally)
And dump the Rocky Mountains down
In Mississippi's valley.
But, first and foremost of the hull,
You bet, I've got the notion,
We'll build a bridge from Cubey hum
Across the Atlantic Ocean.

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty Cents per Box. Mailed for 60c. Sold by druggists. S. G. WELLING, 871 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS

HARPER & BROTHERS'

SPECIAL TRADE SALE,

1869.

FROM AUGUST 16 TO SEPT. 25.

FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK, August, 1869.

We Invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books which will be sold on the following terms, for Cash, from the 16th of August to the 25th of September, after which our terms will positively be as heretofore.

On Orders of $ 300 at one time, 25 per cent. discount;
" $ 500 " 30 " "
" $1000 " 33⅓ " "
" $2000 " 40 " "

And an additional deduction of Five per cent. for Cash.

We shall not sell at any of the Trade Sales this Fall.

The Special List will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

MESSRS. GREELEY, of the Tribune, BRYANT, of the Post, BENNETT, of the Herald, BIGELOW, of the Express, MABLE, of the World, RAYMOND, of the Times, and CHANLER, of the Courier, Portraits, Biographical Sketches are given in the New Annual Publication, "THE AMERICAN PRESS" for 1870. Also, Lucien C. Lorenzo Dow, and Peggy his wife. How to choose a Helpmeet. All for 15 cents. Newsmen have it. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 B'WAY, N. Y.

MOUNT HOPE NURSERIES.
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
(ESTABLISHED 1840.)

GENTLEMEN Improving their grounds, ORCHARDISTS, LANDSCAPE GARDENERS, NURSERYMEN, and DEALERS in Trees, will find our stock of Fruit and Ornamental Trees the largest, and the collection the most extensive and complete in the U. S.

All orders, large or small, will receive prompt and careful attention. Packing for distant points performed in the most perfect and thorough manner.

Small parcels sent by mail when so desired.

Descriptive and Illustrated priced Catalogues sent prepaid on receipt of stamps, as follows:

No. 1.—Fruits, 10c. No. 2.—Ornamental Trees, 10c. No. 3.—Green-Houses, &c. No. 4.—WHOLESALE PRICES.

Address ELLWANGER & BARRY,
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

August, 1869.

MADAME FOY'S
COMBINED
Corset Skirt Supporter and Bustle.

Is just the article needed by every lady who would consult health, comfort, and style. Over 100,000 sold, and often as good as have been sold within the past five years, and the demand for them is constantly increasing.

HARMON, BALDWIN & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers,
New Haven, Conn.

D. B. SANFORD & Co., Boston, Mass.; LEE, ALEXANDER, BEEM, & PHILLIPS, Baltimore; ADAMS & MOORE, Baltimore; KAUFFMAN & BEEM, New York, are our Agents.

VICK'S
Illustrated Catalogue
OF
HYACINTHS, TULIPS, LILIES,
AND OTHER
Hardy Bulbs for Fall Planting,
IS NOW PUBLISHED,
And will be sent free to all who apply.
Address JAMES VICK,
Rochester, New York.

SWEET QUININE. SVAPNIA.

SWEET QUININE is warranted equal—free from acid—to the sulphate (bitter) Quinine, with the important advantage of being sweet instead of bitter.

SVAPNIA is Ocean Perfected of its sickening and poisonous properties. It is the most perfect ANODYNE and SOOTHING OPIATE yet discovered.

Sold by druggists, prescribed by best physicians.

STEARNS, HALL & CO., Chemists, Boston, Mass.

TROY FEMALE SEMINARY.—This Institution offers the accumulated advantages of over 50 years' successful operation. For circulars, apply to JOHN H. WILLARD, Troy, N. Y.

LOSSING'S WAR OF 1812.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With about 1,000 illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete In One Volume, 1094 pages, large 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00 : Sheep, $8 00; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

Mr. Lossing not only writes excellent history, but he collects the material from which that history is made: and we are reminded of Herodotus, who traveled into many lands to obtain the materials from which his immortal work was composed, and whose faithfulness in acquiring knowledge, and accuracy and truthfulness in using his acquisitions, modern research and criticism are pushing beyond all question, and ascertaining that ignorance which would have it that the Father of History was the Father of Lies. Mr. Lossing's industry is equaled only by his conscientiousness, which is saying a great deal of praise. The War of 1812 with the utmost impartiality, and to give all the facts that can be found upon the occasion, will be a novelty in writing about it, for never was the history of an important event in more partisan manner than that of our second conflict with England. * * * The time has arrived when it is possible to write of it with candor as well as with spirit, as Mr. Lossing writes its history; and the fine engravings with which we are beginning to understand its real effect on the country, and it is possible to discuss its character and its consequences in a philosophical manner, as Mr. Lossing discusses them. * * * It is proper that the history of such a contest should be given in a sound manner; and this is the work that Mr. Lossing has placed before his countrymen, after immense exertions to make it as perfect as possible. * * * This story will well appreciate what he has done so thoroughly in a thing of this nature. For young persons who would have correct views of their country's history, no better book can be found. Its authoritativeness, its accuracy, its high tone, and its extraordinary character, render it a fine opening work for youthful readers, whose minds are always injured by the perusal of superficial histories. * * * The engravings are perfectly printed, no European or American book ever having come from the press in a more elegant style. The paper and the binding are faultless. In fact, the book pleases the eye as much as it delights and edifies the mind. It should be in every library, public and private, and in the hands of all persons who would understand American history, and who would acquire accurately thereof from that splendid available source.—Boston Traveller.

This valuable service which Mr. Lossing rendered to the history of the American Revolution he has now repeated, with equally happy results, for the story of our Second War with Great Britain, and we heartily congratulate him upon an achievement which does him no much honor. The value of such labors in the elucidation of history can hardly be overestimated. Mr. Lossing's book has been published in a form worthy of its intrinsic merit.—Tribune.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Removed to 335 Broadway.
THE COLLINS
$15. WATCH FACTORY $20.

The Collins Metal and Jewelry Factory has removed from 37 Nassau Street to their splendid New Factory,

No. 335 BROADWAY.

These superior Watches have now been in use over three years, and give universal satisfaction; and although sold at so moderate a price, are surpassed in style, finish, and time by gold ones costing $100 and $200. They have been greatly improved, but the price remains the same, $15. Those of extra fine finish, $20. Gent's and Ladies' sizes. Also, the richest styles, in every respect equal to the finest gold, at one-tenth the price. We have but

ONE OFFICE, NO AGENTS,

and are not responsible for the bogus and worthless goods sold at cheap jewelry establishments. Our Factory is the ONLY PLACE where the genuine Collins Metal Watches and Jewelry can be had.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.,
No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth Street,
(Up Stairs).

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

The Novelty is the best Press ever invented with which to do your own printing. Sent, with all material to name for the use of General Job Printers.

Price of Presses, $16, $30, $32, $60.

Send to BENJ. O. WOODS, Printer, 101 Federal St., Boston, Mass., for descriptive circular containing list of Presses and parts of Printing Material with specimen of the press, and specimen sheets of Types, Cuts, Borders, &c.

Bromington Nursery,
600 Acres. 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.

Fruit, Ornamental and Nursery stock, large, fine, reliable assortment, very low for cash.

Apples—including most magnificent stock of yearlings: also hardy Northern sorts, such as Duchess, Golden Russet, Bishop Trumbetbull, and other Crab Apples—1, 2, and 3 year.

Peaches, Pears, Cherries, Plums, Quinces, Grapes, Forest and Evergreen Trees, Nursery Stocks, Osage Orange Hedge Plants, Roses, own roots, Paeonies, Rhododendrons, Iris, Spirlla, Lilies, Specimens, Asparagus, &c.

Also superior colored plates of Fruits and Flowers. Send 10 cents for Catalogues.

F. K. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

Choirs are delighted with it!
THE CHORAL TRIBUTE.
By L. O. EMERSON, Author of "HARP OF JUDAH," "JUBILATE," &c.

Universally recognized to be the best book of Church Music issued during the year. Also, equally commanding the author's previous works. Price $1 50; $13 50 per dozen. Specimen pages sent free.

O. DITSON & CO., Boston;
C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even Judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

These watches are now well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

Price now $15 00.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of

Goods sent by Express, C. O. D., with charges
Address C. JEROME EDWARDS, Willimantic, Conn.
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

Good Boys like Excellence better than Showy Imperfection concerning RIVERVIEW MILITARY ACADEMY,
POUGHKEEPSIE, N.Y.

A wide-awake, thorough-going School for Boys wishing to be THOROUGH MEN. Send for Circular. For West Point or the Naval Academy.

A. M. SCHAUFFLER, A.M., Principal.

AGENTS WANTED Local and Traveling for the New American Patent Hand Vegetable Chopper. The best thing in the market, without a rival. For Use of Families, Terms, &c., address D. A. NEWTON & CO.,
36 Cortlandt Street, N.Y.

PARLOR STEAM ENGINE: made entirely of Metal; Boiler will not explode; will do work for hours if supplied with water, &c.: free from danger; a child can run it. Price, $5 00. For directions, for $1 00; three for $2 50. Address
WALTER HOLT, New Haven, Conn.

DO IT NOW.—Don't delay, but send 35 cents at once and receive MAPLE LEAVES for twelve months. It is the cheapest, best, and most popular Monthly published. Specimen copies sent on receipt of 10 cents.

O. A. ROCKBACH, No. 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

A LADY who has been cured of great nervous debility, after suffering for many years, desires to make known to all fellow-sufferers the sure means of relief. Address, enclosing a stamp, MRS. M. MILLER, P. O. Box 5063, Boston, Mass., and the prescription will be sent free of charge.

ALL that is required of SASH FASTENERS, A Walker's Patent will do. They never get out of order. $3 per doz.—FELIX WALKER & CO., at Whitlock Exposition, 35 Park Place, N. Y.

WANTED—Agents every where.—Best chance ever offered. Address A. T. WELLS & CO., 82 Smithfield Street, Pittsburgh, Pa. This is legitimate business.

$9 A DAY FOR ALL. Address
A. J. FULLAM, 600 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE or WEEKLY, 20 cents for the WEEKLY at 10 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly in advance. When sent to Canada, 20 cents extra for the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with the amount of U. S. postage, or 20 cents for the MAGAZINE or WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the first number after the receipt of his order.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which the subscription will expire. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it may be replaced without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When a change of address is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250 : Half Page, $125 ; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Back Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Have just Published:

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With about 1,000 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete In One Volume, 1094 pages, large 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00 ; Sheep, $8 00 ; Full Roan, $9 00 ; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

THE SEVEN CHAMPIONS OF LONDON. By JAMES GREENWOOD, the "Amateur Casual," and "One of Them." With Illustrations by Little Ragamuffin, "Reuben Davidger," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

FAMOUS LONDON MERCHANTS. A Book for Boys. By H. R. FOX BOURNE. With Portrait of George Peabody and 54 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

SIGHTS AND SENSATIONS IN FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND; or, Experiences of an American Journalist in Europe. By EDWARD CROMMELIN. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SANDS'S PHILOSOPHY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, the Pupil, the School. By NATHANIEL SANDS. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Recital and Considerations of the Country Life, and a Curse as Involved in American Farming, with much Valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Homes in the Country. By HENRY STEWART BROOKS, Jr. Illustrated, With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

A PARSER AND ANALYZER FOR BEGINNERS, With Diagrams and Progressive Pictures. By FRANCIS A. MARSH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, and Lecturer on the Philosophical Study of the English Language and the Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language. &c. 16mo, Cloth, 60 cents.

RHETORIC: a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Colleges, and for Private Study. By Rev. R. G. HAVES, D.D., LL.D., President of the University of Mississippi. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: the Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Author of "Travels on the Amazon," &c. With Two Maps and Fifty-two Illustrations on Wood. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By GEORGE C. SCOTT. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

THREE SEASONS IN EUROPEAN VINEYARDS. Treating of Vine-Culture; Vine Disease and its Remedy; Wine-Making, Reds and White; Wine-Drinking as affecting Health and Morals. By A. P. HALLAM. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through England, Belgium, Germany, Australia, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Sweden, Spain, and Portugal, including Ireland. With a Small Map and corrected up to June, 1869. By WILLIAMSON PATTISON. Revised Edition: Eighth Year. Large 16mo, Limp, with Pocket-Book Form, $7 00.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversation in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Systematic Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. PETTENGEL, Professor of Modern Languages in Hamilton University. With copious and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

The New Novels
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

META'S FAITH. A Novel. By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c. Paper, 75 cents.

FALSE COLORS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HETTY. By HENRY KINGSLEY. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. 8vo, Paper, $1 00.

STRETTON. A Novel. By HENRY KINGSLEY. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

CORD AND CREESE. By the Author of "The Initials," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE DODGE CLUB; or, Italy in 1869. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "Cord and Creese." With 100 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.

"HAGBART'S NOVELS."

New Editions, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.

HAGBART. 12mo, Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.

THE VIRGINIANS. 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE NEWCOMES. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 64 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will publish immediately New Editions of Thackeray's other Novels, Illustrated with Original Designs, uniform in price.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

The following are published by Charles Reade's other Novels.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S LAST NOVELS:

PHINEAS FINN, the Irish Member. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, $1 25 ; Cloth, $1 75.

HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Complete. With 64 Illustrations by Marcus Stone. 8vo, Paper, $1 00 ; Cloth, $1 50. Published by Charles Reade's other Novels.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THE CHINESE PUZZLE.

THE FISHERMAN (ALIAS UNCLE SAM) AND THE GENIE.

"The Genie, slowly rolling himself out of the box in the form of vapor, soon assumed his proper proportions. The Fisherman stood aghast on beholding the gigantic size of the demon he had liberated."—Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

A Seven per Cent. GOLD LOAN.

$6,500,000.

The Kansas Pacific Railway, now in successful operation from Kansas City to Sheridan, proposes to build an extension to Denver, Colorado. The Government has granted Three Millions of Acres of the finest lands in Kansas and Colorado, which are mortgaged for the security of a loan of $6,500,000.

This loan is secured in the most effectual manner. It represents a road in profitable operation, and will open the trade of the Rocky Mountain Country, and connect it with the great markets of the East. It is considered to be one of the best loans in the market.

EVEN BETTER IN SOME RESPECTS THAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

The loan has thirty years to run, principal and interest payable in gold, semi-annually, seven per cent. The coupons will be payable semi-annually in either Frankfort, London, or New York, and will be free from Government taxation. The bonds for the present are sold in currency at 95, with accrued interest.

Circulars, maps, and pamphlets sent on application.

DABNEY, MORGAN, & CO.,
53 Exchange Place, N.Y.
M. K. JESUP & CO.,
12 Pine Street, N.Y.

SAPONIO will make Tins resemble Silver. Use only SAPONIO to clean White Paint. From Marble SAPONIO removes all Stains. For polishing Knives SAPONIO is unsurpassed. For cleaning Brass Stair-Rods SAPONIO has no equal. If you would have clean windows, use SAPONIO. Sample cake sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents. Enoch Morgan's Sons, 211 Washington St., N.Y. Scaps of the finest kinds for family use. Established 1809.

STEVENS' POCKET RIFLE.

With Detachable Shoulder-Rest.

Most popular arm made for Sporting and Target-Shooting. SMITH & WESSON'S REVOLVERS, in any quantity, for cash, at hundred price. WILLIAMSON'S DERRINGERS, and other Pistols.
J. W. STOBBS & CO., M'f'r's Agents,
232 Broadway, New York.

FOUNTAIN PENS. One dip writes 4 pages. $1 50 a gross, postpaid.—Penknife and Pencil combined.—Eraser and Pen-Holder combined, and 12 Fountain Pens, 50 cents, postpaid. Sell at sight. AGENTS WANTED. CITY NOVELTY CO., 464 Library St., Philadelphia, Pa.

PRETTY WOMEN.—A comparatively few ladies monopolize the beauty as well as the attention of society. This ought not to be so, but it is; and will be while men are foolish, and single out pretty faces for companions.

This can all be changed by using HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM, which gives the bloom of youth and a refined, sparkling beauty to the complexion, pleasing, powerful, and natural.

No lady need complain of a red, tanned, freckled, or rustic complexion who will invest 75 cents in HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM. Its effects are truly wonderful.

To preserve and dress the Hair use LYON'S KATHAIRON.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French patents, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY, DURABILITY, and CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
Wallingford, Conn.

Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N. Y.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties by nearly every Steamer. Fine Supply of Fancy Goods, Swiss Carved Goods, Fine Gold and Silver Watches. M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 BROADWAY, N.Y.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.

MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages. OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages. MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp. PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages. JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HENRIETTA, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRIPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; RUSCHER BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MRS. C. BURNS, Pittsburg, Pa.; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; CLEVELY & SONS, Albany and Troy, N.Y.; J. T. HAMMICK, Rhinebeck, N.Y.; J. H. HOUTERMEYER, Ithaca, N.Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; C. M. MEACH, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.

IVORIDE

KNIFE-HANDLES.

EQUAL IN

BEAUTY and DURABILITY

TO THE GENUINE

IVORY,

AND AT

HALF THE PRICE.

This material is guaranteed to resist the action of heat and cold, whether of water or of the atmosphere.

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS.

J. Russell & Co.,
Green River Cutlery Works,
83 BEEKMAN STREET, New York City.

7 per Cent. Gold Bonds,

COUPON OR REGISTERED,

FREE OF GOVERNMENT TAX,

SECURED BY FIRST MORTGAGE ON THE

NEW YORK & OSWEGO MIDLAND RAILROAD, and by the additional guarantee of a paid-up capital of six millions of dollars.

Issue limited to $20,000 per mile of road actually built and in running order.

The road is in course of thorough and rapid construction: 160 miles will be completed by the 1st of October next, and the entire line, it is believed, by the end of the ensuing year.

The admirable selection of the route for commanding both local and through business can not fail to make it one of the best-paying railroads in the country.

These choice securities are meeting with rapid sale at par and accrued interest in currency, at which price they are still offered.

For further particulars apply to

GEORGE OPDYKE & CO., Bankers,
No. 25 Nassau Street,
New York City.

URIAN'S HAIR GLOSS AND CURLING FLUID is infinitely superior to any other dressing for the hair ever offered to the public. It is guaranteed to be perfectly harmless, and will produce the most attractive curls in hair that has a natural tendency to curl. Price 50c. Sold at JOHN F. HENRY'S United States Medicine Warehouse, No. 8 COLLEGE PLACE, New York.

TO SPORTSMEN!!

A very superior selection of fine Breech-Loading SHOT-GUNS, RIFLES, and PISTOLS, of our own Manufacture and Importation. FISHING TACKLE, POCKET CUTLERY, and Sportsmen's Articles. Sole Agents for W. R. PAPE'S Celebrated Muzzle and Breech Loaders.

MERWIN & HULBERT,
Circulars supplied. 76 Broadway, N. Y.

POLLAK & SON, Manufr's of Genuine Meerschaum goods. Stores: 519 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 37 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 3546. Repairing and Boiling also done.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES to Agents, to introduce the Wilson Sewing Machine. Stitch alike on both sides. Samples on two weeks' trial. Extra inducements to experienced canvassing agents. Address either of the WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO., Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or Detroit, Mich.

FISHERMEN! TWINES and NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,

☞ Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

Agents wanted. Knits every thing. Send to office, 176 Broadway, for Circulars.

GOING UP TOWN!

On the 15th of August we removed to

747 BROADWAY, near 8th St.,

and now offer our present stock of

CHINA, GLASS, AND FANCY GOODS

at very low prices.

Davis Collamore & Co.,
479 Broadway, near Broome St.

WE PUT GENUINE WALTHAM Watches into the hands of purchasers in any state, territory, town, village, or frontier settlement, at the lowest New York wholesale prices. The Express Companies take them from us and deliver them to the customers in any part of the Union, however remote. The package can be opened, and the watch examined, and not till then is the purchaser required to pay for it; and if on examination it is not satisfactory, there is no obligation to receive it. Our descriptive and illustrated Price-List gives full information in regard to the watches, and our plan of sending them by express. Every one should have a copy. We send it postpaid on application; no return stamps required. When you write, please state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly.

HOWARD & CO., Jewelers and Silversmiths,
No. 619 Broadway, New York.

Scrofula Cured by Brandreth's Pills.

Brandreth's Pills penetrate the whole mass of blood, causing the expulsion of impurities. The body feels relieved from a single dose; what then may be expected from twenty? By continuing their use, the whole of the blood in time becomes purified, and the body reconstructed from good material, and a new lease of life secured.

SING SING, March 23, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR,—My daughter Alice, thirteen years old, has been completely cured of that horrible disease, Scrofula, which for years rendered life a torment; after all medicines and many physicians had been tried and failed, I commenced giving her your pills. She took them almost every day for three months, constantly improving. She has now entirely recovered. Yours truly,
DANIEL LUTHER.

HON. B. BRANDRETH.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

What will it do? is the first inquiry the sick make on purchasing a medicine. Suppose TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT is the subject of the interrogatory. Answer: Simply this reply. It will relieve and cure headache, nausea, flatulence, nervousness, costiveness, debility, biliousness, and indigestion.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS EVERY WHERE.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK OF FOREIGN TRAVEL.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1869. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Revised Edition: Eighth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a new and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 4to, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 663.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

PRINCE ARTHUR IN AMERICA.

PRINCE ARTHUR, the seventh child and third son of Queen VICTORIA, arrived in Halifax, from England, August 22, in the steamship City of Paris. The passage from Queenstown was made in six days and eleven and one-half hours—the shortest trip ever made between those two ports.

PRINCE ARTHUR is a pleasantly appearing young gentleman of thirteen. He is named after ARTHUR WELLESLEY, the Duke of Wellington. Our readers will be interested in the portrait which we publish on this page. The Prince is an officer in the British army. He is of nearly the same age that the Prince of Wales was when he visited America nine years ago. All three of the Queen's sons have been extensive travelers. They have thus become acquainted with the ways of the world, and therefore better fitted to occupy the position assigned them in social life, and as the possible rulers of a great nation.

SHERMAN STATION.

SHERMAN, Wyoming Territory, is the highest point attained by the Pacific Railway on its whole course from ocean to ocean. Fifteen months ago nothing but bare hills and crags marked the spot. Now there is a little town, containing a large machine-shop, a "Wells Fargo's express office," newspaper shops, and even a millinery store. Its two hotels, of course, are of a rough kind, but good meals are to be obtained in them. Our illustration of Sherman is the first that has been published of the place in this country. Wyoming is to include parts of Dacotah, Utah, Colorado, etc. The embryo town of Sherman is 8262 feet above the sea, yet the ascent to it from the Missouri River, a distance of 549 miles, is made with the greatest ease. The grades never exceed 90 feet to the mile, while for the larger part of the distance it is not over 30 feet to the mile.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACE.

IN the contest between the Harvard and the Oxford crews, August 27, the latter won the victory. The race began at 14 minutes 6½ seconds after 5 o'clock, and lasted 22 minutes and 40½ seconds. The Oxford crew won by six seconds. It would give us the greatest pleasure, of course, to be able to announce a different result. But next to the pleasure of claiming a victory is that of yielding the prize to our rival.

But though we have to chronicle a defeat for the Harvard crew, it is not a disgraceful defeat. The gain of less than two boat-lengths 6½ seconds and one-quarter miles—or, if we consider time, the gain of six seconds in thirteen hundred and sixty and a half seconds, while sufficiently deciding the contest, affords no basis for extravagant exultation on the part of the victors.

The Harvards had the choice of position, and they took the outside of the semicircle. The boats started at 5 o'clock 14 minutes 6½ seconds P.M. The Harvards gained the lead from the start, and kept it until passing "Chiswick Ait," two and a half miles from the starting-point. From this stage onward the Oxfords gained.

We had before the race made arrangements to give the best possible illustrations of so interesting an event. We accordingly had selected views of the most critical points along the Thames between Putney and Mortlake. Two of these views—Hammersmith Bridge and Chiswick—we give on page 969.

The boats have been put in to correspond to the telegraphic account, which was received in New York several hours before the time (in London) set for the race.

The Harvard crew used the ELKTON boat, which they had brought with them from America. So that the rivalry was not simply one between two crews and two distinctive styles of rowing, but also between the boats used.

At all the principal points along the river, from the starting-point to the goal—at Putney, Hammersmith, Chiswick, Barnes, and Mortlake—the banks were lined with spectators, wearing either the Oxford or the Harvard colors. It is believed that no crowd so immense ever before gathered on the banks of the Thames.

We gave last week portraits of both the Oxford and Harvard crews. The crews, as we gave them, were those that contested the race. FAY and LYMAN remained as substitutes for BASS and RICE in the Harvard crew.

We will not be so ungracious as to add any thing to excuse our defeat, or expatiate upon the disadvantages under which the Harvard crew labored. A better knowledge of the Thames, or the adoption of their own style of rowing without a coxswain, might have changed the result. So also might any one, probably, of one hundred things that might be mentioned. We were beaten, and acknowledge our defeat.

The first telegraphic dispatches indicated that the Oxford crew reached Mortlake three or four boat-lengths ahead. But a later dispatch informs us that the judge at Mortlake decides that the actual difference was but one length and a half. The time of the race, according to the Tribune correspondent, was 22 minutes 59½ seconds, as taken by FRODSHAM'S chronograph, registering fifths of seconds. The Oxford crew were in perfect condition, and after the race they rowed back to Putney, keeping pace with the Press steamer.

After the race the two crews dined at Mortlake with Mr. PHILLIPS, who had invited a large party to meet them. During the dinner the Oxford men, in their speeches, said that the race was, if not the hardest, at least as hard, as any they had ever contested, and praised the pluck and work of the Harvard men.

The London Times, in its comments, said that the Harvards failed in a most pardonable point —the steering; but added, that the ground lost by the coxswain was not enough to account for the distance between the boats at the end of the race.

The race was well contested, and the Harvard crew met with perfectly fair play. Were the Oxford men to repeat the contest on American waters they would meet with a similar reception.

PRINCE ARTHUR, OF ENGLAND.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY W. NOTMAN, MONTREAL.]

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD—SHERMAN STATION, WYOMING TERRITORY.

DROUGHT.

THE sun uprises, large and red,
The dawn is lost in a sultry glow;
Like a furnace roof is the heaven o'erhead,
Like tinder the thirsty earth below;
Hushed is the grateful voice of streams,
The famished fountains and brooks are dry;
And day by day do the burning beams
Pour from the pitiless sky.

All things languish and fade and pine;
Buds are withered before they bloom;
The blighted leaves of the window-vine
Chase each other about the room;
Vapors gather, then melt in light;
Rain-clouds promise, then burn away;
And all hearts faint as the sultry night
Follows the sultry day.

Sadly adown the orchard lines
The apples shrivel and shrink and fall;
The scanty clusters among the vines
Wilt, half-ripe, on the scorching wall;
The peaches perish before their prime,
The trim espaliers are bare and lorn;
Dry and dead, as in winter time,
Stand the ranks of the cutting corn.

No longer the cool and gurgling songs
Of warblers freshen the lifeless air;
The simmering noise of the insect throngs
Sounds incessantly every where;
The ringing rasp of the locust tones
Piercing the sense like a wedge of sound;
The wasp from his nest in the gable hums,
And the cricket shrills from the ground.

The hard dry grasshopper, sought by all,
Grates the ugliest and thinks he sings;
The castanets of the katydid
Chime with the rattle of sharded wings;
Blundering, booming, the beetles pass,
While bats flit silent as daylight dies;
And loud in the tangles of seedy grass
The peevish cat-bird cries.

Open-billed, with his wings a-droop,
The worn sun slinks, and sinks on more
The half-built nest in the sunny stoop,
Or the children's crumbs by the open door;
Resting with dead and brittle stalks
The paths of the garden are thick with dust;
And the rows of flower-beds down the walks
Are baked to an ashy crust.

Parched to blackness the roses die,
Robbed of sweetness and form and hue;
Vainly the languid butterfly
Seeks as of old, their garnered dew;
Vain the humming-bird's sweet pursuit;
The honey-bee's quest is sped or crowned;
Happy the mole that gnaws a root
In his cool nest underground!

The fading foliage of waiting woods,
The fields all barren and bare and brown,
The city's suffering multitudes,
The parching roofs of the thirsty town,
The herds which snuff at the yellow grass,
The leaves which open their palms in vain,
The sea that mirrors a sky like brass—
All these do pray for rain.

FLORENCE PERCY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1869.

A LAUGHING POLITICAL PHILOSOPHER.

THE action of the late Democratic Convention in Massachusetts is but another proof that the party has no common principle, except opposition to the Republicans, and no national policy whatever to propose. In Virginia and Tennessee the Democrats vote for negro suffrage; in Pennsylvania they denounce it. In Ohio they demand that the bonds shall be paid in greenbacks; in Iowa that they upon the strict letter of the contract. In California they declare for a white man's government, and in Massachusetts they acquiesce in results. With the Republicans they entirely agree. Indeed, whatever may be said of the Republican party, however justly it may be reproached for the unworthy members who always follow success, and for such faults of administration as can be fairly charged upon it, it is scarcely reasonable to suppose that the public welfare would be promoted by the success of an opposition which has no common principle or policy.

The Democratic candidates further illustrate the condition of the party. In Pennsylvania the banner-bearer is Mr. ASA PACKER, a gentleman of whom it is actually impossible to say any thing but that he is very rich, and belongs to the Bourbon wing of the party. In Ohio, Mr. PENDLETON is a gentleman of education and ability, an original Secessionist, and the representative of the repudiating policy in finance. In Massachusetts, Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS is a gentleman also of education and ability, who can not conceal his sense of the extreme comedy of his position; a laughing Republican of yesterday, the Democratic guide, philosopher, and friend of to-day. A steady Republican and earnest supporter of the war, Mr. ADAMS differed with his party upon the policy of reconstruction; and with no respect for the Democratic party, or faith in its doctrines, but apparently supposing that not to approve the Republican policy is necessarily to become a Democrat, upon the principle that what is not white must be black, he suddenly makes his bow as "the rising young Democratic statesman of New England," telling his followers that if they would win the battle their arms must have new locks, stocks, and barrels.

The situation is evidently as amusing to Mr. ADAMS as to every body else. It is as if four excellent and honorable friend, Mr. WOODBURY, the late Lieutenant-Governor of New York, should suddenly appear as the chief sachem of Tammany, directing the serene Mr. TILDEN and his fellow-statesmen, SWEENEY, PETERS, and HALL, what they must do to be saved. To complete the entertainment at the Massachusetts Convention, Mr. WOODBURY, the President, announced that the Democratic party, the party of JAMES M. MASON, JEFFERSON DAVIS, and WADE HAMPTON, the party whose chief leaders fought desperately to overthrow the government in order to perpetuate and extend human slavery, "had always battled for human rights." No one enjoys a joke more than Mr. ADAMS, and no one fancy the smile upon his face as he listened to this daring flight, just as he was about to begin his own speech by telling his new pupils that they must blot their record as fast as possible.

Mr. ADAMS's vote will probably be larger in proportion than usual because of the prohibitory amendment. In his speech he avoided meeting this question fairly; and the best part of his remarks was the shrewd satire upon the vituperative style of the temperance advocates. Mr. ADAMS said that the prohibitory law is an invasion of personal liberty; but whether it be not one of the legitimate invasions of that liberty for the common welfare, which is the ground upon which its friends place its justification, he did not say, but,

"Smiling, put the question by."

There is no doubt, however, that the laughing Republican gave the Democratic party very sound advice. If it would succeed, it must stop talking about its battling for human rights to a generation which has won the victory of human rights in the teeth of Democratic hisses and Democratic bullets. It must prove its honorable acceptance of the situation. It must present some policy that will lighten the financial burden of the nation more speedily. It must eradicate its inhuman and bloody traditions from the memory of the American people; and it must cease to attract to its support the ignorant and the vicious. When it has done all these things, and in consequence nominates cheerful Republicans like Mr. ADAMS, the Democratic party may reasonably expect some favor from the country.

IS CUBA IN THE MARKET?

"RELIABLE authority" is very busy with the Cuban question, and the English and French papers are disclaiming on behalf of the jealousy of the new bond which may be formed between Cuba and the United States. Meanwhile the Albany Argus naively suggests that independence is one thing and annexation another. How different is evident from the unanimous resolution of the revolutionary Congress at Simbaron on the 13th of April, General CESPEDES presiding, that Cuba is fighting for independence of Spain and annexation to the United States. The most persistent and really interested workers for the Cuban cause in this country aim at annexation through independence. The proposal of the purchase of the island is transparent. The mortgage of Cuban bonds is merely the form of a mortgage. If any such arrangement as is spoken of were made with Spain, does any body suppose the interest would be paid by Cuba? We should be the guarantee, and to whom and to what should we look for reimbursement? General CESPEDES, who is the Revolutionary chief, desires for annexation, and the leaders unanimously approve. Does that look like an independent Cuba? If the proposition has been made to the Spanish Government by more than Cuba, and Cuba for a certain sum, it is merely an offer of the United States to buy the island for that precise price.

How much, then, is the United States to pay for Cuba and Porto Rico? What advantage will it be to this country to acquire two millions of a foreign race speaking a foreign tongue, a third of whom are slaves just emancipated? Will such an increase be cheap at ten millions of dollars? Is it necessarily an advantage to a nation to acquire a tropical state which seeks the Union because it is unable to govern itself? These are inevitable questions, although the annexation may be no less inevitable. It is undeniable that the hold of Spain upon her colony is so relaxed that it can hardly again be established. Six months ago one of the shrewdest and most conservative of European diplomatists said that Spain had lost Cuba. La France, a French journal, says that the sale is the only way for Spain to save some fragments of the wreck. The colonial tenure is an inevitable question to every political student who is considering, and the disturbances in Spain will gradually develop a party of separation there. There is as yet, however, as we write, no authentic account either of a proposal from the United States or of its consideration by Spain; and until something is known, it must be conceded to be extremely doubtful whether Spain is likely to renounce her traditions, and consequently whether the Cuban revolution will not, like the South American revolt of fifty years ago, smolder indefinitely before we should interfere.

If the United States should offer to mediate and the offer were rejected, public opinion would undoubtedly demand that that belligerent rights should be conceded to the Cubans, followed in due time by recognition. If the offer were accepted, and a sale proposed upon the terms already published, which would not be agreeable to Spain, the result would be the same. If the terms were agreeable, however, we should virtually buy Cuba. If not, the recognition of Cuban belligerence or independence would naturally occasion complications which would lead to war, a result in every way undesirable for us, but in no way in which we should be the vulnerable combatant. It is in this view that the policy of the Administration has been so pacific. It has restrained from choosing that time to insult Spain in which Spain most appealed to the sympathy of all generous hearts, but a time in which also the power of Spain was evident. And in the spirit of that policy the Administration should persevere. Neither deluding Cuba nor defying Spain, consumers that there is no general interest in the country upon the subject, and that the acquisition of the island is not an advantage, however unavoidable, we trust that the Administration will firmly respect the law of the American traditions, and to justify American good faith and sagacity.

EAST INDIAN COTTON

THAT English manufacturers should feel and express a lively interest in the quantity and quality of the great staple received from the British empire in the East is natural enough, and that we in this side of the Atlantic should attentively observe the extraordinary efforts which the government of India is making to increase the cotton export is not surprising. There are, however, other and far facts which are apt to be overlooked by those writing of the probable effects on American industry of the success or failure of the East Indian experiments.

In the first place, whatever may be the total amount of cotton raised on the plains of Hindostan in any one year, even if it were 5,000,000 of bales, there is a native population in that and adjacent countries capable of absorbing the entire quantity—a population of people, clothed solely in cotton, for the most part fabricated in their own primitive looms.

In the second place, the better price the Indian ryot receives for his staple, the more money he is able to spend on his own clothing, thus increasing the demand for cotton on account of home consumption.

In the third place, after experiments extending over thirty years, all authorities concede that Indian cotton can not be raised in any quantity to compete with American in length and strength of staple.

In the fourth place, however the production of India and America, Egypt and Brazil, may increase, the demand for cotton will supply the ever-increasing number of spindles and looms more than keeps pace with the product of the new machine.

It may be stated in general terms that the Indian cotton crop is raised on farms varying in extent from three to twenty acres, the cultivators of which are mostly very poor, and generally in debt to the village shroff (or banker), to whom the cotton is mortgaged so soon as sown. Such persons are not admitted entering into a detail of the effects of such a state of things. Formerly the result was evident in the dirty condition of the product when offered for sale in the market of Bombay. That evil was the first seriously taken in hand by the government. Inspectors were appointed with power to seize, confiscate, and destroy cotton unfitted for export by reason of excessive dirt or wilful negligence in the removal of the wool from the seed. This supervision, with the partial introduction of the American saw-gin, in the years from 1850 to 1860, raised the price of the best Surat (Dhollerah) from 3½d. and 4d. per pound to 5d. and 6d. per pound in the Liverpool market. Our war, and the consequent scarcity, gave an immense impetus to the Indian cotton trade, and Dhollerah cotton was sold in bales as high as 24d. per pound. This enhanced value must have greatly benefited the Hindoo farmer, who, with such inducement before him, in succeeding years would naturally sow an increased breadth of land with the now valuable crop, the reasons for this increased demand being yet utterly unintelligible to him. But in two years, 1866 and 1867, his cotton had fallen in value sixty per cent., from causes as completely beyond his comprehension as those of its sudden rise. He found his visions of wealth dissipated; the extra pair of bullocks his prosperity had induced him to buy on credit unpaid for; and he returned to the sowing of jowarree and linseed, more firmly clutched than ever in the vampire embrace of the village usurer.

This is the reason that the East Indian cotton crop does not keep pace with the demand. The cultivators are poor and ignorant. They can only comprehend that their cotton is subject to fluctuations over which they have no control, and that when sowing it they have no data to guide them as to its probable value at maturity. The fall of one cent per pound is a very serious matter to a farmer of five acres, four of which he has planted with cotton, mortgaged to Ayah, Dhurm Doss, Ramchuckjee, or Peep in November for a market that had fallen thirty to fifty per cent. It is true that railways and good macadamized roads to the interior have been brought, as a recent writer says, "the ryot to face with the foreign dealer;" but what good does that face do the farmer if the hand does not hold the money which the needy farmer was led to expect for his crop?

All that legislative enactments, model farms, improved seed, and improved apparatus for cleaning and baling can do has been done, and the success, so far as the increased value of the crops is concerned, is very great. Twenty years ago New Orleans cotton quoted 20d. per cent. higher price than the best samples of Surat. In June of this year the quotations in Liverpool were: New Orleans Middling, 11¾d. per pound; Surat, 9¼d. per pound—a difference of only sixteen per cent.

This rise in the value of Indian cotton may be attributed, apart from the increased cleanliness of the wool, to the fact that during the "famine" tens of thousands, probably millions, of spindles were altered to suit the short fibre of the Indian plant, and manufacturers have constantly excited with hopes of an increased Indian supply, have more and more directed their mechanical ingenuity to the use of it in their looms.

After all, the English would appear to be very short-sighted in their attempts to foster the Indian cotton trade at the expense of their cotton trade with this country. It is universally known that for every pound of Surat landed in Liverpool an equal amount in bond was sent to India, while imports from the United States are paid by exports of manufactured articles. During the cotton famine years the balance of trade with India averaged the seventy-five millions of dollars in gold annually, since then the average drain from England has been nearly fifty millions of dollars. It is all very well for individual manufacturers to obtain cotton a cent or two per pound cheaper from one country than another, but if this accommodation to one class of the community be injury to many others, as must be the case by such continued depletion of the precious metals, we should say that some political economist might be found to warn his countrymen of the suicidal nature of the policy now pursued.

The truth is, English manufacturers have an innate belief in the possibility of making the two hundred millions of Hindoos with "dozes," "long cloth," and "mull-mulls" woven in England from cotton raised in India. For more than forty years the English manufacturer has had the Indian market open to him, and with what result? To-day England does not send to India sufficient cotton cloth to make a turban for every wearer of that head-dress. The total English exports to India are £20,-000,000 sterling, and that is only equivalent to one half-dollar for each inhabitant. A total change must come over the natives before this is much increased.

What of Indian manufacture does a Hindoo farmer require? He does not use knives or forks or spoons. He would not know what to do with a pin. He does not wear boots or shoes. A stove would be a curiosity he is taken as the model of a Christian church. A Brummagem razor is about the only thing that would suit the plains of Hindostan, and the market might be found for one in every large village. The Hindoos are utterly beyond the temptations of trade. They have no wants beyond food, clothing, and shelter, and of these clothing is the one thing possible to be supplied by their English masters, and that more of this is not supplied is because manufacturers therefore have themselves to thank. Their own dishonesty is the stumbling-block in their path. Common native-made cloth may be rough and dirty in appearance, but it is honestly made and will so wear. English cloth looks better, but "won't wash." The lime or chalk with which it is finished does not stand the daily ablutions of the Hindoos, who, having on an average about twenty-four dollars to find food and raiment for a whole year, are naturally exceedingly fond of about the serviceable nature of the cloth they purchase.

Before a revolution occurs in Hindoo nature and consequent habits new markets will have opened all over the globe, and whether Indian cotton can ever fully compete with American will be—indeed now is—a question of no moment to us as a nation. We shall always find ready purchasers for every pound of cotton we can raise, even were the amount increased fivefold.

LADY BYRON'S STORY.

SINCE "Uncle Tom's Cabin" MRS. STOWE has written nothing that has made so great a sensation as her late article upon the separation of Lord and Lady BYRON. It has been discussed with as much feeling as the event itself when it occurred; and from the tone of some of the remarks upon the subject it might be supposed that MRS. STOWE had been guilty of some very great offense in making public Lady BYRON'S statement—as if the truth, however shocking, must not be told of Lord BYRON because he was a great poet and has been long dead.

Lord BYRON, one of the most worthless and unprincipled of men, always asserted that he did not know the cause of the separation. He did not hesitate to overwhelm his wife with satire and ridicule before the world. No man with the least pretend to the character of a gentleman and man of honor was ever guilty of more wanton and disgraceful conduct toward a silent and defenseless woman, and she his wife. But her very silence was imputed to her as a crime. Not to contradict the "ten or twenty" different explanations that MACAULAY says were offered, and which bore heavily upon BYRON, was declared to be malignant persecution upon her part. Was it also malignant persecution to endure, in the same silence, his sneers and calumnies?

Having been reviled for keeping silence, Lady BYRON is now reviled for speaking. It was collenerated malice not to speak before; it is odious murder or insanity to speak now. The fact is, that it may be true her silence and the whole life of Lord BYRON and MRS. LEIGH was the purest humanity; and it will be very difficult to disprove the story of that one of the two most interested persons whose word must necessarily be preferred to that of the other. And in saying her story we do not necessarily mean MRS. STOWE'S version of it—for perhaps the accuracy of which, however, we have no reason to question, for the facts of Lady BYRON'S representation are written by MRS. STOWE from memoranda; but we mean the version Lady BYRON gives for the separation. Evidently this is not now told for the first time, although it is now first universally public. Mr. HILLARD even says it has been long known to many persons in England. Dr. LUSHINGTON, of course, knew it. The writer of an article in the Temple Bar Magazine for June drew it. The article in the Edinburgh Review says that he heard it differently told ten years ago. And we know it to have been told at a literary party in Edinburgh more than eight years ago by a gentleman of some literary distinction. But it was hooted by the company, and the gentleman was judged to have committed a great wrong in repeating the story.

The disclosure is shocking, as that of all enormous crimes is—but there is nothing in it which is essentially improbable; and if the charge were true of any man of his time, of none was it more likely to be true than of BYRON. That Lady BYRON believed it true can be no doubt, and as little that it was the substance of her statement to Dr. LUSHINGTON; nor is there any doubt that he believed her representations. In his letter to Lord JOHN, in 1830, he does not say that he qualified his advice by any ifs or buts. "When you came to town about a fortnight or perhaps more after my first interview with Lady NOEL [the mother of Lady BYRON]—I was for the first time informed by you of facts utterly unknown, as I have no doubt, to Sir MATTHEW or Lady NOEL. On receiving this additional information my opinion was entirely changed—I considered a reconciliation impossible." He altered my opinion, and added that, if such an idea should be entertained, I could not, either professionally or otherwise, take any part toward effecting it." There is not the least appearance of doubt. It is evident that Dr. LUSHINGTON believed what Lady BYRON told him; and, as we have said, there can be no doubt that she told him in 1816 what she told MRS. STOWE in 1856. That Lady BYRON was deceived is most improbable; for Dr. LUSHINGTON would not have spoken so peremptorily until he had thoroughly cross-questioned her, and satisfied himself that she told the truth. If that truth was the present story, Dr. LUSHINGTON'S late disposes of the theories that Lady BYRON was jealous or of failing faculties.

Apart from this, Lady BYRON'S direct assertion must outweigh her husband's suppositions that he ardently desired an investigation, and that he had not the least suspicion of the cause of the separation. Lady BYRON'S statement fully justifies her silence, and explains the life that BYRON led after leaving England. The chief difficulty in MRS. STOWE'S report of the circumstances is, that Lady BYRON is represented as living with her husband after she knew the intrigue, and as actually discussing it with him. That she loved him devotedly is unquestionable, and that love sufficeth all things is true; but the version that the editor of the Nation heard seems, at least, more probable, that Lady BYRON knew nothing of the facts until her child was born, and that then she believed her husband to be deranged; which explains her consultation with Dr. HARTLEY, and the light tone of the letter which she wrote after leaving London.

On the other hand, MRS. STOWE'S statement of the reasons why Lady BYRON was willing that the truth should be finally known must be received as satisfactory; and, although that was not her object, every honorable mind will be glad that she, who, by the accident of her relations with Lord BYRON, must be always conspicuous so long as his genius endures in the world, will not live in the immortality of ridicule with which that genius had invested her. It is desirable that all the truth should be known even about great men. If SHAKESPEARE had committed a brutal murder nothing could be gained by concealing it; and if the charge were now first made, the weight of the evidence should be regarded rather than the enormity of the accusation. We once heard a very distinguished poet ruling MR. PARTON soundly for saying in the North American Review that DANIEL WEBSTER sometimes appeared upon the platform drunk—the worse for liquor. But CROMWELL was wiser, who told the painter not to omit the warts in taking his likeness. We should not consider the writer a hyena reveling among graves who should give us a solution of the relation of SWIFT and STELLA as authentic as that which MRS. STOWE has given us of the BYRON separation.

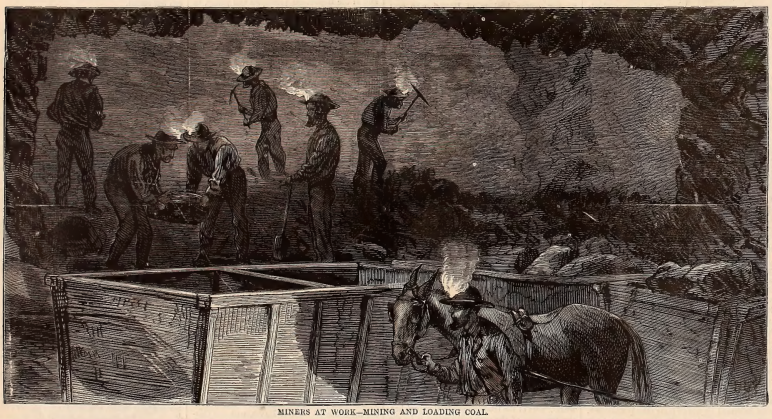
INDUSTRY AT THE SOUTH.

UPON the whole, the most copious and admirable report of the condition of the cotton culture and cultivators in the Southern States is that just issued by Messrs. LORING & AYKINSON, cotton brokers of Boston, who sent several hundred circulars to intelligent cotton planters in every where in the South, and who now publish a careful digest of the answers. The report is a neat pamphlet of nearly two hundred pages, and by far the most perfect one studied as a faithful representation both of facts and feelings.

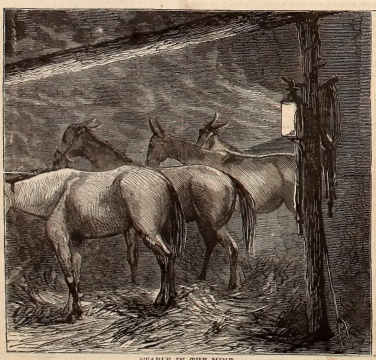
The general testimony in regard to the cotton culture is, that the crop will be more than better labor. That is imperative. One correspondent says that Georgia alone could produce two millions of bales. But the colored laborer is now showing a disposition to idleness. An unnatural system will sooner or later revenge itself. The mortality among the negroes succeeding the abolition of slavery for at least three hundred per cent. greater since they were made free than before, and it is the general estimate that it takes three freedmen to do the work of one slave. The causes of cause, are the opinions of those who are probably generally in favor of coerced labor; but there can be little doubt that the colored population is very rapidly reduced by the greater recklessness of living and negligence of disease, which naturally follow emancipation, and by the increased sterility among the new children, which is universally remarked. The women, too, are largely withdrawn from field labor, and the listlessness and wilfulness of those who have been

MINERS AT WORK—TAMPING A CHARGE.

MINERS AT WORK—THE MINER'S CHEST.



MINERS AT WORK—MINING AND LOADING COAL.

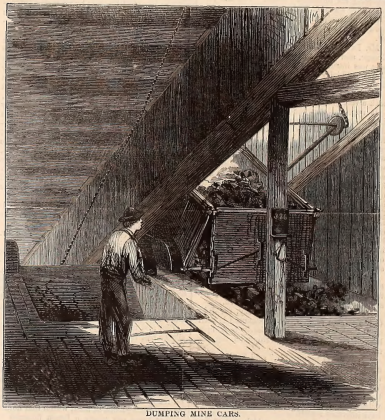


STABLE IN THE MINE.

BOTTOM OF THE SLOPE.

THE COAL-MINES OF PENNSYLVANIA—MINING THE COAL.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 583.]

HONEY BROOK BREAKER, No. 2.



DUMPING MINE CARS.

SEPARATING THE DIFFERENT SIZES OF COAL.

SLATE-PICKERS.

THE COAL-MINES OF PENNSYLVANIA—PREPARING THE COAL FOR THE MARKET.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 583.]

LALAGE.

I could not keep my secret
Any longer to myself;
I wrote it in a song-book,
And laid it on the shelf;
It lay there many an idle day,
'Twas covered soon with dust:
I graved it on my sword-blade,
'Twas eaten by the rust:
I told it to the zephyr then,
He breathed it through the morning,
The light leaves rustled in the breeze,
My fond romances scorning;
I told it to the running brook,
With many a lover's motion;
The gay waves laughed it down the stream,
And dimpled it in the ocean.
I told it to the raven sage:
He croaked it to the starling:
I told it to the nightingale:
He sang it to my darling.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book I.

CHAPTER V.
AN INVOLUNTARY GUEST.

By this time Mrs. Sheardown had enveloped herself and Bobby in water-proof wrappings. Maud Desmond was waiting, warmly protected by a thick shawl, at the vicar's elbow. Herbert Severn stood and locked the harmonium. Every one was preparing to depart.

"Veronica!" called the vicar.

Miss Levincourt was still conversing with Mr. Plew.

"Veronica!" repeated her father, impatiently, "are you not coming?"

She turned round at the summons, giving her hand in a farewell grasp to the doctor as she did so.

She was very handsome.

The first thing that struck you on looking at her face was its vivid coloring. Her skin was of a clear, pale, brown tint; and on each smooth cheek there glowed a rich bluish lake in the heart of a June rose. She had large, dark eyes, fringed round with thick lashes, and surmounted by semicircular eyebrows as black as ebony. Her hair was also black, shining, and very abundant. It was disposed in elaborate coils and plaits, which displayed its luxuriance to the full, and was brought down low on the forehead in crisp waves. Her lips were very red and her teeth very white. There were dimples in the form of her face. Had the brilliant eyes, glancing under their arched brows, so attracted attention to themselves that few observers would have passionately criticised, or to observe that the lower part of the face overbalanced the upper; that the nose was insignificant: the mouth full as to be almost coarse; and the cheeks and chin so rounded as to threaten to lose all semblance of outline, and to become heavy in middle life. Now, however, at nineteen years of age, Veronica Levincourt was a very beautiful creature. But there was something in her face which was not so easily analyzed by a casual observer as the form and color of it. There was a dissonance in it somewhere. Most women perceived this. Many men did so also. But they perceived it as a person with a good ear, ignorant of harmony, perceives a false note in a chord. Something jars: what he knows not. The skilled musician comes and puts his finger on the dissonant note.

When Veronica laughed her whole countenance grew harmonious at once. And herein lay the key to the secret.

The habitual expression of her face in repose seemed to contradict the brilliant glow of youth and health which made her so strikingly beautiful. The rich gipsy color, the ripe red lips, the sparkling eyes, the gleaming teeth, seemed made to tell of light-hearted, abounding, girlish happiness. But the expression of Veronica's face when she was not speaking in animated lines was wistful, sad, sometimes almost sullen.

For the rest, her figure was slight and straight, and she carried herself with an erect and yet easy grace.

"Coming, papa," said she, carelessly. And then she gathered over her shoulders a scarlet cloak with a hood to it.

"You should have had your shepherd's plaid, Veronica," said her father. "That shawl is not nearly warm enough for such an evening as this."

"Oh, it is so becoming to Miss Levincourt," said little Miss Turtle, the governess. She and her pupils had been watching Veronica unwinkingly all the evening, as their custom was.

The dreary walk to the vicarage-house was across St. Gildas's church-yard. But the ground now lay in death-cold pools between the swelling grave-mounds; and although the lanes afforded no good walking in the present state of the weather, they were yet rather better than the way by the church-yard.

Mention has been made of a by-road through the village from Shipley Magna which skirted the garden wall of the vicarage. Mr. Levincourt and the two girls had not gone many paces down this by-road when they perceived through the fast-gathering dusk a figure, which had evidently been on the watch for them, start and run toward them very swiftly.

"I do believe it is Jemmy Sack!" exclaimed Maud Desmond.

Jemmy Sack it was, who presently came to a sudden stop in front of the vicar, and began a breathless and incoherent speech.

"Dunnot ye be frighted, please, Sir, Joe Dowset sett says. They ha'n't a took him into the house, please, Sir. And it's the same un as I send nimble after. On'y he's a-lying on his back a regular wi' dreadful fire. But Joe Dowsett says as ye bain't to be frighted, nor yet the young ladies neyther, please Sir."

Long before the combined cross-examination of the vicar and the young ladies had succeeded in eliciting any connected information from Jemmy, they arrived at the garden door, and then the matter to a certain extent explained itself.

A man in a velveteen shooting-jacket crouched with mud lay on his back in the road beneath the garden wall, and close by a heap of flint stones lay ready for the use of the road-menders. On to these he had apparently been flung, for his face was cut, and a thin stream of blood trickled slowly down his forehead.

The prostrate man was totally insensible. His head was supported on the knee of Joe Dowsett, the vicar's gardener, groom, and general factotum, who was endeavoring to pour some brandy down his throat. A cart, in a neighboring field, was being harnessed by the bridle. Three of the village boys who had been practicing in the school-room stood at a little distance looking on, and two frightened women-servants, with their aprons huddled round their shivering shoulders, peered nervously from the garden gate and called to Joe Dowsett with shrill questions, of which he took no notice whatever.

A chorus of voices arose as soon as the vicar was perceived: but a few words will suffice to put the reader in possession of the facts of the case. The fallen man was the same gentleman whom Jemmy had seen thrown earlier in the day. The day's sport had terminated at a considerable distance from Shipley Manor. The gentleman was a stranger, had probably missed his way, and gone by roundabout roads. He had evidently not been informed that Shipley Magna, having struck into Bassett's Lane, as the by-road was called. His horse and he were both tired. And when they came to feel the effects of his first fall more severely than he had felt them in the heat of the chase and at the beginning of the run, a little distance looking on, the gentleman's horse stumble, and at the same instant the boys returning from the school-house had appeared on the scene, whooping at the end of the lane. In a moment the gentleman had been pitched heavily off his horse, and was now in the keep of Joe Dowsett.

The first thing to be done was to send for a doctor. Mr. Plew would probably not have reached his residence. Jemmy Sack was also dispatched to fetch him, and set off running at a famous rate, throwing out his long legs, and followed by all the boys but Joe Dowsett, the discussion seemed to be one of intense and concentrated ecstasy.

But prevailing Mr. Plew's arrival, the swooning man could not lie there, with the night falling fast, and a bitter wind blowing from the marshes, he was very ill, Joe Dowsett said, to flread the hard marrow in your bones.

There was no other house at hand. The vicarage was a desirable dwelling-place. Joe Dowsett and the carter, with a little assistance from Mr. Levincourt, carried the stranger into the house. Veronica's room had been taken from an old oaken press blankets and coverlets for the spare bed. A fire was lighted in the inmate of the bedroom—a room on the ground-floor, looking toward the garden. For that night, at least, the gentleman must remain at the vicarage.

Mr. Levincourt was very uneasy, and asked Joe over and over again if he thought it was serious. To which Joe always returned, "Seems to that it might be or it mightn't, but that for his part he didn't think it wouldn't be much: an vascular existence in which he had served as groom to find some comfort. Veronica sat at the window, drawing eye and ear to catch the first signal of the doctor's arrival.

"He's quite old, this poor man, isn't he, papa?" said she, with her face pressed against the glass.

"Old? well—that's relative, my dear. Here is Mr. Flew at last! I hear his step on the gravel, although I can't see him yet."

Mr. Plew's report was not very reassuring. If the patient were not better by to-morrow, he would fear that he could not safely be moved for a day or two. Meanwhile Mr. Plew would like Dr. Gunnery, of Danecester, to be called in, in consultation.

When Dr. Gunnery arrived on the following afternoon he shook his head very gravely, and said that he had better wait until the patient being able to leave his bed for some weeks. Even if—and here Dr. Gunnery lowered his voice, and reversed the movement of his head by bending it up and down instead of shaking it from side to side—even if he pulled through at all!

CHAPTER VI.
SUSPENSE.

THE vicar's first thought on hearing Dr. Gunnery's opinion was that it behooved him (the vicar) to communicate with the family of the stranger whom Fate had thrown — literally thrown—into the midst of the quiet household at the vicarage. As it was, they could hardly have known less about him had he dropped among them from the moon, instead of from the back of a startled horse.

But for many hours the injured man was incapable of communicating with his host. Fever set in. He became delirious at intervals. And on no account must he be disturbed or annoyed by questions. Dr. Gunnery confirmed Mr. Plew's first statement that the principal visible injury had been done to the stranger by his fall.

"But," said he, "he is a bad subject. If we had a young constitution, or even a sound constitution for his years, to deal with the whole affair would be a mere trifle. But in this case it is very different."

"Very different, indeed," assented Mr. Plew.

"No accident," continued the Danecester physician. "The whole machine is in a worn-out condition—constitution gone to the deuce."

"To the—ahem! quite so!" assented Mr. Plew, again.

"Then, Dr. Gunnery," said Mr. Levincourt, nervously, "do you mean to say that he is in danger?' Dear me, this is dreadful! Really dreadful!"

But to so direct a question Dr. Gunnery could, or would, give no direct reply. He merely repeated that, in his opinion, Mr. Levincourt ought to lose no time in communicating with the sick man's family. And then, saying that he would return the day after to-morrow, and that meanwhile the patient must possibly be in better hands than those of Mr. Plew, the great Danecester doctor drove away.

Beyond the fact that had come under his own eyes, the vicar knew but two circumstances regarding his involuntary guest. The first was contained in a letter which he was staying at the Crown, in Shipley Magna; the second was that Lord George Segrave was said to be a friend of his.

Mr. Levincourt dispatched a note to Lord George, and ordered Joe Dowsett (to whom the note was given) to ride off on from Hammick Lodge to Shipley Magna, and tell the people at the Crown what had happened.

From Hammick Lodge, Joe Dowsett brought back a very polite note.

It appeared that the acquaintance between Lord George Segrave and the stranger was of the slightest possible kind. They had met in Rome one season, and had hunted side by side on the Campagna. Lord George knew nothing whatever of the gentleman's family. His name was Gale, Lord George said. Lord George was deeply distressed that the vicar of Shipley and his family should be so seriously inconvenienced by this accident. The same time he could hardly regret, on Sir John Segrave's account, that the latter should have fallen into such hands. Lord Georgeleft it to himself the honor of calling at Shipley vicarage, and, meanwhile, he begged to know if there were any way in which he could be of service to Mr. Levincourt, himself or to the invalid, under these painful circumstances.

This note, although extremely civil, left matters pretty much as they had been before. But from the Crown Inn Joe Dowsett brought back something more definite and unexpected.

He brought back, that is to say, Sir John Gale's foreign servant, who announced himself as "Mr. Plow," and immediately took upon himself all the duties of waiting on the sick man.

"If you will permit, Sir," said Paul, in very good English, "I will have a mattress laid by the side of my master's bed on a few nights. You have but a man to attend him, and needs not to have all night, I shall find to sleep at the village. There is a small cabaret there, as I have informed myself."

The arrival of this man, which was at first looked upon by the vicar and the inmates of the vicarage, proved before long to be an inestimable comfort and relief.

By the first night he eased the vicar's mind by taking upon himself the responsibility of communicating with Sir John's friends. Or rather he relieved the vicar of responsibility existed. Sir John had, Paul declared, no relatives. He had neither wife nor child, brother nor sister, whose sole concern in his life had lived a great deal abroad. Paul had not been with Sir John in England before this winter. He would write to Sir John at once on the matter of business. That was all that would be necessary.

Mr. Levincourt, never unwilling to shift responsibility on to the shoulders of others, told Paul that he must do as he thought best. There was something in the grave, steady aspect of the little man that inspired confidence. Then Paul took upon himself the whole business of the sick-room. He waited by day, and watched by night. He administered the medicines. He reported progress to the doctors with an intelligence and accuracy which won those gentlemen's good opinion very soon. He relieved the vicar's servants of all trouble as regarded Sir John Gale. He prepared and served the kitchen, and, a certain grave tact which characterized him, won over old Joanna to allow him to prepare culinary delicacies for his master's delectation. He was always at hand when wanted, and yet entirely unobtrusive. He was never tired, never sleepy, never surly, never indiscreet.

In a word, before many days of his sojourn at the vicarage had passed over, the whole household began to wonder how they had managed to get through the few hours that had intervened between the accident and the arrival of the admirable Paul.

He very soon contrived to let it be understood that money expenses would not at all matter, and added to the burden thrown on the vicar's family by his master's accident and illness. Sir John was rich: very rich. No expense need be spared. If, even, it were deemed necessary to send to London for additional medical assistance, they need not hesitate to do so. This, however, did not appear to be desirable. And as soon as Sir John was enabled to understand his own condition he expressed himself entirely satisfied with the skill and care of the doctors who were attending him.

Lord George Segrave fulfilled his promise of calling. Lord George was a bachelor. He was a great sportsman, and some folks said that he was too fond of other pursuits which persons holding strict principles could not approve. Lord George was well known on the turf; and in his youthful days had been a patron of the Prize Ring. Without belonging to the category of those whose lives were openly scandalous, he yet was a man whose acquaintance could by no means be taken to be a certificate of good character.

Retired as was Mr. Levincourt's life at Shipley-in-the-Wold, he yet knew this much of the present occupant of Hammick Lodge, and the knowledge had not served to make Sir John Gale's enforced residence beneath his own roof the more agreeable to him.

But Lord George Segrave soon made it appear that his acquaintance with Sir John was really and truly no closer than he had stated in his note. It need scarcely be said that Lord George had no idea what a signal service he was rendering to the invalid in his host's opinion by disclaiming any thing like intimacy with the former.

Lord George was rather good-natured, and extremely selfish, and he deemed that it would be more pleasant to understood that, while he was willing to send his servants scouring the country on on a search after Sir John the moment he might suggest, he (Lord George) by no means intended to put himself to the personal inconvenience of making frequent visits of inquiry at the vicarage.

"Pray, command me, Mr. Levincourt," he said, on leaving the sick-room, "in any way. I quite feel what an uncommon bore this business must be for you. Though, as I said before, Gale may be considered in luck that he didn't break any on any other heap of flint stones than the one at your door. I'm sure I hope he'll pull through, for there's a good thing. You'll find he will only just a kind of bowing acquaintance with him in Rome. And then he hailed me on the hunting-field at Sudbrook's (over the other side of Danecester), and—and that sort of thing. Hammick Lodge is twelve miles from Shipley as the crow flies, but fifteen by road, so I'm afraid I can't be able to look him up myself very often, you know. But I hope you will do me the favor to command me if there's any thing in the world my fellows can do, or—or that sort of thing."

And then Lord George Segrave departed, feeling that he had done all that could reasonably be expected of him.

Dr. Gunnery came again and again. And Mr. Plew was constant in his attentions.

The house, always quiet, was now hushed into stillness. The piano remained closed. Joe Dowsett was bound to whisper as he worked in the garden. The servants stole up to bed past the door of the guest-room, making every sound of the utmost delicacy to prevent their ordinarily cautious footfall. Paul's noiseless step glided through the passages, and he came on you like a ghost.

Even the peasant are contagious. So are silence and the hush of suspense. But though Veronica was naturally stiller than it was wont to be, it was less dull. All the household was conscious of a suppressed excitement, which was merely quieting, and not reach its height till the next day, every hour of the day, presented a question whose answer was deferred—Will he live or die? And on the answer to this question hung no ingrained human heart—none, at least, within that house.

Was there any where a breast fluttered by hope or rewards, by fears, for the sick man who lay feverish and uneasy on the stranger's bed in Shipley vicarage?

No breast for him. No friends inquired.

He was discussed in the vicarage kitchen, and in other kitchens in the neighborhood. He was discussed in the village alehouse, in the farmhouses, in the tap-room and the stables of the Crown at Shipley Magna. He was spoken of, once or twice, at the different guests of the West Danesbire hunt. Lord George Segrave mentioned that he believed Gale was going on all right, you know, and that sort of thing. That was a nicish nag of his, not the one he had been riding when he was thrown, you know, a hand little chestnut. Lord George wouldn't mind having him. He wondered what the figure would be. If Gale's executors were still at the crown he had a good mind to go over and have another look at the chestnut, and to ask Gale's groom whether he thought his master would sell him. He supposed that Gale had had enough of hunting in England. He was doocsd sorry for him, you know, and that sort of thing. And then he could he expect? With that seat he (Lord George) only wondered how Gale had been able to stick on his saddle five minutes. And most of the field wondered too. For it has been observed that of all the trials to which human cavalry, modesty, and magnanimity are ordinarily apt to be subjected, the trial of comparing your own riding with another man's is the one that most frequently develops mortal frailty.

There was probably not a man who habitually hunted with the West Danesbire who did not secretly nourish the conviction that his own seat on horseback was admirable, and that the majority of his friends and acquaintances rode like tailors!

Little it mattered to Sir John Gale what was said of him in the parlor, kitchen, stable, or hunting-field. Little, perhaps, would it ever matter to him now. For although, as Dr. Gunnery had said, the absolute injuries resulting from the accident were trifling, and to a young and vigorous constitution would have been matters of small importance, yet in this case there seemed to be no elasticity or power of rebound in the poor man's frame. A low fever took hold of him: a dreadful insidious fever, that might be figured as a weird phantom, invisible to the eyes of men, but with two bony, cruel hands, whose touch was terrible. Of these hands one was cold as ice; the other burning, like the heart of a furnace. Alternately the victim of fate stroked the sick man's body, drawing long shuddering thrills through every limb, or clutched him with a lingering grasp that made his very heart sick. Now he was consumed with scorching heat; anon he shivered to the marrow of his bones.

Mr. Rew still not trouble his mind, perhaps it were better to say his brain was not troubled; seeing that such fancies come to a man, or may come to him, without any conscious exercise of his will—with any fantastic embodiment of a Fever Phantom. But he reported day after day that John was in a very low way—a very sa-avity, low way—and that he couldn't get him to rally.

"Do you think he is troubled in his mind?" asked Mr. Levincourt. "Is his heart ill at ease? He is perfectly conscious now, and, I think, clear-headed enough to give orders. And yet Paul tells me that his master has entirely approved what has been done, and will have been left undone. He desires to see no one; has received no letters—except, as Paul tells me, one from his agent sent to the Foreign Office by Shipley Magua—and, in short, appears to be singularly isolated in the world, for a man of his wealth and position. I should fear his life has not been a very happy one."

"Well," said Mr. Pleve, musingly, "I don know, of course. But—but he doesn't seem to me to be at all that sort of man."

Mr. Pleve's statement was vague enough; and the vicar did not care to be at the pains of probing the little surgeon's meaning. Yet the latter had a meaning, although he would have found it difficult to put it into clear words.

His meaning was this; that from his observation of Sir John Gale he had, half-instinctively, drawn the conclusion that his wealthy patient was not a man to allow sentimental troubles to prey on him.

Wounded love, tender regrets, affectionate yearnings after a lost friendship, or a longing for softer attentions and closer companionship than could be had from servants and strangers, did not seem to Mr. Pleve likely to enter into the category of drawbacks to Sir John's recovery.

Material comforts, nay luxuries, he did not lack. As to sentiment—Mr. Pleve of course had encountered ailments arising from purely spiritual causes. Very troublesome ailments they were, and very inefficacious proved the powers of physic to cure them. He remembered the case of an old clergyman who had been a famous preacher in the days when Benjamin Plew was walking the hospitals in London. His business was to the effect that the bodily health of half the world would be marvelously improved if a mechanical, remedy contrivable by human skill could be substituted for a heart of flesh in the human breast. "We might defy the doctors then," said this old clergyman, "and the world be not be worth having!" But of Sir John Gale, neither Mr. Plew nor the reader as yet knows enough to enable him to judge whether the baronet's heart be of flesh or of stone.

A fortnight passed; three weeks; a month had nearly elapsed itself away since the accident when the doctors pronounced that Sir John was somewhat stronger.

The pallid hands, the hand of fire and the hand of ice, slowly relinquished their prey. By degrees the interval between the attacks of Danger lessened. At last they ceased. Danger was over; and from the beginning of March the invalid began slowly, but surely, to mend.

COAL-MINING AND THE COAL MARKET.

LUZERNE, Carbon, Schuykill, Columbia, Northumberland, and Dalton counties comprise the anthracite region of Pennsylvania, and, so far as has been ascertained, this is the richest coal-bearing field of the United States. Previous to 1860 the price of coal from these mines did not average, at wholesale, $5 per ton, if we except the year 1855, when the price rose to $5 40 per ton, by the cargo, which, at that time, was an unprecedentedly high figure. During the present month (August) stove coal is quoted, in New York, at $8 50 per ton, the consumer paying a very considerable advance upon this price before it is lodged in his cellar.

The Honey Brook Mines are located at a point where the counties of Carbon, Luzerne, and Schuykill meet, this point being the highest in Pennsylvania, if we except the Alleghany Portage Rail district, which is 50 feet higher. The coal mined here is of excellent quality, and the mines may be regarded as fair specimens of the best style. They are managed closely by men of experience and excellent judgment. The names of the superintendent and chief engineer of the colliery boys are on their pay rolls. With this force a thousand tons of coal per day can be mined, prepared, and shipped, when the mines are worked up to their full capacity.

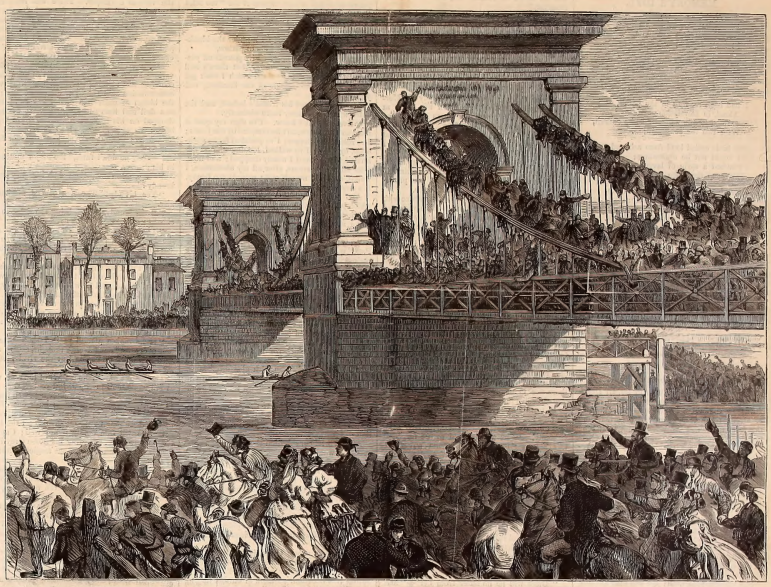
It would seem best to describe a visit to the mines by showing the coal first in its native state, and then following it from the "basin" to the car in which it is shipped to market. Accompanied by the superintendent and the mining engineer, we step into a car and are lowered down an inclined plane of 35° for a distance of 1,000 feet, when we are at the bottom of the "basin," where but for the flaring lamps attached to the miners' hats the darkness would be impenetrable. There is activity every where: loaded cars going up, emptied cars descending, and cars moving hither and yon, drawn by quick-stepping mules; miners and laborers hastening to and fro; the boom and reverberation of the "shots" that are displacing coal, the quick clip of the miner's drill, and the thud of his pick; and above all this the cries of the miner who has lighted his match and is fleeing to a place of safety, crying first fire! to warn those near of the danger, and then fire! to announce to the come used to these noises, and as you trudge along in the darkness you grow aware of the perfect system that prevails. Civil as they are, miners are at work drilling with their sharp crow bars, or ramming home the powder which is to blast out tons of coal if the charge has been "well placed."

At another point is the miners' arranging his cartoons on brown paper, the edges of which he snips to keep the powder dry after the charge is placed. His mining chart has a key of powder in it, with oil, tools, fuses, and blasting barrels, not to mention various other articles necessary to his operations. On a hand you see the miners at work in a great cave leading from the gangway in which the tracks are laid for the transit of the cars, and which is lined quickly loaded by the miners' laborers. During your peregrinations you will visit the stables—caves cut out of the solid coal—and, finally, after a long walk, will reach the slope where the coal cars are ascending and descending, and the same hustle is going on that you noticed on your first arrival from above. Jumping into a coal car, up you go again to the dazzling glare of day light. Possibly you will be under the safe convoy ance of Mr. HOPKINS, the superintendent, as you do at your own when you reach the hotel.

To be brief, the Honey Brook mine structure at which the coals are prepared for market is designated, is better described by the illustration than is possible by words. The coal is fed to the breaker you make your way by means of stairs much worn by the tread of miners. The coal runs over the cars arriving from the mine in hundreds of feet below, drawn up by means of a stationary engine and hoisting gear, is soon dumped by mechanical means, and the coal commences its descent toward its market. Before the car starts on its return to the mine a weight on tag is removed, and hung upon a coil corresponding in number to that on the tag. This is the miner's check, by which the superintendent indicates that of car loads of coal sent up with the miner's name.

The coal dumped from the car passes down an inclined plane, which at one point has a flooring of iron bars placed a sufficient distance apart to permit coal to pass through, but not slate. The best passes on down the slope to the cars which are to convey it to market. Such lumps as may be deemed too large for the trade receive a mark in the tag as

THE INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACE—THE HARVARD CREW PRACTICING IN THE ELLIOTT BOAT.—[DRAWN BY OUR OWN ARTIST.]



THE INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACE—HARVARD LEADING, AT HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACE—OPPOSITE CHISWICK, OXFORD LEADING.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

MEMORY'S IDYL.

THE low brown house, I see it now;
Grandmother, with her knitting,
A holy calm upon her brow,
In shaded porch was sitting.

All down the path the poppies flamed,
Stiff box made green the border,
And small blue violets, half ashamed,
Grew low in sweet disorder.

I had been reading in the porch,
Aloud, in Revelation;
It seemed like Sunday, and like church,
With two for congregation.

The birds called loud from ash and fir—
I could not be unheeding;
I plucked a sprig of lavender,
To keep the place in reading.

I wandered down by balm and rue,
And clumps of China-aster;
I thought—well, Jack, I thought of you,
With heart-beats somewhat faster.

Do you remember how the vine
Grew close o'er all the darling?
It was a favorite haunt of mine,
A dear secluded harbor.

So in I strolled, and there you were,
In all your summer's glory;
Ah, you remember? Tell it, Sir!
Ay, dear, you end the story.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XLIX.

A STRICKEN CONSCIENCE.

LADY DIANA read the letter of Robert Douglas with a look of strange perturbation in her face. In this letter, written under the influence of strong feeling, Douglas had departed from the forms of caligraphy which for a long time past had been adopted by him, and these characters resembled some which Lady Diana remembered to have seen many years ago.

As she held the letter under the lamp, that she might discern the words more clearly, a flush of joy came to her heart, and the fingers holding the paper trembled exceedingly. Doubt did not strengthen into conviction until she turned over the letter mechanically and caught sight of the seal on the envelope. For a moment or two eyes stared at it with painful intensity; then she moved quickly toward an alcove and seated herself on a sofa, for her feet seemed about to fail her; she felt a proud horror of letting her suffering be overcome by the spectators.

She knew the seal well; she was only too well she did. She had a keen memory for trifles, and she remembered how, when, in the first sweet hours of her wedded life, she took to wife his signet-ring from her husband's finger, he had laughingly repulsed her, saying that "not even Ana should deprive him of his father's last gift."

There are many things pleasant enough to have recalled to one's mind in a dreamy pang of recollection—the air of a sweet old tune associated with a vanished hour of jubilee—the smile of your lover when he turned his head to give you that parting look—the crow of your babe when it welcomed home your face—the last words of your first love-letter—but these reminiscences is fraught with an exquisite sadness; they believe for a long number of years that you are eternally free of the companionship of one whom you had feared rather than loved—you be seized by a fearful suspicion that the unloved dead are not, in fact, silent in death's helplessness, but live—live to judge, to condemn, and perhaps avenge!

Lady Di was brave even in this extremity. She nerved herself to answer with apparent gayety the letter which of one of her attendants presently approached her. She accepted his escort to her carriage, and she gave him a jarring smile of such evidently that he instantly stopped to look at himself in a mirror on his way back to the ball-room.

Although some knew, and many suspected, that the news of some affliction had come to Lord Orme that night, no one guessed what a terrible anxiety was consuming this fair, gay-mannered woman.

"I must see her—make sure," she iterated, in the solitude of her own chamber. "A stranger's man might inherit and wear that ring; but how should any other possess his trick of handwriting?"

She sighed heavily as she dragged herself toward her bed.

"I have a great mind to say my prayers," she said, ruefully.

Habits enforced in early youth frequently recur, after long disuse, in hours of trouble. Lady Diana had been taught by her good old nurse always to pray fervently when any affliction impended over the household, that it might be averted.

She could not sleep. The pillow might have been bristling with spikes for all the comfort she could find in it. In repose the dread seemed to grow stronger, the fear bigger. With a groan, she arose from her bed, and paced up and down the room. She caught sight of a dim, ghastly face as she passed by her mirror, and shuddered to think how soon such wearing anxiety would make her old and ugly.

"I must ascertain the truth," she muttered. "Suspense is the worst phase of sorrow. To-morrow—or rather to-day, for those wrangling church clocks are all chiming five together—I will go down to Auriel, and see this Robert Douglas."

There was something Roman and heroic in her, after all. She preferred to invoke her own fate to waiting for the creeping progress of Atropos's scissors.

CHAPTER L.

MOWBRAY.

WHEN Captain Mowbray left Lady Di Mertion's presence, he walked down the stairs at Orme House feeling less timid than as if some one had dealt him a blow in the face.

"Idiot! fool that I was ever to dream that woman could have even an interval of veracity! Ha!—a her!"

His heart felt very sore as he looked up at the brilliantly lit windows, and imaged to himself how she, who caused his grievance, was probably breathing more freely in his absence.

I do not expect the reader to sympathize with his pain; in novels we only condole with the sorrows of the virtuous; but the sorrows of the vicious are none the less acute for the absence of commendable motive.

Thurstan had simply forgotten his beautiful young wife during the fluctuations of his hopes and doubts concerning the evil-hearted siren who had wiled him away from the thought of Azalea.

He felt additional bitterness when he reflected on that useless journey to Auriel. "So expensive, too, and one can't get railway tickets on credit," he growled. To do him justice he would not have grudged his most sovereign (pennies do not enter into the calculations of spendthrifts) to secure him the woman he longed for, but the most extravagant will like to buy that for which they have thrown their money aimlessly at a phantom target.

Thurstan did not go back to barracks at once; there are moments when solitude is the most grateful solace that can be applied to a sore heart: so he turned from the lights of the town and set his face toward the sea.

"I'll go to Azalea," Captain Mowbray said, suddenly. "She will be glad to see me." He was always "me," with Thurstan nowadays. So Captain Mowbray thought of Azalea, not as one injured, but as one who had been unkind to him for his injury. His letters had not been forwarded to him from London. He remembered this now, and remembered to curse the idle porter for having failed to send them on; not that it was of so much importance after all: he could calculate tolerably well upon the full reception of missives awaited him; a tender little cog from Azalea, another from Lucia from irritated creditors, a duty letter from his mother, telling that he was well, commenting on the weather, and sending him a good deal of unasked love.

With a sudden blank he thought,

"There will be no letter from her"—! her" meaning Lucia.

However, he kept to his decision about going to Auriel, if only for a few hours; he thirsted for the solace of Azalea's presence, a presence which was in itself a caress. His wounded vanity yearned for the balm of her devotion; he looked on her in the light of a cheroot or cigar, something to sooth his irritation and dull his pain.

Yes, he would go to her." He imaged to himself how she would glow at his approach, how she would run to welcome him with eye, lip, and voice. He had forgotten the fearful fears raised mound in the Auriel church-yard; he could not guess that the color had gone out of her cheeks forever, and that the ghastly sign of moonlit earth, slanting between two sullen stunted cypresses, shielded her from further unkindness.

The wind rose and the sea grew more troubled. He turned his weary homeward, and as the clouds thickened over the moon's face he could no longer see his way clearly, but moved through a dark gulphous space which was filled by wild hints of storm and shipwreck. He was glad when he had got away from that dismal shore haunted by ghosts and ghastly forms, to the brackish scent of deep-colored sea-flowers, by the ominous moan of the rising wind, and by the sting of the rain: he had brought with him to the water's edge.

The more he pondered over the wrong done to him, the more fierce his longing for her who was to palliate the smart.

"I will run down to Auriel to-morrow," he thought; but the next morning, when he took his seat on the point of starting for the station, the servant of a rival brother officer came with a message, asking him to be there as good as stop as and see the Major before he went.

The Major was Major Welter, the "Gentleman Jack" of the regiment, and one of its most popular officers; young (as majors go), handsome, but a broken man, honorably gained in a full over a stiff flight of post and rail, rich and popular. What more could a man desire to insure his happiness? Major Welter did not desire more; but to be something, or rather something less, was necessary to his peace of mind; he had an unhappy propensity to grow—according to the Banting standard, but heavy in handicap point of view.

On this particular morning any one uninitiated in racing mysteries would have viewed the Major's appearance with concern and alarm, fearing that he was the victim of some prostrating distemper.

When Thurstan entered the room nothing was visible of his friend save the tip of a damp-looking nose. The mother that bore him would scarcely have recognized her son in that heaving mass of yellow flannels which represented, or rather misrepresented, the manly outline of John Welter.

Mowbray exhibited neither surprise nor commiseration. He was accustomed to these desperate attempts at liquefaction of the "too solid flesh" of thirteen-stone men.

"Been wasting, I see. What have you brought it down to?"

A faint voice answered from under the blankets, in a Desdemona-like tone of pathos,

"It's no use, Mowbray. Five pounds off yesterday, four pounds on to-day, but there will eight pounds too many on me which I can't get down. Just ease off one of the blankets, will you?"

Mowbray obeyed his friend's behest, and the fellow was himself once more distinctly.

"I've tried all I know. I've shut my eyes at mess so that I shouldn't be tempted by the joints; I've resisted my liquor. I've qualified for an anchorite, by Jove! I've walked, looking like an unlimited turnip, until I nearly dropped; and now, after all my exertions, all my self-denial, I weigh, and find myself eight pounds too heavy. It's enough to break a fellow's heart!"

And something like a tear shone in the eye which peeped out above the shining nose. Scoff him not ye who have never known what it is to strive against the misery of "superincumbent flesh," and to fail in the strife.

"I was going to ride my chestnut horse, Piff Paff, the Major continued, dolorously. "I've backed him for a heap of money. You see he's such a queer-tempered beast I couldn't put an ordinary amateur on him. I wish you'd ride him, Mowbray."

"When is it to come off?"

"To-morrow; it's the Wharnesbie Hunt Steeple-chase. The horse will go on to-night; you can go down to-morrow morning; and if we catch an early train back we'll have such a jolly dinner in town!" And the speaker's eyes glistened once more, this time with pleasurable emotion.

"I'll ride him for you with pleasure," Mowbray replied. "I have no leave to leave town in the evening. I am going down into the country."

Captain Mowbray's heart was still very sore, and as he had not fasted he did not feel that a dinner would afford him any especial consolation.

After a brief consultation the friends arranged that they would go together to Wharnesbie that evening, and Captain Mowbray's servant was dispatched in town for his master's letters, and follow the latter down to the race meeting on the following morning. Mowbray knew in Thurstan's mind a lingering hope that Lady Diana might repent her decision, and dispatch some sign of grace in the shape of a letter. He had known any one to hope it was faint and fine as a spider's thread, and he himself was hardly conscious of its subtle existence.

"That boy, young Orme, is going to ride a mare of his own, which he has hunted once or twice. I do not think his father knows he is out on this occasion. Belton of ours is up too, and Flitter rides Antelope."

"Antelope is a screw-pigeon; and he, the Major added, with solemn emphasis, "was dangerous.

CHAPTER LI.

THE STEEPLE-CHASE.

AT an early hour on the following morning six men might have been seen studying the topography of the Wharnesbie Hunt Steeple-chase course with somewhat of the solemnity of chiefs of an army surveying a disputed field of battle. These were Mowbray and Count Orme (riding under the name of Ennro to evade paternal scrutiny), Major Welter, Captain Belton, Flitter (the "dangerous" and Mr. Knowlton, a well-known performer in the pigskin. Four of the lookers-on were mounted, for the latter gentleman was serene; he was not going to ride, and the fences didn't look nearly so big to him as they did to the others.

"Do you think your little mare is up to this, Orme?" Mowbray asked, anxiously, of Count Orme. "I wish you'd let Captain Belton, Flitter if he got spilled, or even had a very bad fall; this would was a bothering world after all. At any event he should get free of the burden of intolerable self-reproach. He dare not dwell too long on the horror of that letter, he feared he might lose his head altogether. As it was, Anna's white, dead face kept rising before him, and once he even lifted his hand to put it gently away.

"I wish you'd take it away until the race is over," he remonstrated, half aloud to himself. Meer Welter, thinking his friend alluded to the brandy flask, put it out of sight; and perhaps it was well he did so, for Captain Mowbray had already consumed a considerable amount of its contents.

At present, however, his judgment was not one whit impaired by the stimulant he had taken, nor by his mental distress. The force of habit is a strong controlling power. It is said that men in their sleep sometimes sit down boxes with consummate grace and skill, even while Death is in their hearts. Mowbray, with a growing madness in his brain, sat and handled the uneasy beast he rode with all his usual ability.

He walked Piff Paff slowly up to the hurdles, and flapping the reins loose upon his neck began to pat and talk the chestnut into a belief that nobody wanted him to jump.

"What's your jock about, Welter?" asked a horsey-looking man, clad in the costume supposed to be identical with a taste for sport—i. e., tight trowsers and stunted coat.

"Can't tell, can't tell," was the hurried reply. "Never interfere with another person's ride, especially when he knows as much as Mowbray does."

Soothing the while, Mowbray having approached as near to the hurdles as he dared, veered his horse round, and picking up his reins, quickly darted off in the opposite direction for a breathing-space. The spectators looked blank at being balked of the anticipated jump.

He of the horsey trowsers, who had watched the proceeding with undisguised scorn, shouted in derision—

"Is it to one against Piff Paff."

"Put it down to me, Sir," coolly rejoined Major Welter.

"I'll do it, if you like," said the other.

"It's a bet," replied the Major; adding to a keen-eyed bookmaker standing near to him—

"I only bet to one from you."

"No, Sir, and I wouldn't give you three to one now."

The horses now walked quietly down to the post, where Lord Pastern, who, as the "correct card" of the day, was acting as starter, had already arrived.

"Come back behind the post!" shouted my lord, with a view to some lessons in the art of starting; "I won't start you till you're all behind the post. Now, Captain Mowbray, why are you hanging back? Come on, you must not."

Piff Paff makes a few steps in a forward direction, and Conrad, taking this as a hint to be off, digs his heels into Primrose, and away they go, the others, infected by his example, also spring forward till they have gone about two hundred yards, when Flitter, who has more than sees there is something wrong, pulls up and returns. Conrad Orme and Knowlton soon follow his example, and so would Cleopatra, only that if Greyling permitted it; but the latter bolts as far as the stand, where he stops short, like one of those wilful toy-mice, which, when once wound up, run their own way or none at all.

"Get inside him, Captain."

"Really, I see not much start do you want?"

Amidst such like derision, Captain Belton "winds his solitary way" back to the starting-post.

"What, Flitter, you here?" cries Lord Pastern, as the jockeys rejoin him. "Why, what on earth made you poke your nose in here, sir, the doves in the dove-cot said to the eagle, 'I suppose you've got a certainty?' What's your nag?"

"He's a four-year-old, my lord," whispers Flitter, confidentially, "but I don't like jockeys; they tried him to be a fairish horse last year; but he turned cur, so they put him to cross country work. I've given a fence or two over worse a bridle, but I'm sadly afraid he'll cut it to-day if there's any thing good enough to stretch his neck. Still his owner has backed him for a heap of money."

"Well, he has to carry ten pound extra for professional purposes, Flitter; but I fancy you can give away that little lump."

"Not to Captain Mowbray, my lord. I don't know why—he's given him weight over a country he knows as much as most of us."

By this time the horses were nearly all in a bevy, and Lord Pastern dropped his flag—not with a hearty "go!" The three bounded away in close order and kept pretty well together until the leading Orme had made a quarter of a mile from the starting-post, were nearly reached, when Captain Belton shot to the front, and with outstretched neck and star-gazing head, his hasty brute, never rising, smashed through the hurdle in front of him: almost simultaneously Conrad, Flitter, and Knowlton topped the gorse, while Mowbray quietly slipped through the passage cleared by Greyling.

Passing the stand and betting ring, the riders catch occasional shouts of five to four against Antelope, ten to one against Piff Paff, and from Captain Belton, if he were still within ear-shot, might have heard the mocking cries of fifty to one against Greyling; the latter never slackens as he draws near the fence in front of him, but taking off out of distance crashes down to the bottom of the ditch and there reposes. His jockey has just time to arise and swear that he is a dead man, when Conrad, by this time two lengths ahead of the running horse, comes down to the obstacle; Mowbray and Knowlton take the jump shoulder to shoulder; while Flitter, easing his nag, shaves the flag in cutting off the corner. A beautiful piece of sound turf succeeds, and the four sail away as if the field had no boundary, Flitter holding Antelope hard by the head, as much as to say—

"Now, this is the finest fun in the world, and if you don't take care I won't let you have the spree of going at all."

Thereby deceiving the wily nag and infusing courage into his cowardly heart.

The ice it is at last arrived at, and a trumpery little thing it looks—a mere ribbon of green Canada mare blunders on to the wrong side of him on to her neck, so that he has to work back by degrees and fish unconcernedly for a lost stirrup, which seems like a stirrup i possessed, and keeps shadowing, hanging its leg thinly encased in his riding-boot. Then, in consequence of Primrose's inattention to the ditch, Knowlton finds round Mahomet's neck in a small thornbush which he thinks will make her rise.

His ruse succeeds. Meanwhile Piff Paff, who is in an unwonted hurry, has responded to the soothing influence of Mowbray's delicate yet firm handling, simply strides away, and seems not to see the gap. Mowbray, while flitting with a "Come up, horse!" also follows in safety.

They now cross a deeply-plowed fallow field, which necessitates some holding together, after the land is so dry that the horses move in a cloud of dust; and Flitter, who is lying back, thinks in his eyes uncomfortably of the sweet clover and small stones thrown up by his predecessors. Antelope also shows his disgust by shaking his head from side to side, and finishes by a cross-furrow, Knowlton drops Madonna into it, feels the effort of coming on to firm going, sends her along at a flattering pace, immediately followed by Mowbray. The mishap at the gap had frightened Piff Paff out of the lead; but he now works his way to the front, and pounds along, regardless of the furrow, thinking only how to regain that forfeited place, which object he achieves, not without trying poor Primrose severely. The fallow runs out into a green lane, patched by an occasional cottage and tawny children, who resemble the received notion of imps, shout with glee as Primrose, springing to the summit of the opposite bank, disappears in the meadow beyond.

Madonna, Piff Paff, and Antelope follow, and the pace improves with the horses' appreciation of the elastic sod.

"Hang it!" ejaculates Conrad, "what a deuce of a wind there is!" It is true that there is a gale, from the pace at which he is tearing along; but, in fact, there is not a breath stirring. "I don't keep my mouth shut," he thinks, "for my tongue feels like leather. What wouldn't I give for a wine-glass of water? Hold up, old woman!" he cries to Primrose, who is making heavy play of her fatigue, and, putting her foot into a water furrow, threatens to somersault.

The brave little mare answers up at the sound of his voice, and changing her leg, gathers herself together for the next fallow rails, which now show new, hard, and forbidding at the further end of the pasture.

"Flitter's more's no breaking them," thinks Flitter; but he yet resolves that the other three shall have the first chance.

Mowbray gnashes his teeth as he mutters, "I wonder if—" and sits back on the chestnut, prepared to rouse him with the spurs at the very last moment.

"Yoi, ove!" screams Knowlton to Conrad, whose unswerving cheer rings in the air as he lands well in the next field, Madonna, with Knowlton, both horses performing faultlessly. Mowbray draws Piff Paff nearly into a trot until close by, when he drives the chestnut at the rails more vigorously, his tactics serving him so well that he gets over with a bang which reminds the horse that oak oaks carry not me tangere plainly on their faces.

"Lucky I didn't put over those hurdles at the stand," thinks Mowbray. "He'd have been sure to sweep them away, and to have tried the same game here."

Flitter, not daring to check his uncertain Antelope too much, rises simultaneously with Mowbray and gets over with the same luck. The brook is running very full, and Primrose, greeting to the disappointment of the crowd. Steeple chase fences are not the only ones brooks, and afford no fair trial to a hunter's water-jumping abilities. In the steeple-chase brook the take off and the landing are generally cramped, a few slight of gorsed hurdles conceals the sheen of the water from the horse until it is too late for him to retract. But in a country, where, while Mowbray listens mechanically to the changes in the bedding. The twenty to one against Primrose becomes so wonderful that Conrad Orme, who can not resist urging his mare to "leave those duffers standing, and win in a walk." Poor lass, she does her best to obey her lord but though her rider has sense enough to save her a little by selecting the sound furrow in the fallow field, and although he does continue to lead first out of the lane, this time lined with the usual crowd of children, she jaded mare reels over the bank, and is passed immediately by the other horses. Ah! Primrose passed by those you bid so gallantly, who shall tell the pain you feel?

Mowbray now takes up the running: he conjectures that to tire first-hearted Antelope will be his most workmanlike plan. He sees Madonna his done her best, and that henceforth the race lies between Piff Paff and the favorite. Calculating with reason that the previous bruises over the timber have taught his horse a lesson, he faces the gorse boldly and confidently, and gets over cleverly, succeeded by Antelope, who rapes all fours, and Madonna, who follows suit. Conrad comes laboring on, the mare struggling painfully to keep her companions in sight.

"I may yet do it," the lad thinks; "they may all come to grief afterward; and I shall run but get over this, I may win even now. Poor old fellow!" to Primrose; "once more, old girl, it's the last time!"

And hand and heel go desperately to work. Primrose looks helplessly from side to side as though seeking an alternative, and then, game to the last, although she feels her strength is nearly spent, she gives a pitiful spring, catches both fore-legs on the top rail, and crashes headlong down on the grass beyond. Presently the exhausted mare struggles up again, but the rider does not move. The ladies in the stand see through their lorgnettes that a huddled heap of pink and white lies there, like a crumpled rag on the green meadow, but fortunately for them they can not distinguish the face of the poor boy beneath.

The sun shines down fiercely on him, but his upturned eyes do not shrink; awe-stricken men whisper question to him, but he preserves an ominous silence; his cheek is stained by something redder than a blush, and his features have lost their shape under the imprint of the horse's foot.

But just now and he had flashed through sun and shadow a gracious living presence; now he lay stiff and ungainly with the quietness of death sweeping on him. Once the gentlest sound and he had passed the grand stand a gay-hearted lad, his cheeks glowed by the wind, his bright short curls glistening in the sun, and with no more solemn thought in his mind than that, "If he won, perhaps the governor would not so much mind his having run away."

Now he was something which could not even think; something with a face which was a fearful parody on himself; something which even an instant was going further away from the world without being able to breathe it a farewell.

"Breathing, but quite motionless, breathing stertorously," as the doctor expressed it, who is one minute quickly collected round the fallen youth; some half a dozen take off their coats with eager kindness, and stretching them over the hard bars of a neighboring gate, carry the body to a farm-house, where the doctor and a few of the farmer's friends keep watch over the unfortunate gentleman, Madonna, lying still, but too true a prophet when he shouted to Primrose, "For the last time."

Unconscious of Conrad's fate, the other three pursue their way; Thurstan increasing his lead, Flitter waiting with the bravest patience, for he knows he must win, and once Antelope, and Knowlton gradually tailing off; the lorgnettes at the stand can now discern the state of the race, and the general practice of the ring to discredit Antelope.

"The favorite's beat!" roar the bookmakers.

"Piff Paff wills in," they add.

But Mowbray has not yet won over the brook, and nearly as he thinks of it he would be more cautious and less confident if he saw a starving white bird appear, and, perching on the rail, survey the people, and the open space left for the steeplechasers, comes bounding along and arrives on the opposite bank just as Piff Paff is making his spring. It is too late to make any effort to avert the catastrophe, and in an instant dog, horse, and rider are rolling in the mud. Thurstan looks round to the reins, and taking them over Piff Paff's head, gallops on to the finish, feeling immediately throws his arms round the horse's neck, while a by-stander assists him in readjusting the bit.

The fallen jockey is raised to a sitting posture, followed by Madonna, and dreading Mowbray's reappearance, makes play at the best pace his tiring legs can afford, having no conviction that even the slow but honest Madonna may, if she can only get alongside of him, snatch the victory at the last few strides.

Layers look black, and backers rejoice.

"The favorite wins easy!" thinks the crowd, and in the excitement of excitement even those who forget to wonder if that dear little boy, carried away on the litter, was much injured.

"It is Mowbray coming on!" shouts Flitter to a countryman, staring with all his might at the closing issue of the race. But Antelope has not yet given way before the pressure of the query reaches the stupefied yokel.

The other riders are coming on, hand over hand, knowing his horse will try, and that Antelope will show the white feather if Piff Paff can but overtake him. Mowbray does all he knows, and clearing the last fence is soon within fifty yards of the leader. Catching and passing the hazen Mowbray creeps up inch by inch; at the distance he is within ten lengths, and resolves to wait to the last. They are now close to home. Antelope's ears are up, his tail is over his tail, a symptom of defeat not lost on Mowbray, who calls on his horse with all the power of his voice, and with a last effort finds Antelope raising, and almost against his better judgment, picks up his whip; he finds no response from his exhausted nag, and sits at once on the ebullition of punishment Antelope lays his right short and reels round, the jockey flies, and the favorite is the winner by half a length.

"You have ridden magnificently, my boy," Major Welter is heard shaking his jock's hand energetically, "and by Jove! it's the making of me, Mowbray."

Later he added, "Don't go down into the country, Mowbray; stay and make a night of it in town with me."

"No," Thurstan said, with an odd look on his haggard face. "I shan't go down into the country, I'm going abroad. Welter. Between you and me, there was a dead woman holding her face close to mine during all that race, and I want to get away from her. I shall go home to my people."

Late that night Lord Orme bent over his dying boy, yearning for one look, one word of recognition, but "For the last time. For the last time," was all that Conrad said; and these piteous echoes of his fatal encouragement to poor Primrose were the only coherent words that passed his lips.

When the sun next dawned the lad was at peace, and Lord Orme, stricken to the heart by the unexpected anguish of this last misfortune, kissed the poor bruised lips with his face streaming with tears, and asked himself if this were retribution!

THE AUSTRALIAN REPUBLIC.

We have received a printed document setting forth sixteen reasons for the independence of the six Australian colonies, and their federation in the form of a Republic. The reasons are good, and the time is ripe for the establishment of it. Some have only room for the following extract: "As Australia and New Zealand, with area and capabilities for supporting a population of 50,000,000, count as yet less than 2,000,000, their first great vital 'want' is, of necessity, the want of more people, the want of that more capital and labor, energy, enterprise, art, and skill, ever, by the golden stream of emigration, flowing from the Old World to fructify the New. That in the last fifty years, while only one million British colonists have settled in British colonies in America, four millions have settled in the adjacent United States, and that as German and Continental emigrants have been wholly so the latter, it may fairly be estimated that, in the last half century, for every one emigrant family settling in Australasia under the British flag, we have chosen to settle under the Stars and Stripes. That as the natural advantages of large portions of the British colonies in America are not inferior to those of the United States, this sixfold superiority of the latter over the former in popularity and repute, as an emigration field, proves that, politically and socially, an independent Republic of British origin and genius is vastly more attractive to Continental emigrants than a British World than are subordinate British colonies, and that this pregnant fact alone might wisely determine Australasia to cease to be the one, and to become the other."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ANY THING BUT A FICTION-IN-LAW—A Mother-in-Law!

May a glass of spirits taken in a garret be called a dram-atic performance?

A "HARD" QUESTION—A blind man's dog.

The Earl of ——, of pompous notoriety and pare-monious celebrity, superintends personally the pedigree of his cattle. He sent word last week by his valet to the village children with his own hands. One morning a group of them presented themselves at the door, either to be hobnobbed with. Pleased with the appearance of the child, he patted her on the head and gave her a kiss. "Now, my pretty lass," he said, "you have got a kiss from your lord; but you have been kissed by an earl." "Ah! but," replied the child, "we look for nothing though!"

John Smith fell in love with a maid;
Each night 'neath the window he stood,
And there, with his air personal,
He wakened the whole neighborhood!
But vainly he tried to arouse
Her sleep with his strains so bewitching;
While he played in front of the house
She slept in the little back kitchen.

An old lady was asked what she thought of the ecliptic. "Ecliptic, indeed, no ever heard such a thing; and that is, that the papers don't always lie."

A quick medicine vender at the South beads one of his advertisements as follows: "Sick Babies Wanted.

APOLOGETIC.

I'd offer thee this bunch of mine,
If thou but hadst the dimes.
But posies wort sell and slim se thine
Won't do for these hard times.
I view her fees in thy wistfulness,
As one too poor to mate,
For thou art rich in thy loveliness
When based on real estate.

MARK TWAIN AT THE TOMB OF ADAM.—"The tomb of Adam" is what we should have been in a land of strangers, far away from home, and friends, and all else dear to us, but for the kindness here, for he will find little to his taste in my journeyings through Holy Land. And now—for I am still but in sad sooth—he did not live to see his child. And I—I—alas! I die and he is not. Now, he is gathered down by sorrow and disappointment, he died before I was born—six thousand years before I was born. But let us try to bear it with fortitude. Let us trust that he is better off where he is.

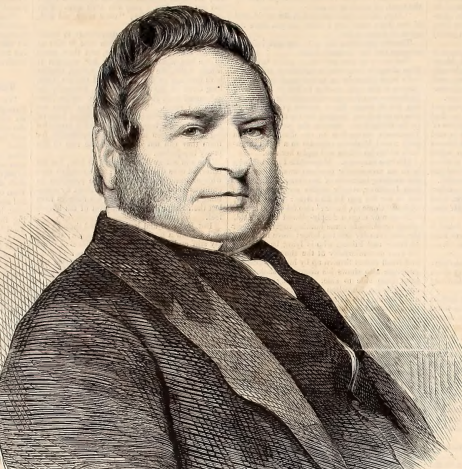
A WHEELCIPEDE.

It has only one wheel,
Neither treadle nor saddle;
It is built to stand still,
That you don't have to straddle.
The man who performs
Takes hold with his hands
Of two upright arms,
And on the ground stands.
Pats his feet in order,
One after the other,
While the arms go slow.
While the feet go faster,
This funny machine
Goes—for a mile or spring—
It is useful to carry
Material for building—
Shingles and shavings,
Brick, lime, and plaster—
And the lighter the load
It can travel the faster.
It is better than a bicycle,
For it isn't so nervous
And our wheelcipede
Is not a wheel-to-borrow!

"Bridget, what became of the tallow I greased my boots with this morning?" "I fried the buckwheat in it." "Oh, I was afraid you had wasted it."

REV. F. J. JOBSON, D.D.

At the opening of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference at Hull, England, early in August, the Rev. FREDERICK J. JOBSON, D.D., was elected President of the Conference during the twelvemonth ensuing, and received from Mr. HALL, the retiring President, the official seal of the Conference, and JOHN WESLEY'S pocket Bible. Dr. JOBSON was born at Lincoln in 1817; and, having received a good education, was articled to learn the profession of an architect, with Mr. WILLSON, F.S.A., of Lincoln. While living under his master's roof Mr. JOBSON received much literary instruction from the Roman Catholic clergy who frequented Mr. WILLSON'S house. But he remained a Protestant, and entered the Wesleyan Ministry in 1834. From that time to this he has been untiring in his services to the Church of his choice. He has been stationed in some of the most important circuits in the Methodist connection, including the First London, First Leeds, Fifth Manchester, and Bradford Circuits. He was also appointed by the Conference to visit the Methodist Episcopal Church of America, in company with Dr. HANNAH. While in America he expressed his humane sympathies with the negro race, and declined to be separated from them either in traveling or at the table. It was from one of the American universities that he got the degree of D.D. Dr. JOBSON has published several works which have attained success in Methodist literature; among his other works are "Australia, with Notes by the Way;" "A Mother's Portrait," and "A Tribute to the Memory of Dr. Bunting." He is one of the best preachers in the connection; and his conduct as President is distinguished by strict impartiality and amiable manners.



REV F. J. JOBSON, D.D., PRESIDENT OF THE WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE, ENGLAND.

THE WAR IN CUBA.

It is impossible even yet to ascertain the precise situation in Cuba, as between the Spaniards and the Patriots. But, whatever may be the result of the conflict, there can be no doubt as to its desolating character. The picture which we give on this page is a characteristic representation of the Vandalism to which both parties seem to have abandoned themselves. Confiscation and despoliation are the order of the day. Such events as that illustrated have frequently occurred.

HON. FOSTER BLODGETT.

Few men of any age or country have been the object of more unmerited abuse and persecution, at the hands of political opponents, than the Hon. FOSTER BLODGETT, Chairman of the State Central Committee of the Republican party in Georgia. A man of strong native intellect, a bold and original thinker, independent in character, sincere in his convictions, ardent in devotion to principle, and uncompromising and determined in the execution of his plans, Mr. BLODGETT has long been regarded as a representative man of his State, and one of the most formidable opponents of the pro-rebel Democracy of his native section. That such a man should be assigned leadership in his own party, and thereby excite the bitterest animosities of his opponents, is not unnatural. The first public man in Georgia to openly advocate the organization of a political party in the State looking to the overthrow of the old sectional hierarchy, and the restoration of the State to its proper relations with the Union, upon the basis of Republican principles, he early endeared himself to the Union men of his section, and he also called down upon his head the anathemas of the decaying political dynasty of Georgia.

Mr. BLODGETT was born in Augusta, Georgia, January 15, 1826, and is consequently now in his forty-fourth year. He was educated in the common schools of his own State, and entered the arena of politics as a Union Whig of the HENRY CLAY school—thus beginning his career as an uncompromising opponent of the dominant party of his State. Only three months after attaining to his majority he was elected member of the Common Council of his native city, and served in that capacity for several years. At the age of twenty-four he was elected Bridge Keeper, and to that position of trust and responsibility was annually re-elected for five successive years, when he refused longer to be a candidate for the place. In 1856 he was elected Judge of the Probate Court, and School Commissioner for Richmond County; and the appreciation of his services in this capacity was shown by his re-election in 1860. In August, 1859, at the age of thirty-three, he was chosen Mayor of the city, and the Augusta Water-Works, which have been carried on so successfully, were planned by him, and completed during his administration. In 1860 he was again the choice of the people for Mayor. He was also appointed a delegate for the State at large to the Convention that met in Baltimore, May, 1860, and which nominated BELL, of Tennessee, and EVERETT, of Massachusetts, as candidates of the Whig-Union party for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency of the United States. It was during this memorable year that he presided, at the hazard of his life, over the last Union mass meeting held in Georgia previous to the outbreak of the rebellion; and it was from this date that those persecutions by secession leaders commenced, which have steadily pursued him to the present moment. At one time, during the progress of the war, these persecutions became so bitter and relentless as to victimize him under the military exactions of the DAVIS government, and force him for a time into the rebel army. He succeeded, however, in so far extricating himself from the military shackles as to return to his family with an honorable discharge, without ever having fired upon his country's flag. After the surrender of the rebel forces he was appointed, by President JOHNSON (June 25, 1865), Postmaster at Augusta. Refusing to become a party to Mr. JOHNSON's defection, he was suspended from the functions of his office, January 1, 1867, but was restored by the Postmaster-General, March 31, 1869. On the 1st of May, 1868, and during the period of his suspension by Mr. JOHNSON, he was appointed Mayor of Augusta by General PORE, then Commandant of the Third Military District—a position which he held until December, 1868.

THE CUBAN INSURRECTION—THE PATRIOTS BURNING A SUGAR-MILL IN LOS INGENIOS, NEAR TRINIDAD.

Mr. BLODGETT was President of the first Republican Convention ever held in Georgia. This occurred on the 4th of July, 1867, and will be long remembered as the opening of that memorable political campaign which, for bitterness of invective and malignity of personal hatreds, stands almost unparalleled in the annals of partisan warfare. It was, in very truth, "a time to try men's souls." Inspired by the audacity and leadership of the old secession magnates, and encouraged by the defection of Governor JENKINS and the obstinacy of President JOHNSON, the Democratic press of the State teemed with the grossest personal abuse of the more prominent leaders of the Reconstruction movement, and sought to manufacture a public sentiment that would rigidly ostracize every man suspected of "Radicalism," and even encourage wives to leave their husbands, and justify assassination itself for political opinions' sake. So terrible was this storm of malevolent invective and denunciation, so rigid the social ostracism it occasioned, that many true Republicans lacked the moral courage to assert their honest convictions; and, rather than subject themselves and their families to such an ostracism, abandoned the field, and, in some instances, publicly recanted their faith! It was under such circumstances as these that FOSTER BLODGETT—a Southern man—took a bold and determined stand for the Right, as against the clamor of a turbulent mob, and thereby became the central figure in this momentous drama. His election to the position of Chairman of the State Central Executive Committee seemed less a matter of form than necessity; and under his able administration confidence was restored in the Republican ranks, and the Convention was called by a respectable majority of the registered voters. As a member of the State Constitutional Convention he was active and vigilant, originating many of the most important resolutions and ordinances that were adopted by that body. At the close of the campaign, and after the new State government had been inaugurated, Mr. BLODGETT received the nomination of his party for the position of United States Senator; but, through the defection of one or two Republicans, who essayed to become "respectable" with the pro-rebel faction, he was defeated by his election before the General Assembly, and Dr. H. V. M. MILLER—the representative of a compromise between the Reconstructionists and the Democrats—was elected over the regular Republican nominee. As a delegate to, and one of the vice-presidents of, the National Republican Convention at Chicago that nominated GRANT and COLFAX to the Presidency and Vice-Presidency, Mr. BLODGETT was active and conspicuous, and few men in the South contributed so much of time, energy, and personal sacrifice to the interests of the Republican ticket as he did. At present he is Treasurer of the Western and Atlantic (State) Railroad—the great railway thoroughfare of the State, northward, to the Tennessee Valley—a position of great trust and pecuniary responsibility, to which he was recently appointed by Governor BULLOCK.

HON. FOSTER BLODGETT.

In person Mr. BLODGETT is of medium height and size, slenderly but compactly built, and possesses extraordinary powers of physical and mental endurance. His moral and intellectual faculties are well developed; in temperament he is nervous-sanguine, and walks erect, with a light, elastic step. In manner he is quiet and engaging; in conversation ready and always interesting. His words are generally few and well chosen, and never fail to elicit attention, whether spoken in a tumultuous assemblage or in the more quiet decorum of the committee-room. He is eminently one of the representatives of the "self-made men" of our times; and has attained to great political influence in his section, without appearing to have sought it, or to have suspected that he possessed it.

RAKING FOR CLAMS.

THE fleet of boats engaged in the clam business in Prince's Bay, south of Staten Island, numbers about one hundred and fifty vessels, of from two to twenty tons burden, and manned each by two or three men. This fleet sends to the New York markets during the summer season between 300,000 and 400,000 clams per week, and during the fall and winter seasons about double that quantity. The clams sell at the boats for about $3 50 to $4 per thousand.

Our illustration on this page is from a characteristic drawing by Mr. EDWIN FORBES.

RAKING FOR CLAMS, PRINCE'S BAY.—[DRAWN BY EDWIN FORBES.]

A VERY SMALL COLONY.

When the great Napoleon was conveyed to "Wild St. Helena," there to wear out his giant heart chafing against the iron rule of Sir Hudson Lowe, the English placed a garrison on the little island of Tristan D'Acunha, thirteen hundred miles to the south of the sentry-girt Longwood, to act as "outposts," or picket, to the naval guard around St. Helena.

The Conqueror of Europe, obtaining in a few years the whitest comfort of Europe, the garrison was withdrawn from Tristan D'Acunha, and three men-o'-war sailors were left undisputed masters of this bright little gem of the sea.

When H.M.S. Gorgon visited the group of Islands of which Tristan D'Acunha is the largest and only inhabitable one, the approach to the shore was found difficult; indeed, it would be inaccessible were it not for a beautiful and copious provision of Nature, which has erected on the northeast side a natural breakwater of giant sea-weed, which makes the water as quiet as a mill-pond. The Gorgon was boarded by six straggling seamen, who came off in a very fine whale-boat, and accompanied some officers to shore.

They found there about a dozen huts, all built of solid stone, evidently the work of much patience and labor, but necessary to withstand the furious northerly gales. These huts were boxes are built here, there, and every where, more detached than one would think they should be for society's sake. Each has its little garden of potatoes, "cask" kennels, mongrel Newfoundland dogs, and substantial pig-sties. The inhabitants of the island were, in all, forty-three—seven men, and children. They are all related, but it is difficult to say how, as they have intermarried with each other until a few years ago, when Mr. Taylor visited them from the Cape of Good Hope, and for the sum of $3000 (which a philanthropic old Englishman left for the purpose) remanned five years, improving and training their morals, etc.

This would be a happy family, but, strange to say, they are quite the contrary.

The patriarchs, at the period of the Gorgon's visit, were Peter Swain, aged eighty-two, and Alexander Cotton, seventy-nine, both old man-of-war's men, discharged from the service half a century before on this their island.

The inhabitants subsist mainly on their land productions, having herds of fine sheep and cattle, but obtain their luxuries by exchanging the monsters of the deep with masters of ships calling for water. During the months of January and August considerable numbers of sea-elephants are caught, the larger of which yield about four barrels of oil each. They are very small and of little value. The islands also swarm with seals, from two thousand to three thousand having been seen in one year.

Whales are also caught, but seldom. The sea alone would make this dreary colony rich had they a good and safe Yankee population, the present possessors making no exertion until a ship arrives; then the whaling, sealing, etc., commences. The latter all they catch for the English and American goods, and then they lie on their cots instead of laying in stocks of valuable oil, skins, teeth, and beef, etc., ready for the next ship, the sure sale of which would speedily enrich them, and enable them to return to their father-land with independent fortunes.

THE SOLAR MUTABILITY.

Science is every day teaching us to think of the sun, and what have now been so long called the "fixed" stars, with less and less of that sense of fixity which these enormous journeys to planetary beings would seem to render desirable. Not only have we learned that all these so-called fixed centers of our immediate universes are themselves traveling in different directions (dragging their planetary systems after them), with enormous speed, through vast distances from any system we can see great that, in the few centuries we have had to study them, the change has not become even sensible to ordinary perception; but we have also learned that many of them are "variable" stars—now sun among the numberless, becoming brighter, and again less bright at fixed intervals of years: that some of them have broken up and disappeared in the years (or perhaps thousands of years) before the blank caused by their disappearance could have struck the human retina. Nay more, we now know that some suns (resembling in this probably most other solar bodies of the same kind) is in so highly fluid and excitable a condition as to be constantly sending out from its surface forked tongues (thousands of miles in extent) of inflamed hydrogen gas, like the flickering flames of light from the stars of a street illumination; and, moreover, as to be subject to great periodical disturbances, now called "magnetic storms," which are in all probability caused by certain combinations in the movements of those little solid bodies, on one of which we live, round them. Even now one such epoch of magnetic storm seems to be thought pretty near at hand. The sun has been lately exhibiting the most surprising forms of disturbance, and presenting to scientific eyes less "fixity" of essence than ever. Spots so vast that we must estimate their dimensions by millions of square miles have broken out from time to time, and have presented rapid changes of figure, indicating the action of forces of inconceivable intensity. Clusters of smaller spots, extending over yet vaster areas, have exhibited every form of disturbance known to the solar physicist, and every degree of light, from the apparent blackness (in reality only flatness) of the nuclei, to the intense brilliancy of the faculous ridges.

And we now know that these appearances are NOT merely matters for the curious, with which, as they happen at a distance of above ninety millions of miles, practical men need not concern themselves. In point of fact, it is by no means impossible that the issues of peace or war, of a financial crisis, or a religious agitation, may be closely bound up with these phenomena—if not, indeed—which is also quite possible—the sudden disappearance of our whole system after the fashion of other solar systems which have thus disappeared. This much, at least, is certain, that the vast electric energy which is the physical constitution of the sun are changes which do most powerfully affect the electric condition of our earth, which, in the form of aurora and the most violent disturbances in the various artificial as well as natural electric apparatus of the world we live in, is rapidly becoming a great of all its possible effects, might, just as well as not, happen some day to throw the electric condition of either a department or the whole planet, under the sea or above it, into the most dire confusion, and send down telegraphic companies' shares to zero in a lump, even if they did not contrive to telegraph to us, after some strange matricidal fashion, that there is all public mischief in store, even in that very limited public company, the human race, are, in a physical point of view, of very doubtful value indeed. Let us explain briefly to what we allude.

On September 1, 1859, shortly before noon, two astronomers, Carrington and Hodgson, watched—one at Oxford, the other in London, were at the same instant scrutinizing a large group of sun spots, when a sudden flood of intense white patches of light appeared in front of the cluster. So brilliant were they that the observers thought the darkening glasses through which their eyes must have become fractured. But the truth was found not to be the case. The bright spots indicated some portion going on which was not merely a process of such activity that within five minutes the spots traveled over a space of nearly 240,000 miles. Now, in point of velocity there are self-registering magnetic instruments which indicate the processes of change by which the subtle influences are thrown through space, and wane. At one time the line traced by the pointer will be marked by scarcely perceptible undulations, showing the almost complete repose of the great terrestrial magnet. At another, well-marked waves along the line indicate the undulations of the magnetic system, influenced in a manner as yet unintelligible to the physicist. And then there are the fits of violent agitation, the sharp, sudden jerks of the pointer exhibiting the occurrence of those mysterious phenomena termed "magnetic storms," by which the operators of the Kew Observatory came to be looked over, it was found that at the very instant at which the brilliant spots of light on the sun had been seen, Hodgson and Carrington, the self-registering instruments had been subjected to the third and most significant form of the influence—a magnetic storm began, in fact, as the light broke out on the sun's surface. But this was not the only evidence of the sympathy of the earth with the sun's surface. At this

MOUNT HOPE NURSERIES.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

(ESTABLISHED 1840.)

GENTLEMEN improving their grounds, ORNAMENTISTS, LANDSCAPE GARDENERS, NURSERYMEN, and FLORISTS in Trees, will find our stock of Fruit and Ornamental Trees the largest, and the collection the most extensive and complete in the U. S.

All orders, large or small, will receive prompt and careful attention. Packing for distant points performed in the most skillful and thorough manner.

Small parcels sent by mail when so desired.

Descriptive and Illustrated priced Catalogues sent prepaid on receipt of stamps, as follows:

No. 1.—Fruits, &c. No. 2.—Ornamental Trees, &c. No 3.—Green-House, &c. No 4.—Wholesale, free.

Address

ELLWANGER & BARRY,
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

August, 1869.

CYPRESS HILLS CEMETERY.

OFFICE, No. 124 BOWERY, N. Y., (Corner of Grand Street).

OFFICERS:

EDMUND DRIGGS, President.
WM. J. FRASE, Vice-President.
WILLIAM MILES, Treasurer.
WILLIAM EDWARDS, Secretary.
A. S. JARVIS, HERVEY G. LAW, JOHN I. VAN ALST, ALFRED M. WOOD, Trustees.
N. G. PALMER, Supt and Surveyor.

The Climax Knitter!!

This is, without question, the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. It is simple, light, not liable to get out of order, durable, works very rapidly, has but one needle, makes the old-fashioned knitting-needle stitch (and two others) with light or heavy, single or double yarn, sets up and finishes the work, and needs no weights. It knits close or loose textures, knits a 2d welt, large or small fabrics—anything that can be knit by hand, and in a much better manner. A child can readily operate it, and can learn to do so much sooner than to knit with ordinary needles. There is nothing to be done but to thread a needle and turn a crank, until the heel is reached, which is formed to perfection, while turning and also narrowing; the same is the case with the toe.

The price of this Knitter is but $30.00, which places it within the reach of every family. It is destined to be very popular. Any one can offer agents, grocers and special, exceedingly liberal terms for engaging in its sale. Send for Circular.

Address ESSICK KNITTING MACHINE CO., 8 W. corner 11th and Chestnut Sts., Philadelphia, Pa.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal so much like genuine gold as to be undetected by the public. Its brilliancies and resemblance to Gold are such that even experts have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of the scientific men, and has not only called forth the commendation of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exhibition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

Price from $15 to $25.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.

Goods sent by Express, C. O. D., with charges.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 82 Nassau Street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED, Local and Traveling, for the New American Patent Rotary and Vegetable Chopper. The best thing in the market. Sells at sight. Sample Machine, Terms, &c., address D. A. NEWTON & Co., 49 Cortlandt Street, N. Y.

SEND ONE DOLLAR, and get a sample mink sent of LORING'S DOLLAR BOOKS of elegant French Note-Paper, with your initials. Address LORING, Publisher, Boston.

$25 A DAY. — 33 new articles for Agents. Sample free. B. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

EMPLOYMENT that pays. For particulars, address S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

"As natural as Thackeray, and more real than Dickens."

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Now just published:

My Daughter Elinor.

A NOVEL.

8VO, PAPER, $1 25.

A good American novel, presenting life and society in the United States in the life that we live and the society of which we are a constituent part—has long been the desideratum of publishers and the despair of novel-readers. * * * A story in which the characters are typical of American people as they differ from the same social representatives of other countries, is rarely issued from the press. Such a story is "My Daughter Elinor," which is destined to attain a wide popularity, because delineating with natural ease and verisimilitude the life that is around us. It is from no hand but the historian-philosopher of the foibles of the age of which he writes. In Mr. Grey we have the portraiture of the accomplished politician in "My Daughter Elinor" we have a real woman of to-day and such as many a reader has made love to in the days of premières jeunesse. The style is easy and unaffected, at times straining overmuch at epigram, and again running a little into slipshod; and the dialogue is natural and effective, never torturing with obvious comment or teasing with inevitable inference. Mrs. Rickett is a fresh and delightful Mrs. Malaprop, and Tad Tilmon is an original drawn from nature. The reader must learn the plot of "My Daughter Elinor" from the novel itself.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The style is clear and vigorous, the dialogues are animated and interesting.—N. Y. Herald.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1.25.

THE CELEBRATED IMITATION GOLD WATCHES.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our Agents Outside Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our manufactures, we deem it our duty to caution the public against them, and give notice that there is no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch or our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide of COLLINS METAL," and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL Improved Oroide.

This Metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is worked up to gold exceeding in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are fitted Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Case, and fully guaranteed as Gold certificate. The 3/4 Watches are equal in movement, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold case costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $100. Ladies' size, from $12 to $20.

JEWELERY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Gold Pencil and Pen Cases, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), as we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our published prices. We retail to consumers, therefore, have the benefit of our lowest price. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindles. The genuine Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York. Parties at a distance can remit by draft, money or letters, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office. Goods sent by express, C. O. D., to all express agents. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only Office is No 335 BROADWAY, corner Worth Street (Up Stairs), New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

LIVINGSTON'S PATENT

BRACED WEB SAW.

PATENT GROOVE.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and its inventor pronounces it the best saw in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., Bellows Falls, Vt., N. Y.

Bloomington Nursery.

600 Acres 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.

Fruit, Ornamental and Nursery Stock, immense and reliable assortment, very low for cash.

Address (printing must suit) Important stock of everything, also hardy Northern sorts, such as Duchess, Olden, Wealthy, Transcendent, Hyslop, Lyman, Crab, &c., 1, 2, and 3 year.

Pears, Plums, Cherries, Plums, Quinces, Grapes, Forest and Evergreen Trees, Nursery Stocks, Osage Orange Hedge Plants, Roses, Greenhouse Vines, Bedding Plants, Narcissus, Iris, Spoilla, Lobias, Specimens, Aurantias, &c. Also number colored plates of Apples and Flowers. Send 15 cents for Catalogues.

F. K. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

SWEET QUININE. SWEET QUININE *is warranted equal—*done for dose—to the tasteless Quinine Pills, and is an important advantage of being sweet instead of bitter.

SYAPNIA. SYAPNIA IS OPIUM PERFECTLY DEPRIVED of its Narcotic and Constipating properties. It is the most perfect Anodyne, Tonic and Sedative yet discovered.

Sold by druggists, and by wood physicians.

STEARNS, FARR, & CO., Chemists, New York.

"FOLD HIS HANDS GENTLY."

This beautiful new Song was written on the occasion of the death of a young child, and many parents who have been similarly bereaved will be interested in it. Words and music are of a tender, and extreme simplicity and appropriateness of the music. New Edition will be ready, free of postage, on receipt of the price, 30c. CORY BROTHERS, Publishers, 4 Bond Street, N. Y.

FLORENCE MARRYAT'S NEW NOVEL, "REPONIQUE," is nearly ready. Miss Marryat says: "It is my favorite of all my novels or stories." Price 75 cents, in paper covers.

LORING, Publisher, Boston.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

Saving of our premium list of Printing Presses, and paying it, every man can do his own printing; thus saving much time and expense. Circular containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free. Specimen of Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 93 Murray Street, New York.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machine. The best under the sun. Will stitch, hem, fell, stitch on both sides. First machine on trial. For further particulars, address

THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $5, $13, $16. Offices, $18, $30, $50. Send for a circular to

KELSEY & CO.,
18 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

PSYCHOMANCY, Fascination; or, Science of the Human Will. Illustrated. Price, 40 cents. 400 pages. Cloth. By HERBERT HAMILTON, B.A. A curious book for inquisitive people. It contains complete instructions to acquire this wonderful power over men or animals. Can be obtained by enclosing price in stamp and address to T. W. EVANS & CO.,
41 South 4th Street, Philadelphia.

TILTON'S Fashionable Initial Note-Paper and Envelopes,

Neatly put up in Dollar or Half-Dollar Boxes, and SENT BY MAIL, POSTPAID, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Send for a box to

J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston.

TROY PENCIL SEMINARY.—This Institution offers the accumulated advantages of over 50 years' successful operation. For circulars address JOHN F. SWIFT & CO., Troy, N. Y.

$9 A DAY FOR ALL. Address A. J. FULLAM, 502 Broadway, N.Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Have just Published:

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution," &c. With Maps and Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Sketches made by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1104 pages, large 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By JAMES GREENWOOD, the "Amateur Casual" and author of "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "Reuben Davidger," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

FAMOUS LONDON MERCHANTS. A Book for Boys. By J. R. Peddie. With Introduction by Clement Scott, and 34 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

SIGHTS AND SENSATIONS IN FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND; or, Experiences of an American Journalist in Europe. By EDWARD GOULD BUFFUM. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SANDS'S PHILOSOPHY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, the Pupil, the School. By NATHANIEL SANDS. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Miscarriages of the Cultivator of a Cruel Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss as Involved in Amateur Farming, with Much Valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Large or Small Pieces in the Rural Districts. By RODNEY B. MOORESLEY. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

A PARSER AND ANALYZER FOR BEGINNERS, with Diagrams and Suggestive Pictures. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, Author of "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

HISTORIC; a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Colleges, and for Private Study. By Rev. B. G. HAYDEN, D.D., Rector of Christ Church, Northwestern University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro," "Palm Trees of the Amazon," &c. With Ten Maps and Fifty-one elegant Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By GEORGE C. SHERP. With 170 Illustrations. Cloth, extra, $4 00.

THREE SEASONS IN EUROPEAN VINEYARDS. Treating of Vine-Culture, Vine Diseases and its Cure, Wine-Making and Wines, Red and White; Wine-Drinking as affecting Health and Morals. By WILLIAM J. FLAGG. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map and Colored Plan. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Revised Edition. Eighth Year. Large 18mo, Leather Pocket-Book Form, $2 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a Most Improved Method. Intended to Supersede "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By F. COLTON WOOLSEY, A.M., Assistant Professor in Hamilton University. With exercises and explicit Rules in the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER & BROTHERS'
SPECIAL TRADE SALE,
1869.

FROM AUGUST 16 TO SEPT. 25.

FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK, August, 1869.

We invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books, which we will sell on the following terms, for Cash, from the 16th of August to the 25th of September, after which our terms will positively be as heretofore.

On Orders of $ 500 at one time, 25 per cent. discount;
" $ 500 " 30 " "
" $1000 " 33⅓ " "
" $2000 " 35 " "

And an additional deduction of Five per cent. for Cash.

We shall not sell at any of the Trade Sales this Fall.

The Special List will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

The Novelty is the best Press ever invented with which to do your own Printing. Any boy can learn to run it. Price of Presses, $15, $30, $32, $60.

Send to BENJ. O. WOODS, Agent, 13 Spruce Street, Boston, Mass., for descriptive circular containing testimonials from every country, with specimens of work done on the press, and specimen sheets of Types, Cuts, Borders, &c.

PIANOS and ORGANS.

Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of first-class makers, for $675 and upward. New Cabinet Organs, of the best quality. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $40 to $175. HORACE WATERS & SON, 481 Broadway, N. Y.

IDA LEWIS.—Just Published: Theodore Tilton's POLLY MACLEOD, for the Piano, with full-size Photograph Picture of Ida Lewis, on title-page, Ida Lewis, the Heroine of Lime Rocks' Light, Newport, in Costume of Rescue of March 29th, 1869. Copies mailed free of postage, on receipt of price, 40 cents. CORY BROTHERS, Music Publishers, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

WANTED AGENTS.—$75 to $200 per month, in their own town, to introduce, in families, the NEW NOVELTY SEWING MACHINE. A new thing. Price $18. Fully warranted. Price for Hand Machine, $18; with Table and Foot power, $28. Send for Circular, with Cut of Machine and terms to Agents. Address W. S. HILL, Manchester, N. H.

WATCHES FOR THE MILLION.

The GREAT TRADE-IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION (Incorporated) have for sale 20,000 Full Plate Gold and Silver WATCHES, upon the one-price general-average principle, which will enable any one to obtain a desirable buying elsewhere. Agents wanted.

Address GREAT TRADE-IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION, Broadway, cor. Fulton St., New York.

WANTED AGENTS.—To sell the American Button-Hole, Over-Seaming and Sewing Machine. Price $50. The most simple, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine ever invented. It will knit a pair of stockings per minute. Liberal inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE COMPANY, Boston, Mass., or Chicago, Ill.

ALL that is required of SASH FASTENERS, A Walker's Patent will do. They never break. Address WALKER & CO.—FEDERAL ALLEY & CO., 81 Whitlock Exposition, 39 Park Place, N. Y.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $75 per month and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

PARLOR STEAM ENGINE.—Perfect in Safety of Metal; Boiler and Furnace complete; will work for hours if supplied with water, &c. Free from danger; a child can work it. Sent free, with instructions, for $1 00; three for $2 50. Address WALTER HOLT, No. 162 Nassau Street, New York.

WANTED ON SALARY.—Experienced Practical AGENTS for the NEW MASONIC WORK. For Members of the Fraternity this is a rare chance. Send for Circular. M. W. REDDING, 497 Broadway, N. Y.

Use B. A. Fahnestock's Vermifuge.

The New Novels

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

META'S FAITH. A Novel. By the Author of "St. Olave's." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FALSE COLORS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HETTY. By HENRY KINGSLEY. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. 8vo, Paper, $1 25.

STRETTON. A Novel. By HENRY KINGSLEY. 8vo, Paper, 40 cents.

CORD AND CREESE. By the Author of "The Lodge Club." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE DODGE CLUB; or, Italy in 1869. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "Cord and Creese." With 100 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS;

NEW EDITION, carefully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.

VANITY FAIR. 24 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.

THE VIRGINIANS. 189 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE NEWCOMES. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 64 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PAUL FOSTER'S DAUGHTER. By Anne Thomas. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PAUL FLEX. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

LITTLE LULU. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

☞ To be followed by Charles Reade's other Novels.

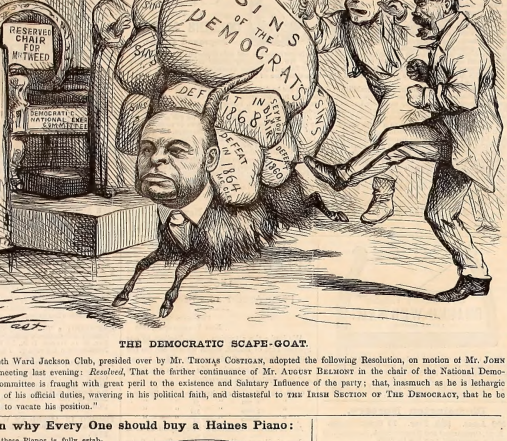
ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S LAST NOVELS:

PHINEAS FINN, the Irish Member. Illustrated by MARIUS. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.

HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Complete. With 64 Illustrations by MARIUS STONE. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, Uncut, $2 25.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.



THE DEMOCRATIC SCAPE-GOAT.

"The Twentieth Ward Jackson Club, presided over by Mr. THOMAS COSTIGAN, adopted the following Resolution, on motion of Mr. JOHN DELANY, at their meeting last evening: Resolved, That the further continuance of Mr. AUGUST BELMONT in the chair of the National Democratic Executive Committee is fraught with great peril to the existence of the Party; that, inasmuch as he is lethargic in the performance of his official duties, wavering in his political faith, and distasteful to the IRISH SECTION OF THE DEMOCRACY, that he be forthwith requested to vacate his position."

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRUEY, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, TENN.; KUNKEEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; J. B. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MOORE & BURNS, Pittsburg, Pa.; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; CLETTY & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HANSCOM, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; J. H. HINTERMEISTER, Ithaca, N. Y.; WAYTE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, MASS.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; C. M. MERON, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, CONN.

Middletown Mineral Spring Water cures all diseases of the Kidneys, Skin, and Blood more promptly than any other known remedy.

☞ Call for TESTIMONIALS or CURES. Sold by Druggists.

Caution.—All genuine bears our trade-mark, and the bottles and corks are branded "Nature's Remedy."
Address J. JAY JOSLIN,
Treas. M. M. S. Co.,
Middletown, Vt.

Or, S. H. Scripture, 193 Broadway, New York, General Agent.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,
WITH
PURE STERLING SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. SIMPSON, and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods in

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,
which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY,
Can not be Excelled.
All goods bearing our trade-mark,

"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"
ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED; and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, CONN.
SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 19 JOHN ST., N. Y.

SCHREIBER CORNETS and BAND INSTRUMENTS.
The most splendid instruments ever made. We are manufacturing all styles, and can readily supply all orders for sets. Send for Price-List and Circular.
M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,
680 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $500 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. Also, make the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Watertown, Pa., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.
CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE ECLIPSE
In Lots, including totality, all sizes. Stereoscopic, 25c. each; large, 85; postpaid. Trade supplied. WILSON, HOOD, & CO.,
Photographic Supplies, 823 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa.

PRETTY WOMEN.—A comparatively few ladies monopolize the beauty as well as the attention of society. This ought not to be so, but it is; and will be while men are foolish, and single out pretty faces for companions.

This can all be changed by using HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM, which gives the bloom of youth and a refined, sparkling beauty to the complexion, pleasing, powerful, and natural.

No lady need complain of a red, tanned, freckled, or rustic complexion who will invest 75 cents in HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM. Its effects are truly wonderful.

To preserve and dress the Hair use LYON'S KATHAIRON.

SAPOLIO will make Tins resemble Silver. Use only SAPOLIO to clean White Paint. From Marble Sapolio removes all Stains. For polishing Knives SAPOLIO is unsurpassed. For cleaning Bare Skin SAPOLIO has no equal. If you would have clean windows, use SAPOLIO. Sample cake sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents. Enoch Morgan's Sons, 211 Washington St., N. Y. Soaps of the finest kinds for family use.
Established 1809.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 118 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List; Baltimore, Md.

PARIAN & SON, MAKERS to all Gentlemen of Moustachium goods. Stores: 639 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 21 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Latter-Box 5846. Repairing and Boiling also done.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just published:
META'S FAITH.
A NOVEL.
BY THE AUTHOR OF
"ST. OLAVE'S," "JEANIE'S QUIET LIFE," &c.
8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

The perusal of "Meta's Faith" has afforded us wholesome pleasure. The tale creates strong interest by the naturalness and force of its delineations of character.—London Athenæum.

This book deserves much praise, and will well pay perusal.—British Quarterly Review.

A very interesting and attractive story, worthy of the accomplished author of "St. Olave's." Every character has a distinct individuality.—London Sun.

This book contains many of the excellences of the better novels of the class to which it belongs. It is fairly readable from first to last.—Saturday Review.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

GOING UP TOWN!
On the 15th of August we removed to
747 BROADWAY, near 8th St.,
and now offer our present stock of
CHINA, GLASS, AND FANCY GOODS
at very low prices.
Davis Collamore & Co.,
479 Broadway, near Broome St.

THOMSON'S
PATENT
"GLOVE-FITTING"

The Most Popular Corset ever introduced into the American Market.

The strongest proof of the excellence and popularity of this Corset is found in the numerous attempts to palm off worthless imitations as the genuine imported Glove-Fitting." We therefore call special attention to our stamp, which is always to be found on the genuine goods, and of which we give a fac-simile below.

TRADE MARK.
THOMSON'S PATENT IMPROVED GLOVE-FITTING

N.B.—All infringers of Patent or of our Copyright in Name, "Glove-Fitting," will be prosecuted.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
391 Broadway, N.Y.
Sole Importers and Patentees for the United States.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL
PERFECTLY SAFE.
Send for Circulars.
OIL HOUSE OF CHAS. PRATT,
Box 3050. 108 Fulton St., N.Y.

Life is the Gift of God.
When we are sick this life is obscured, under a cloud, oppressed with humors. Experience has taught us certain means which never fail for their removal. The child receives with his life the seeds of his death. It may take one, or one hundred years, before the seeds bear their sad fruit, but just as sure as the seeds of death ripen, life ceases. Purging is the grand safeguard, because then what fosters the seeds of death are taken away, expelled from the body.

Govern Yourselves by Experience.
My child, aged five years, had scarlet fever, and for five days had constant fever. By order of the doctor I gave her strap of rhubarb; she took nearly a pint, but her bowels continued closed. On the fifth day the doctor said her bowels must be opened or she would be lost. I prepared Brandreth's Pills. To this he would not consent, saying she was too weak. I consulted with my husband, and we concluded to give her three pills. In about four hours they operated, filling half full a common chamber. After that operation the fever left her, and she rapidly recovered.—Reference, 106 Clermont Avenue, Brooklyn.

TO SPORTSMEN!!

A very superior selection of Guns from Breech-Loading SHOT-GUNS, RIFLES, and PISTOLS, of our own Manufacture and Importation. FISHING TACKLE, POCKET CUTLERY, and Sportsmen's Articles. Sole Agents for W. E. PAPE'S Celebrated Muzzle and Breech Loaders.
HERMAN HULBERT,
Circulars supplied.] 285 Broadway, N.Y.

Of all Hygeian Waters that bubble from the earth, that of the Seltzer Spring in Germany is held to be the best in tonic, corrective, and cooling virtue. But it has some impurities, all of which are omitted, while all the peculiar virtues are intensified, in TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.
SOLD BY DRUGGISTS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

Kellogg's Liniment.—A time-tried and reliable Remedy for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all pains. May be used INTERNALLY or EXTERNALLY. Beware of Imitations. The genuine is signed "De Witt C. Kellogg." Price 25c., 50c., and $1.
Sold by all Druggists, and may be had wholesale of JOHN F. HENRY, No. 8 College Place, New York, at the Great United States Family Medicine Warehouse.

STEVENS' POCKET RIFLE.

With Detachable Shoulder-Rest.
Most popular arm made for Sporting and Target Shooting. Sights & Wiper's Rifles ready, in any quantity, for cash, at hundred price. WILLIAMSON'S DERRINGERS, and other Pistols.
J. W. STORRS & CO., M'f'r's Agents,
252 Broadway, New York.

4 PHOTOGRAPHS of the ECLIPSE, and full Report of all Government Expeditions, in Philadelphia Photographer for September. Just out. Postpaid, 35c. per copy. Trade supplied.
BENERMAN & WILSON, Publishers,
Photographic and Chemical Depot, Philadelphia, Pa.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.
Agents wanted. Knits every thing. Send to office, 176 Broadway, for Circulars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 664.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE NEW MERCANTILE LIBRARY BUILDING, SAN FRANCISCO.

The new Mercantile Library Building, San Francisco, California, is considered the finest building of the kind in America. This is conceded by even Bostonians who have visited San Francisco. It is located on Bush Street, near Sansom, and was completed in December of last year. The building is three stories high, with an attic. Its frontage is 69 feet on one street and 136 on another. The style of architecture is the modern Italian, with a Mansard roof. The front, rising 65 feet to the cornice, is largely composed of cast and wrought iron, and the designs are elegant. In the rear, on the first floor, there is an extensive lecture-room. On the second floor is the library, smoking and chess room, ladies' parlor, and apartments for the use of the Library Association. Above, on the third story, is the reading-room, museum, and art-gallery. The attic is divided into twenty-five rooms, and is let for various purposes, many of the apartments being used as studios by some of the leading San Francisco artists.

THE PLACE OF ARMS, HAVANA.

The beautiful situation of the chief city of Cuba, on the western shore of a magnificent landlocked harbor, from which it slopes into the luxuriant upland, clothed with dark verdure of the cocoa-nut palm groves, and adorned with numerous villas, has often been described. The interior of Havana, with its mean and narrow streets, except in one or two modern quarters of the city, is scarcely worthy of its commercial and political importance. The Plaza de Armas, shown in our engraving, is tolerably handsome, with several public edifices around it, and with two broad streets intersecting each other in the middle of the square, dividing it into four pleasant gardens or shrubberies. In the centre is a statue of FERDINAND VII., King of Spain, overtopped by four majestic palms. The palace of the Captain-General, or Viceroy of the island, fills one side of the square. Opposite to this stand several palaces, and a chapel is erected on the spot where, at the first founding of the city, the first mass was celebrated, under the shade of the ceiba-trees, some of which still exist. To the right are the Intendencia and other government buildings, and to the left is a line of houses and shops. During the daytime the burning heat of the tropical sun drives the Havana population into the shade of their own houses, or of the narrower and cooler streets; but in the cool of the evening the out-of-door life begins again. The military band performs every evening on the Plaza, and crowds of people swarm there to listen to the music. The streets are thronged with the elegant "Volanti" and "Quitrin," the characteristic national equipages, filled with ladies in brilliant toilets, while the promenaders enjoy the cool air beneath the starry sky or in the clear moonlight until the cessation of the music gives the sign for the general dispersion of the groups. Such is the aspect of the Plaza de Armas in peaceful times; but we had occasion, not many weeks ago, to give an illustration of a very different scene, when the Governor's palace was attacked at midnight by a mutinous mob of Spanish volunteer soldiery, whom the regular troops did not venture to disperse, so that General DULCE was forced to leave the island. Under the more vigorous government of his successor, General CABALLERO DE RODAS, the city of Havana is again tranquil; but the Cuban revolt is not yet subdued.

IMPORTED POULTRY.

The attention paid by farmers and poultry-raisers to imported breeds recently introduced into this country was illustrated by the interest manifested in the sale of fowls at the rooms of the American Agriculturist on the 18th of August. These fowls were sent here by JAMES C. COOPER, of Cooper Hill, in Limerick, Ireland. Specimens of the lot are given in our illustrations on page 604.

Each of the different "fancy breeds" has its peculiar and special merit. They are all valuable for their size, delicacy, and laying qualities. Perhaps the most generally and deservedly popular fowl is the Houdan, unsurpassed even by the Dorking for quality of flesh or for size. They are very hardy, and good winter layers. Their plumage is a mixture of black and white in large spangles. They are of French origin, and, like the Dorking, have five toes.

The duck-winged game are birds possessing elegance of form and beautiful plumage, yet they are the best of layers, and the flavor of their flesh is beyond comparison with that of any other fowl. They are small eaters.

The dark Brahmas are bred heavier than any other, single specimens having been known to weigh thirteen, fifteen, and even eighteen pounds. The pullets lay when six months old, and usually from thirty to forty eggs before they are inclined to hatch. They often begin to lay in autumn, and continue without a single day's interruption till spring.

The black, white-crested Polands weigh from five to six pounds, have an erect and bold carriage, and their crests are large, full, and regular.

The Crevacœurs and Cochins are greatly preferred in France for the quantity and quality of their flesh. A full-grown cock often weighs ten pounds. They are easily raised in confinement, mature early, and lay large eggs. The Cochin chickens, though they feather slowly, are hardier than any other breed except the Brahmas, and will thrive where others would perish. They grow fast, and may be killed when twelve weeks old. They are gentle, can not fly, and the hens are unsurpassed as setters and mothers.

The silver-spangled Poland is a most beautiful breed. It is bred to a very good size—six to seven pounds in the cock and four to five in the hen being the average weight. The Poland is an affectionate bird. Its favorable localities it is a prolific layer, and its flesh is remarkably good.

The La Fleche is a French variety peculiarly adapted to our Southern and Southwestern States. In colder climates they require great care, but they well repay it.

The Spanish breed, from which probably the La Fleche proceeds, is also sensitive to cold and dampness. They lay large white eggs, and, in moderate weather, very abundantly.

The Dorkings are an artificial and celebrated English breed. They are unsurpassed as table-fowls, combining the flavor and delicacy of game with an abundance of meat, and that in the choicest parts—the breast, merry-thought, and wings. The hen is an excellent setter and mother. The Dorking is a poor layer, especially in winter, and is difficult to raise in confinement.

The game Bantams are a comparatively recent variety of that breed, but they are hardier than any of the other varieties. They are delicate as food; there seems to be a peculiar closeness of texture in their meat, greater than in that of even their larger progenitors.

The Sebrights are a beautiful and ornamental variety, which may be recommended for exhibition, as well as for its intrinsic value.

AN ESQUIMAUX PARLIAMENT.

After the expenses of the very elaborate machinery of a company of Governmental merchants is defrayed, a quarter of the profits of the trade is credited to each district, to be again distributed among the natives. About $25,000 is the average amount derived from the sale of the oil, walrus, and narwhal ivory, whalebone, seal-skins, etc., in Copenhagen; and supposing the share of the profit from this falling to the settlement of Egedesminde to be $250, which is, I suspect, more than the average—it would be distributed in the course of the year by a sort of hyperborean Parliament called the Partisok. This assemblage is composed of representatives chosen by universal suffrage from all the little Esquimaux fishing-stations, each one of which returning one member—generally some talkative old fellow, not over much use as a seal-hunter, but who is intimately acquainted with every body. The president of this body is the governor, and the priest, doctor, and assistant trader have also seats in it. All the native members wear a scarlet cap with a white band, with the badge of the Royal Board of Greenland Trade in front—a bear rampant, its head surmounted by a crown. They meet generally in the winter, when traveling from settlement to settlement over the frozen sea is easy. Then assemble from all the outposts the claimants—the clients of the Partisok. A widow will say that her husband is dead, and it is now time that her boy should learn to kill seals in his kayak; but she can not afford to pay any body to teach him. The Partisok in its wisdom votes the munificent sum of five rigsdaler per annum for that purpose. Then a young fellow comes—blushing through the oleaginous dirt on his cheeks—and avows that he is going to be married, and has not money to purchase a musket or a kayak; and, with a deal of good advice from the assembled sages, he is lent the money for a term of years. Or a family in poor circumstances, on the catcher of the family being sick, and to them a sum for their immediate necessities is voted; and so on until the balance is expended.

NEW MERCANTILE LIBRARY BUILDING, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.—(SKETCHED BY L. R. TOWNSEND.)

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1869.

☞ Persons desiring to renew their Subscription to this Paper will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their names as early as convenient before the Expiration of their present Subscription. It will avoid the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

THE DEMOCRATIC BOURBONS.

WE have already mentioned the struggle in the Democratic party between the old and the new spirit, between the dogged retention of the old doctrines and policy and the cordial adoption of new measures in harmony with the actual situation. The signs of the contest abound on every side. The different tone of the platforms in the various States, and the different and antecedents of the candidates of which we spoke last week, all reveal the want of a common expression and a common purpose in the party. It begins to appear, however, that the progressive wing of the party yields to the Bourbons, and that one more effort will be made to prolong the angry debate out of which the war sprang.

This contest in the Democratic party began with its organization under JACKSON. General JACKSON was substantially a Jeffersonian. He was in favor of a restriction of government to the lowest terms, and although he approved a tariff for revenue, he was opposed to a national system of internal improvements and magnificent enterprises. Long before General JACKSON left the Presidency, Mr. CALHOUN, whose general political philosophy was much less sound than JACKSON'S, had fixed his heart upon it. His instinct indicated to him his chief rival, during the Presidency of Mr. MONROE Mr. CALHOUN was hostile to "the hero," who did not suspect it. JACKSON'S election presently made CALHOUN his open enemy. The first contest between them was the nullification movement of 1832. JACKSON was honestly a Unionist man, and heartily despised as well as disbelieved the Southern theory of the government. His proclamation was as admirable and sound as WEBSTER'S speeches, and he made preparations to keep the peace and enforce the law. In the latter resolution his party supported him. But in his Message of 1832, previous to the proclamation, he virtually recommended the policy that CALHOUN demanded. From that moment the CALHOUN element in the Democratic party grew stronger, until it absolutely controlled it, and the war that was always latent in that element broke out.

The conduct and event of the war proved that the people rejected the CALHOUN theory while they enjoyed slavery, for whose protection the theory was urged. The Democratic party, as a party, passively opposed the war; and as it was a party organization maintained. The internal conflict was therefore inevitable. There were the party traditions, the Southern alliance, and the hatred of the negro, with the old party leaders, apologists of slavery, and supporters of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions—in fact, the CALHOUN men, on one side; and on the other, the feebler element of this party, young proselytes who held philosophically to the limited functions of government, and who insisted upon abandoning the plainly closed issues of the last generation. Of this wing the New York World became the organ; a journal skilfully and intelligently managed, but whose tone of half-hearted loyalty was always paralyzed in influence and destroyed its power.

In the Democratic National Convention of 1868 the two wings of the party met and tried conclusions. CALHOUN reappeared in the flesh as WADE HAMPTON, and he swept all before him. The New York managers had secured the meeting of the Convention in Tammany Hall itself, and intended to secure their preference in the nomination. But the wilier the New York plotting the more conspicuous was the triumph of South Carolina. One of the ablest and most honorable of New York Democrats, HENRY C. MURPHY, reported the platform, and the New York trick of nominating the New Yorker, HORATIO SEYMOUR, succeeded. But Mr. MURPHY'S platform was repudiation, and Mr. SEYMOUR, who had opposed repudiation at Tweddle Hall, accepted as his own the repudiating platform of Tammany. The question of the campaign, therefore, was simply whether the people would surrender the results of the war, and the election of General GRANT was the answer.

The progressive wing of the party was compelled to submit to the Bourbons of the Convention, and their hopes of the prompt abandonment of old issues and a bold dash at the future in the nomination of Mr. CHASE being baffled, the progressives made a show of failing into line; but after the premonitory thunder of Maine and Pennsylvania the World called for a change of front, which was a confession of inevitable defeat. It came, and the new issue mentioned was opposed to and resisted by the Bourbons. But they forgot that nothing can instruct the Bourbons. The World hailed the nomination of General ROSECRANS in Ohio, urged that of General HOFFMAN in Pennsylvania, and rejoices over that of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS in Massachusetts. It has stringently set forth that compromise demands acquiescence in what is actually accomplished. But it pleads in vain. The Bourbons conquer. General ROSECRANS, in declining, echoes the World; and the Bourbon spokesman in his place VALLANDIGHAM'S candidate, FENDLETON, the chief national representative of repudiation; and in Pennsylvania ASA PACKER, an extreme Bourbon; and answer JOHN QUINCY ADAM'S speech, advising a general renunciation of old issues, by the stolid declaration of the platform that they mean nothing.

Not content with condemning the war by replacing ROSECRANS, a Union general, by FENDLETON, a Vallandighamite, and PACKER, a repudiator, and by preferring PACKER to HANCOCK, the Bourbons now begin to demand the head of the Chairman of the National Committee, who opposed repudiation. They will not demand it in vain. Every where, also, the Bourbons insist upon opposition to the Fifteenth Amendment as the denial of political rights to the colored citizens. It is the reaction nationally attempted last year at which they now aim in the separate States. And its complete is their victory that the World itself, whose one principle of party action since the surrender of Lee has been the abandonment of issues that were dead, has undertaken to prove that Mr. PENDLETON'S proposition to pay the bonds in currency is not bad faith, and that the negro contest must be continued. The passage of the fifteenth Amendment, which the World opposes, would formally close the great debate of the last generation; and the acquiescence in equal suffrage, which was by the adoption of the new Constitution would open the way for the consideration of new issues. The Bourbons have conquered the World, which has surrendered to the advantage that the result of the Presidential election gave it. It hurrahs for PENDLETON and hurahs for ADAMS. It hurrahs for SEYMOUR and CHASE and then for CALHOUN. As for its Democratic readers, "Gentlemen, you pays your money and you takes your choice."

The question for the country then is, shall we put the negro out of politics by completing the work which is nearly accomplished of securing his equal rights? Let the voters in this State, and in every State, remember that the Bourbons insist upon fighting the same old battle over again. We fought it in a way that they remember in 1865 and 1866. Let us show in '69 that there can be no radical change in parties until the question which divides them is settled.

THE LARGE WHITE WIG.

IN one of his private letters Mr. WEBSTER speaks of a gentleman who had "the Presidential air. When Mr. BUCHANAN, who, as Minister in England, had been known to expectorate upon carpets, was elected President, there were those who were delighted that there was at last "a gentleman" in the White House—Mr. BUCHANAN'S claim to distinction being frequently residing in his white cravat. When Mr. LINCOLN succeeded Mr. BUCHANAN there were many Southern "gentlemen" who could easily break an oath to the government, but who bitterly regretted that such an "uncouth boor" was made President. Undoubtedly there are many persons who take great comfort in Turveydrops, and in what may be called a grandiloquent deportment; and Mr. CHARLES ROBINSON, in his lately published "Diary," speaks of a clergyman who "was a gentlemanly person, and inspired respect—especially by a very large white wig."

It happens that President GRANT does not wear a very large white wig of any kind whatever, and for that reason, apparently, he forfeits a good deal of respect in certain quarters. The great constituency of Buncombe, for instance, is in high wrath. Here is a President who is one of the simplest of men. He does every thing in the quietest way. He never, it is said, includes, rolls off so resounding twaddle, but tranquilly and efficiently attends to his duty as a modest and faithful officer. "Is this brilliant, is this splendid, is this the Presidential air?" roars indignant Buncombe, with one accord; "where is the very large white wig, pray; and how can a President inspire respect without it?" The prestige of his administration, we are more soberly told, is declining, and, absurd as it may be, simply from the absence of the great white wig.

This is very possible. There is such an immense quantity of white wig in our politics and statesmanship that its absence may really appear to some persons to be the absence of wisdom. If General GRANT had only followed the counsels of Buncombe—if he had staid steadily in the White House, and had made solemn speeches to complimentary delegations—if he had surrounded himself with reporters, and loudly expressed declarations of doing this and that—if to all invitations he had replied in fine flights of epistolary eloquence instead of by a plain yea and no—if he had only worn an immense white wig that could be seen from every corner of the Union, even the Turveydrops would have conceded to him the Presidential air, and his administration, being, as it is, really efficient and economical, would have been saluted as splendid.

But the truth is, that Americans like rhetoric and flap-doodle, and what is very commonly and expressively called "squirt." Our representatives talk to Buncombe, not to the House. The very nature of our political debates in late years has increased this tendency, because they have dealt with the rights of human nature and with moral duties. Before this debate fairly began the questions at issue also admitted of magnificence in the treatment. After the war of 1812 Jefferson, in his fourth, "the American system," internal improvements, and a national university. Thus President JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, unlike his grandson, amplified the functions of government in classical scholar and well-read in history, he enriched his messages with allusions to the monuments of Rome, the magadavi, and the Pharaohs; and he filled the national imagination with the vision of a vast system of explorations, and structures, and institutions, which were all words, but such amazingly fine words as no other old duty for things. No President ever wore a more enormous white wig than the excellent JOHN QUINCY ADAMS. General JACKSON wore a large, but it was very different. Ignorant, imperious, violent, and vindictive, he destroyed the bank and removed the deposits, and whatever he did was done with such a high and bold air as "by the Eternal" that delighted Buncombe was in raptures over the hero as an "old Roman" of the purest Republican type. General JACKSON understood the use of the large white wig as well as any body.

General GRANT utterly despises it. He and his Secretary of State are two of the least bewigged personages that American politics have produced. They do their work with so little swagger that those who confound bluster with business might suppose that none done. The President leaves the White House in the summer, as most Presidents have done, and as all ought to do. Instead of going to the Soldiers' Home in Georgetown he moves leisurely from point to point, not far away from Washington. He travels as quietly as he can, not making a progress as the Presidents have done before, and very properly, if they liked it. He has a most edifying and amusing contempt for the cries that assail him, and is conscious that none of them can really injure him so long as he is not truant from his duty as well as from the White House. The Springfield Republican says that no man at this time is the task of kings, not of Presidents, and advises the President, if he must travel, to go to the Southern States, and learn from the South his friends from his enemies. To such a sneer the conduct of the President is sufficient answer. There is not a man in the Southern States who does not know what he is doing as his sympathies, nor does the Republican show in the least point how his absence from the capital has injured the public welfare. If the supremacy of the party, as the Republican alleges, is fast passing away, it certainly is not because the President passes the hot weather at the sea-side rather than in Georgetown. And if there is a feeling that his administration disappoints expectation, it is not because of what it has done or failed to do, but of its total want of swagger, its unprecedented freedom from large white wigginess.

THE FALL TRADE.

THE diffusion over the South of a much larger portion of the specie circulation than they enjoyed last year has had the same effect upon the Northern and Eastern States, from which the drain proceeded, as if the currency had been so far contracted. The South, thus strengthened, have powerful reasons not only for holding all that they can, but for obtaining, as the fruit of the crop of cotton now about to be gathered, as much money as may be necessary for the convenient prosecution of all their various industries—an object which will be far more easily overcome than with them, as the strength of a part is the strength of the whole.

This policy restrains speculation, and induces great caution on the part of buyers. The transfer of capital from the Northern to the Southern section has made money less plentiful; but yet there are many reasons for the confidence still felt that the fall trade will be considerable and remunerative.

The freights to Chicago, via the Erie road, were raised from 38 cents per hundred to 45 cents for first-class goods; but this, while it is the rate on other lines and very nearly the measure for other points, is so far below the combination rates which lately prevailed that it still stimulates to activity in the hope of moving goods before the expected advance in freight occurs. A low rate by one line controls the price by the other great lines, and it may be that the Erie, which acts capriciously and scarcely at all with a view to remunerating its stockholders, may for some time obstruct any complete arrangement. There are intimations of a moderate advance next week.

So far as dry-goods are concerned, their prices turns largely upon that of new cotton, present and prospective; and it is to the judgment which individual buyers of dry-goods form on this point that they are the one or occasional purchasers. The price of raw cotton is still maintained in foreign and home markets at a high figure—higher than is warranted by the interests of manufacturing industry here and abroad.

It would seem from the experience in the trade which we have lately had that more looms for both cotton and wool have been running than can be supplied by consumption, and that this excess of production has not been corrected by the necessary suspension of work in England and in this country. This species of property feels the effect of this condition of the trade, and must continue to do so until a proper adjustment has been reached between what is produced and what is consumed, and between the price of the raw material and of manufactures. That such an adjustment must take place is very evident, accompanied with important effects.

It is thought to be somewhat singular, in the face of these facts, that the English are complaining of the poverty of the cotton crop, and are making powerful efforts to increase the growth of cotton in their Indian possessions; but their opinion is that the present high price of cotton limits consumption, and that if it were reduced, the use of manufactures would increase in the same proportion.

Our annual crop testing the accuracy of this theory are fortunately less ample than theirs, for we are in the midst of thriving populations not required to look to the cotton harvests with the care to which older communities are condemned. In England there is a large population on the verge of pauperism, to whom any advance in the price of cotton comes as a hardship which must be met by economy. We produce in this country a large portion of the staple, and we produce more in the advantage of a high price for it than do the English, who must pay the foreigner the whole excess.

The greatly improved condition of the South in the State is a contribution made from the manufacturing industry of the whole world, and is a fortunate result of circumstances not likely to be of long duration. The South will not be permanently managed with great adroitness from a clear comprehension of the whole situation, on the part of an intelligent body of planters and merchants. We have unfortunately combined to produce the result. The tendency hereafter will be in the direction of more reasonable rewards; but it is not to be feared that cotton in both can not be produced at a loss as long as the opinion prevails among British manufacturers that the whole production is inadequate. The means do not exist for an immediate extension of the cultivation in India. Expensive irrigation, model farms to instruct the Ryots, and a large increase of personal facilities are the means recommended at Manchester; and these require time for their development. It is safe, therefore, to urge Southern planters to go on vigorously with this great industry.

Until the new crop begins to come forward, it is thought, from the combined influence of the present deficiency in middlings of good quality and the resort on the part of mills to short time, that the price of cotton fabrics will continue very firm. The strength given to the dry-goods trade is due in great part to this cause, but also to the fact that country distributors have light stocks.

A meeting was recently held in Liverpool to encourage a direct trade with the Southern States, and cut off New York from the advantage of being the chief importer and distributor for the whole Union. A planter from Memphis urged this policy, which had its advocates before the war as part of the scheme of independence which was formed for the protection of the peculiar institution of the South. If it was impossible then to secure this change it must be so now, when the chief object of this isolated policy no longer exists. The eminence of New York in trade is not due to circumstances that can be controlled. The issues of importation and exportation can be done cheaper by New York than by any Southern port; and it is this which will prevent its transfer to any other locality.

The Board which was convened to listen to the Memphis appeal would, perhaps, from some little jealousy of the growing influence of this city, aid the scheme if it were possible; but the motives for building up a direct trade between the South and foreign parts have been so much weakened by recent events, and the motives for a more perfect union are now so powerful, that it may be safe to predict that the loss attending such an attempt will not now be incurred.

SENATOR BROWNLOW AND THE TENNESSEE ELECTION.

IN the Knoxville Whig of August 31 Senator BROWNLOW makes a courteous reply to our suggestion that he should explain why he wished "a sound and reliable Republican" to be elected Governor by those who will not elect such a Republican Senator.

The Senator says that the Convention having failed to nominate, he was at liberty to choose between the two Republican candidates, and he believed Mr. SEXTER to be the better man. Personal jealousy had nothing to do with the decision. As to the franchise, he thought it safe and necessary to restore it to those who had forfeited it by rebellion, and among the considerations that influenced him was the fact that the Supreme Court had restored some twenty thousand, including most of the leaders, and he saw no reason for further excluding the rank and file. Yet he thought it should be done in a constitutional manner by a convention. For "conducting the question" by improperly manipulating the registration, however, the Senator claims that he is not responsible. He is of opinion that SEXTER'S Republican vote would have been larger except for the interference of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General, but that his Republican vote is now to be disregarded. For the possible action of the Legislature in choosing a Democratic Senator and rejecting the Fifteenth Amendment, Senator BROWNLOW declines to be held responsible. Should it do both, he says that his action in the premises will be determined by his convictions of duty.

The foregoing has rests his support of Mr. SEXTER upon his personal knowledge and preference. But when the registry was "manipulated" under the auspices of Mr. SEXTER, in what Mr. BROWNLOW believed to be a most unconstitutional manner, was it not plain that the candidate whom he preferred was willing to be elected by unconstitutional means, and by the votes of those who were unfriendly to the professed principles and to those of Senator BROWNLOW; and was it not equally plain that Mr. SEXTER would come under such circumstances, although he was personally a Republican, could not be considered a Republican victory, and must necessarily put the Legislature and the Senator to the Democrats and defeat the amendment? Is it surprising that, under such circumstances, Republicans out of the State who knew the Senator's fidelity thought that he should postpone his personal preference to the general advantage? However wise and desirable the reasons of disability may have been, the Senator himself concedes that his action was "improperly manipulated." He thus added a result which was due to questionable means, and which gives him an opportunity of the Administration as a colleague. Senator BROWNLOW certainly has the right to vote for the candidate whom he prefers. But a party man must see that when a Republican supports the candidate whom all the Democrats support he is helping to bring the Democrats into power. This he will of course do when he prefers the Democratic policy. But as we can not see that Mr. SEXTER'S success was essential to general enfranchisement, we must regret that the Republicans did not leave him to be elected by the votes inevitable, by the "manipulated" votes.

THE CHINESE TROUBLE.

MR. J. ROSS BROWNE, late Minister to China, denies that he has opposed the ratification of Mr. BURLINGAME'S Chinese treaty, or that he has stated that it would be rejected. What Mr. BROWNE'S reply to an address of the British and American merchants in Shanghai shows that this view of the case points to the observed toward China is radically antagonistic to that of Mr. BURLINGAME. The treaty negotiated by the latter was a arrangement between two absolutely independent and sovereign powers. Mr. BROWNE, on the contrary, says that in his judgment China should be treated as a power sovereign in its internal aspect, "but as occupying an organization incompatible with absolute equality." "We carry on business here," says Mr. BROWNE, absolutely, "by force and against the will of the Chinese; it is, therefore, China's duty to profess to respect a sovereignty which we practically disregard. It may be necessary, for our interests, to regulate the internal affairs of the country, and we had better not say in advance that we will not do so." In fine, Mr. BROWNE says that we have no trust in Chinese just as the Europeans treated the wild Indians—that is, make our pleasure and interest the law of the country. In this spirit he virtually says to Prince KUNG, the Chinese Minister, that he must hasten to do certain things or they would be done for him.

This policy seems to us neither honorable nor wise. Nothing, certainly, can be more disgraceful than the old British policy in China; and really it is not easy to see how it differed from this. Its principle was that the Chinese were barbarians in possession of a vast country, some of whose productions were desired by England, and should be had at any cost. Suppose that England were to inform us that our tariff was a barbarous Chinese policy, that Chinese policy was distasteful to England, and that if we did not "hurry up" and establish free trade she would do it for us, as she was resolved to trade with us upon conditions agreeable to herself. If China is to be treated as an incompetent child because of the barbarian ignorance of the rest of the world, why is not this country equally childish and barbarous in the degree that it excludes the rest of the world? Mr. BROWNE will see that there is a sad confusion of beams and motes here. His policy is untenable. We ought to trade with China upon terms agreeable to China, not upon such terms as we choose.

If, indeed, we deny the right of "an ignorant pagan nation," as Mr. BROWNE calls the Chinese, "to do as it pleases," of course a treaty like Mr. BURLINGAME'S is ridiculous. But by what right does Mr. BROWNE make the supposed pecuniary interest of trade to be pleased to call a Christian nation the measure of its duty? Which was the more admirable, the conduct of Christian and intelligent England making war upon China to open a market for opium, or that of the ignorant pagan nation refusing to buy it? If England can not carry on an opium trade with China except at the cost of war, is that trade so essential to Christian civilization that the war is justifiable? And if Christian England can not carry on hard and chow-chow to Christian Americans, shall we cut their pagan throats by way of persuasion?

If Mr. BROWNE alleges, there is really no authority in China to enforce a treaty, that is no good reason for not making them. But that has nothing to do with ignorance and paganism and our right to do what we choose with ignorant and pagan nations. In the eye of what are technically called Christian nations, Turkey is both ignorant and pagan; but we contrive to maintain equal and friendly relations with the Sublime Porte. If it be a fact that the condition of China is such that foreign merchants can not protect themselves without large guns upon the local authorities, then it is certainly not a country to which we should send a minister any more than to New Zealand or Madagascar. But we ought certainly to come to some conclusion. If Mr. BROWNE'S statements are correct, we ought to withdraw from a treaty with a government which can not protect its citizens, and which is, therefore, of course, incompetent to observe the stipulations of a treaty.

NOTES.

IT has never been surprising to those who know that EDMUND BELMONT was a gentleman of ample fortune that he was the chairman of the National Democratic Committee. But there is evident disposition on the part of the Democratic party to relieve him of that honor. We think that the other statesman, Mr. WILLIAM M. TWEED, would be a good party manager. Perhaps it would not be so easy to furnish majorities for the whole country, upon information by telegraph, as it is for one district in New York, but what could be done in that direction Mr. TWEED is unquestionably the man to do. Yet there are objections to his nomination which will probably force the nomination of Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR and General FRANCIS P. BLAIR we met one of the murderous Democratic conventions of the radical districts. Speaking of the impending nomination of the Chief Justice, which Mr. TWEED was stopped, we do not see why it would not be edifying to see so unmitigated a Hard-Shell as our indescriminate vote for so original an abolitionist as Mr. CHASE. Associated, as they will certain forcible epithets, replied, "I've just seen Jeff. Davis, and I told him that he could manage this city very well, but that Mr. CHASE would were too compound expletive) big for him!" They certainly were so for the present honorable chairman.

THE course of Philosophical and Literary lectures proposed by the new President at Harvard College is not only sure to be most attractive and instructive, but it will mark a decided revolution to keep pace with the rapid movement of the times. Mr. EMERSON lectures upon "The Natural History of Intellect," which will be a study to derstand him to propose a series of discourses upon memory, imagination, etc., which will be treated not as a branch of mental or moral "school," but by the insight of genius. Professor DOWDEN'S lectures upon Locke and the Philosophy of the Eighteenth Century, upon HUME, a most admirably accomplished scholar, upon Deism, Pantheism, and Atheism. The two new names in this department are J. LEAVITT CABOT upon "KANT," and JOHN FISKE upon "The Darwinian Philosophy." Mr. CABOT is a scholar of very remarkable and widely various attainments, thoroughly familiar with the German philosophy, as with other and wholly different departments; and Mr. FISKE, a young man, is known as the author of a reply to Mr. PATTON'S pamphlet upon smoking and drinking, and of the more elaborate literary reviews in the World, among which a sketch of Greek life published last winter was a very striking paper. Mr. FISKE'S scholarship is extensive and accurate, and he has proved his power to deal vigorously and brilliantly with a subject in the article in the English Fortnightly Review of last year. In the literary course the names are Professor BÜCHER, upon the French Comedy of the 17th Century; "History and Relations of the German Language," by Professor W. D. WHITNEY; "Goethe and Schiller," by Professor CORNEL—all of whom have the best reputation in their departments. There are then "English Poetry of the 16th and 17th Centuries," by Professor FRANCIS J. CHILD, who is unquestionably the master of American, and certainly the peer of English, scholarship in the subject. It is to Professor CHILD that we owe the recovery of the original Percy manuscript, and from him that the best edition of Chaucer is expected. Professor JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL lectures upon "Early Italian and Spanish Literature." Those who have heard him upon Dante know with what wealth of knowledge, what delicacy of insight, what subtlety of humor and fine imagination, what deep and noble sympathy, what generous wisdom, he will treat his subject; while the "New Italian Literature" will be presented by WILLIAM D. HOWELLS, whose articles in the North American upon the subject show the utmost familiarity with it, and are full of that thoughtfulness, tender grace, and sweet, sparkling humor which are so delightful with inexpressible charm in his two books of life in Italy. The Literary course begins on the 15th of September, the Philosophical upon the 16th; the fees for both courses will be $200, and they are open to all "competent persons, men or women."

THE Secretary of State has written an admirable letter to the Vice Consul-General, at Havana, upon the abuses of American citizenship. Certain Cubans, exiled by revolutions in their country, and returning to Cuba have concealed their flag, and even accepted offices that can be conferred only upon Spanish subjects. Of course, when some duty to the Spanish Government was to be enforced at personal cost, these persons declare that they are citizens of the United States. Mr. FISH states that both naturalized and natural citizens are entitled to the same protection from the Spanish government. But it is very possible for any of the latter class to abandon the United States country, and pass for native subjects or citizens with impunity and protections. He instructs the Consul to use his discretion in regard to such applications, and to interfere only when he is convinced that the applicant has in good faith maintained his allegiance to this country. We hope that this is not to be considered another illustration of this practice of trucking of this government to the bloated despotism of Spain. It seems to us that it is scarcely as fair and honorable as enforcing the Neutrality Laws. But when Spain once has a nation under her thumb, she is determined that she had as thoroughout the Cuban business, every action of a subject Secretary must be suspiciously scrutinized.

MR. LOSSING'S "Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution" is universally known as one of the most delightful and valuable of histories for the family library. It was the result of careful study and personal exploration with pen and pencil in hand; and it was so warmly received that the author instantly continued his work; and the HARPERS have just issued the "Pictorial Field-Book of the War of 1812," which renders the same service to that where it was left by the first work, and brings it down to the peace of 1815. Beginning with a faithful sketch of the condition of the country under the Revolution, the rise of parties, the war with Barbary, and the European wars, it proceeds to develop the causes of our second war with Great Britain, which it then describes in most ample and interesting detail, with every kind of quaint and attractive illustration, in the most picturesque and simple style. The research and labor in both books must be very great, and they are treasuries of important facts. They are also most entertaining to readers of all ages, however familiar with the stirring events, and are indispensable to every library.

THE system of Lyceum lecturing has now become so extensive and so complicated that a Bureau for conducting correspondence has become both a necessity and a convenience. The American Literary Bureau in this city has engaged in this work for three or four years with such success that it has become at last a great number of lecturers, among whom are some of the most desirable in the country. The value of the system established by the Bureau has been approved in the Western States, and Lyceum committees will save themselves a great deal of trouble by applying to the Bureau in communications with the American Literary Bureau, 132 Nassau Street.

IT is time that the stockholders and directors of the city railroads were heard from. The general complaint of the cushions in the cars which are supposed to be infected with disease, and known to contain vermin. The cushions in the cars of the horse-car Companies are, which always forbid crowding their cars, for instance—who, we say, will doubt that the cushions of the uncleanly cushions will have disappeared?

A CLERGYMAN in England lately published a work called the "Perfect Man," which the Spectator praised, but said that it had its origin in "Echo Homo." The author thereupon wrote to the editor that his book was chiefly composed of sermons written during the year 1865, and was then laid by. Yet at the time he had written for it as a good title "Ecce Homo," which, of course, he rejected when he decided to publish his book, as his name had been already appropriated. It is another curious illustration of the unconscious plagiarism and imitation of which literary history is so full.

AS ingenious gentleman, signing himself President, bespeaks our sympathy in his proposition to establish the "Order of the Eagle," the object of which is to be "the saving of our country by the purifying of politics." Each member is to swear that he will support the Constitution, vote for the best candidate, and take no bribe. These are most excellent purposes, but as every honorable and intelligent citizen virtually takes this oath, as fast as he perceives the situation, the Order of the Eagle is already very much larger than its President is probably aware.

THERE is a new singer, and her name is GIULIA MARINONI. She appeared in Boston last year, and has been singing in Sweden this year. Tid Sweden was glad to prove if she could rival the Swedish nightingale?" With what curious memories JENNY LIND would listen! A correspondent writes to the Tribune that in an experience of twenty years he recalls no débutante who unites so many excellences and charms as Madame MARINONI. Indeed, he calls her an imminently formidable rival of NILSSON and PATTI.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL HOAR has given an opinion as to the Reconstruction of the State of Virginia by the Virginia Legislature. He says that the Legislature must, as a preliminary condition, submit the Constitution, or their action thereon, to Congress for approval. Their action without approval will not be required. If the Constitution and the action of the Legislature be approved, the Legislature of Virginia, the Legislature of the Legislature of the State of Virginia, and the provisions of the Constitution of Virginia, the qualifications of members of the Legislature necessarily prescribed—the requirements of the registration laws of Virginia being thus approved as to the matters to be concerned. But before such approval by Congress, a Virginia must bring in all respects a State of the Union, the Legislature, as a provisional body, can not exercise the functions of a State government, and the Reconstruction acts require the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States before the State can be admitted to representation in Congress.

The diminution of the public debt during the month of August was over five and one-half millions. The reduction since March 1 has been $40,666,750.

There were 352,192 immigrants arrived at Toronto. Of these only 7154 remained in Canada, and 345,038 passed to the United States.

The Thornton property, one of the old colonial estates of Virginia, on the Potomac, in Alexandria, London, and Hampshire Railroad, and known as Accotink, has been sold to the Washington Southern Company for $180,000. It is to be divided up into small lots, and the Accotink Springs will soon be a watering-place.

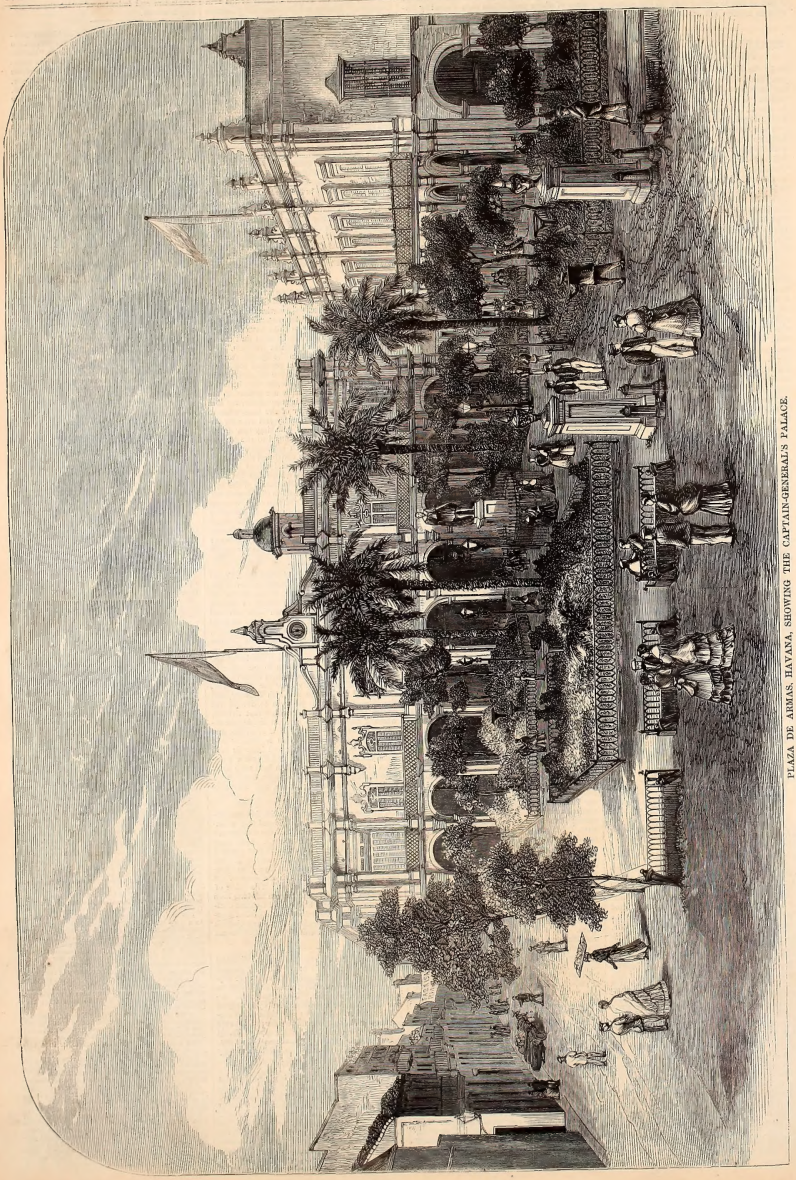
On August 31 there was a fire at Cape May, which destroyed many hotels, including the United States and Atlantic, and numerous other buildings, involving a total loss of over a quarter of a million of dollars. The fire broke out in a house which is the morgue, driver," who was arrested and held to bail for arson.

The election of a Democratic Legislature in California will probably postpone the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment by that State.

The Democratic State Convention of Wisconsin on the 1st instant nominated for Governor Lucius Fairchild, the present incumbent.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE monument commemorative of the Council, substituted to that of the architect, Count Vergiganal, has been approved. It will consist simply of the column of Alexandria, raised from the emporium, raised on an hexagonal base, which will be surrounded by a row of the towns, which will be surrounded by a row of the towns, which will be surrounded by a row of the towns



PLAZA DE ARMAS, HAVANA, SHOWING THE CAPTAIN-GENERAL'S PALACE.

BOAT-HOUSE OF THE LONDON ROWING CLUB, ON THE THAMES.—[SKETCHED BY OUR OWN ARTIST.]

VIEWS ON THE THAMES.

THOSE of our readers who have perused the accounts which have been given of the late international boat-race between the Harvard and Oxford crews will be interested in the views given on this page. They are views upon the Thames along the line of the race. One of them represents the boat-house of the London Rowing Club, the other Crab-Tree Inn, a favorite resort of boating-men. We have given these views from sketches by our own artist, from whose pencil we gave last week several equally characteristic representations connected with the great race. Before this reaches our readers the Harvard crew will have returned home

THE CRAB-TREE INN, ON THE THAMES.—[SKETCHED BY OUR OWN ARTIST.]

A SUMMER SUNSET.

GREEN islands in a golden sea,
With amethyst cliffs that melt away
At every wash of the sleepy wave,
While towering Alps that greet the day;
And still through rents in the further space
Glimpses of distant ocean bed,
Burning with restless changeful light,
And veined with the flushes of glory spread,
Far as the living are from the dead,
Far as the blessed are from hell's night.

Then the islands grow to radiant realms,
And shoot forth golden tongues of land,
And the Alps fade down to a level plain,
And the ocean rolls in a threatening band;
Then murky towers, where ghosts can reign,
Rise like a city of dusky dreams;
While low in the west in a narrow vein
There spreads, through the dusk, one golden beam,
Like heaven's last and lingering gleam
Seen through hell's vein by those in pain.

Nature is changed, and, like the sea,
Has its autumn ebb and its summer flow.
Cloudlets of morning pass with dawn;
Who can tell where the midsteams go?
Dead flowers turn to mere earth at last,
Earth to blossoms bursting forth in May.
Life and death are ever at war
On this great changeful world, I say:
Which is victor, or leaf on the tree
Yet cloud or flower, it seems to me,
Is not so changeful—that a feather can sway.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book I.

CHAPTER VII.

MR. PLEW.

At Shipley-in-the-Wold people dined at two o'clock, and took tea at six or seven. "Tea-time" was the vicar's favorite hour of the twenty-four, especially in the winter season. The work of the day was over. The fire blazed up companionably, and filled the pauses of conversation with light and warmth. And if a forlorn wind were moaning without upon the "glooming flats," its voice only heightened, by imagined contrast, the comforts of the ingle nook.

The family dinner-room—named in Daneshire the parlor, the parlor—was no exception to the assertion that Shipley vicarage was an old house. Yet even here the magic of the leaping flame and glowing coals worked wonders. It sent flickering shadows to play over the high ceiling; it made the glass panes of a tall bookcase sparkle with flashing rubies; it found out every gleam of gilding on the tarnished backs of the well-worn books; it mellowed the hue of the faded crimson window-curtains, subdued the staring pattern of the wall-paper, and made the old-fashioned furniture covering on the furniture seem rich and harmonious as an Indian carpet.

"Give me another cup of tea, Veronica," said the vicar, sitting in the parlor on a drear March evening.

His daughter and his ward were both with him. On each of the three faces there was, for once, a look of cheerfulness. That morning's dinner guest had been pronounced out of danger. The shadow which had darkened the house was passing away.

"Give me another cup of tea," said the vicar once more, rubbing his hands together. And then he resumed the discourse which his demand had interrupted. "Yes; and I assure you I am very much pleased with Sir John altogether. Nothing could be better chosen than his manner of expressing himself."

"What did he say, papa?"

"Oh, I am not recollect word for word. Thanks, of course, and gratitude, and—and so on. But not overdone. Very earnest and good, themselves. He appears to be a man of the world, yet not exactly worldly. He has, in short, I should say, a great deal of savoir vivre."

"Savoir vivre!" repeated Maud, musingly. "That would be an art to learn; how to live."

"The acquirement of all arts, Maud."

"Yes; and it would include—would it not?—how to die: if one did but consider aright."

"Maud and Veronica, with a little shudder," I do beg of you not to be solemn. Don't talk of such things. It makes me cold. We are worse than a northeast wind blowing over the snow-drifts."

Veronica inherited from her mother a more than childish horror of death. The slightest allusion to it sufficed to cloud her bright face and make her invritable.

"Well," answered Maud, quietly. "Sir John Gale is not going to die just yet, they say, so there is no need to be solemn, as you call it. It is to be hoped he will give up hunting, or learn to get a better seat on horseback. Joe Dowsett says that manner of his is as gentle as a lamb, and has such a mouth that a baby might ride him. And yet Sir John could not contrive to stick on his back."

"That's not quite fair, Maud," observed the vicar. "When Sir John was thrown opposite the garden door he was in a half-fainting condition, you must remember. But it was not then that the mischief was done. It was an ugly fall he got earlier in the day from a fresh, hot-tempered beast. He changed horses afterward, and persisted in continuing to 'assault the chace,' as Mogworthy says. So I do not think we are justified in concluding any thing to the disadvantage of his horsemanship."

"But don't you know, papa," Veronica put in, "that Joe has inoculated Maud with the true Daneshire notion that only Daneshire folks, born and bred, can ride?"

Maud smiled and shook her head.

"Sir John charged me," said the vicar, "with 'a thousand heart-felt thanks to my amiable daughters.'"

"Thanks?" exclaimed Veronica. "You rare have done nothing for him. Paul takes care that his master shall lack no service. So, then, Sir John thinks that Maud is your daughter as well as I?"

"I suppose so. It matters nothing. In a short time he will go away, and in a—perhaps—a rather longer time, will have forgotten all about us; so that it was very unnecessary to trouble him with family details."

"If he forgets all about you, it will be very forgetful, indeed, dear Charles," said Maud.

"From the earliest days of her coming to the vicarage, Maud Hilda Desmond had used to call Mr. Levincourt and his wife "uncle" and "aunt;" although she was, of course, aware that no relationship really existed between them and herself.

"Ungrateful? Well, I don't know. It would scarcely have been practicable to have him outside the garden gate all night. Do you know any one who would have shut the door and gone in quietly to bed under the circumstances?"

"Forget us!" cried Veronica, with an impatient shrug of her shoulders; "he could be will first shrug of her shoulders; "he could be will forget us! Why, he never turned his back on Shipley would care ever to think of it again?"

"Jl'would," replied Maud, quietly.

"Would! I am not sure of that. But at all events the cases are widely different. Sir John is wealthy. He can travel. He has seen many countries. Paul says: France, Italy, the East. He can go where he pleases; can enjoy society. Oh, Shipley-in-the-Wold must be a mere little ugly blot on his map of the world!"

The vicar sighed, uncrossed his legs, and stretched them out straight before him, so as to bring his feet nearer to the fire.

"What made him come to the little ugly blot, then, when he had so many places to choose from?" demanded Maud, indignantly.

"He came for the hunting, I suppose."

"And, then, when he found there was something in Shipley that he couldn't get in his France, and his Italy, and his East!"

Veronica laughed scornfully. She seated herself on the rug at Maud's feet, and leaning back rested her head on her friend's knee. She looked up into her face.

"Well, Maud?" she commanded. "His France and his East! Yes; I suppose rich people find good things every where—even in Shipley."

"Maud shook herself off their horses, and are bruised and cut, and burnt by fever, and prostrated by weakness, in search of their riches," observed Maud, philosophically.

"Children," said the vicar, suddenly, "do you want to go to Lowater or Shipley to-night?"

"Of course not, papa. What is it? Have you had an invitation?

Veronica's eyes sparkled, and her rosy lips parted, and she clapped her slender hands together joyously. Maud, too, looked eager and interested.

"Yes," answered Mr. Levincourt; "I have had an invitation for us all to dine with the Sheardowns on the nineteenth. It is next Wednesday."

"How exquisite!" cried Veronica, seizing one of Maud's hands that rested on her shoulder, and squeezing it hard. "A dinner-party! A well in the desert! A tuft of palm-trees in a harvest land!"

"I suppose we must go," said the vicar, plaintively.

"I suppose we must," indeed. Why, papa, you know you like the idea of it as much as we do."

"I am always charmed to meet Mrs. Sheardown and the captain."

"No doubt of it," cried Veronica, now in a full glow of excitement. "We know that you are Mistress Nelly Sheardown's most devoted cavalier. But it isn't you that I am thinking of. It is the dinner. A change, a break in the monotony, a peep at something beyond Shipley. You would like to go, if it were even to dine at Hogcote with old Lady Alicia. And quite right too, say I."

The vicar made an attempt to assert his progrative of victimhood, but in vain.

The varying thermometer of Veronica's spirits had risen to fever heat, and she insisted on volubly, speculating as to who there would be at Lowater; whether Mrs. Sheardown would contrive to get a dance at the evening party, and what she should wear (exhaustless theme), and so forth.

At length the stream of words ceased, and then ceased. The last accents of scarlet and amber ribbons demanded an absorbed and silent consideration.

"Don't you think, Uncle Charles," said Maud, "that Mrs. Sheardown is the sweetest woman you ever saw?"

"She is charming, in truth; charming and excellent; and, moreover, possesses a mind of a very superior calibre."

"Bravo, Uncle Charles! And then she is—in my eyes, at least—so pretty. That quality must not be omitted in the catalogue of her perfections."

"I am not quite sure on the point, Maudie. Is she very pretty? I don't think that any man would ever have fallen in love with Mrs. Sheardown for her beauty."

"Perhaps not. And if so, all the better. Sure I am that any one who once loved her would never cease to think her beautiful."

Veronica looked up. "All true," she said.

"I agree with your eulogium. And observe that it is pure magnanimity which prompts me to do so. For sweet Mistress Nelly does not like me one bit."

"Oh, Veronica!"

"Oh, Maud! It is so. I have a sixth sense which never deceives me in these matters. I know that to Mrs. Sheardown I am not simpatica."

"Simpatica! Nonsense. Whenever you use an Italian word where an English one would serve, I know that you are saying something that won't bear daylight. Why should not Mrs. Sheardown like you?"

Veronica clasped her hands behind her head, and rested both head and arms on Maud's knee. Then, with her eyes cast contemplatively upward, "I suppose," she said, "it is not good," said she.

The vicar's brows contracted into an uneasy pucker as he looked down on his daughter's beautiful face.

"Veronica," he said, almost sternly, "I wish you would not say such things."

"Very well, papa. I won't."

"Still more, I wish that you would not think such thoughts."

"A, quoto poi—"

"If you please, Sir," said Catherine, the maid, putting her rosy face into the room, "here is Mr. Plew."

Mr. Plew was hospitably invited to enter. The surgeon of Shipley was a small man, with a florid face and high, light hair round a bald crown. His eyes were of a weak blue tint, his skin usually pale yellow. On the present occasion, however, it glowed with a fiery red, in consequence of the change from the piercing outer air to the temperature of the well-warmed and well-lighted parlor. His eyes watered, and his frostinflamed nose glowed like a hot coal, above the white cravat that enveloped his throat.

"I fear I am intruding at an unseasonable hour," said Mr. Plew, speaking with a strong provincial accent and a gentle, deprecating manner.

"By no means. Pray come in. It is our little hour, you know. Veronica, ring for a clean cup, and give Mr. Plew some tea," said the vicar.

"Not any, thank you. Pray don't move, Miss Levincourt. I have just left our patient's room. I could not resist coming to congratulate you on the favorable verdict that Dr. Gunnery pronounced this morning. Paul told me. I was unable to be here earlier in the day. But there is very little danger now. Sir John's condition this evening, I am quite able to indorse what Dr. Gunnery said. Danger is over for the present."

Mr. Plew sat in a rather hesitating, shy way. And, although he seemingly tried to control his wandering glances, he could not for a moment keep them at every minute toward the hearth, where Miss Levincourt still remained in her nonchalant attitude on the rug.

"Veronica, get up," whispered Maud.

"Why? I am very comfortable. Mr. Plew is an old friend. He won't treat him with ceremony; do we, Mr. Plew? Paul Veronica aloud.

"Oh dear, Miss Levincourt, I trust not. I beg—that is—I would not think of disturbing yourself on my account."

"Then you must seek another cushion," said Maud, blushing, in the severity of your weight. You are as well able to support yourself as I am to support you.

With that, Miss Desmond rose, crossed the room, and took a chair beside the vicar. Mr. Plew's face uttered a mute and disapproving commentary on the deed.

Veronica caught his look, and instantly answered it by speech.

"I feel myself bound to give way to my whims, pray? I have more selfishness in my little finger than she has in her whole composition. She is worth three times my weight, in pure gold. Ain't you, Maudie?"

"I should say," answered Maud, stiffly, "that a discussion of our comparative merits would be highly uninteresting to Mr. Plew."

Mr. Plew looked extremely uncomfortable. The conversation came to his rescue.

"We are much obliged to your unremitting attention, Mr. Plew," said the vicar, "to which, under Providence, the happy issue of this affair. I can venture to say that Sir John is very sensible of it. He said to you, I am sure, and spoken with him to-day for the first time."

"Oh, indeed, Sir?"

"Yes; a very agreeable man, Sir John."

"I dare say he is, Mr. Levincourt. But you know the circumstances under which I have had the honor of seeing him exactly." Here Mr. Plew tittered faintly.

"H'm! Not a good patient, eh?"

"Very good, Sir. But I should say he had not been accustomed to be restrained in any way. His servant manages him, I believe."

"Paul is a good fellow; one of those excellent servants that one never finds in England."

"Indeed, Sir?"

"No, not still won't grow them. Or, if one is to be found here and there, they are, at any rate, not indigenous to Daneshire.

"Daneshire people, high or low, are not remarkable for civility," observed Veronica.

"Nor even for hospitality."

"I suppose we shall soon be losing our guest, resumed the vicar. "He spoke to-day of returning at his pressure, et cetera. The fact is, that to us personally his stay involves scarcely any inconvenience. But he will naturally be anxious to get home as soon as may be. How soon do you think he will be able to travel?"

Mr. Plew could not tell. He would be able to judge better on that point when the sick man should have left his couch. He anticipated that Sir John would find himself very weak. There had been much prostration.

"I hear," proceeded Mr. Plew, "that Sir John Gale's groom and three hunters have been sent away from the Crown. I was at Shipley Magna to-day, and was told that the servant and horses left for Lowater on Wednesday. They are bound for a place that Sir John owns, in the south somewhere. I forget the name of it. He is immensely rich, from what I can gather."

As thus Mr. Plew gossiped on, in a monotonous tone, the vicar listened, or seemed to listen, with half-closed eyes. His thoughts were in reality harking back to Veronica's phrase that Shipley must be "a mere little ugly blot" in Sir John's map of the world. And then the vicar indulged in some "sweet self-pity" commiserating his days spent among Daneshire hinds, and under Daneshire skies, with the brightness of his three years' existence abroad. And yet those years spent in foreign lands had been haunted by the ghost of a lost love, and by a vain regret.

Presently Mr. Plew's talk turned on the choir of St. Gildas, the progress it had made, and the desirability of introducing still further improvements. Then Mr. Levincourt roused himself to attend to what was being said. He longed to talk himself, and he talked very well. Veronica and Maud sat a little apart, away from the glare of the fire, and held a whispered consultation as to their toilets on the nineteenth.

Maud had her share of natural girlish interest in the topic; but she tired of it long before her companion. With a quiet movement she drew a book from beneath a heap of colored wools and canvas in her work-basket, and began to read, almost stealthily, half hidden behind the vicar's arm-chair.

Veronica advanced to the hearth, drew her chair up opposite to Mr. Plew, and disposed one foot, exquisitely peeping from under the folds of her dress, on the polished steel bar of the fender.

Mr. Plew stumbled, stammered, and lost the thread of his discourse.

"I beg your pardon," said the vicar, "I don't quite understand your last remark. I was wrongly comprehend your last remark. I was wrongly comprehend your last remark. I was wrongly comprehend am your elder by two years, you little solemn white owl!"

Maud quietly released the hot cut-of her hair from its bonds, and said nothing. Suddenly Veronica knelt down by her companion's side and clasped her arms round her waist. So she remained, still and silent, for some minutes. Then she slid down into her favorite posture on the rug, and continued, without looking up, "I wish I could be good like you, Maud!"

"Nonsense! Good like me? I am not very good! But we can all be better if we try hard."

"I can not. No; I can not. I—I—want so many things that good people despise—or pretend to despise."

"What things?"

"Oh, I don't know: all sorts of things. Is there nothing you want?"

"Plenty of things I should like. But I don't see how wanting things should prevent your being good."

"But I want vain, wicked, worldly things, Maudie!"

"And do you think vain, wicked, worldly things would make you happy?"

"Yes, I do. There! Don't look so scared, and open your eyes so wide, white owl. That's the truth. You always advocate speaking the truth, you know. Good-night."

"Good-night, Veronica. You are in one of your perverse moods to-night. There is no use in arguing with you."

"Not a bit of use!"

"But you are wiser than sorely we think you know better."

"That's the worst of it! I wish I didn't know better. Fools do. Fools are never troubled by knowing better. I know the better and want the worse. There, now, you are frozen into an ice maiden again!"

Maud remained pale and silent, gazing straight before her.

Veronica waited a minute, lingering near the door, and then, with a little defiant toss of the head, shrugged her shoulders and left the room without another word.

The house was still; the vibrations of the last stroke of eleven, boomed out by the deep-voiced bell of St. Gilda, were dying away; the glow of the fire had died down to a faint red glimmer, when a white figure glided noiselessly to Maud's bedside.

"Maudie! Maudie! Are you asleep?"

"Veronica! What is it? What is the matter?"

"Nothing. Kiss me, Maud. I can not sleep until you have done so."

Maud raised her head from the pillow and kissed the other girl's cheek.

"Good-night, dear Veronica," she whispered. "God bless you, Maudie!"

VACCINATION.

IN Chinese chronicles tell the truth, mankind had been scourged by a loathsome disease, which maimed the few whose lives it spared, for nearly three thousand years before an obscure medical practitioner in Gloucestershire stumbled upon a means of palliating, if not altogether arresting its ravages. So far as can be known, the existence of small-pox in man is traced back in the records of the Celestial Kingdom as far as 1122 years before Christ, and in 1798 Dr. Edward Jenner published an unostentatious essay setting forth the results of several years of careful investigation into what at first seemed a rustic superstition, and modestly expressing a "hope of its becoming beneficial to mankind." This superstition was, that cow-milkers who contracted sores or hands from cows suffering under a peculiar and then prevalent eruption on the udder, were thereby given immunity from small-pox. Jenner probed the village gossip, had his attention drawn to certain corroborative facts, pondered the matter, tested it in his own ways, and finally promulgated his scheme of "VACCINATION."

In consequence with Jenner's researches, and as showing his superior perspicacity, two circumstances are noteworthy. The first of these is, that a popular belief in the protective power of the infection, derived from this peculiar kine disease, was not confined to Gloucestershire, but existed in the dairy districts around Hanover, where acute medical observers have never been wanting. The second is, that the similarity between the "vaccine" in cattle and small-pox in man was noted by Italian writers before Jenner announced his belief that the two maladies were identical. Subsequent experiments have conclusively proven the validity of this hypothesis. Small-pox was transmitted from the human subject to the calf and other animals, and in 1836 a Russian physician named Thiele produced on cow's udders, by inoculation with the virus of human small-pox, the characteristic vesicles of the kine-pox. There is found that the lymph from these retained its specific power after seventy-five successive transmissions through human subjects. Among the results of other interesting experiments it may be stated that human small-pox has been transmitted through the horse to the cow, and from the latter children have been vaccinated with genuine cow-pox; and furthermore, that when a cow is inoculated with vaccine matter from a human arm, the lymph produced in her has comparatively little activity, but gains intensity by successive transmissions through human subjects.

It seems certain, from these and other data, that the same cause which produces small-pox in man gives rise to a specific disease in cattle, but that in the latter the virus undergoes a modification which renders its manifestations much milder, without, however, destroying its essential attributes; in other words, by vaccinating a child we communicate to it a very light form of small-pox, and thereby prevent it from contracting a graver form of the same malady.

That this protective power is really exerted by vaccination, statistics show beyond the possibility of dispute. In England, during the last half of the eighteenth century, out of every 1000 deaths 96 were caused by small-pox; while in the half century from 1800 to 1850 the rate was reduced to 25 in 1000. In the German States vaccination reduced the mortality from small-pox from 66.5 to 7.26 in every 1000 deaths. Every where experience has shown that the more thoroughly vaccination is enforced the fewer deaths occur from small-pox. Thus, in Glasgow (where vaccination was voluntary and rare) the disease killed 36 out of every 1000 deaths, while in the Rhenish Provinces (where vaccination was compulsorily) its ratio was but 1 in 1000. During the twenty years from 1817 to 1837 several epidemics of small-pox visited the West Indies, but among the British troops stationed there (an aggregate strength of 86,661 whites and 40,934 blacks), out of a total mortality of 6803, there was but a single death from the disease. Statistics of this sort might be adduced almost ad infinitum, if it were requisite to give further evidence of the data afforded by vaccination.

Strange to say, in the face of all these facts, there has been, since Jenner's time, a doggedspirit of opposition to vaccination periodically manifested itself against his discovery; and at the present day, more particularly in England, not only the ignorant classes, but many persons of intelligence and culture, have declared open and organized hostility to vaccination, and accuse it of committing ravages worse than the havoc of the disease which it supplants. According to popular belief, vaccination produces every one of various kinds, erysipelas, and indeed nearly all the ills that flesh is heir to, are transmitted by vaccine lymph; the more thoughtful opponents of vaccination, among whom are included a few medical men, confine their argument to the possibility of communicating syphilitic and cancerous forms of skin-disease. The first of these theories is thus clearly answered in the recent work of Professor Simonson, than whom no higher authority on such subjects exists:

"Leaving out of consideration certain foolish objections that have been urged against vaccination, it can not be denied that it sometimes endangers life, and in other cases leaves permanent impairment of health, especially cutaneous eruptions and other scrofulous affections. The hypothesis that scrofula was transferred by the vaccination from one child to another is false, however, as can be proved. Sometimes children become scrofulous after vaccination, although the lymph from which they took the germ of a perfectly healthy child; and sometimes children remain perfectly healthy after being vaccinated with lymph from a decidedly scrofulous child. The occurrence of scrofula after vaccination seems to be due to the debilitating influence of the first accompanying fever, whereby the full prominence of the exanthems among these scrofulous affections appears, and also in the order of the skin, artificially induced at the point of vaccination. At least, other febrile diseases, as well as all debilitating influences, produce in young children with a tendency to scrofula, have the same influence in developing this disease that vaccine has. And the fact that the pustule and other irritants to the skin not only induce inflammation at the point of application, but also increase the susceptibility to inflammatory affections. Many children who have never previously suffered from any exanthems are affected for months with eruptions about the face after having their ears pierced, as well as after vaccination. But it is only in rare cases that the occurrence of scrofulous affections is due solely to vaccination, and is not influenced by other causes, such as weaning and teething, which usually take place about the time that vaccination is done; and it is still rarer for life to be endangered by the operation. Complete impossibility of vaccination, which show a decided decrease of mortality since the introduction of vaccination, must be the only excuse for urging these objections as a ground against vaccination. It may be readily seen why more children die of measles, scarlatina, croup, and hydrocephalus, since small-pox has a smaller number for these diseases to attack, as it were, than previously. Vaccination and all the above diseases does not, by any means, equal the diminution of mortality in variola (small-pox). Unless the vaccination be done during epidemic throws all other considerations into the shade, I do not vaccinate weakly children, inclined to scrofula, but wait for a time, and wait till the second or third, after the teeth have developed, because I am satisfied that, in such children, very severe attacks of scrofula may be first development from injurious influences."

With regard to the skin-diseases attributed to vaccination, the observations of many skilled physicians shows that in the majority of such cases the eruption is of a kind not communicable by inoculation, and therefore to be viewed as a previously latent tendency, roused to activity by the vesicatory disturbance, as it would have been by any other exciting influence. To the question: "Have you any reason to believe, or to suspect, that vaccinated persons, in being rendered less susceptible of small-pox, become more susceptible of any other infective disease, or of phthisis?"—a question addressed by the English Board of Health to eminent medical men at home and abroad—342 answers were received, all decidedly in the negative. Sir W. Jenner, Dr. West, and Mr. Marson, in an aggregate of 79,000 vaccinations, had not a single case giving color to any suspicion of the kind. Time passes, and a long list could be given of the most distinguished and conservative members of the medical profession who have written to the same effect.

That certain forms of syphilitic disease may be inoculated from one person to another is certain, but it seems equally certain that the transmission can not take place through vaccination, if properly performed. Just as the virus of scarlet-fever will communicate only scarlet-fever, the contagion of whooping-cough only whooping-cough, as the syphilitic poison itself produces nothing but syphilis; just so the vaccine virus transmits none but the vaccine disease. The vesicle which forms and matures in a vaccinated arm on the eighth day contains a clear lymph which represents the specific virus of the vaccine disease, totally independent of the condition of the person from which surround it. As Dr. Ballard, in his "Prize Dissertation," says: "The purity or quality of vaccine virus is not regulated by any specific healthiness or unhealthiness of the child who furnishes it, in the sense that it partakes in any way of that child's particular constitution. It is the same thing whether a scrofulous or rickety infant as from a robust one; it is vaccine virus, weakened and deteriorated somewhat, perhaps, but in no essential nothing more. Now, if the lymph from this vesicle be procured on the eighth day, we may be sure that it possesses but one specific property, namely, that of communicating the disease of which it is the product. If we wait until the contents of the vesicle have degenerated and become purulent, not only are the results of vaccination less certain, but there may even be an inoculation of something besides vaccine. If, however, the lymph be important point to instead of merely puncturing the vesicle, the surrounding tissues be wounded so that blood be mingled with the lymph, then the use of such lymph becomes dangerous. That syphilis may be communicated when the blood is no longer a matter of doubt; but if we inoculate both blood and lymph it is obviously unfair to impute the ill-effects solely to the lymph. Such cases, however, are exceedingly rare, and anything but the most inexcusable clumsiness can cause the dangerous admixture. A. L. C.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A SPECIAL Committee of the Prison Association of the Legislature of New York have reported to the State Senate Chamber at Albany to consult in regard to the best method of punishing in our State Prisons. After considerable discussion a paper was read by one of the Committee, in which the opinion was expressed that one of the most important points of prevention is bad conduct in prison, encouraging the inmates to conduct themselves properly, and proving to them the advantage of good behavior, in the law which rewards them for it, by an abbreviation of their sentence. Reasoning on the effect would also manifestly be marked if bad conduct and disobedience of the prison rules should increase the length of sentence in the same proportion as good conduct and obedience now reduces it. If, when sentence was pronounced upon a convict, the court should inform him that a good behavior in prison would diminish the time, and bad behavior increase it in the same proportion, it was thought it would in many cases exert an influence on the convict in regard to his deportment. It was also suggested that improper conduct and violations of prison rules should not be punished by whipping, shower-bathing, and solitary confinement, which seldom have any improving influence, but that the offender should be confined alone until he evinced a change of spirit. But it was thought that in every close cell should be well ventilated, kept free from any foul air, and perfectly clean, that the physical and mental health of the occupant be preserved. It was thought desirable to make a thorough examination of the prisons, and report concerning them. The conference is to be renewed at Sing Sing some time in October.

IT is stated that the Right Honorable Stephen Lushington, who was consulted by Lady Byron in regard to a separation from her husband, is alive, and will doubtless be able to clear up the so-called "Byron slander." Dr. Lushington is now eighty-seven years of age.

A sad report is current that Miss Grinnell has become insane since learning of the recent accidental death of her betrothed, who was killed by falling from a window at the Isle of Wight.

On one occasion during the recent Presidential tour in Vermont, the President and his wife alighted from the cars, each an eager crowd gathered to catch a glimpse of the distinguished pair. Mrs. Grant was apparent lost in the throng. Her simple, unpretentious dress and manner prevented her being recognized, when the gentleman next to her, thinking he requested to "stand back, and let the President's party pass!"

The interest which Boston felt in the result of the international boat-race was intense. A public announcement was made that as soon as the telegram was received from England by ringing the fire-bells—2-3 to be struck if the Oxfords were victorious, and 5-6 if the Harvards—a salute would be fired from "Bull" assembled in Boston to obtain the earliest information; and when the heavy 5-2 sounded the Harvard pointment was great. Yet when fuller details of the race came, many a hearty cheer went up for the plucky Harvards.

A dangerous new counterfeit $10 greenback is thus briefly described: It is one of the new series, No. 85, letter D. The coat lest is to fold the note, bringing the two ends together. The counterfeit note is not perfectly square at the ends. The engraving in the plate being made at true right angles, and when folded the discrepancy between the genuine and counterfeit can be detected.

THERE must be some chance of confusion in the books of the Bank of England, there being no less than 5409 fifty-pound notes bearing dividend warrants in the public stocks. There are also 9475 Browns, and 2190 Joneses.

A novel association has been formed in Portland, Maine—the Aged Men's Society, it is called—and bought no one under sixty-five years of age is admitted, there are already 111 members. It is stated that Judge Luther Fitch is the oldest member, he being eighty-six.

According to President Woolsey, of Yale College, "Connecticut is at the bottom of the list" in regard to the number of divorces in proportion to the number of marriages. From tables which have been prepared in some few of the States, it has been ascertained that the ratio of divorces to marriages has annually averaged, since 1860, in Vermont, one divorce to twenty marriages; in Massachusetts, one to forty-four; in Ohio, one to twenty-six; in Connecticut, one to ten. In twenty States the Constitution prohibits the Legislature private bills of divorce; yet in several States the courts have power to grant divorces for what shall seem to them "sufficient reasons."

THE well-known Professor Anderson, who proposed to announcement, crossed Niagara River on what was termed a "velocipede." The machine used in this foolish feat was the same as any ordinary velocipede, though a bicycle. The wheels, three inches wide, were made heavy, weighing 100 pounds, the grooves nearly two inches deep. The connectingrods were iron, so also the balance-pole, which was eight feet long and tipped with lead weights, and weighed twenty-eight pounds. The whole thing, with the man, weighed 300 pounds. The propelling power was a pinion cog-wheel made of brass, about nine inches in diameter. The cable was securely fastened on the American side, and the end, after being coiled around a windlass, so that it might easily be hauled in. The front wheel of the bicycle was placed on the rope, and standards from the under side so arranged as to bring two strong bars of iron on either side of the rope. Every thing was securely fastened, and the whole arrangement such as to throw the centre of gravity on the cable and ride very steadily. Some little disappointment was evinced among the large spectators when this was apparent. But, dressed in costume, the feat of the day was performed on his ride, the crowd preserving deathlike stillness. When he reached the middle of the abyss the cable sank back, in response to which a faint cheer arose. When, after a passage of seven minutes, he reached the edge of the cliff, the applause was loud and long.

A story is told in a Paris paper of a new method for recovering one's debts. A crowd gathered in the vicinity of the Odeon round a gilt and handsome sign, whom a gentleman at an adjoining window was apostrophizing with loud curses and gesticulations. It turned out that the girl was a washer-woman who had gone to the gentleman to ask for payment of her bill, and finding that the money was not forthcoming, she had seized her customer's wooden leg, which was lying in a corner, and was waved it declaring that she would not return it till she was paid.

A mechanician named Gennod has invented a machine which registers the number of kisses. He lies in the same as that which governed the "mechanical composition," from which each great things were once produced. The machine sits down between a man and playe, as it were, upon the keys, each stroke placing a kiss on the human lyre over. When it is full practice he can outstrip the swiftest speaker. †

Corporal punishment is not inflicted so frequently in the public schools as in England. In one opinion every where out of New England being against its performance. It is prohibited by law in the case of girls, and in light and primary schools. The New York schools, with an aggregate attendance of 1900 pupils, dispense with it altogether, and manage without it; and it was found that discipline and good order were more effectually preserved by other means. Another batch of schools was omitted to adopt extreme moderation instead of total abstinence in this matter, and they discovered very soon the evil to which when other means had failed. The result here was that a number of boys only of mature years found impervious to the new method of persuasion. It is an interesting question what would have become of these boys if they had happened to be in the schools where the rod was totally forbidden.

It is said that the thread of a certain species of spider, found in the Society Islands, is equal to that of a grains. As this fibre is only the one-four-thousandth of an inch in diameter, this is at the rate of 12,649 pounds, or 6¼ tons, per square inch. Good iron wire sustains 87 tons per inch; good steel 66 tons; good gun-barrel 75 tons.

Paper garments promise to displace cotton and woolen fabrics one of these days. Moreover, imitations leather are made from paper, which supplies a cheap and useful covering for furniture, and even serves for shoes.

The Gentleman's Magazine is the most ill-natured invention of the times. The carte de visite of a lady friend, for example, is thus by the Magazine described: "It appears distorted in a thousand hideous ways, the innumerable combinations of the kaleidoscope being successfully applied to the art of making ugly cow's-fellow creatures.

An exchange, evidently regarding Rochester as a monomaniac, says: "The Rochesterians are about the devotion of that city to the famed Century Plant. It declares that for the last three months Rochester has been entirely suspended in Rochester, and Jack's bean stalk has been completely left out in the wet. The keynote of the people has been so unmelodious that even at restaurants the bills of fare offer Aloe Soup, Roast Century Beef, Century Plant, and Mutton reticulated, Lamb with Pericarp Sauce; while Pods, Pistils, Stamens, and Petals come into Entrees; and Baked Cotyledons, Refreshing Cups, Spring, and Auricula Meringues help to make up the list of Pastry. Moreover, "seventy-eight new Century Aloe steamers and all-through railroad lines have been chartered for the transportation of the gigantic Agave to Chicago."

The cause of "woman's rights" is advancing rapidly in Great Britain. The women of England have obtained the Lancashire Franchise, the Queen of Commons has passed the married woman's property bill, and it has been announced that Miss Jane Hume of Castle. Moreover, the provisions of the endowed school bill will give young women a fairer share of educational privileges than they have hitherto enjoyed.

A prominent South Carolina newspaper asserts that "during this fall every cotton State in the entire country will show more true prosperity than any other section of the world." There is reason to anticipate, according to the paper referred to, a crop of about "3,000,000 bales of cotton, valued at $168 a bale;" a "corn crop worth $320,000,000 ?" and sugar, wheat, tobacco, and other crops which "will bring $150,000,000 more," making a very large income "for a population of about 11,000,000." Reconstruction certainly has not ruined the South, as was so fiercely prophesied by many and long ago: and Southern statesmen and rulers in what seems to be only the beginning of a brighter and better career.

APPARENT DEATH.

CERTAINLY we manage some things better than they do in France: among them being the interval allowed to elapse between death and interment. Still, there are circumstances and cases which, even here, afford matter for serious reflection.

It will easily be supposed that the dangerous briefness of this interval has been urged upon the attention of the French Legislature, and been ably discussed by the French medical press. In 1856 a petition was presented to the Senate from a person named De Cornol, pointing out the danger of hasty interments, and suggesting the measures he thought requisite to avoid terrible consequences. Among other things he prayed that the space of twenty-four hours between the decease and the interment now prescribed by the law should be extended to eight-and-forty hours. A long debate followed, in which Cardinal Donnet, Archbishop of Bordeaux, took a leading part. He was decidedly of opinion that the petition should not be set aside by the "order of the day," but that it should be transmitted to the Minister of the Interior for further consideration and inquiry. Some of the venerable prelate's remarks produced so great an effect on his auditors as to merit particular notice. He said he had the very best reasons for believing that the victims of hasty interments were more numerous than people supposed. He considered the regulations on this head prescribed by the law as very judicious, but unfortunately they were not always executed as they should be, nor was sufficient importance attached to them. In the village where he was stationed as assistant curate in the first period of his sacerdotal life, he saved two persons from being buried alive. The first was an aged man, who lived twelve hours after the hour fixed for his interment by the municipal officer. The second was a man who was quite restored to life. In both these instances a trance more prolonged than usual was taken for actual death.

The next case in his experience occurred at Bordpaux. A young lady, who bore one of the most distinguished names in the department, had passed through what was believed to be her last agony, and as, apparently, all was over, the father and mother were torn away from the heart-rending spectacle. At that moment, as God willed it, the cardinal happened to pass the door of the house, when it occurred to him to call and inquire how the young lady was going on. When he entered the room, the nurse, finding the body breathless, was in the act of covering the face, and indeed there was every appearance that life had departed. Somehow or other it did not seem so certain to him as to the by-standers. He resolved to try. He raised his voice, called loudly upon the young lady not to give up the hope, and that he was come to cure her, and that he was about to pray by her side. "You do not see me," he said, "but you hear what I am saying." Those singular presentiments were not unfounded. The voice reached her ear and effected a marvelous change, or rather called back the life that was departing. The young girl survived, and in 1866 was a wife, the mother of children, and the chief happiness of two most respectable families.

The last instance related by the Archbishop is so interesting, and made such a sensation, that it deserves to be given in his own words:

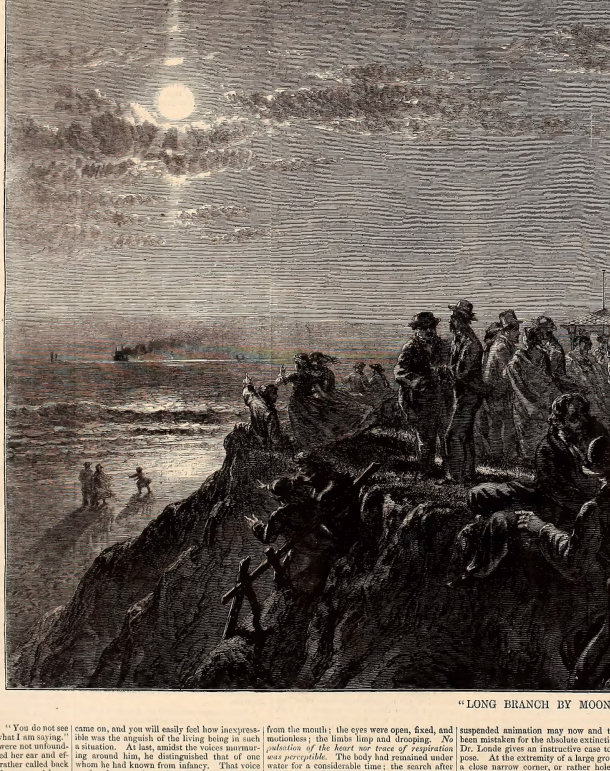
"In the summer of 1826, on a close and sultry day, in a church that was excessively crowded, a young priest who was in the act of preaching was suddenly seized with giddiness in the pulpit. The words he was uttering became indistinct; he soon lost the power of speech, and sank down upon the floor. He was taken out of the church and carried home. Every body thought that all was over. Some hours afterward the funeral bell was tolled, and the usual preparations were made for the interment. His eyesight was gone; but if, like the young lady I have mentioned, he could see nothing, he could nevertheless hear: and I need not say that what reached his ears was not calculated to reassure him. The doctor came, examined him, and pronounced him dead; and after the usual inquiries as to his age, the place of his birth, etc., gave permission for his interment next morning. The venerable bishop, in whose cathedral the young priest was preaching when he was seized with the fit, came to his bedside to recite the De Profundis. The body was measured for the coffin. Night came on, and you will easily feel how inexpressible was the anguish of the living being in such a situation. At last, amidst the voices murmuring around him, he distinguished that of one whom he had known from infancy. That voice produced a marvelous effect, and excited him to make a superhuman effort. Of what followed I need say no more than that the seemingly dead man stood next day in the pulpit from which he had been taken for dead. That young priest, gentlemen, is the same man who is now speaking before you, and who, more than forty years after that event, implores those in authority not merely to watch vigilantly over the careful execution of the legal prescriptions with regard to interments, but to enact fresh ones, in order to prevent the recurrence of irreparable misfortunes."

A remarkable pamphlet, Lettre sur La Mort Apparente, Les Conséquences Réelles des Inhumations Précipitées, et Le Temps Pendant lequel peut persister L'Aptitude à être Rappelé à la Vie, by the late regretted Dr. Charles Londe, records accidents which are more likely than the preceding to occur in England. Even were the bathing season not at hand, deaths by drowning are always to be apprehended. We therefore cite the following:

On the 13th of July, 1829, about two o'clock in the afternoon, near the Pont des Arts, Paris, a body, which appeared lifeless, was taken out of the river. It was that of a young man, twenty years of age, dark-complexioned, and strongly built. The corpse was discolored and cold; the face and lips were swollen and tinged with blue; a thick and yellowish froth exuded from the mouth; the eyes were open, fixed, and motionless; the limbs limp and drooping. No pulsation of the heart nor trace of respiration was perceptible. The body had remained under water for a considerable time; the search after it, made in Dr. Bourgeois's presence, lasted fully twenty minutes. That gentleman did not hesitate to incur the derision of the lookers-on, by proceeding to attempt the resurrection of what, in their eyes, was a mere lump of clay. Nevertheless, several hours afterward, the supposed corpse was restored to life, thanks to the obstinate perseverance of the doctor, who, although strong and enjoying robust health, was several times on the point of losing courage, and abandoning the patient in despair.

But what would have happened if Dr. Bourgeois, instead of persistently remaining stooping over the inanimate body, with watchful eye and attentive ear, to catch the first rustling of the heart, had left the drowned man, after half an hour's fruitless endeavor, as often happens? The unfortunate young man would have been laid in the grave, although capable of restoration to life! To this case, Dr. Bourgeois, in the Archives de Médecine, adds others, in which individuals who had remained under water as long as SIX HOURS were recalled to life by efforts which a weaker conviction than his own would have refrained from making. These facts lead Dr. Londe to the conclusion that, every day, drowned individuals are buried, who, with greater perseverance, might be restored to life.

Nor is suffocation by foul air and mephitical gas a rare form of death. It is possible that suspended animation may now and then have been mistaken for the absolute extinction of life. Dr. Londe gives an instructive case to the purpose. At the extremity of a large open court, in a close narrow corner, or rather hole, was the sleeping-place of the shopman who managed the night sale till the shop was closed, and who opened the shutters at four in the morning. On the 16th of January, 1825, there were loud knocks at the grocer's door. As nobody stirred to open it, the grocer rose himself, grumbling at the shopman's laziness, and proceeding to his sleeping-hole to scold him. He found him motionless in bed, completely deprived of consciousness. Terror-struck by the idea of sudden death, he immediately sent in search of a doctor, who suspected a case of asphyxia by mephitism. His suspicions were confirmed by the sight of a night-lamp, which had gone out with oil and wick, containing the remains of charcoal reduced to ashes.



"LONG BRANCH BY MOONLIGHT."—[ENGRAVED BY W. J.

In spite of a severe headache, he [illegible] the patient taken up and placed in a chair in a position favorable for breathing. The limbs of the body, drooping, the pupils of the eyes contracted, no trace either of breathing or pulsation in the heart or arteries; in short, all the appearances were those of death. The most energetic means of restoring animation were resorted to, but for a long time without success. At last, about two hours after noon, that is, after the commencement of the operation, a slight movement was perceived in the region of the heart. A few minutes after, the patient opened his eyes, regained consciousness, and was able to converse with those around him. He spoke of his resurrection, and drew conclusions as to the cause of his death, which, although suffocated by mephitism, were not unnatural, namely, that he had been murdered while he was asleep. He was not undeceived when they mentioned to him the charcoal in the stove, which he had not seen when he went to bed. Nevertheless, he soon recovered his memory, and remembered perfectly all that had occurred previously to his having gone to sleep. Several days elapsed before he was entirely restored to health, and he still suffers from almost unavoidable attacks of nervous headache, which are peculiarities of the mephitical poisoning. Some of the symptoms of death, namely, the coldness, and the total suspension of all vital action, which we have mentioned as characteristic of death, are not infallible signs of death. In fact, the life has taken refuge in the heart, and is only concentrated there, as an asylum, in a state of suspended animation, which may last for a considerable time, and from which the individual may be recalled to life by the application of proper means. Such is the case with persons who are drowned, or who are suffocated by the fumes of charcoal, or by the effects of the gases which are found in wells, and in other places where the air is vitiated. Many persons have been restored to life who were supposed to be dead, and were on the point of being buried, when they were saved by the sudden appearance of some of the symptoms of life. Many persons have been buried alive, and have awakened in the tomb, when they might be saved by the application of proper means. We have had occasion to speak of this subject before, and we shall probably have occasion to speak of it again. Such cases are of frequent occurrence, and the public should be informed of the means of restoring life in such cases. Many lives might be saved by the knowledge of these means. Many persons have been buried alive, and have awakened in the tomb, when they might be saved by the application of proper means. We have had occasion to speak of this subject before, and we shall probably have occasion to speak of it again. Such cases are of frequent occurrence, and the public should be informed of the means of restoring life in such cases. Many lives might be saved by the knowledge of these means.

although well supplied a portable stove con- charcoal partly reduced

e, he immediately had open air, and kept on nearly vertical as possi- sufferer hung loose and motionless, with no pulsation of the heart were all the signs of moved modes of restoring ion for a long while with- hour three in the after- Assoc[illegible] continued exer- ment heard in the region hours afterward the patient to Poland to study the cholera) was opening a subject in the dead-house of the Bagatelle Hospital in Warsaw, he saw another body (that of a woman of fifty, who had died in two days, having her eyes still bright, her joints supple, but the whole surface extremely cold) which visibly moved its left foot ten or twelve times in the course of an hour. Afterward the right foot participated in the same movement, but very feebly. M. Trachez sent for Mr. Searle, an English surgeon, to direct his attention to the phenomenon. Mr. Searle had often remarked it. The woman, nevertheless, was left in the dissecting-room, and thence taken to the cemetery. Several other medical men stated that they had made similar observations. From which M. Trachez draws the inference: "It is allowable was about to wrap the corpse in its winding-sheet. Suddenly a rattling noise issued from Thévbe's chest. She opened her eyes, and, in a hollow voice, said to the nurse: "What are you doing here? I am not dead. Get away with you." She recovered, and felt no other inconvenience than a deafness, which lasted about two months.

In Germany coffins, with the corpses laid out in them, are placed in a building where a keeper watches day and night. During the forty years that this system has been in force not a single case of apparent death has been proved to occur. This negative result can not be cited as conclusive, either for or against the system. In a country where a million of people annually die, an experiment embracing only forty-six thousand Docteur Bouchot has shown that atropine has no action on the pupil when death is real. In a state of lethargy the pupil, under the influence of a few drops of atropine, dilates in the course of a few minutes; the dilatation also takes place a few instants after death; but it ceases absolutely in a quarter of an hour or half an hour at the very longest; consequently, the enlargement of the pupil is a certain sign that death is only apparent.

This promised, imagine a little camera-obscura, scarcely so big as an opera-glass, containing a slip of photographic paper, which is kept unrolling for five-and-twenty or thirty minutes by means of clock-work. This apparatus, placed a short distance in front of the dead person's eye, will depict on the paper the pupil of the eye, rolled marks the time during which the experiment has been continued. An apparatus of the kind might be placed in the hands of the minister or one of the notables of every parish. Such a system would silence the apprehensions of the most timid. Fears — natural enough — would disappear, and the world would be shocked by no fresh cases of premature burial.

THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.

THE innocent eccentricities of certain members of the human family have afforded much entertainment to the rest since the world began. Whether queer people were more plentiful in by-gone times than they are at present; whether the world be less or more fatuous than it was, we have not the slightest notion. As it gets older, we should hope it grows wiser; though this does not, in individual cases at least, always follow. But that we have still eccentrics among us, persons whose doings are just as outré as any vagaries previously recorded, there seems no reason whatever to doubt.

The newspapers recently announced that a married lady in New York had left the whole of her property for the purpose of building a church, on the condition that her body and bones should be made into mortar, in which to lay the corner-stone of the edifice. What a very eccentric lady she must have been! Think of the originality of the notion! None but a person of irregular mind could have conceived it. Her object or motive we do not and can never know, but her last will and testament is certainly one of the most extraordinary curiosities of testamentary literature on record.

A short time previously we read that Professor W. B. Powell, an eminent American physician and physiologist, lately dead, bequeathed his head to one of his pupils, a Mrs. Rinsey.— The executor of the deceased employed Dr. Curtis, of Cincinnati, to take off his head, which is now in the possession of the fortunate legatee. What will she do with it? We never heard of a foot being bequeathed by any body. There is, however, the legacy of a hand on record. The will of Philip Thicknesse, Esquire, who died during the last century, runs thus: "I desire that after my death my right hand may be cut off and sent to Lord Dudley, that he may see the hand dead which when living had not only often given him many guineas in his youth, which his father wanted in his age, as well as an expensive education, with a view of what he was to be, rather than what he then was; sincerely hoping thereby that such a deadly sight may awaken his deluded mind, and teach him his duty to God, that he may obtain pardon for his neglect of a father who once loved him with unbounded affection, and who dying forgives him, as he does all his enemies." Few persons, we dare say, would be inclined to consider the legacy a handsome one; but the story is pathetic.

An inhabitant of London, who lived about four centuries ago, left eight shillings to be expended annually in the purchase of faggots with which to burn heretics. John Hodge has kept his name out of oblivion by giving twenty shillings a year to a poor man to go about the parish church of Tryvall during sermon-time to keep people awake and boys out of church. Henry Green, of Melbourne, Derbyshire, gave his property to provide green waistcoats for four poor women every year, such waistcoats to be trimmed with green galloon lace. In the same neighborhood, and inspired by a similar feeling, Thomas Gray provided gray waistcoats and grey coats. John Nicholson, a London stationer, was ac-ded consciousness, and was ble spectators attracted by Londe drawn the same ner, namely, that persons suf- were not unfrequently buried ed.

W. J. LINTON, FROM THE ORIGINAL PAINTING BY ROSENBURG.]

ses in this country, and may ch by dying times, if ever, and merely excusable, but Nevertheless, one of the fatal diseases is to bring on fit of death, the prostration, ental livid hues, long before ortune. Now, Dr. Londe neglected fact, that patients cholera have been repeatedly ptures of their limbs after Trachez (who had been sent to think that many cholera patients have been buried alive."

Dr. Veyrat, attached to the Bath Establishment, Aix, Savoy, was sent for to La Roche (Department of the Yonne) to visit a cholera patient, Thévbe X., who had lost all the members of her family by the same disease. He found her in a complete state of asphyxia. He opened a vein; not a drop of blood flowed. He applied leeches; they bit, and immediately loosed their hold. He covered the body with stimulant applications, and went to take a little rest, requesting to be called if the patient manifested any signs of life. The night and next day passed without any change. While making preparations for the burial they noticed a little blood oozing out of the leech-bites. Dr. Veyrat, informed of the circumstance, entered the chamber just as the nurse corpses is too partial to be relied on as evidence. Moreover, mortuary chambers exist only in a few great centres of population; and it is especially in small towns and country districts, where medical men are too busy to inspect the dead, that premature interments are to be apprehended.

M. de Parville announces the possibility of distinguishing every form of lethargy from real death. He professes to place in any one's hands a self-acting apparatus which would declare, not only whether the death be real, but would leave in the hands of the experimenter a written proof of the reality of the death. The scheme is this: It is well known that atropine possesses the property of considerably dilating the pupil of the eye. Oculists constantly make use of it when they want to perform an operation or to examine the interior of the eye. Now M. le which will have been previously moistened with a few drops of atropine. It is evident that, as the paper slides before the eye of the corpse, if the pupil dilate, its photographic image will be dilated; if, on the contrary, it remains unchanged, the image will retain its original size. An inspection of the paper then enables the experimenter to rend upon it whether the death is real or apparent only.

By this simple method a hasty or careless certificate of death becomes impossible. The instrument applies the test, and counts the minutes. The doctor and the civil officer are relieved from further responsibility. The paper gives evidence that the verification has actually and carefully been made; for, suppose that half an hour is required to produce a test that can be relied on, the length of the strip of paper un-tached to his family name that the bulk of his property was given in charity for the support and maintenance of such poor persons in England as shall appear to be of the name of Nicholson—a very catholic benefaction, certainly. Then we have "The Brown Bequest," published a short time ago. Joseph Brown, Esq., of Goldsworth-all, left a splendid estate to endow a hospital at Silleston for the education of boys of the name of Brown, preference being given to those who combine the names of Joseph with the surname. According to one of Brown's executors, the enormous sum of £50,000 is being expended upon the building, and all for the accommodation of only nineteen boys. We incline to think that so magnificent a fortune might have been turned to much better account. The executors propose to exhibit "in a glass case, in the great entrance-hall of the institution, the original ragged coat in which the founder came to Silleston, in March, 1794." This story of the tattered coat reminds us of another instance where an extraordinary penchant for present as well as posthumous admiration may lead a man to commit an act of the most egregious folly, vanity, and bad taste. In the museum of the Chambers Institution, at Peebles, which was founded at a cost of some £20,000, there may be seen, carefully framed and to the wall, a small box or chest, on the lid of which there is an inscription to this effect: "This box belonged to William Chambers when an apprentice in Edinburgh, between the years 1814 and 1819, and which then contained all he possessed in the world." Incredible as it may seem, the inscription, as we happen to know, is in the hand-writing of the founder himself, who is no other than the author number of the well-known firm of publishers. Surely this is pushing "Chambers's Information for the People" to the very utmost. We take one man even, college, another provides for a cat. With others the rule is reversed, and here for dogs, horses, and parrots. Thus the will of Sir Jacob Astley, who died so recently as 1867, contained an annuity to his servant, and £10 to provide food for his parrot. Mrs. Hannah White, in 1798, left in trust to one of her servants the sum of £25 per annum for the maintenance of her favorite cats "during the term of their natural lives."

About the same date (1790) we find the Right Hon. Henry Bilson Legge, of Grove House, Chelsea, bequeathing his sent to Mrs. Luther, under the following very singular restrictions: All the horses and dogs on the premises were to be carefully fed and attended to until they died a natural death, and his own servant was to have two rooms in the house as long as he lived, in default of such attention to the animals, Mrs. Luther would have only a life-interest in the premises; but if she carried the intention of her will the estate would be absolutely at her own disposal. All the animals and the servant being dead, the property was put up for sale in 1819. Regarding Mr. Morrice, Colman, in his "Random Records," says, "I remember seeing this gentleman in his own park, where, in summer weather, they reposed beneath the shade of the trees, when a boy was employed to flap the flies from their backs by the bonnet shown by Mr. Morrice to his beasts of burden were only inferior to those which Caligula lavished on his charger." The testator, in this instance, showed his affection for his horses and dogs by conferring annuities upon them, in a very different feeling, however, operated with the late Mr. Berkley Wingfield. Mr. Wingfield was a wine and spirit merchant and resided at Bath, where he died in August, 1867. In his will he requested that his horse, to which he was much attached, should follow him to his grave, afterward have a good corn, and then be destroyed. The injunction was strictly carried out. The horse, with the closed carriage of the deceased, followed in the rear of the funeral procession, and the next day, after being well fed with corn, it was taken to the side of a pond, which had been dug in a field adjoining the residence of its late master, and there "knocked on the head" by a veterinary surgeon. The operation was performed in the following manner: The jugular vein was opened, and an iron pipe having been inserted in the vein, the pipe was blown down until the horse expired, which occurred in about half a minute. Mr. Wingfield had also requested that the whole of his domestic animals might be destroyed at the same time and buried with the horse. Several cats were accordingly killed, and the remains of a beautiful dog which had died about a month before were exhumed, and all were buried in one grave. The testator left annuities to the whole of his servants, but, as was jocularly remarked at the time, the annuities were not to be destroyed! We have had more than one instance of late of a person disposing of his or her surplus cash to found a Refuge for Cats; and a few years ago one of the partners of a well-known firm of drapers in London left the enormous sum of £50,000 with which to build a Home for stray dogs. The deceased's relatives have here struck up a hornet's nest, but will set forth that as it was usual to put flowers into the coffins of departed friends, and she had never found any flowers so fragrant and refreshing as the precious powder, her old and trusty servant, Sarah Stuart, was to take care her body was covered with the best Scotch snuff. Six men, the greatest snuff-takers in the parish of St. James, were to carry her to the grave, each wearing a snuff-colored beaver hat instead of mourning; and the half-dozen old maids, selected to act as pall-bearers, were to be supplied with boxes of snuff wherewith to refresh themselves on the road. The officiating clergyman was also to be paid five guineas on condition that he walked in front of the hearse, and "took a certain quantity, not exceeding one pinch" of the same. Finally, on condition that she strewed at least two bushels of the said snuff at the door of the testatrix's residence, and walked three times around it for the purpose of distributing "every twenty yards a large handful of Scotch snuff to the ground and upon the crowd." Lastly, in every legacy bequeathed to Dame Thompson was attached a gift of one pound of what she called "the grand cordial of nature." The story of another old lady and her tea may appropriately follow. Mr. Day, the founder of Fairlop fair, had a housekeeper who had lived with him for many years, and was equally eccentric. She had two strong attachments; one to her wedding-ring and garments, the other to tea. When she died Mr. Day would not permit her ring to be taken off. It that were attempted, he said, she would come to life again. He directed that she should be buried in her wedding-dress, and a pound of tea to each hand. The latter part of the will was duly obeyed. It is a sad reflection on the frailty of human nature that some persons do not allow their remembrance to rest with the dead in the grave, but leave behind them wills which excite the bitterest animosities among their surviving relatives and friends.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER LII.

AND THE WORLD RUNS MERRY AS HERETOFORE.

It was evening at Auriel; a sad-hued evening, full of damp vapors and wan colors: only in the west was the dull, misty sky illumined, and there every leaf that quivered in the glow of the rosy light appeared a tiny blaze of gold; elsewhere all was dimness and gray: the hedboughs were soaked black by rain, the tawny foliage lay thick over the rose-beds, or made bronze colored circles round the dead-looking shrubs.

It was very dreary, Lady Diana thought, as she walked up the avenue on her way to the house. When she drew nearer to the huge red building with its many lights gleaming and glittering in those last fierce beams of the winter sun, she paused with a sudden terror lest eyes by her unseen might be watching her approach from behind those uncanny-looking squares.

Then she reasoned herself into composure. Who could be watching her? Her movements were thus, muffled up in dark clothes—a thick veil obscuring her face, a black velvet net concealing the brightness of her hair—as two grays were black, and her pretty feet were disfigured by clumsy-looking shoes.

She walked on toward the door, but her heart beat so fast as she stood on the threshold that she felt almost faint; it was some minutes before she nerved herself to ring the bell, and then that a quick-eared mouse would scarcely have been startled by the sound. The dead old woman who sat crooning over the kitchen fire, thinking in her aged fatuity, and dreading, she scarce knew why, the return of the young lady to the house, Lady Diana peered in at the only window through which she saw a gleam of fire-light, and looked intently at the aged occupant.

Only one person was visible, and that was old Sally, who crouched over the fire with her hands stretched to the blaze: the wind roared, and her lips were murmuring some little lullaby which had stilled her babe's cry many weary years ago.

"There can be none in the house," the watcher thought; "she would not be so still and inactive if she were not alone."

Emboldened by this idea, Lady Diana lifted the latch of the side-door, and finding that it yielded to the touch, she walked in, and, directed by the fire-light, made her way to the kitchen.

"Who's that?" the old woman said, suddenly waking up and looking at her visitor with an air of suspicion.

"I hope I haven't startled you," Lady Diana said, kindly, for she had remembered that she had been sent to Auriel by some friends of the girl who had lately died. They wish me to make some little compensation to you for all your trouble," she added, judiciously, producing some gold, and old Sally's confidence was won at once.

"So you've come back to the darling that's gone; well now I've often thought it strange no one come to see the last of her. Ah! how she did suffer, to be sure," the crone said, in a tone of melancholy satisfaction. "And she was carried out, ma'am, by that very door you just come in at."

Lady Diana shivered and looked round uncomfortably.

"Don't talk about it," she said, hastily. "I hate to hear of death."

"Well, it isn't much good shutting your eyes to him when you're sure to see him some day," Sally answered, composedly. "For my part, I'm ready for him. P'raps, if you spent fifty years in working to keep hunger from your inside and rheumatics from your limbs, you'd be tired out at last, too. Poor Miss Alice, she used to whirl about the house gay as a kitten, and sing something about life's being beautiful; but, bless you! that's all according to one's weekly wages and state of health. My life's been ugly enough."

"Did any one but yourself take care of that poor girl?" Lady Diana asked, abruptly. "I must make amends to every body."

"There was only the old doctor. Maybe he won't be sorry to have a present for all his new carriage; and there's Mr. Douglas, but—"

But what?" the other broke in with impatience.

"I was thinking, dear, the old woman answered, slowly, "that no one can comfort him, since not the Great Power of all has done it; he sits there—up stairs where she died—and he looks there now and then, sometimes: when I pass the door, I think I hear him calling her name; but softly, as if he feared to wake somebody."

"Is he there now?"

"I count he is."

"Could I look at him? Could I see him without his seeing me? I should like to carry away with me what I looked; they would be sorry if he were ill; but I should be afraid he might be angry if he saw me," stammered Lady Diana.

"I don't think he'd take notice," Sally suggested, "if you was to go to the door (it mostly stands open) and look at him."

But her companion turned a shade paler under her veil, and shook her head.

"I dare not risk it," she murmured.

She had resolved, as she set out this man that she might face the truth; but if her suspicions were correct, she would have met the awful eyes of the murdered man with a fainting glance.

"He could never forgive, for he can never forget what my fault led him to," she thought.

And so (in a veiled sense after all) is magnified by his consequent crime; what a fool he was to come to this that night! But what a fool I am—it may not be he after all. I declare, if it is not, I'll put up a memorial window to him in his parish church!"

"If we go to the top of them," Sally said, indicating the last flight of stairs, "you can stand behind me, and he won't never notice us."

Lady Diana walked up to a dingy fragment of mirror which hung on the wall, and took heart when she saw how complete her disguise was; at the same time, with a pang of vexed vanity, she noted what an ungainly appearance she made.

"If he did recognize me by any chance," she meditated, "I should pull down my back hair and fly accident, and toss aside this ugly bonnet."

When they reached the door of Azalea's room she hung back with a desperate dread creeping over her heart.

She experienced that sudden sense of failure—failure of moral courage, failure physical power, which sometimes afflicts us when we are brought face to face with the peril which at a far distance we have defied.

Then her heart strengthened with resolution, such resolve as sustains the wretch who welcomes the last agony which puts an end to unavailing torture.

With a long-drawn sigh, and a face contracted with the pain of the moment of sharp anguish, Lady Diana advanced to the threshold of the room where Sally had just beckoned the red face of the sun. There was, in his glance, a certain sad wistfulness—the pathetic doubt of one who looks for the last time out of silence, when implores hope from darkness; but there was no interest or sympathy expressed in external objects. His countenance was in the dull immobility of despair—despair such as no human being might remove or console. Lady Diana looked intently at the grey shadows of hair, at the deep lines under the eyes, at the ashen cheeks and withered hands, crossed listlessly one over the other, which hung down freely. The more she remembered, the man whom she had feared to recognize to-day, had worn a very different aspect. Stuart Merton's face was of a sunny brown, his forehead white, and his full lips red; his cheeks had always been pallid, but when they last touched hers in the parting embrace they were as smooth as ivory, and unscarred by a single wrinkle. His hair was full and broad, shouldered, carrying his head with a certain proud grace, not unbecoming to one whose heart was rich with treasure. This aged man, bowed, marred man, sitting so strangely quiet in the gathering dusk, bore no resemblance to him whom the sea had sucked down into its depths eighteen years ago.

Some books were lying partially open on the table, and Douglas, on which the ink was dry, were spread before him.

The wan streaks of sunset that were narrowing toward the west suddenly streamed over a vase filled with dead flowers, which stood near him, and made a piece of blue ribbon, which, trailing close to the glass goblet, cast a dim reflection of its hue on to the slender transparent stem of the vase.

Glancing mechanically at the varying colors of the glass, Douglas's eyes presently fell on the ribbon, and in an instant the whole expression of his face changed; the lips quivered, the eyes shone out under a sudden blur of tears like stars dimmed by mist. He took the ribbon in his hands gently, as if it were a living thing which would shrink from a rough touch. As he caressed it with his tender fingers, building some inarticulate murmur of love, every hard line relaxed as all the tense composure of despair gave way. Something of youth's fire and youth's mobility returned to his face in the sudden storm of passion which swept over it. As the dying light shone on his eyes, all afire with the pain of memory, on his lips, tremulous in their struggle to keep grief restrained, his changed expression was revealed to the watcher at the door. She involuntarily shrank back a few steps, and, as she put her hand to her heart, she could scarcely repress a groan. It was with a thrill of terror, she admitted the suspicion that this man's countenance was not, after all, unfamiliar to her.

"I can not tell, I can not be sure," she moaned to herself; "how am I to decide it without risk of detection?"

She stretched out her head, so as to get a fuller view of the occupant of the room without obtruding herself on his notice, but did not again stand in the doorway, but peered round with the little grace and attitude of a child watching an inimical approach; then, with a sudden access of resolution, with a desperate desire to terminate this prompt pain of doubt, she crouched yet further out of sight, and called, in a tone strangely hoarse and troubled—

"Stuart—Stuart Merton!"

She was conscious of his startled gesture; of a pale face looking in the direction of the door; and then, as his tall figure bowed and moved toward her through the gloom of that lonely chamber, she put out her hands with the desire to clutch at the dread of the old man who had accompanied her; praying, in a choked whisper, "Hide me away; keep me from his sight!" but the old woman was gone, and had vanished of standing there in the dark, cold atmosphere, when her little fire down stairs was blazing a welcome for her; and so she was left alone while Lady Diana lingered; and the latter felt voice and hands alike become powerless, as with a sick sensation about her heart, and a dull pain closing over her eyes, she lost all consciousness, and dropped down on the step at her husband's feet.

When Lady Diana awoke to the pain of returning sense she felt like one who moves in the dull atmosphere of a dream; a dream encumbered by the presence of a hideous terror.

What was this dark chamber illumined only by the fitful flickering of a wood fire? and who was he who sat opposite to her, looking intently at the flaring light?

If it was not—and she saw the sheen of a blue ribbon, which dangled from his neck, that she thoroughly realized the full trouble of her waking state. Then Stuart, with a pang of repentance pierced her; a glow of shame made her cheek hot as she remembered that in her life had been since she parted from this man, by no act there motionless in the twilight; the very sight of him, and those memories he evoked, were, in themselves, her punishment and condemnation.

Douglas was wearing the same absent look in the eyes with which he first saw him on the light of the dreary winter sun. He did not notice her return to consciousness, of which, indeed, she gave no outward sign, excepting in the irrepressible quiver of her lids, and a slight tremulous movement of her pale lips.

Lady Diana then looked at him stealthily, not daring to break the grim silence. Then, with a quick movement of her hand, she disengaged the ribbon from his fingers: the man, recovering not, freed herself of the heavy shawl which concealed her figure, and, rising up before him, stood for an instant as if irresolute, and then sank down, clinging to his knees, an embodiment of Corregio's Magdalen. The Magdalen in grace of form, in softness of disheveled tresses—tresses which made a glory of soft light over Douglas's head—but not the folded hands of the Magdalen in penitence of face and in her shamed attitude: a Magdalen who believed herself to be suffering as she had never suffered before, but who in reality only writhing under the wound of detection—one, in fact, who would sin again as soon as she had screened herself against the mischances of discovery.

Still clasping his knee, she cried out, "Forgive! forgive!"

She did not venture to lift up her face to his; she did not dare to counterfeit joy in meeting his eyes; she felt that such an assertion would be impossible to her, and would seem incredible to him; she could only wail out all her terror and remorse in a passionate entreaty for pardon.

"Oh, forgive me!" she cried. "Oh, Stuart, speak but one word to say that I need not fear a curse in your eyes."

A flush of color had come back to her cheeks, and her hair streamed like gold in the light of the fire. Her sleeves had fallen back from her outstretched arms, revealing their fair roundness. As she wound them tighter about his knees, he was reminded of the strange sinuous beauty of Lamia.

"Won't you know me?" she said, at last, in a subdued, caressing tone. "Have you not one word to give Ana?"

He removed her quietly; not as if she was an object of aversion, but simply as something which incommoded him.

"Yes, I know you very well," he said, quietly; "but what then?"

Something in his tone exasperated her.

"Is that all you will say to me?" she answered, with somewhat of reproach in her tone.

A gleam of anger lit up his deep gray eyes. "I will say, if you will, that you are the devil who led me to do a murder. You have made memory a hell to me..... Do you remember that man who kissed you in the final convict that I saw for distant and unconscious of my shame?..... Do you ever recall his fierce look as you left me, as flushed with the feeling of your parting embrace?..... and did you see him afterward?"

She shivered, and bent her head lower. "No," she whispered. "I never saw him again. I knew he was there, close by; but I would not look at him."

"But does he never look at you?" Douglas said, his face burning with excessive excitement. "Do you not see his dim set eyes, his pinched nostrils that never dilate with breath, but which appear day more shrivelled and contracted? Do you not see how all the proud blood had gone away from his wax-like face—all the brightness from his lank, dull hair? Does he never reproach you in your dreams, for not having given him 'more time?'—two hot, angry minutes sent his soul to God, and he thought sometimes, Ana, that those two minutes would be repaid to me by an eternity of hell; but God's mercy is the grand altar, the solace for those who fly from the ban of their own consciences, and it is my hope that He has let me work out some of my penance here, so that I may yet meet her hereafter."

His voice died away in a murmur of prayer. He seemed to be appealing for the Divine consolation of which he had just spoken, and as he communed with invisible Glory, his whitened face became transfigured with a beauty surpassing that of youth.

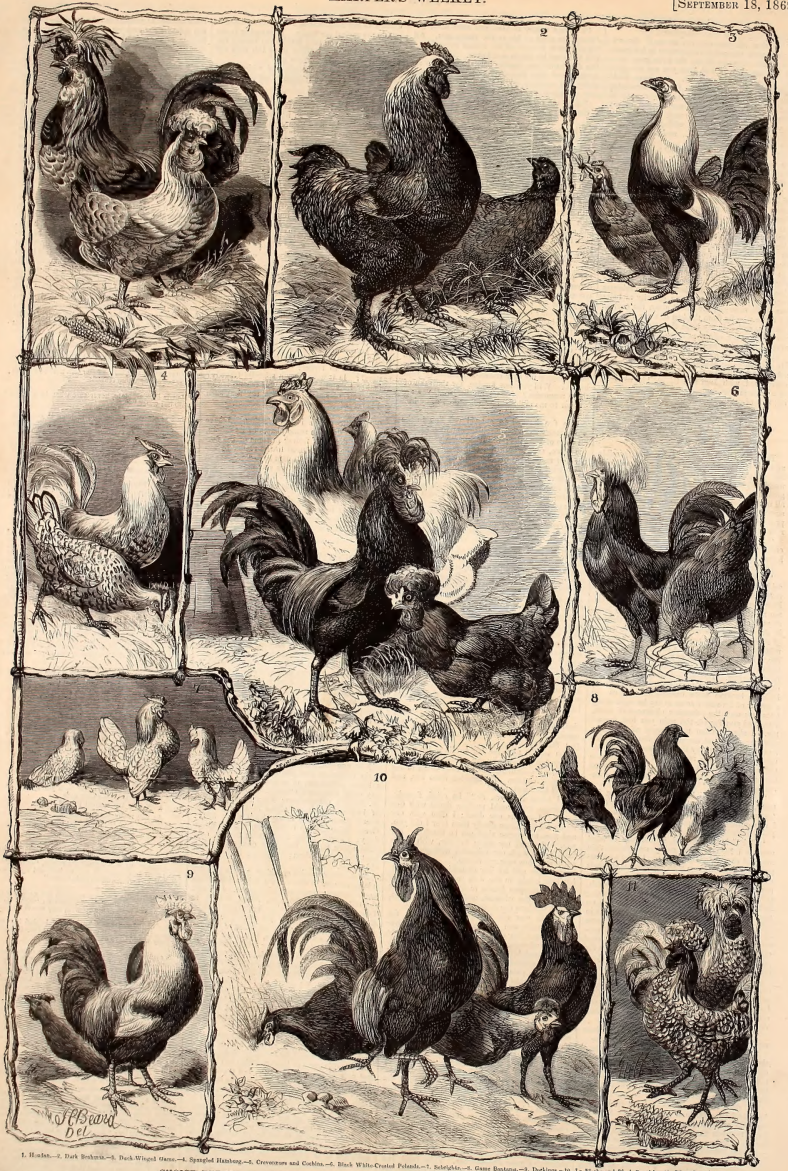
CHAPTER LIII.

THE END AT LAST.

THE woman at his feet felt inexpressibly awed and humbled. Was this the husband who had gone mad for jealousy of her?—who had wrecked his whole because of her sin? Was his great love, and his great wrath for love's sake, all merged into a religious frenzy; or had much sorrow unsettled his fine intellect, making him a prey to all the troubled fancies and weird terrors of an infirm imagination?

"Is it you, Stuart?" she moaned, as she still crouched at his feet. "Are you the husband I knew—the Stuart who loved me?"

He looked at her with sudden anger in his face. "Why do you come to torment me?" he said, impatiently. "Have you not worked me trouble enough? Can not you let me be at rest? If ever I shall again receive my mortal body," he said, impatiently. "Have you not worked me trouble enough? Can not you let me be at rest? If ever I shall again receive my mortal body, in the wicked light of your eyes. I see your tricks of gesture, your caressing hands; and I am reminded of the time which blasted my youth and life. I tried to put it away from me—all the old sickening despair, the keen, deep wound of that blighted time. I succeeded in so far as I myself concerned; as years went on, and your worthlessness became more evident to me, as the glamour of love died away in my heart, and my eyes saw with the relentless clearness of truth, I loathed you for all the pain you had caused me. I drowned the thought of you in the cup; I poisoned it with opium;



1. Hamlet.—2. Dark Brahmas.—3. Dark-Winged Game.—4. Spangled Hamburg.—5. Creevemore and Cochins.—6. Black White-Crested Polands.—7. Sebrights.—8. Game Bantams.—9. Dorkings.—10. La Flache and Black Spanish.—11. Silver-Spangled Polands.

CHOICE BREEDS OF POULTRY RECENTLY IMPORTED FROM IRELAND.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

VIEW OF MAUCH CHUNK, CARBON COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

MAUCH CHUNK, PENNSYLVANIA.

MAUCH CHUNK, the capital of Carbon County, is situated on the west bank of the Lehigh River, where that stream passes through the Mahoning Mountain. The town lies on both sides of Mauch Chunk Creek, and between the Mahoning and Sharp mountains. It is a location so contracted in breadth that it is really a long cañon. No room is afforded for gardens. The hills on either side rise precipitously to the height of several hundred feet; some of them are a thousand feet above the river. The name of the town is Indian, and signifies Bear Mountain.

The narrowness of the valley in which the town lies added greatly to the destructiveness of the memorable flood of 1862.

In 1818 the whole country in this vicinity was a complete wilderness. It was known, indeed, that anthracite coal was to be found here, but every attempt to get it to market had been baffled. In 1817 JOSIAH WHITE, accompanied by G. F. HAVEO, visited this region for the purposes of reconnoissance, the object of which was to ascertain the feasibility of using the Lehigh River to convey the coal to market. The project was any thing but encouraging, but it was determined to commence operations. Accordingly, roads were made from the mines to the Lehigh, and upon the latter were built a series of dams to aid the navigation by slack-water. Thus was established the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company. In 1832 the dependencies of this Company gave work to 400 men, principally miners, who, with their families, made a population of 2000. After passing through many a perilous crisis, and after an expense of $2,500,000, the enterprise was at last consummated.

The town is at present in a flourishing condition, the coal shipped from this point amounting to some millions of tons per annum. The Lehigh Valley Railroad, which is one of the best-managed roads in the country, affords the traveler admirable facilities for reaching this region, which is so remarkable for its picturesqueness that it has been termed the "Switzerland of America."

Judge ASA PACKER, the Democratic candi-

WORKMEN LAYING THE CONCRETE PAVEMENT IN NEW YORK CITY.—DRAWN BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 606.]

gate for Governor of Pennsylvania, resides at Mauch Chunk; and the grounds around his place, originally laid out by the exiled gardener of LOUIS PHILIPPE, form one of the chief attractions of the town.

The tourist who has not ascended to Mount Pisgah in this region, and taken a trip over the Gravity Roads, has failed to experience one of the most novel of the pleasures incident to modern travel.

THE CONCRETE PAVEMENT.

THE number of experiments which have been made in the matter of street pavements in this city, and the partial or total failure of these experiments clearly illustrate the deficiency of the system adopted by our municipal government. This fault can be repaired only by the establishment of a bureau of construction and repairs, consisting of competent engineers, not subject to the interference of the Common Council, except possibly in the matter of expenditure. The success that has attended the limited independence of the Central Park Commissioners is a proof of the policy and economy of eliminating the questions of politics from the conduct of public works.

The statistics of the several kinds of pavement laid down within twenty years, presented by a survey of the city, would stand approximately as follows:

	Square yards.
Stone-block	1,913,342
Nicolson	50,564
Fiske concrete (estimated)	8,000
Stafford (estimated)	100
Cobble-stone (estimated)	3,000,000

Since 1866 the cobble-stone pavement has gone out of use. During that year 17,254 square yards were put down—under contract to 1870—by the private expense 7032—but one ordinance looking to the laying of its any part of the city being passed while the previously mentioned work was going on. This ordinance provided for a cobble-stone pavement on Bank Street from West Street to the river. The curve of the new Bank pavement began with the disuse of the cobble-stone, in the starting down of 400 square yards on Nassau Street in 1866, of 29,000 in 1867, and of 29,073 in 1868. A contract was also made for laying of the Fisk concrete pavement along One-hundred-and-seventy-fourth Street from Third to First avenues, and an experiment with the Stafford pavement was tried at private expense in Wall Street, between William and Pearl over. An ordinance in favor of the latter on Seventh Avenue, between Fourteenth and Fifty-ninth streets, was also passed, together with six ordinances, amounting in all to 50,000 square yards, in favor of the Nicolson; six ordinances amounting to about 60,000 square yards, in favor of the M'Gonegal; two ordinances, amounting to 40,000 square yards, in favor of the Fisk & Miller; and three ordinances, involving about 20,000 square yards, in favor of the Fisk concrete; fifty-six ordinances, amounting to 400,000 square yards of stone-block pavement, complete the provisions for the year.

It has been estimated that in the course of twenty-four hours 17,000 vehicles pass the Astor House, in Broadway, up or down. This would wear out the stone-block pavement once in every fifteen years. Estimating the number of horses and vehicles in use in this city at 120,000, it is calculated that not less than $10,500,000 might be saved annually by the adoption of some less grinding substitute for the "Belgian" of the Russ and Belgian and stone-block superstructure; and the inference may be drawn that the question of expense of construction and repairs is not the only important economical question involved, but the relative cost per square yard of the several pavements in use may be averaged as follows:

Stone-block (Belgian)	$2 50
Russ, or stone-block with concrete bed	4 00
Nicolson	4 00
Fisk concrete	3 00
Stafford	3 50

In Paris, since 1854, a strong preference has been manifested for the asphaltum pavement upon a concrete foundation. This pavement is quite similar to the Fisk concrete, which is now being laid in the most fashionable streets of this city and in Central Park. As a rule, experienced foreigners express doubts as to the merits of the Nicolson and Fisk concrete pavements of all patterns. The Stafford type of wooden pavement, though later in the field, possesses some advantages over the Nicolson, the principal of which are its simplicity and the ease with which it may be repaired. The wooden pavement question has been practically settled in the negative by English experiments during the past twenty years. Its merits are its noiselessness, its reduction of the mortality of horses, its reduction of the wear and tear of vehicles, and its effecting a utilization of the utmost percentage of draught force, and these are all merits to an equal degree of the asphaltic road—may be made merits of any concrete whatsoever. The increased mortality in horses occasioned by the Russ and Belgian and other stone pavements in this city is estimated at 3,000 annually—an item of considerable importance in the discrimination between pavements for thoroughfares. As between the two typical systems, the Belgian and the Nicolson, from data already supplied, it may be estimated that, with the attrition of Broadway, the former would last fifteen years against a duration of half that period in the case of the latter.

The concrete pavement—the value of which has been happily settled in Paris—effects a union of the better qualities of both the wooden and the stone block, without the objections appertaining to either, and, as the minds of engineers and inventors are already beginning to turn in this direction, nothing is hazarded in predicting that the ideal or coming pavement will be developed from the present crude concretes.

Our illustration on page 605 shows the manner in which the Fisk concrete pavement is laid. This pavement is composed of gravel, broken stone, cinders, and coal ashes (free from all foreign substances), mixed in definite proportions with tar, resin, and asphaltum. The road-bed, properly prepared, the composition is spread on in layers of moderate thickness, successively rolled with heavy rollers for uniformity and compactness. These layers form a softly-steady strong roadway of about one and three-quarters of a foot in depth, and can be put down at as expense, per square foot, not exceeding the expense of the Belgian pavement as constructed in Paris. It remains for years and attrition to test the practical value of this concrete; but, from the data already presented, it is heartily and highly commended by thoughtful engineers as a step in the right direction. The sole objection to it, as it seems to us, against the pedestrian to measure the imminence of passing vehicles, is an abatement of concretes over wooden pavements, illustrated in our engraving by the asphaltic road, the value of which as a preventive of accidents to life has been amply tested. This style of pavement has been adopted by the Central Park Commissioners.

THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA BY THE CHINESE.

WE all columbus the first discoverer of America, or did we learn it from our geography when it had, in remote ages, been found, peopled, and forgotten by the Old World? It is curious that this question has not been more generally raised, for it is very clear that one of two things must be true: either the people whom Columbus found in America were the direct descendants from emigrants from the Old World, and therefore America was known to the Old World before Columbus's time, or the Indian species of the western hemisphere were the result of spontaneous human generation—the development of man from a lower species of animal, not descended from a second Adam and Eve, whose original would be contained in the Bible. If we are prepared to cast aside Holy Writ, and all our general notions of the origin of the human race, we must believe that there was some time communication between the Old World and the New. Probably this communication took place on the opposite side of the globe, and the natives of eastern coast of Asia and the side of America must remote from Europe: and I believe it is quite possible that the inhabitants of eastern Asia may have been aware of the existence of America, and kept up intercourse with it while our part of the Old World was ignorant of its existence. The impenetrable barrier the Chinese have always anxious to preserve between themselves and the rest of the universe of the Old World renders it quite possible that they should have had a knowledge of America to themselves, or at any rate, from Europe. The objection that the art of navigation in such remote times was not sufficiently advanced to enable the Chinese to cross the Pacific and land on the western shore of America is not conclusive, as we have seen that many arts and sciences which were once generally supposed to be of quite modern origin existed in China ages and ages before they were known in Europe. The arts of paper-making and printing, among others, had been practiced in China long before Europeans had any idea of them. Why, then, should not the Chinese have been equally, or more, in advance of us in navigation? The steady trade of Bombay, Calcutta, Singapore across the streets whose erection would puzzle our modern engineers, the Pyramids, and other such remains of Egyptian skill, would point to a state of civilization, and the existence of arts and sciences in times of which European historians give no account.

One fact, corroborative of the idea that the Old World, or at least some of the inhabitants of Asia, were once aware of the existence of America before its discovery by Columbus is, that many of the Arabian writers with whom I have conversed on this subject are fully convinced that the ancient Arabian geographers knew of America; and in support of this opinion point to passages in old works in which a country to the west of the Atlantic is spoken of. An Arab gentleman, a friend of Rajah Govind Hussein Pasha, in a work he has just written on American affairs, called Ex-Never-Ex-Tayar, quotes from Djeldeki and other old writers to this effect.

There is, however, among Chinese records not merely vague references to a country to the west of the Atlantic, but a circumstantial account of its discovery by the Chinese long before Columbus's time.

A competent authority on such matters, J. Haslay, the Chinese interpreter in San Francisco, has lately written an essay on this subject, from which we gather the following startling statements drawn from Chinese historians and geographers.

Fourteen hundred years ago even America had been discovered by the Chinese and described by them. Fifty years later, and to be about 20,000 Chinese miles distant from China. About 500 years after the birth of Christ, Buddhist priests repaired there and brought back the news that they had met with Buddhist idols and religious writings in the country already. Their descriptions, in many respects, resemble those of the Spaniards a thousand years after. They called the country "Fusang;" after a tree which grew there, whose leaves resemble those of the bamboo, whose bark the natives made clothes and paper out of, and whose fruit they ate. These particulars correspond exactly and remarkably with those given by the American historian, Prescott, about the maguay-tree in Mexico. He states that the Aztecs prepared a pulp for paper-making out of the bark of this tree. Then, even its leaves were used for thatching; its fibres for making ropes; its roots yielded a nourishing food; and its sap, by means of fermentation, was made into an intoxicating drink. The accounts given by the Chinese and Spaniards, although a thousand years apart, agree in stating that the natives did not possess any iron, but only copper of which they made their tools for working in stone and metals, out of a mixture of copper and tin; and they, in comparison with the natives of Europe, were but thought but little of the worth of silver and gold. The religious customs and forms of worship presented the same characteristics to the Chinese fourteen hundred years ago as to the Spaniards four hundred years since. There is, moreover, a remarkable resemblance between the religion of the Aztecs and the Buddhism of the Chinese, as well as between many of the customs of the Aztecs and those of the people of China. There is also a great similarity between the features of the Indian tribes of Mexico and South America and those of the Chinese, and, as Haslay, the Chinese interpreter of whom we spoke above, asserts, between the ancient and modern of the monosyllabic words of the Chinese and Indian languages. Indeed, this writer gives a list of words which point to a close relationship; and infers therefrom that there must have been emigration from China to the American continent at a most early period indeed, as the official accounts of Buddhist priests fourteen hundred years ago notice such things as existing already. Perhaps no one will receive any recovered in Europe which may furnish full particulars of this question; but, as we may rate remarkable and confirmative of the idea of intercourse with China to America at some remote period, that at the time of the discovery of America by the Spaniards the Indian tribes on the coast of the Pacific, opposite to China, for the most part, enjoyed a state of infancy of human growth, while the inhabitants of the Atlantic slope were found by Europeans in a state of original barbarism. If the idea of America has not been discovered before the time of Columbus be correct, it undergoes to prove that there is nothing new under the sun; and I hesitate not to say that is bold but beautiful lines—"Thou canst not find one spot whereon no city stood." Admitting this, who can tell whether civilization did not in part America when we were plunged in barbarism? And, stranger still, whether the endless march of ages in which our present civilization seems may not obliterate it, and sever the two hemispheres once again from each other's cognizance? Possibly, man is destined to a state of great civilization, to be like Sisyphus, always engaged in rolling up a stone which ever falls down.

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty Cents per Box. Mailed for otc. Sold by druggists. S. G. WELLING, 871 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS

TO remove MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, and TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by all Druggists.

NEW INDISPENSABLE HAND-BOOK For Home Improvement for both Young and Old. HOW TO WRITE, HOW TO BEHAVE, and HOW TO TALK, HOW TO DO BUSINESS. The most handsome volume of 600 pages. Sent by first post for $1 50. P. S. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Also, Just Published:

WEDLOCK: or, The Right Relations of the Sexes. $1 50; Extra Gilt, $2.—HOW TO READ CHARACTER. A New Illustrated Hand-Book of Phrenology. $1; in Muslin, $1 25.—ORATORY, with a Chapter on Conversation. $1 50.—NEW ANNUAL of PHRENOLOGY for 1870. Only 25 cents.—Works on Short-Hand, the Natural Sciences, &c. Agents wanted.

FRENCH CLOCKS,
BRONZES,
FANCY GOODS,
MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,
Opera Glasses,
FINE WATCHES AND
JEWELRY,
PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES.
Alex. M. Hays & Co.,
No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York,

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

FURNITURE.

We invite buyers to visit our extensive warerooms and examine our large stock of Suites for Parlors, Chambers, Dining-Rooms, Libraries, &c., Manufactured from the best materials, and warranted in every particular.

With improved machinery, and a rare experience in manufacturing, we are enabled to offer goods at most reasonable rates which we say to buyers that, taking quality into consideration, we can not be beaten in price.

WARREN WARD & CO.,
Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers and Dealers,
75 and 77 Spring Street, corner Crosby.

WANTED—AGENTS—To sell the AMERICAN Knitting Machine. Price $25. The simplest, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings per minute. Liberal Inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

Alaskan Diamonds.

The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or carbonized quartz, equal in brilliancy to the real diamond, mounted at our establishment in solid gold diamond settings, guaranteed solid—gold, and sold by us at one-tenth the cost of real diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

Ladies' Solitaire Finger-Rings, $5, $8, $10, and $15; Solitaire Ear-Drops, with gold settings, $12; Solitaire Scarf-Pins, $10; Cluster Finger-Rings, $8, $10, $15, and $20; Cluster Ear-Drops, $10 and $15.

Cluster Sets, $18, $20, $25, and $30; Cross Sets, $20 and $30.

Gents' Solitaire Pins, $3, $5, $8, $10, $15, $20, and $30; Rings, $6, $8, $10, $15, and $20; Cluster Pins, $10, $15, and $20.

Cluster Pins, $12, and $15; with shank, $10, $18, and $25.

Cross Pins and Cross Charms, $6, $10, and $18; Studs, per set, $3, $8, $10, $15, and $20.

We do not know how many of you can cut, which has a world-wide reputation for its fine jewelry, and now send in sympathy with this bogus concern advertising cheap jewelry.

All orders by mail for less than $10 should be accompanied with P. O. Order or Registered Letter, and will be sent by Express, C. O. D., subject to examination, at Large Discount to the Trade. Call on or address

THE STANDARD & WHIPPLE MFG. CO.,
No. 12 South Main Street,
Providence, R. I.

SWEET QUININE. SWEET QUININE is warranted to cure Fever and Ague—for dose—to the palate (bitter) and Neuralgia, with the great advantage of being sweet instead of bitter.

SVAPNIA. SVAPNIA is an OPIUM PERFUME of its sickening and poisonous properties. Assuages and induces Sleep. Odor delightful. Sold by Druggists, prescribed by the best physicians.

HERRING, FARR, & CO., Chemists, New York.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is warranted to wear equal entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its quietness and resemblance to Gold are such that the closest judge will be deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of all scientific men, and has not only called forth favorable notice in the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Fair of the Institute.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and these watches are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them for a term of years.

Price now $16 to $22.

Further details will be found in small pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.

Goods sent by Express, C. O. D., with charges.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 84 Nassau Street, New York.

CYPRESS HILLS CEMETERY.

OFFICE, No. 128 BROADWAY, N. Y.,
(Corner of Grand Street).

OFFICERS:

EDMUND DRISCOLL, President.
WM. J. PRASE, Vice-President.
A. T. STELLE, Secretary. Address
WILLIAM EDWARDS, Secretary.
A. S. BARNES, DENIS S. LAY, JOHN I. VAN ALST, ALFRED M. WOOD, Trustees.
N. G. PALMER, Supt. and Surveyor.

SPLENDID PRIZE PARLOR ENGRAVING, worth $10, given as a premium to each subscriber to DEMOREST'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE. Specimen copies of the Magazine, with Circular, mailed free on receipt of 10 cents. Address DEMOREST'S MONTHLY, 838 Broadway, N. Y.

Two New Novels.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just published:

I.

FALSE COLORS.

By ANNIE THOMAS,
Author of "Denis Donne," "On Guard," "Played Out," "Cattle Queen of Montana," "Playing for High Stakes," "Taller Sunday," &c., &c.

8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

"Miss Thomas's writings are fresh and reasonably vigorous. Her characters are clever and well done. Her power of language is strong, and she uses it directly and appropriately.—Chicago Journal.

Miss Thomas will, we think, rank high among that class of novelists of whom Miss Evans (George Eliot) is the first.—Reader.

II.

FOUND DEAD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"CARLYON'S YEAR," "ONE OF THE FAMILY," "A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK," &c.

8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

He is the most humorous of the writers of fiction at present, but his fun is always controlled by good taste, and always subordinate to truth. His love scenes are as rational as it is pure. There is no novelist who more thoroughly understands the sanctity and the happiness of the affections in their highest and most virtuous exercise; but there is no sentimentality in his writings—not a touch of that subtle kind of falsehood which would give the heart precedence of the conscience, and exalt passion at the expense of principle.—Examiner and London Review.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above books by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HITCHCOCK'S
New Monthly Magazine
OF
CHOICE MUSIC, ART NOTES,
AND
Select Reading for the Family Circle.

CONTAINING

Beautiful Illustrations, Biographical Sketches, Choice Musical Compositions arranged for the Piano-Forte, Poetry, and Notes on the Painting, Sculpture, &c., &c.,

FORMING A SPLENDID

Illustrated Magazine for the Drawing-Room,

AND A

Valuable Library of Excellent Music.

It is issued on the 15th of every month. Price, $3 00 per Year, in advance.

Specimen Copies mailed free, on receipt of price, 25 cents each.

Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
24 Bookman Street, New York.

☞ Agents wanted every where. Write for Terms.

Bloomington Nursery.
600 Acres. 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.

Fruit, Ornamental and Nursery Stock, immense and reliable assortment, very low for cash.

Agents—including the magnificent stock of evergreens; also hardy Northern sorts, such as Dutches, Osbaning, Hardy Herbaceous and water Cash dep'ts—and, and 3 year.

Forest and Evergreen Trees, Plums, Quinces, Grapes, Small Fruits and Evergreen Trees, Norway Spruce, Silver Spruce, Balsam Fir, Arbor Vitæ, own roots; Tulips, Hyacinths, Narcissus, Iris, Spanish, Lilies, Specimens, Acuratum, &c.

Also splendid colored plates of Wild and Cultivated Flowers. Send 10 cents for Catalogues.

F. K. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

THE BEST WRINGER,
THE RELIANCE,
With Keyed Rolls and Spiral Cog-wheels, manufactured by PROVIDENCE TOOL CO., Providence, R.I.

NEW YORK STORE, 99 BEEKMAN STREET.

Also, HEAVY HARDWARE, SHIP-CHANDLERS' AND SAIL-MAKERS' Goods, &c., &c.

Manufacturers of
PEABODY BREACH-LOADING FIRE-ARMS.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, with recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of type, cuts, borders, &c., 25 cents. Address ADAMS PRESS CO., 25 Murray Street, New York.

GLYCERINE JELLY

Food, Nourishment, and Stimulant for Consumptives and delicate children. 25c. per box.
JOHN F. HENRY, N. Y., and Druggists generally.

Patent Building Paper.

This celebrated article for lining and sheathing buildings, and as a substitute for plastering, is having a rapid sale in this vicinity.

For sale by B. E. HALE,
22 and 24 Frankfort St., New York.

SOMETHING NEW.—In musical circles the Estey Organs are the rage. They are the most flutable we have the finest tone, remarkable for their sweetness and power. The Fox Humana and Vox Jubilante are the greatest novelties and best inventions ever introduced. J. ESTEY & CO.,
Brattleboro, Vt., Sole Manufacturers.

PIANOS and ORGANS.

Prices greatly reduced For Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of first-class makers, for $275 and upward. New Cabinet Organs for $40 and upward. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $40 to $175, at 481 Broadway, N. Y. HORACE WATERS.

LIO!! FOR LOUISIANA.—For a copy of "New Louisiana," containing a State Map and full and valuable information about the Sugar, Rice, Cotton, Rice, and Orange lands, the unprecedented profits of farming in Louisiana, and rare chance for investment of money or labor, send six cents in postage stamps to DR. J. O. NOYES, Free's Board Comm. of Emigration, New Orleans, La.

AGENTS WANTED, Local and Traveling, for the New American Patent Model Vegetable Chopper. The best thing in the market, without exception. For Out of Doors, Terms, &c., address D. A. NEWTON & CO.,
38 Cortlandt Street, N. Y.

A LADY who has been cured of great nervous debility, after many years of misery, desires to make known to her fellow-sufferers the means of relief. Address, enclosing a stamp, MRS. M. MERRITT, P. O. Box 5124, Boston, Mass., and the prescription will be sent free by return mail.

THE Great American Gift Candies, — Each package contains an elegant present and delicious Confectioners, News Agents, and Fancy Goods Dealers will find these attractive and profitable. A liberal discount to the trade. Send for sample and price-list. Jessup & Tuttle, 302 North 8th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

TROY FEMALE SEMINARY.—This institution offers the accumulated advantages of over 30 years' successful operation. For Catalogue, apply to JOHN H. WILLARD, Troy, N. Y.

ALL that is required of SASH FASTENERS, Walker's Patent will do. They never get out of order. $2 per doz.—FELIX WALKER & CO., at Whitlock Exposition, 25 Park Place, N. Y.

$25 A DAY.—32 new articles for Agents. Samples free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$1140—How I made it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fulton, N. Y.

Use B. A. Fahnestock's Vermifuge.

THE WORLD-RENOWNED
FOGGAN'S GENUINE ORIODE GOLD HUNTING-CASE WATCHES

are manufactured on strictly scientific principles, having in them the brilliancy, durability, and exact appearance of virgin gold. They are fac-similes of the most rare and costly description of Genuine Gold Watches. Scientific and expert men have been engaged in vain attempts to analyze this wonderful substance, and pronounce it a remarkable freak of nature, and believe it to be the natural condition in which gold has probably taken thousands of years to become the precious metal. Railroad Conductors, Engineers, Bankers, the most scrupulous of our customers, have thoroughly demonstrated the reliability, durability, accuracy, and beauty of the Oriode Watches, and pronounce them unrivalled as reliable time-keepers. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Size Swiss Movements, $20 each. Ladies' Duc-de-Nemours Watches, $25.

Sent to any address, C. O. D., by express, for examination, on receipt of $1 00. Express Co. will allow customers to examine previous to paying the bill on receipt of charges. Clubs ordering Six Watches will receive an Extra Watch free.—JOHN WILKINSON, Manufacturer, and Importer of the Genuine Oriode Gold Watch Co., 79 Nassau Street, New York.

The Editor of the New York Daily Tribune says: "We have a specimen watch of so close a resemblance to gold that none but an expert could tell the difference. The movement is the same as that of the best gold watches. We are informed that the genuine Oriode Gold Metal wears well and does not tarnish."

THIRTY-EIGHTH
NATIONAL EXHIBITION
of the
AMERICAN INSTITUTE, opened to the public on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 8, at 10 o'clock, M., and continued daily, from 9 A.M., to 10 o'clock, P.M., Until SATURDAY, Oct. 30, 1869, at the
SMPIRE CITY SKATING RINK,
Third Avenue, between 63d and 64th Streets.

This exhibition will be the most comprehensive and important ever seen on this continent, consisting of machinery in motion, mechanical inventions, and the ingenious inventions by American minds and brains, implements of husbandry, products of the soil, workshop, and the studio, fabrics of every description, manufactured from cotton, flax, and silk. Thousands of other attractive Novelties.

Also, under the auspices of the Institute, the National Association of Wool Manufacturers will, for the first time in the United States, hold a special exposition of all articles manufactured from Wool. This special department should command the attention of every one interested in the prosperity of American Labor.

Solo Water will be drawn from Matthews's Fountains, and the Association will have the exclusive direction of the well-known caterer, Downing.

Season Tickets for Gentlemen, $5; for Ladies, $3. Single Admission, 50 cents; Children under 12 years, 25 cents.

The exhibition is on the line of the Third and Second Avenue Railroads, and may be conveniently reached by the other city roads.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE EXHIBITION.—Advertisements to be inserted in Official Catalogue should be sent in immediately.
W. H. RISSELL, Publisher.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machines. The best machine in the world. Stitch alike on both sides. Fully licensed. Warranted five years. Circulars, terms, and other particulars, address
THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

WATCHES FOR THE MILLION.

The GREAT TRADE-IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION (Incorporated by the States) sell FINE GOLD and SOLID SILVER WATCHES, upon a new and original sewing system, at $10 each. Be sure to obtain a circular before buying elsewhere. Address as follows:
Address MICHELIN & CO., Managers,
Broadway, cor. Fulton St., New York.

TILTON'S
Fashionable Initial Note-Papers
AND ENVELOPES.

Neatly put up in Dollar or Half-Dollar Boxes, and sent by mail, postage, a free part of the country, on receipt of price. Send for a box to TILTON & CO., Boston.

WANTED AGENTS.—$75 to $200 per month, in every where, male and female, to introduce the NEW WORLD Family Knitting Machine. A new thing, with the latest improvements. Price for Hand Machine, $18; with Table and Treadle Power, $25. For Circular, with Cut of Machine and terms to Agents, address W. & WANSER & CO., Marion, N. Y.

PARLOR STEAM ENGINE: made entirely of Metal; Boiler and Furnace complete; will work for hours if supplied with Fuel and Water, &c.; free from danger; a child can work it. Sent free, with instructions, for $1 00. Address, plainly, your name,
WALTER HOLT, No. 192 Nassau Street, New York.

Agents! Read This!
WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $150 per month and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. ADDRESS M. WAGNER & CO., Marion, Ohio.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any colored hair or beard to a permanent Black or Brown. One Comb sent by mail for $1. For sale by Druggists generally. Address Magic Comb Co., Springfield, Mass.

$100 to $250 per Month guaranteed. Sure pay. Agents wanted, male and female, to introduce goods in every where selling our Patent Everlasting White Wire Clothes Lines. Call at, or write for particulars to the Girard Wire Mills, 261 North 3d St., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE NOVELTY PRINTING-PRESSES are sold at Manufacturers' Prices by
C. C. THURSTON, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Send for Circulars and Specimens of Type.

EMPLOYMENT that pays. For particulars, address S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

The Climax Knitter!!

This is, without question, the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. It is small, light, neat, simple of construction, durable, works very rapidly, has but one needle, makes the old-fashioned knitting-needle stitch (can be knit plain, ribbed, or heavy, single or double yarn, sets up and finishes its own work, and needs no waiting. Needle does not loose stitches, hollow or flat welt, large or small fabrics—anything that can be knit by hand, and in much better manner. A child can readily operate it, and can learn to do so much in a few hours as to knit with economy. There is nothing to be done but to thread a needle and turn a crank. The work knit is reached which is formed to perfection, with little trouble and no sewing; it is knit from the web to the foot.

The price of this Knitter is but $20 00, which places it within the reach of every family. It is destined to be very popular, and we can offer agents, general and local, such rates as will secure for them a lasting business. Send for Circulars.

Address CLIMAX KNITTING MACHINE CO.,
S. W. corner 11th and Chestnut Sts., Philadelphia, Pa.

QUARTER OF A MILLION PIANISTS are indebted to Richardson's New Method for their ability to play well.

This book continues to be the Standard Method of Piano Instruction, and contains the course in its Easy Lessons, Pleasing Exercises, and Charming Recreations, have made it extremely popular, while its rare adaptation to all grades of advancement causes it to be not only valuable to a person just taking its early studies, but for a lifetime. Price $6 75. Sent postpaid.
OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, 277 Washington Street, Boston: CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or one half the cost of either.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a number; for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office of delivery. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 12 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Year. Back Numbers will be sent as ordered accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

Subscribers to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Thus, "Dec. 1869" means that when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to send a notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the Order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. Local Direction, if any, is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $2 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Pages, $2 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE CELEBRATED IMITATION

Gold Watches and Jewelry
THE COLLINS METAL, THE ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE OXIDE

The $15 Watches, in appearance and for time, are equal to gold ones costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, at $25, are not surpassed by $500 gold Watches. TIME, BALANCE, FINISH, and DURABILITY no imitation of gold can begin to compare with the Collins Metal. Excepting the intrinsic value, it is equal to gold. Every watch fully warranted by certificate.

CHAINS FROM $2 TO $8.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Ear-Rings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Charms, Odd-Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send the seventh Watch free of charge. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express, to be paid for on delivery. Money need not be sent with the order, as bills can be paid when goods are taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. We employ no agents; orders, therefore, must be sent directly to us. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and State. Our only address is No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth St. (up stairs), New York. C. E. COLLINS & CO.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812, or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution," &c. In 1 vol. 8vo, 1092 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Sketches made by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1094 pages, large 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 00; Half Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By James Greenwood, Author of "The Wilds of London," "The True History of a little Ragamuffin," "Reuben Davidger," "Low Life Deeps," &c. With Portrait of George Peabody and 34 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SIGHTS AND SENSATIONS IN FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND: or, Experiences of an American Journalist in Europe. By Edward Gould Buffum. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SANDS PIPER'S STORY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, the Church, the School. By Nathaniel Sands. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Careful Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss to be found in Agriculture and Farming, with much Valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Large or Small Pieces of Rural Districts. By Rodney R. Hoosevelt. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By Alfred Russel Wallace, Author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro," "Palm Trees of the Amazon," &c. With Ten Maps and Fifty-one elaborate Illustrations, Drawn on Wood. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By George C. Scott. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

THREE SEASONS IN EUROPEAN VINEYARDS. Treating of Vine-Culture: Vine Disease and its Cure; Wine-Making and Wines, Red and White; Wine-Drinking as affecting Health and Morals. By William Allen Butler. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Bohemia, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1869. By W. Pembroke Fetridge. Revised Edition: Eighth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversation in French, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to enable the Learner to "Hear it Spoke." By W. Pembroke Fetridge. Assisted by Professors of Modern Languages. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

The New Novels
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

FOUND DEAD. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "No Name," "My Mother and I," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

MET'A FAITH. By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FALSE COLORS. By Annie Thomas. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HETTY. By Henry Kingsley. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. 8vo, Paper, $1 25.

STRETTON. By Henry Kingsley. 8vo, Paper, 40 cts.

CORD AND CREESE. By the Author of "The Initials," "Quits," "Ready-Money Mortiboy," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE DODGE CLUB; or, Italy in 1859. By James De Mille, Author of "Cord and Creese," &c. With 100 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 75.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS:
New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.
VANITY FAIR. 32 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.
THE VIRGINIANS. 150 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
THE NEWCOMES. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 95 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
HENRY ESMOND and LOVEL THE WIDOWER. 12 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:
HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, $1 00.

☞ To be followed by Charles Reade's other Novels.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S LAST NOVELS:
PHINEAS FINN, the Irish Member. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.
HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Complete. With 64 Illustrations by Marcus Stone. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. Part II., separately, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books, by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

"ONE GOOD ROW DESERVES ANOTHER."

HARVARD. "Can we have the Pleasure?" etc.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any one may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,

46 East 14th Street, New York.

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRUEY, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KUHKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MRS. C. BLUME, Pittsburg, Pa.; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; CLEVES & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HANNUM, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; J. H. HUTTENSTEIN, Illinois, N. Y.; WAITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; C. M. MUNCH, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.

Middletown Mineral Spring Water cures all diseases of the Kidneys, Skin, and Blood more promptly than any other known remedy.

☞ Call for TESTIMONIALS or CURES. Sold by Druggists.

Caution.—All genuine bears our trade-mark, and the bottles and corks are branded "Nature's Remedy."

Address J. JAY JOSLIN,
Treas. M. M. S. Co.,
Middletown, Vt.
(Post-office Benson.)

Or, S. H. Scripture, 193 Broadway, New York, General Agent.

WE PUT GENUINE WALTHAM Watches into the hands of purchasers in any state, territory, town, village, or frontier settlement, at the lowest New York wholesale prices. The Express Companies take them from us and deliver them to the customers in any part of the Union, however remote. The package can be opened, and the watch examined, and not till then is the purchaser required to pay for it; and if on examination it is not satisfactory, there is no obligation to receive it. Our descriptive and Illustrated Price-List gives full information in regard to the watches, and our plan of sending them by express. Every one should have a copy. We send it postpaid on application; no return stamps required. When you write, please state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly.

HOWARD & CO., Jewelers and Silversmiths,
No. 619 Broadway, New York.

JUST OUT:

CHERRY PECTORAL TROCHES, for Coughs, Colds, Sore Throats, and Bronchitis. None better, none as good, none so pleasant, none cure so quick. For sale by JOHN F. HENRY, No. 8 College Place, N.Y.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties by nearly every Steamer. Fine Supply of Fancy Goods, Swiss Carved Goods, Fine Gold and Silver Watches. M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 BROADWAY, N. Y.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French pulcuis, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY,
DURABILITY,
and CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
Wallingford, Conn.

Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N. Y.

Violent Purgation is Obsolete. To assist, not to attack nature, is the true medical philosophy, and TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, by gently urging the torpid secretive and discharging organs to perform their functions, quietly and painlessly works the most extraordinary cure.

SOLD EVERY WHERE.

UPHAM'S FRECKLE, TAN, AND PIMPLE BANISHER.—A few applications of this remedy will remove FRECKLES, TAN, SUNBURN, BLOTCHES, PIMPLES, &c., from the face, and render the complexion CLEAR AND FAIR. Infinitely superior to powders and washes that ultimately make the complexion you vainly seek to beautify. Price 50 cents.

Sold at JOHN F. HENRY'S U. S. Medicine Warehouse, No. 8 COLLEGE PLACE, New York.

FULLAM & SON, MANUFACTURERS OF Genuine MERCHANT'S goods. Store—519 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 37 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 5646. Repairing and lasting also done.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List. ☜ Baltimore, Md.

BE BEAUTIFUL.—If you desire beauty you should use HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM.

It gives a soft, refined, satin-like texture to the complexion, removes Roughness, Redness, Blotches, Sunburn, Tan, &c., and adds a tinge of pearly bloom to the plainest features. It brings the bloom of youth to the fading cheek, and changes the rustic country girl into a fashionable city belle.

In the use of the MAGNOLIA BALM lies the true secret of beauty. No lady need complain of her complexion who will invest 75 cents in this delightful article.

LYON'S KATHAIRON is the best Hair Dressing in use.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO,

FOR CLEANING AND POLISHING.

SAPOLIO will make Tins resemble Silver.
Use only SAPOLIO to clean White Paint.
From Marble SAPOLIO removes all Stains.
For polishing Knives SAPOLIO is unsurpassed.
For cleaning Brass Stair-Rods SAPOLIO has no equal.
If you would have clean windows, use SAPOLIO.
Sample cake sent by mail on receipt of 20 cents.
Depot, 211 Washington St., New York.
Established 1809.

Particular attention is called to our SOAPS for family use.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., OR ST. LOUIS, MO. CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

FOUNTAIN PENS. One dip writes 4 pages. $1.50 a gross, postpaid.—Penholder and Pencil combined.—Eraser and Pen-Holder combined, and 12 Fountain Pens, 50 cents, postpaid. Sell at sight. AGENTS WANTED. CITY NOVELTY CO., 404 Liberty St., Philadelphia, Pa.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

Agents wanted. Knits every thing. Send to office, 176 Broadway, for Circulars.

10-20 BONDS.

A Limited Number
OF BONDS
OF BUCHANAN COUNTY,
STATE OF MISSOURI,

Issued by a Special Vote of the People, at an election held for this purpose, under an act of the Legislature of the State of Missouri.

TWENTY YEARS TO RUN.

With the option of paying them after ten years, bearing TEN PER CENT. (10 per Cent.) Interest, the legal rate in Missouri, payable on the 1st of July and January, at the BANK OF AMERICA, New York,

FREE OF GOVERNMENT TAX.

Principal Payable in New York.

The entire debt of Buchanan County, including the Bonds now offered for sale, is only $500,000, and is secured by a lien on the County property and individual property, both real estate and personal, of the citizens residing in the County, amounting by the taxable returns to $13,000,000, pledged to pay the Bonds now offered for sale; while the taxable wealth of the City of St. Joseph, which is the capital of Buchanan County, amounts to $12,000,000, making the combined wealth of the County and Capital City $25,000,000.

PRICE, 96 AND ACCRUED INTEREST.

FOR SALE BY

TANNER & CO.,

BANKERS,

49 WALL STREET, New York.

WE TAKE PLEASURE IN RECOMMENDING THESE BONDS AS A PERFECTLY SAFE AND RELIABLE INVESTMENT, POSSESSING A SECURITY OF THE HIGHEST ORDER, AND WILL FURNISH SATISFACTORY INFORMATION RELATING THERETO.

TANNER & CO.

STEVENS' POCKET RIFLE.

With Detachable Shoulder-Rest.

Most popular arm made for Sporting and Target-Shooting. SMITH & WESSON'S REVOLVERS, in any quantity, for cash, at lowest price. WILLIAMSON'S DERRINGERS, and other Pistols.

J. W. STOIRS & CO., M'f'r's Agents,
192 Broadway, New York.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 128 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 665.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

326 HOPE ST NY 973

THE AVONDALE COLLIERY DISASTER—BRINGING OUT THE DEAD.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE DOUBLE PAGE.]

THE CHIEF OF STAFF.

OVER his war-worn face has come
The still, white sign that he knew no well,
Hushing afar the rolling drum,
Stilling the noise of shot and shell,
The holy sign that wiped the stain
Of blood from the face of the slain.

A strenuous soul, deep-built within,
The years were few from the cool pit's flame
To beleaguered Richmond's dying din
And the name that settled on his name;
But not of years was his strength of deed:
The man was based on a full-grown creed.

Out from the dusk of common fate
He stepped when the cry was loud for men;
Mounted his dead, by his chair of state;
Is his stature greater now than then?
Did he get or give by the country trust?
Behold that drunken form of dust!

He stood where but few had strength to stand
In the wild fore-front of a giant time,
With the great commander, hand in hand,
Doing humanity a work sublime;
Nor even in triumph put it by,
But under it laid him down to die.

No more for him is the hurried day,
Filled with threats of the tangled fight;
His now, the dread lines that lay
Drawn out when the battle closed at night;
Their orders are deep in bree and breast,
And the weary Chief of Staff may rest.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1869.

THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT.

AS we suggested last week, the resolution of the Kings of the Democratic party of the North to resist the Fifteenth Amendment gives a peculiar and unexpected importance to the political situation. That amendment provides that no State shall disfranchise a citizen by reason of color, and it is opposed upon two grounds: first, that the subject should not be regulated by the National Government; and, second, that colored citizens ought not to be allowed to vote upon equal terms with others.

The tone adopted in pressing the first objection, as if there were some outrage in a citizen using a proper question to the country in the constitutional manner, is merely ridiculous. Even if it were settled now that the conditions of suffrage should be determined by the National Government, it is certainly not improper that the people should be asked to decide the question in the mode that they have themselves provided. Consequently the assertion of the Ohio Democratic platform that "the attempt to regulate suffrage in Ohio by means of the so-called Fifteenth Constitutional Amendment is subversive of the principles of the Federal Constitution" is transparent folly. The Federal Constitution is the body of fundamental laws, to which additions are made as experience and reflection suggest. The principle of the Constitution, so to speak, is that it shall be supreme over all the States in every particular that shall seem expedient for the general welfare. Thus, the Thirteenth Amendment forbids any State to tolerate Slavery: the Fourteenth secures the equal civil rights of every citizen of the United States in all the States; and the Fifteenth proposes to prohibit unreasonable disfranchisement.

Is it desirable, then, that the States should be allowed to prescribe a qualification for the suffrage from motives of color? Upon reflection, not, because nothing is gained by it but the gratification of a prejudice. Color does not determine intelligence or political capacity. The color of the skin is a disqualification as unreasonable as that of the hair or eyes. Moreover, color is a disability which, by perpetuating a distinction of race among the citizens, tends to arouse the freshness of the feelings from which the war arose. The Pennsylvania Democratic platform declares that the party in that State "is opposed to conferring upon the negro the right to vote." It gives no reason, and how could it? How could a party which courts ignorance, and which does not consider confirmed drunkenness to be a valid bar to the suffrage, offer any plausible reason for excluding honest, intelligent, well-bred men from the polls? How is it opposed to the voting of the colored citizens because it knows that the votes of a class which the Democratic party has done its best to degrade will naturally be cast against it. The colored vote of Pennsylvania and Ohio were sure for that party, does any observer suppose the party would object to the voting of negroes? If the same vote were not sure to be thrown against the party in New York, is it supposable that the Democrats would insist upon the present inequality of the suffrage in this State? The Democratic party endeavors by every kind of fraud, as at the last election in New York, to secure the voting of the most ignorant foreigners, who have, and can have, no possible knowledge of the merits or tendency of the issues; is it conceivable that such a party opposes the equal voting of intelligent native citizens because they are colored?

Until this question is settled there can be no escape from the old issues; and the question may be postponed, but it can be settled in one way only. No man in his senses can imagine that this State, or this country, will finally rest in a policy of discrimination among citizens so baseless and infamous as this. A qualification of residence, of education, of familiarity with the language, is reasonable and intelligible, but one of color is contemptible and exasperating. Apparently the Democratic Convention in this State will decline to accept the Fifteenth Amendment, and against the provision of the new State Constitution that equalizes the suffrage. It will then be the orderly and intelligent citizens to determine how the public welfare is to be promoted by the success of a party pledged to perpetuate upon such grounds the difference that has to-day produced the present war.

Or are there other considerations in favor of its success that make this objection insignificant? Ohio will, undoubtedly, reject Mr. PENDLETON; but shall New York virtually declare in favor of him and of his repudiation? If there is general discontent with the character of the Legislature, it is in effect whether whether it is likely to be improved by voting opposed entirely or in a majority of such members as the city of New York may send. The Republican party is the friend of the Fifteenth Amendment, of the national faith, of equal suffrage in this State, of a strict registry, and of the utmost protection of the ballot-box from fraud of every kind. It is certainly not less honest and economical than its adversary. When it is added that it is in favor of settling the long disturbing difficulty of our politics in the most just, reasonable, American, and inevitable manner, can any man who has hitherto sustained it doubt as to his duty?

THE VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE.

THE decision of the Attorney-General in the Virginia case ingeniously compromises the difficulty. The dilemma, however, should not have arisen; and we cannot help hoping that it would have been better avoided by leaving Congress to interpret its own law. The registered voters of Virginia have, indeed, voted in favor of a Constitution that, when accepted by Congress, becomes the law of the State. But, until accepted, it is not the law of the State, which is still governed by Military Orders to the laws passed for its regulation, and among these laws is that which requires the oath of all officers, including the members of the Legislature. The Attorney-General says that it is impossible to suppose that Congress could intend that a Legislature under the Constitution of a State should be subject to a military commander. But is this Legislature, before the Constitution has become valid, properly described by the Attorney-General as "a Legislature under the Constitution of this State?" If it be, it is certainly not a provisional Legislature, as the Attorney-General afterward asserts. And if it be provisional, all its acts must be equally so, including the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment. But is a provisional ratification valid?

It is plain that the Legislature is not a Legislature of full functions until its action is approved by Congress; and is it not therefore equally plain that, in the language employed by the Attorney-General's remarks, does "undertake to furnish the State with a suitable Legislature to start with?" If this Legislature does not do what Congress wishes, will it be held to be unsuitable. If, on the other hand, Congress is satisfied with it, it will, for that reason, and for no other, be considered a suitable Legislature. But in considering the action of the Legislature, Congress will necessarily investigate its origin and authority. The Reconstruction laws do not compel Congress to approve the assent to conditions which is made by a body that is not qualified to make the assent; and although General CASEY will not question that origin, under the circumstances, and the Legislature will therefore probably meet and ratify the amendment, yet Congress will have to satisfy itself of the justice of the Attorney-General's decision before it accepts the Legislative action.

Of course we have no desire to prolong the controversy, but the Attorney-General's opinion would defeat the manifest will of the registered voters of the State. In the dilemma which the law of Congress has itself occasioned, we would have suggested the proclamation of the commanding General, which would have enabled Congress to deal with the subject before the Legislature assembled. It will be much more difficult to manage the matter when the Legislature has organized and acted, without any clear conception of the limits of its authority. If it does not, as the Attorney-General suggests—namely, ratify the amendment, and then wait and see if Congress will choke it with full Legislative functions by accepting the Constitution and approving its action—the difficulty will be passed. Or if Congress is willing to accept the action of those who by existing laws are incompetent to act, thereby suspending the laws in their favor, there will also be no trouble But was it not better to avoid such contingencies and all the questions that may consequently arise?

WALL STREET.

THE cable telegraph has produced effects nowhere greater than in the financial centre of the Union. It brings us into immediate contact with London, Paris, and Frankfort, with this advantage, that the business-day is over in what of the great European markets before it commences in the United States, and can be studied and weighed before entering upon the conflicts of the trade in which we are respectively engaged. The foreign and domestic markets for cotton, food, manufactures, public debt, etc., and whether money is plenty or otherwise at any controlling point, constitute the essential subjects of inquiry at the outset of the business-day, and fortunes are lost or won if information is accurate or false in these matters.

The morning press furnishes information of the markets of the previous day, but private telegrams sent by leading houses to their correspondents here give the latest advices, and constitute the basis of immense transactions. Only those who deal largely can afford the expense of frequent telegrams, and in a time of excitement the lines are incessantly used.

The great bankers in England and on the Continent have access to all the important sources of information in their respective localities; and if the press telegrams are erroneous with respect to the health of NAPOLEON, some other topic of interest at the time, furnish their agency or branch here with exact knowledge, upon which it acts with effect while the public at large remain in the dark.

Perhaps in no matter has the cable been used more effectively than in transactions relating to United States bonds. The Germans were the first to invest in them largely, which they did with great pecuniary advantage to themselves, while at the same time they have aided to establish over Europe the credit of the Union, which alone was wanted after the successes of the war to elevate us to the condition of a first-rate power. In the course of these transactions, on the part of the great bankers on the other side, news would reach us of a glut; apprehensions would exist here of a return of bonds; purchases of gold on speculation would follow in this market, to end in disappointment and loss on finding that the absorption of our securities still continued, and that those who held the latest advices had become free sellers of gold. The turn in the market would be immediate and overwhelming.

We have thus arrived at a time shown how the cable was used to accomplish not only a sale of the bonds, but of their proceeds in the shape of "cable transfers," so as to produce instantaneous results, and the effect of the market here, who were speculating for an advance in the gold premium. The anticipated shipment of gold by which the premium for a rise was based became unnecessary from the sale of cable exchange; which sale, effected here on the afternoon of one day, would be in a condition to complete on the morning of the next, to the dismay of those who supposed the foreign purchasers overstupid with our securities.

Perhaps never again in the history of the country will such great opportunities for amassing fortunes be found as the negotiation abroad of our securities has furnished. We hope that we may forget that such a time will be used to enable us to substitute a four per cent. bond in the place of those earning six and five per cent. It will be folly to do this will depend on the skill with which the national finances are managed. If, on the one hand, the Repudiator is kept down by the pressure of public opinion, and a sufficient rate of tax is regularly collected and applied to pay the interest as it accrues, we shall in time reach that position of safety which arises from having to pay only a low rate of interest. It is our highest policy to look to this with never-failing eagerness, or the country may be tempted by heavy bounties to lose sight of the object. The latter there is a constant tendency toward the accumulation of business on the part of those who wield large capitals, as they are found to command success in a variety of ways. If they speculate for a fall in prices, they will lock up capital at a moment when money is already scarce from the application to investments in mercantile produce or breadstuffs; and as the small houses know nothing of the combination or the moment of its termination, they must proceed timely, and never without risk of being caught by such sudden changes of policy. These speculations ordinarily embrace in the combination outsiders who are admitted on the strength of their supposed wealth, on the agreement that they shall not be required to make a deposit as security for the risk; and it is the temptation to engage in a large business that the plan of buying stocks without any margin is invited by the smaller houses, who, in truth, take the risk of the speculations of their principal. The recklessness of a corner—which can not be engaged in without an abandonment of all claim to high commercial or moral position—is communicated to too many for public advantage. The policy of issuing convertible bonds and suddenly converting them into stock; of watering stocks without the consent of stockholders, and sometimes without the knowledge of Directors; and the appointment of a Court, armed with lockbreakers and Receivers, belong to the new state of things.

Great uncertainty is communicated to business in the street by these events; for it is scarcely possible to tell what portion of the price of particular stocks is due to the power of outside combinations, and when it will unload their watered stock upon the unwary. It is painful to find that at Chicago and other Western cities the dealings in grain are subjected to the uncertainties and the vicissitudes of Wall Street gambling.

A large amount of the business of Wall Street is conducted upon proper business principles by bankers of high standing, who earn their profits by buying bills of exchange representing cotton or grain produced for export, and who sell their own bills, drawn on bankers in Europe, to the merchants engaged in importing foreign goods. The profits of the transaction of this character are large, as the banker takes the risk of the foreign market for the cotton or grain on which his purchase of exchange is founded. The merchant can not keep these bills founded on the produce which the country exports, because the business requires the close attention and particular knowledge which bankers only from long experience reach.

Many young men start in the street determined to avoid speculation and confine themselves to legitimate business, and progress greatly to their profit and honor, continue on in this course, securing respect and confidence; but the general tone is adverse to this, and leads the majority away from the true path.

THE COAL-MINE TRAGEDY.

THE fearful catastrophe at the Avondale coalmine should stimulate the inquiry whether there is not great carelessness in the general management of the mines. It seems incredible that there was no ventilating shaft into the pit where the miners were at work, and that their sole hope of safety lay in a shaft whose safety was constantly and peculiarly threatened. It will be easy hereafter to avoid this especial peril, but why was it not perceived and guarded what other dangers as appalling still menace the miners? It is a sad life, away from the fresh air and the sunlight and the green earth. There are no gloomier tales than those which tell the story of the miners; and legislation has been obliged to interfere to save little children from the thoughtlessness of employers at the mines.

Government is, first of all, founded upon experience and common sense. The theory of the laisser-aller, of letting "things look out for themselves," may be abused in practice, like every other. When women and children were worked sixteen hours a day in cotton factories, it seemed almost impossible to pass a "short time" bill. Hundreds of thousands of wearing labourers were ready to starve more in order to release wives and children from the horrible bondage; and at length the bill passed. It was not theoretically correct, but it was actually most humane. No visitor to the workhouse in a coal company would be unjust to the miners; but corporations have no souls, and managers are responsible only to open spend little and make much, or they are in danger of losing their places.

It is to be hoped, therefore, that this terrible tragedy will lead to the most searching and thorough investigation of the general management of the Pennsylvania coal-mines; and that every seeming which experience may suggest may be made obligatory upon the companies. There is a vast mining population in that State, and its character must necessarily affect that of the Commonwealth. It is for the interest of the State that the miners do not feel themselves more and more excluded from general sympathy, and this can be done by wise evidence of the care of their fellow-citizens.

MR. FESSENDEN.

By the death of MR. FESSENDEN the country loses one of its most patriotic and able statesmen, and his party a man who commanded the confidence and respect of both friends and foes. His name is not especially identified with any single measure, nor with any peculiarly memorable speech, but it will be always conspicuous among the leading advocates of the wise and humane policy of the Republican party.

During the anti-slavery debates that preceded the war MR. FESSENDEN'S intellectual keenness and stern logic, and the sharpness of his sarcasm, were always most efficient in exposing and ridiculing the sophistry and malice of the slavery-leaders. Through the struggle as Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, and for some time as Secretary of the Treasury, his sagacity was of the utmost service. And after the war ended, his Report to Congress as Chairman of the Committee upon Reconstruction, in which the principles of the policy afterward adopted were set forth, is one of the most admirable political documents of the time.

With the Republican Senators FESSENDEN and GRIMES, Mr. FESSENDEN voted against the conviction of President JOHNSON when he was impeached. The question had been made a matter of party, and the abuse of these Senators by a large part of the Republican press, and especially by the New York Tribune, was unmeasured for its outrageous vehemence. It is hardly accurate to say, as that paper states since Mr. FESSENDEN's death, that he was "every where condemned" for his vote. There were many of the most radical Republicans who differed with him, but who no more condemned him than they did Mr. SUMNER; and it was the influence of those men which prevented the censure of Mr. FESSENDEN and the Senators who voted with him by the Convention that nominated General GRANT. Of the fidelity of all these gentlemen to the great purpose of the Republican party there has never been any more reasonable doubt than of their ability and spotless integrity.

Mr. FESSENDEN's feeble health for many years, joined to a peculiarly sensitive temperament, made him especially impatient of mere display, and sometimes too irritable in the vicissitudes of debate. He had a certain disdainful independence, a scornful honesty, which indicates the character most desirable in a public man amidst the tendencies of our politics. In many ways he recalls the men of an earlier day; grave, simple, devoted, with a profound consciousness that this is a government of laws, not of persons. Of the sycophancy of the politician he had no trace whatever. His character and his services were full of the dignity of self-respect; and the loss of such a living example of the rarer civic virtues is not the least cause of regret at his death. It will be very difficult to fill adequately the place of such a man, who in the one act of his political career for which he was most severely censured by a large number of his party friends showed that not the least valuable moral service of a most honorable and useful life.

GENERAL RAWLINS.

The general assent of the country to the words of Attorney-General HOAR's touching message, in spite of General BUTLER's sneers—"a man so upright, able, and faithful"—shows how deep is the public sense of his loss. It shows also the sagacity of the President's course in selecting for so important a position a man with whose character and capacity he was thoroughly satisfied, although his name might not be familiar to the public. From the beginning of the war intimately associated with General GRANT, General RAWLINS constantly proved his ability; and the testimony of all who knew best, since his appointment to the War Department, proves the vigor and sagacity with which, even in his extreme ill health, it was conducted by the Secretary. Had he been a conspicuous politician, is it likely that he would have been a better officer, or that the country would more truly mourn his death?

In selecting his successor we hope the President will look among those whom he knows rather than those whom the politicians expect or present. We understand the necessity of party sympathy and support, and we only insist that it is the duty of every man to be a politician, so far as that word implies a knowledge of the principles involved in the questions upon which he votes. But the word politician has come to mean distinctively the hucksters in the party, and in that sense we are glad General RAWLINS could not have been the candidate of the politicians; but the party that supported General GRANT, as well as the country at large, were satisfied with his appointment. They will be equally pleased with a successor whom upon his appointment they may not know, if his administration of the office shows them, as in the case of General RAWLINS, that the President has selected a man "upright, able, and faithful."

THE THORNS OF TRAVEL.

"A SUBSCRIBER" writes to the Times the story of his experience upon a railroad. He went to the Erie station at the foot of Twenty-third Street and asked for a ticket to Niagara Falls, the advertised price of which was seven dollars. He was asked by "the bland and gentlemanly agent" if he intended to return by the same road. He said no. Thereupon he was politely informed that the fare would be eight dollars and seventy-five cents. He was unwilling to turn away, and paid the sum demanded, with the impression that he was swindled. When near Buffalo the conductor informed him that he must wait at that place for three hours, and gave him sixty-five cents to pay his fare to Niagara Falls. He improved the delay in writing his letter to warn his fellow-citizens of the snare into which he had fallen.

And he did well. He did what every traveler ought to do under the circumstances, and what most travelers are too lazy or thoughtless to do. It is only of the great catastrophes that the public hears, not of the myriad small vexations that sting the traveler. The constant failure to make time, and the consequent "making up"—the minor miseries at the Mugby Junctions—the runnings of the track, and the slight collisions without serious results, the toleration of drunken passengers, and all the annoyances which the traveler habitually suffers, seem to him not worth complaining of, and he would fear to be called an old Betty. But the public pays quite enough for its railway accommodation to have it of the best; and it will certainly not be of the best without the incessant spur of exposure.

The posted placard announces, "To Niagara Falls via Erie Railroad for $7." It means that the condition is, that you will take a return ticket by the same road; but the condition is not mentioned. This is mere petty swindling, and of a kind that we have known before. Perhaps the Company will explain it. If not, we shall all have cause for still greater gratitude to Governor HOFFMAN for continuing the present direction of the road beyond the term for which it was elected.

NOTES.

The Democratic Bourbons who are victorious every where else must attend to their own affairs when the Democratic Convention lately resolved that it "rejoices in the extinction of slavery; in the prompt and general acquiescence of the southern people in the results of the war; in every well-directed effort for the enlightenment and elevation of oppressed humanity at home and abroad; and in every measure compatible with good government and public order to broaden the basis of human rights and to secure the blessings of free institutions to all classes of the people." It then proceeds to deplore that the policy of the Republican party during the war has seriously ends; but that is of course. Here is a Democratic Convention that turns OVERBOARD out of doors, and tells to revolution and the shot-holes bones of the right of a man with a white skin to "wallop" a man with a black. But, as it is the duty of the Democratic party to denounce, the same Convention resolved that the national bonds ought to be taxed. The Wisconsin Democracy, after all, is "humanity" that needs "well-directed efforts for its enlightenment."

JUDGE DENT has been nominated for Governor in Mississippi by those who are called the Conservative Republicans, and who are in direct opposition to the Democratic party. The platform is wise, generous, and progressive, including amnesty and education; but the hand that most remarkably developed for the Dent which a few of its professed friends are trying to make, with the aid of its enemies, is the word "Conservative." The movement in Mississippi is as suspicious as all other movements which take that fine name. It is really the attempt of those who have been opposed to acquiesce in the settlement of reconstruction to obtain power under false pretenses. Such a judge DENT, with his eminent personal qualities, is a most undoubted "carpet-bagger" —a fact so repulsive to the Democratic press—we should expect to have it denied forth with gibes and grimaces in the "Conservative" journals.

CHIEF JUSTICE CHASE has written a cheerful letter to Mr. JAMES A. BRIGGS, in which he says, "I want nothing whatever of a political character, and desire that my name may be disassociated in men's minds with all political action." When he was younger he says that he thought it would be a good deed of kind if the people should trust him with great powers; but now that he is older, he is not at all sure that he deserves the trust of men who have been trusted with them. There is no reason to doubt that the Chief Justice says precisely what he means; and it is too old a politician to suppose that he will be understood as meaning finally to withdraw from political life. He says, of course, that he means to allow his name to be used, with a certainty of success, for a Presidential nomination by the surely winning party. In his "Reminiscences of Men and Events," just published, and full of interesting political correspondence and history, JAMES A. HAMILTON quotes an amusing and characteristic monoplace-book of Mr. JOHN JOHNSTON, an old merchant of New York. General WASHINGTON one day expressed a low opinion of Mr. JEFFERSON, saying that when he resigned the office of Secretary of State Mr. JEFFERSON said that he was tired of public affairs, and meant to live in private, even forbidding newspapers to be brought to his house. Speaking of this with General HAMILTON, WASHINGTON said that he hoped Mr. JEFFERSON would be happy in his retirement. HAMILTON replied that for his part he should not be surprised to see the ex-Secretary a candidate for the Presidency; and when Mr. JEFFERSON afterward became a candidate, even General WASHINGTON thought that his renunciation of public life was not sincere. Such is the fate of public men.

The great public services of Mr. VANDERBILT in buying and controlling the Harlem and Hudson River railroads, and in going round the world in his own steam yacht, have been recognized by Captain ALBERT DE GROOT and some other friends, who have caused the erection of a huge bronze statue, surrounded with emblematic designs of the methods by which Mr. VANDERBILT has accumulated his fortune.

ROCKWOOD'S very elaborate display of pictures at the Rooms of the American Institute constitutes one of the leading attractions of the American Institute Exhibition. Among the pictures is a large oil-painting of the late JAMES HARPER, copied from the photograph taken a few hours before the lamentable accident which caused his death.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE AVONDALE DISASTER.

We publish this week, on our first page, and on pages 614, 615, and 617, a number of illustrations of the recent calamity at Avondale, Pennsylvania, accompanied with detailed narratives. The subjoined cut is a diagram of the gallery, showing the position of the shaft and the counter gallieries. Among the papers in the possession of the company there is to be found no plan of the mine, which was consequently a new one. But one artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, who visited the scene of the disaster, and from whose sketches our illustrations have been prepared, has succeeded in producing an accurate diagram from his own personal observations, aided by the efforts of a Welshman, the superintendent of a neighboring colliery.

The scene presented during the exhumation of the unfortunate victims can never be forgotten by any one who witnessed it. Upon the side-hill, as it were, amphitheatrically, was the waiting multitude with anxious faces. The scene immediately about the shaft was gloomy in the extreme. The relief to the breaker; the descent to the brave, stalwart miners detail relief—their re-appearance at the top of the shaft with their sad burden from below; their hurried departure with the deadly grave with their head uncovered: the recognition of the dead by friends, followed by the anouncement, one by one, of their names—all these features made up a picture of horror which cannot be given by pen or pencil.

But there was another scene that would bottle the acuity of hearing to experience, none of which no record is left, for there is no one to tell the tale. This was when the fire-damp first came upon the fire breaking out of the fire, when all the fresh air in the mine was being drawn toward the roads to feed the exhausted flames, and when the fatal gases were being driven back into the interior. The bewildered miners hurried to the front. Who can describe the tumult of that gathering, or the panic which followed when it was known that there was no hope of escape or of rescue? At length the terrors had all unmanned from every sense of the mine. Friends, hitherto separated, now had met. Their fortunes, though, were fixed, and to him they all looked for counsel. He seized upon the one resource that was left. If the fresh air could be imprisoned and a barrier built against the invading gases—then, perhaps, the men could live until help could come from above. Resolutely, under the orders of their captain, they fell to work and built the first "bottice" or barricade. There sat Hughes, as he above stated, giving instructions to the men and boys. But all in vain. At last, exhausted by their work, and overcome by the deadly damp that would not be repulsed, they fainted at their post and died.

Most of the victims—all but eight or nine—were Welsh miners. They had rented work only a few days before, after a suspension of three months. But for the last suspension, which would have been made with the old tunnel, and through the outlet then in use, the mine would have been secure against any calamity like that which has now proved fatal.

NEWS ITEMS.

Mr. James J. Brooks, a special United States Revenue Agent on duty at Philadelphia, was shot by a party of ruffians September 6.

The Vermont election took place September 7. The Republican majority was 20,000.

The President has appointed General Sherman to act as Secretary of War until the vacancy caused by the death of General RAWLINS shall be filled.

The Allentown Iron-Works, at Allentown, Pennsylvania, was destroyed by fire September 7, and a thousand workmen thrown out of employment. The loss is estimated at $300,000.

There have been sixteen cases of suicide in Lowell, Massachusetts, within eight months, mostly of young girls.

The new Senate of Kentucky will consist of two Republicans, two Independents, and thirty-four Democrats. The House of Representatives will consist of eight Republicans and ninety-two Democrats. The Fifteenth Amendment will be raised much of a chance in a body thus composed.

The Democratic candidate for Governor of Ohio, George H. Pendleton, made a speech at Cincinnati on Friday last, in which he opposed the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment, because he regarded it as a material and radical change in the present system of government, and as destroying the constitutional relations of States to the Federal Union.

The Wurrumbung coal-mine at Carbon Hill, Missouri, caught fire in the main shaft on September 6, while fifteen men were in the mine. Seven of the men succeeded in escaping, but by clinging to the rope of an ascending car, although they were badly burned; but the remainder were forced to remain in the mine until the fire was extinguished, when they were rescued in a mass of two injured condition, the foreman, Mr. Halvey, probably fatally.

On September 8 General Canby issued his proclamation declaring the result of the late election in Virginia. Kellogg, Walker will be installed as Provisional Governor on September 11, and John W. Lewis Provisional Lieutenant-Governor on September 15. The Legislature will be called together October 5. The adoption of the proposed Constitution is announced.

The Republican State Convention of Minnesota met at St. Paul September 9, and nominated Mr. Austin, of St. Peters, for Governor.

John Bell, of Tennessee, died at Nashville September 10.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The French Senate has closed its sessions, after adopting the Senatus Consultum. The amendment giving that body the power to elect its own President, and which had been previously rejected, was finally passed at the last hour by a vote of seventy-one.

There is a rumor, reaching us by a recent cable telegram, that the Empress Eugenie may abdicate in favor of the Prince Imperial.

The Ministerial responsibility is to be proposed in a measure to be introduced by the Liberal Party at the next session of the Prussian Diet.

There are 22,000 men, women, and children starving in Paris, and 200,000 more have been reduced to want by a strike among the nail-makers.

The great Gladstonian preparations are being made for the Œcumenical Council. Twenty-three shorthand writers are engaged to make a report of the proceedings at the Council. They have been selected from different parts, no local interest of any one acquainted with every variation in the pronunciation of the English tongue. The Pope's chair has been placed in St. Peter's, and seats have been arranged for 750 bishops. "The seats are to be covered with crape," says the correspondent of the Morning Post (London). "They are constructed in the usual manner, and each obsee prelates will be somewhat squeezed in them. Each stall has a writing-desk in front, with a cushion underneath."

The Belgian Government has declined to join Bavaria in carrying out Prince Hohenlohe's policy respecting the forthcoming Œcumenical Council. The Government has also determined to send no official delegate to the Council.

Republican organizations in Portugal are said to be increasing in numbers and influence.

Lady Palmerston, widow of the late Lord Palmerston, died September 11.

Arrangements have been made to repeat the Boston Peace Jubilee at the Crystal Palace in September, England.

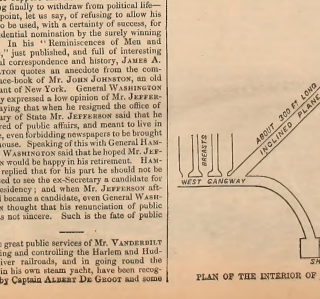
The London Morning Post says: "His Holiness the Pope is about to make great efforts to convert the negroes of America. Two hundred of them are now studying for the priesthood."

Letters received from Cuba at Washington on September 9, by way of Key West, purport to give full accounts of the battle at Las Tunas, which is regarded as the most important that has yet taken place. The fight lasted five hours. The Spanish forces were under General Valmaseda, and numbered over 4000 effective troops. The insurgents were about equal in force. The Cuban loss, as reported, is killed, 72; missing, 47; wounded, 267. The Spanish loss is killed and wounded over 600. Two hundred of their dead and wounded fell into the hands of the rebels, 200 were captured, and nearly 400 deserted. The result of the battle compelled Valmaseda to give up and fall back on his fortifications. There is great rejoicing throughout Cuban army.

In the mean time 16,000 troops are reported ready to start from Spain to reinforce the Volunteers. General Sickles, our Minister to Spain, has notified the Spanish Government that, although the United States Government has not yet recognized the Cubans as belligerents, the situation may soon call for such a recognition.

It is reported that the Spanish Regency under Marshal Serrano will be extended.

King Victor Emanuel, of Italy, in reply to overtures made to the Duke of Aosta in connection with the Spanish throne, declares that his son shall never rejoice in a free country ruled by the unanimous call of the Constitutional Chambers.



PLAN OF THE INTERIOR OF THE STEUBEN MINE, AVONDALE, PENNSYLVANIA.

ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT.

THE 14th of September, 1869, was the centennial anniversary of the birthday of Baron ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT, the great German traveler and savant. This anniversary was to his German countrymen a day of great interest, and in this country it was celebrated by them with peculiar enthusiasm. We give on this page an excellent portrait of Baron HUMBOLDT, who in many respects was the greatest man of his age. He died at Berlin, May 6, 1859, at the age of ninety years.

Few, if any, possessed so varied a range of attainments; no one ever used vast knowledge more nobly than he. The sciences — astronomy, chemistry, geology, mineralogy, natural history, physics, anatomy—were not more familiar to him than politics, law, and belles-lettres: in all he was a master. Whether we consider the sum of his additions to the general stock of known facts, or the valuable generalizations and laws which he deduced from the discoveries of others, we shall find it difficult to name any philosopher of the present day who can be compared to him. Personal advantages enhanced the fame of his mental triumphs. After a youth spent in the successful pursuit of knowledge under surprising difficulties and in spite of formidable dangers, he enjoyed a serene and beautiful old age, and set an example of rare industry and unvaried equanimity at a time of life when neither the faculties nor the temper are expected to be bright. Unlike many benefactors of humanity, he was fortunate enough to reap his reward in his lifetime. He saw his fame surpass that of conquerors and monarchs, and received, for the last quarter of his life, a homage more universal than any other man of his day. No funeral honors or posthumous eulogies can enhance the veneration with which the name of HUMBOLDT has been worshiped for a quarter of a century throughout the civilized world.

He was born at Berlin on September 14, 1769; his father was a soldier of distinction and a man of wealth. Left fatherless at the age of ten, FREDERICH HEINRICH ALEXANDER—this was his name—was carefully educated by judicious relatives, and spent a creditable career at the universities of Berlin and Göttingen. His taste for scientific pursuits led him to devote especial attention to geology and mineralogy; and, after a couple of years study at Fribourg, he became, at the age of twenty-three, a director of the works at Baireuth. He had previously traveled extensively through Germany, Holland, and England, and had published a small work on the basaltic rocks on the Rhine. His labors at Baireuth increased his love for science; he made himself master of all that was then known of chemistry, galvanism, botany, and geology; and the death of his mother placing him in possession of independent property, he sold his estates, threw up his situation, and determined to devote himself to science.

Having decided to choose a new field for his observations, he was somewhat embarrassed in his selection. War was raging throughout Europe at the time. He proposed to explore scientifically Southern Italy, and actually set out with a friend; but the British cruisers compelled the relinquishment of the enterprise. He planned a tour through North Africa, and got as far as Marseilles; but the war again interfered, and he abandoned the project. He had met at Paris the late M. BONPLAND, then appointed naturalist to a scientific expedition to South America; but the war put a stop to this too. Almost in despair, he and BONPLAND resolved to devote themselves to a series of scientific experiments and observations in Spain, and left France accordingly. While they were in Spain the Government of that country became acquainted with HUMBOLDT'S extraordinary attainments, and anticipated his fondest hopes by soliciting him to undertake the exploration of Spanish America. The offer was joyfully accepted.

DARK OR FAIR?—[SEE POEM, PAGE 614.]

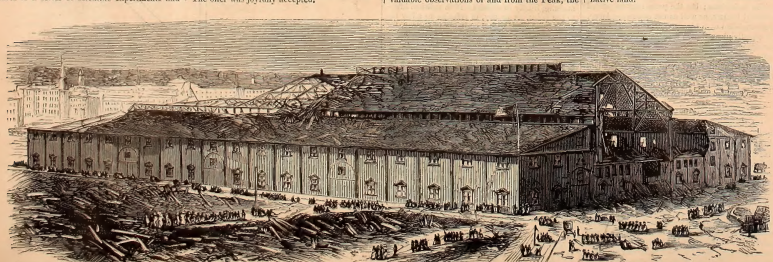
On June 4, 1799, HUMBOLDT sailed from Corunna on his great voyage. Even to give a brief summary of the results of his five years' journey-ings would exhaust far more than the space allotted to this sketch. It must suffice to say that, having touched at Teneriffe, and obtained some valuable observations of and from the Peak, the illustrious traveler landed at Cumana, in the middle of July, and devoted eighteen months to a thorough exploration of the wilderness which now constitutes the State of Venezuela, laying down the true course of the Orinoco and other rivers, and collecting the materials for an accurate account of the physical geography of that section of country. From thence he went to Cuba, traveled over the island, and made so thorough an examination of its resources and peculiarities that his work on Cuba, old as it is, is the most valuable we have. In March, 1801, he left Cuba for the main land, intending to make Panama his starting-point. Accident drove him further south. He made Bogota his point of departure, and from thence, in spite of the rainy season, crossed the continent to the Pacific, and carefully surveyed Peru, Chili, and the whole Pacific slope of the Andes. It was during this tour that he made his famous ascent of Chimborazo; he attained an elevation of 19,300 feet—over three miles above the level of the sea; and amidst mists and cold so intense that the blood started from his eyes and ears, planted his instruments on a rock which the wind had bared of the eternal snows, and enriched science with an unprecedented series of observations. In Chili he was enabled to study the phenomena of earthquakes, as, in Venezuela, he had studied meteoric showers; his views on these important subjects have never been controverted. After spending twenty-two months in South America he repaired to MEXICO, visited its great volcanoes, laid down the course of several of its rivers and mountain ranges, and obtained a thorough knowledge of the country. From Mexico he sailed, by way of Havana, to Philadelphia, and spent a couple of months in this country. From whence, at length, in July, 1804, he sailed for France, with the fruits of five years' indefatigable and intelligent travel—such a store of facts, drawings, and observations as no previous traveler had ever been able to collect.

Some idea of the value of his American harvest may be gathered from the fact that his published account of his travels in South America and Mexico comprises seventeen volumes folio, and eleven volumes quarto, and costs $2,000 a copy. It took him twelve years to write.

After the completion of this gigantic labor he traveled through parts of Italy which he had not seen, and spent some time at Rome at the villa of his brother WILHELM. He was enabled to witness a great eruption of Vesuvius, and obtained some valuable observations. In 1818 he finally took up his residence at Berlin, where he was eagerly welcomed by the king and court as well as by the savans. The Prussians were so proud of him, and so fearful of losing him—strong inducements were held out to him to settle in France—that he was made a councilor of state, and given to understand that any favor would be too great for him to ask. He had no political ambition, however, and was happy in being able to prosecute his studies.

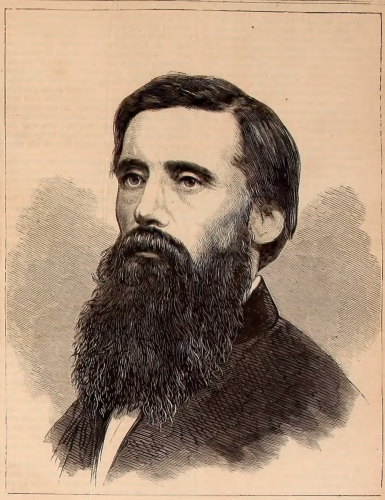
In 1829 the Emperor of Russia resolved to have a survey made of his Asiatic possessions, and offered HUMBOLDT the direction of the work. The offer was accepted, and in company with two distinguished savans, HUMBOLDT traveled through Siberia and Tartary, spending nine months in collecting ample material for an account of the physical geography of Central Asia. His travels were published by the Russian Government in a magnificent form, and at his suggestion a series of observations was undertaken which has been of great use to science. NICOLAS would gladly have retained HUMBOLDT in Russia, but found him inflexibly attached to his native land.

BARON ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT.



THE COLISEUM AT BOSTON AFTER THE TERRIBLE GALE OF SEPTEMBER 8.—PHOT. BY JOHN A. WHIPPLE, BOSTON.—[SEE PAGE 614.]

THE LATE HON. WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN.—[SEE PAGE 614.]



THE LATE HON. JOHN A. RAWLINS.—[SEE PAGE 614.]

On his return home HUMBOLDT found the revolutions of 1830 in progress, and filled his first diplomatic part by going to Paris, on behalf of Prussia, to recognize LOUIS PHILIPPE. He was much occupied then and for some years afterward in political concerns. With the King of Prussia he lived on terms of almost brotherly intimacy; and though his political opinions were much too liberal for his sovereign—he was, in fact, a thorough republican—he represented Prussia faithfully and honorably on several momentous occasions. The crisis of 1848 is said to have led to some decided expression of his liberal views, and for a time to have estranged him from his royal friend; but the separation was brief—the King was a very good man at bottom, and meant well—he could not live without HUMBOLDT, who, for his part, was so much engrossed with scientific concerns as to be rarely anxious about politics.

Shortly after his return from Russia he planned his magnum opus, which, he intended, should contain the sum of his acquirements, and should demonstrate the harmonies of the universe. To this great work he gave the appropriate title of "Cosmos"—the World. He began it in 1831; but for a long period the work was interrupted, and the first volume did not appear till many years afterward. The fifth was published shortly before his death. The work is so well known as to need no description here. It is enough to say of it that it contains the sum and reason of the knowledge of the most comprehensive mind of the present age.

The problem he sought to solve—the demonstration of the perfect unity of the divine purpose, and the harmony of all the divine laws—has not been solved, because all science is yet in infancy, and the sum of what we know is small in comparison with that which we have yet to learn. But any one who wants to know how much the human mind grasps, and how far the human eye has groped into the mist of knowledge, will find what he seeks in "Cosmos."

One of the most striking characteristics of HUMBOLDT was the remarkable quickness with which he turned every thing to good account—even accidents and disappointments. Every man was for him a teacher of something; every object a theme for study; every event a new problem solved, to be stored away in the proper shelf in his capacious mind. TUCKERMAN says of him: "If delayed by the events of war from embarking on his American expedition, he occupied himself in ascertaining the height of the central plains of Castile; when becalmed on soundings, he examined the weeds collected on the lead to gain new light for the theory of the coloring of plants; the haze that for many hours concealed from his sight the Peak of Teneriffe induced ingenious speculations on the effects of atmosphere on vision." Our countryman, Mr. Squier, who visited him at Berlin, thought, after a few hours in his company, that the rapacious arcaut had pumped him dry about Central America; but he was mistaken, for, before his departure, an urgent note reached him from Humboldt, imploring him to say whether the potato disease had ever existed in Nicaragua!

THE AVONDALE COLLIERY DISASTER—FRIENDS CLAIMING THEIR DEAD.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE DOUBLE PAGE.]

Between American and Humboldt there always existed a strong bond of sympathy. His early travels; the respect shown him on his visit to this country; his republican principles and his intimacy with some of our greatest men, always led him to feel a strong affection for the United States, and to show to American travelers more attention than to foreigners generally. It is not enough to say that his regard was reciprocated by the American people. No foreigner enjoyed such general veneration in this country as Baron Humboldt. The proposal which was made to leave the Oregon dispute to his arbitration was one of the many evidences of the unexampled esteem in which he was held on both sides the water.

DARK OR FAIR.

See Illustration on Page 613.

Maiden fair
With the golden hair—
Sweet Brunette
With the locks of jet
As you range side by side
On the margee of the tide,
I know not on which my heart I should set.

The hazel orb
Will the heart absorb,
And the eye of blue
Is tender and true:
But what orb are together
This sunshiny weather,
Their powers combined must our peace undo.

Beautiful pair,
Our bosoms spare!
The moon and the sun
Shine never as one,
And why should you two
Both rise on our view
When either alone had our worship won?

From crown unto feet
In beauty complete,
Like the Night and the Day
Together you stray,
Past the pier and the shipping
So daintily tripping
In your pretty, bewitching, unconscious way!

The maiden fair
Would I gladly declare
My darling and yet
There's the dark-eyed Brunette!
And I vow on my word
To say that I preferred
Is a question with terrible doubt beset.

What shall I do
To decide twixt the two?
So beautiful both
That to choose I am loth,
And which was the fairest
The sweetest and rarest
I could not declare, were I put on my oath!

Brunette and fair maid
Like Sunshine and Shade—
Each in her sphere
Is the loveliest here,
And I own I'm as fond
Of Brunette and of Blonde—
A shocking confession I very much fear.

THE LATE HON. WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN.

For some days before Mr. Fessenden's death we were assured that his illness was serious, and that there were no hopes of his recovery. He died at Portland on the morning of September 8, in his sixty-third year.

William Pitt Fessenden was born October 16, 1806, in Boscawen, New Hampshire. He was graduated at Bowdoin College in 1823, and after four years' study of law was admitted to the bar in 1827. He began the practice of his profession in Bridgeton, Maine, but in 1829 moved to Portland, where he ever after resided.

Gaining prominence as a lawyer he entered into politics in 1831. In 1831 he was elected to the State Legislature from Portland, and was distinguished in that body for his skill and legal acumen as a legislator, and for the power which he displayed as a debater. At the expiration of his term he returned to the practice of his profession, and was soon known as one of the most distinguished members of the bar in his State. In 1840 he consented to run again for the Legislature, and was elected. He was then a strong Whig, while a majority of the Maine Legislature was Democratic. Notwithstanding this fact Mr. Fessenden was placed on the judiciary Committee, and afterward elected Chairman of the Committee for the revision of the State Statutes.

In 1840 he was elected to Congress. His speeches on the Loan bill, Bankrupt law, and other measures, and his reply to Caleb Cushing fully sustained his reputation as a lawyer and as an orator. He declined a re-election, and but for the Democratic majority in the Maine Legislature would have been chosen Senator. In 1845 we find him again in the State Legislature, having been elected by the prohibitionists. From 1846 to 1852 he took no active part in politics, except as a member of Whig National Conventions. In 1848 he was a member of the Convention which nominated General Taylor for President, though not Taylor but Webster was his favorite candidate. Four years later he supported the nomination of General Scott. During this time, while engaged in the practice of law, Mr. Fessenden, in conjunction with Mr. Wendte, gained a reputation in the Supreme Court against an opinion previously rendered in a lower court by Judge Story. The case involved the question of the liability of the owner of property for the fraudulent acts of his auctioneer.

Though supporting General Scott as candidate for President in 1852, Mr. Fessenden opposed the platform of his party, and predicted its defeat. His mind at this time was occupied with the imminent question of savery, and, after the action of the Southern Whigs on the Nebraska bill, he advocated the formation of a new party. Scott was defeated; but by a combination of Whigs, Democrats, and "Free-Soilers," Mr. Fessenden was elected. His celebrated speech in the Senate was Hannibal Hamlin, then a Democrat. Mr. Fessenden's speech on the Nebraska bill on the 25th of March, 1854, established his reputation as one of the ablest debaters in the Senate. He served on the Finance Committee, and on the expiration of his term, in 1859, was unanimously re-elected.

From this time Mr. Fessenden's reputation was a national one. He held his position on the Finance Committee during both terms, and his knowledge of monetary matters and Secretary Lincoln to appoint him Secretary of the Treasury upon the resignation of Mr. Chase in 1864. He consented to retain his position until March, 1865, when he was succeeded by Mr. McCulloch.

Mr. Fessenden's course in the Senate during Andrew Johnson's administration was eminently conservative, though he was a sound Republican from first to last. One of his most memorable acts of his Senatorial career was his vote against the impeachment of President Johnson.

Personally, Mr. Fessenden was a pleasant, affable gentleman. He was tall and dignified in his appearance: but his natural severity of demeanor was relieved by the suavity of his manners.

GENERAL JOHN A. RAWLINS.

General John A. Rawlins, late Secretary of War, died on the afternoon of September 6. The loss to the country will not easily be repaired; that sustained by the President is totally irreparable, for the latter has not only been deprived of a faithful servant, but also of a trusted friend.

John A. Rawlins was born in Jo Daviess County, Illinois, February 13, 1831. At his death, therefore, he was in his thirty-ninth year. He received a common-school and academic education, and until twenty years of age was only engaged in agricultural pursuits. In 1853 he entered the law-office of J. P. Stephens, of Galena, where he made the acquaintance of President Grant. In 1854 he was admitted to the bar, and was afterward tolerably successful in his profession.

Previous to the war General Rawlins's career was comparatively obscure, but he had that force of character and energy of purpose which, in the new era that opened in 1861, made him a prominent soldier. From the beginning of the war his record is closely associated with that of General Grant. Soon after the fight at Sumter a large public meeting was held at Galena at which Grant presided, and Rawlins spoke. The latter had been known as a Democrat, and his declaration of the line of coercive measures to maintain the Union had on that account a great effect.

In August, 1861, he was a Major in the Forty-fifth Illinois, known as the lead-mine regiment, but at the request of Grant, then a Brigadier-General, he received an appointment as Assistant Adjutant-General, and was placed at the office at whose request the appointment was given. From that time he accompanied General Grant in all his campaigns.

He was made a Lieutenant-Colonel November 1, 1862, and a Brigadier-General of Volunteers August 11, 1863. He was first appointed Chief-of-Staff to General Grant in November, 1863, and retained that position on the elevation of the latter to the rank of Lieutenant-General. On March 3, 1865, he was confirmed brevet Major-General. His full services as Chief-of-Staff were fully appreciated by General Grant, who in no small degree owed his remarkable success to General Rawlins.

For a short time after General Grant's inauguration General Schofield remained at the head of the War Department. But the President decided to appoint General Rawlins to that place in his Cabinet, and finally prevailed upon him to accept it. He was unanimously confirmed, and his appointment was satisfactory both to Republicans and Democrats. Under his charge the affairs of the War Office were conducted with increased efficiency, and with a wise economy of expenditure.

General Rawlins was a victim of consumption, a malady contracted by exposure during the war. His private character was such as to win the esteem and affection of all who knew him. His temper was equable, and his domestic relations were of the most pleasant nature. His first wife, whom he m. ried June, 1856, died in 1861. In December, 1863, he married Miss Mary E. Hurlbert of Danbury, Connecticut. This lady, who survives him, is herself an invalid.

THE LATE GALE IN BOSTON.

A terrific southeasterly gale visited the entire line of the New England coast on the evening of September 8. Before nightfall it grew into a hurricane, causing great damage to property, accompanied with loss of life. The Boston Common was literally carpeted with foliage, and a few trees were blown down. The Old Elm, however, still stands. Awnings were torn to shreds, chimneys were blown down, and churches and other edifices were unroofed.

One of our illustrations on page 612 shows the effect of the gale upon the Coliseum, in which the grand musical festival of Peace Jubilee was held last July. This once imposing building is now more than a mere wreck, and its ruinous and dismantled condition gives a more striking proof of the fury of the storm and the havoc which it wrought than any one instance that can be cited. Shortly before six o'clock a furious gust of wind struck upon the orchestral end of the building "like a hummer," as sailors say. In a few minutes the large circular window, which is twenty feet in diameter, crashed to the floor. The wind getting within the building quivered like a reed. The whole orchestral end now crashed in, and the blast, sweeping with redoubled fury to the other extremity, as speedily forced out that end. In a few moments nothing but the office seemed to be the sport of the elements, and the wind, getting underneath the roof, playfully lifted it off piece by piece until the whole area of the transept was rapidly unroofed. The air was darkened with falling and flying timbers, which were tossed and blown about like shavings. The crash was tremendous, and struck awe into all beholders. The organ was speedily leveled to the ground and buried in the enormous mass of timber. The big drum was also laid flat and pierced in several places by the falling timbers. Immense pieces of the roof presented considerable distances, and fell on every side.

A large number of vessels were wrecked along the coast.

THE WIFE'S SECRET.

If pride myself upon any mental endowment whatever, it is upon that humble one of Common-Sense. I live what is called by the intellectual people a commonplace life. I have my pew in the neighboring church, and sit in it twice every Sunday. I know one captain in the army—just such a person he should be—polished, and yet ferocious, gentle to ladies, but rather insolent to civilian beaux, boastful of his clubs, and giving all his leisure time, which is considerable, to the cultivation of his mustaches; but otherwise I am ignorant of the fashionable world and all its gay doings. I have made no endeavor to break through the gilded pale that separates it from the outside barbarians who crowd the pit. I never go to the Opera-House every day; I return from the City in one; and if it is wet I use the same conveyance in the morning to reach my office. I dine at a restaurant weekly. My best sherry is 48s. a dozen; and when the captain talks of vintage wines (as he will do by the hour at a time) I offer him for what he thinks he is drinking. However, with true good-breeding, he imbibes it in great quantities, as though it were the best. I often see him at restaurants. Our cook can not compass an omelette soufflée. My wife trims her own bonnets. We have eight children. We attend the Church Catechising in March, except the baby and the last but one. In short, a more respectable and unfashionable family than ours does not exist in all Bayswater.

Under these circumstances, it may be easily imagined that we are as free from the vices of the great as we are without their privileges. But this was, I honestly believe, the case until within a very recent period. When I used to read in the papers that the Lady Day Coltsy of Coltsmain ancestry and blest blood) had left her husband's roof, and that the Major Fluttery of the Life Guards; or that it was rumored among well-informed circles that the gentlemen of the long robe would shortly present in the domestic affairs of his Grace the Duke of Belgravia, I used to give a prolonged whistle, and remark: "Here then is another case of the total absence in the habits of the haut ton. I knew that one hereditary aristocracy were given to these excesses, and that the high tone of life must certainly be crimes, and I perused such details as the press could furnish with an avidity unlike any I am subject to in reprobation. I resented to be reading of a class of persons whose way of life was too far removed from my own to affect me, except as a matter of just as when I went to the play I found myself in an atmosphere of intrigue, and misunderstanding, and jealousy, altogether unnatural to that which I had not the ghost of an experience in common.

Jealousy! Why, I had been married sixteen years without entertaining that passion, so that it was not very likely, however well acted, that I was going to entertain me. Misunderstanding! The thing was impossible for, when ever there promised to be "a row in the pantry"—and every household can well understand me—when I make use of that metaphorical expression—I brought it to a head, and had it out, and off we started again (speaking for self and Mrs. R——) on the smooth current of our lives, with the little fracas buried forever in its depths. As for the matter of eight falling in love with another man—it is all very well in a stage-play, and particularly where the husband is a black man, and, as I have said, belitting enough among persons of quality; but upon the Notting Hill side of Bayswater any such mischance would, I felt, be one of shame, and still-less—actual presumption, as well as a great domestic crime.

Imagine, therefore, my astonishment when my opposite neighbor, Peabody, who also calls himself my friend, did me the honor to call upon me a few weeks ago, to speak, in confidence, of the alarming conduct of my wife. Having demanded and obtained a private interview, it is scandalous old person, who was once an indoor merchant, and yet retains the trace of his calling upon his nose, set before me in detail a number of curious circumstances connected with the "goings on," as he was pleased to call them, of my wife, which, he was sure, would surprise me to say, "might not possibly be only coincidences, after all," but which he felt it his duty as a fellow-creature, and one who had been a husband in his time—here his lips made a dumb motion of gratitude—to let me know. Even as a neighbor, and an individual of no pretension whatever, hitherto remarkable for its respectability, and much, I doubtless remembered, had declined to permit Mrs. Jones to put up apartments in her window, lest we should be confounded with the lodging-house localities; nay, which, by the mere force of its public opinion, had prevented No. 48s from being let to a playactor—even in this character, as I say, he would have felt it his duty to make me aware of what was being said, though doubtless falsely, respecting the behavior of Mrs. R——. I should have to be excused the door, and informed Peabody that his late hour was certainly arrived, and that he had better make his game with Providence before I cut his throat; but from ignorance of the proper conduct to be adopted in such exceptional circumstances, and perhaps from the knowledge that there was nothing but a paper-knife in the room with which to effect this righteous punishment, I only frowned out laughing, and called him a meddling and impertinent old fool.

"Very true," returned he, for he always makes use of that form of words—"very true: but still the facts are worth investigating, even from their singularity. Do you know, for instance, that at seven o'clock, three days a week, your wife goes out in a cab by herself?"

"No," said I, "I do not; though, if she does, it is surely better than if he had an ineligible companion. As a matter of fact, however, she does not do so, for I have offered to go shopping with her twice this week, and she has declined to accompany me upon the ground of having a large cheque."

"Upon what days did she give this excuse?" inquired Peabody, taking out his pocket-book.

"Last Monday and last Thursday," returned I.

"Well, here's a memorandum: Monday 4th. Saw Mrs. R——, short, as usual, at 11; Thursday 7th, ditto, ditto. She could not be driving to a morning concert, because she had no white gloves on."

"I will grant that much," quoth I, sardonically, and yet not by any means unmoved by this unexpected intelligence. "My wife does not go to morning concerts."

"Very true," observed Peabody. "Then the question arises, where does she go to? Now, as an inhabitant of the Crescent—"

"Peabody," interrupted I, severely, "I acknowledge the right of every man to look out of the man in the moon himself—to meddle in my affairs upon that ground. I am obliged to you for the interest you have taken in this matter, but the simple fact is, that it has been entirely misplaced. I have been perfectly well aware of my wife's movements, and they have had my fullest permission and approbation. I only wanted to see to what lengths your impertinence and love of interference would carry you. This is your last, I believe; your umbrella is the alpaca one; I wish you a very good-morning."

I saluted my visitor out, and then sat down at my private parlor with my elbows upon the table, and both my hands thrust into my hair. I had undoubtedly received a shock; but I was on fire with jealous apprehensions myself. What could it all mean? For sixteen years my wife had never given me occasion even to cry in company, upon which, she had always given me to understand, she doted; and yet, after refusing to go out with me, she was driving away by last, on the plea of sore throat, she had started, the instant that my back was turned, in a Hansom—or even supposing it was a four-wheeler, in a cab, without white gloves on, and— Confusion! Here was a row in the pantry, and one which my wife would undoubtedly have cleared up at once. "Anna Maria," cried I, from the bottom of the stairs. "Anna Maria, I wish to speak with you immediately."

"Jor' bless me," answered my wife from the top, "you don't think the kitchen chimney's on fire, do you, Mr. Jones?" and she added, in a tell-tale manner, "and didn't I tell Mary to have it swept a week ago; and now the fire-engines will be coming here, even if we are not burnt out of house and home."

Was it possible that this woman could have deceived me, as Peabody had said; and was talk so simply of her children, and of house and home? By the time Anna Maria had got down to the drawing-room I had begun to feel ashamed of myself. When the mother of eight reached my sitting-room door, with her honest face aglow with indignation, and her voice raised to shout the soot, I did not dare to mention what I had in my mind.

"I called you down, dear, to say that I was going to give myself a holiday to-day, and to ask you to come with me to Hampstead Heath, and dine at Jack Straw's Castle to the Marseillaise, it being such a beautiful day."

At my wife's face for an instant over her features, and then, as if recollecting herself, she began to stammer that she was very, very sorry, but really she had so much to do about the house just then; if I would only wait till Friday week, which was my birthday, then we would go somewhere, and she should enjoy it above all measure. This afternoon, however, the thing was impossible.

"Well," said I, gravely, "we have not many holidays together, and I am sorry. You had a sore throat on Monday and on Thursday, when I offered you a similar opportunity."

"Oh yes," answered she, shaking her little head, which is very pretty—could it be too pretty?—and shrugging her shoulders: "it was quite impossible that I could go out with that throat."

"Here," thought I, for the moment, "we have gone out without her throat, "is some throat falsehood; but Peabody may have told it, and not she. Perhaps she never went out at all. Should I rather believe the wife of my friend or than that scandalous old retired indigo-merchant? Was it not base even to suspect Anna Maria of deception?" And I said: "I have: but yet I think I would just sasisfy myself with my own eyes."

"Very well," observed I, quietly: "since you can not come with me to-day, I shall go to No. 7 City, as usual. I don't care for a holiday by myself."

"Poor, dear fellow," said Anna Maria, coaxingly, as she helped me on with my great-coat, "I am quite grieved to disappoint you. Good-by, John. And you have a good luncheon; it's very bad for you eating those buns and rubbish."

"Ah, what a tangled web we weave when somebody," when I was practice to deceive," though after but a little trying, there's nothing easier than lying. I pretend I felt like a letter-box in my pocket, and dodged and lurked about our Crescent, watching in the distance my own door, to see whether Mr. R——would come out as usual at the accustomed hour. I suppose I have none of the attributes necessary to the profession of a detective: for whenever my sharp-set eye met that of any of myself blushing all over, and hanging my head on one side, as a dog hangs his tail. I darted round, and round, in the Crescent, but loitered at the corner of a street which commanded it, now trying to dip up the tops of the coal-cellars by measuring the needle of my umbrella in the cellular holes, and now eliciting mournful music by dragging it against the area railings. Exhausted with these exercises, I had been leaning against a lamp-post for about ten minutes, when the door of a house opposite opened suddenly, and a tradesman of neat prepossessing appearance out upon me, with her cap-strings streaming in the wind.

"Now just go away, my gentleman," said she, in a menacing voice, "before the police makes you. I know who you're a-looking for, and I can tell you she ain't a-coming. So you've got her locked up in the cool-cellar. I know you, although you have not got your red face to-day; and I tell you if you get another slice of meat in my house, I'll prosecute you as sure as my name's Mivins."

"Grocer! Heavens, Madam!" cried I, "do you take me for a common soldier?"

"No, Sir," answered she, meekly; "but for a tipsy-looking, dirty Life Guardsman, who never saw a shoe fired in his life; and if ever you come after my Jemima again——"

I turned and fled into the very arms of the abominable Peabody. "Make haste!" exclaimed he; "there is not a moment to be lost. No; the cab is coming this way; you may see for yourself whether I am not right this time."

And sure enough, who should drive by, at a rapid rate, but Anna Maria, in a four-wheeled cab, and without her bonnet, and with a flower in her hair! This blow, coming so close upon the attack of the widow lady, was almost more than I could bear. "Where can she be going to?" gasped I, half unconsciously, "in the most extraordinary thing I ever heard of."

"I have heard of similar things," returned Peabody, dodging, "although I never experienced any thing of the sort myself. Of course, I don't know where she is going to; but the direction she has taken is toward St. John's Wood."

I hastened back to my own house, and with the air of a man who has forgotten something, began to search in the pockets of a great-coat hanging up in the hall. "By-the-by," said I, as the servant who had let me in was disappearing, "I think my master mentioned that he'd be after all. Just run up, and tell her I want to see her for a minute."

Emily Jane, who has been in our service ever since we were married, turned as scarlet as her cap-ribbons. "Sir," said she, looking confused, "missis has just stepped out: she has taken two of the little girls for a morning walk."

"Which girls?" inquired I, looking this abandoned young person full in the face. Her subtle spirit was cowed by this course of procedure; she replied that she did not know; she didn't recollect—she hadn't paid particular attention, but she rather thought that it was the two youngest—all in a breath.

"In that case," rejoined I, pointing with withering scorn to the perambulator, "how comes this here?" No, Emily Jane; your mistress must have taken out with her to-day the same two children that she took on Monday and on Thursday, when her sore throat was so bad that she could not go out with me."

"Yes, Sir," replied she; "it was the same two."

"Emily Jane," said I, solemnly, "I always tets the truth. I know all. Where is your mistress gone to at this present? Is she with her hair recently arranged, and a flower stuck in the left-hand side of her head? and that after telling me she was too busy to move out. Conceal ment is worse than useless. Where is she?"

"Well, horses shouldn't do it," returned the domestic, resolutely. "I told her I would keep it dark, and I won't betray no confidence as has been reposed in me. You must find it out all of your own head, Sir. Oh dear, oh dear!"

Here, to my confusion, Emily Jane cast her apron, by a sudden and dextrous movement, over her features, and with a convulsive sob came rushed down the kitchen-stairs like a bull stung by bees.

At that moment the front-door bell rang with a violence such as none of our visitors, except the captain, ever dare to use. My wretched heart seemed to experience a little throb of joy. He at least, then—and I confess my suspicions had been turned in his direction, for was it not his privilege to come at all unusual hours, and to destroy our domestic peace—he at least, I say, unless there was more than one—I started from the kitchen-stairs, and met Peabody coming down the house with Dinah——

I didn't like his impudence, and I didn't like his song, but there was nothing for it but to submit. What could Anna Maria be doing with telegraphs? From Rupert Mervington, No. 7 Cupidon Villas, St. John's Wood. Pray, be punctual this time. I am engaged after twelve. I trust you will do your duty your best, not yoke, as on Monday and Thursday.

"There's somebody in the house with Dinah: there's somebody in the house! I know——" I rushed out with the receipt in my hand, and the boy snatched it, and took to flight, for he saw by my countenance that I disliked this pleasantful message mean? or rather what meaning could it have but one? Rupert Mervington, a man at a steady sounding name, to begin with: the sender, too, was evidently no business-man, or he would not have exceeded the number of five words. "Rupert, a military smack all over (and I didn't like that notion—a military smack!). Mervington was of a different and refined mode. The hashing was good, and so far unlike the captain's; but then people don't write their own telegraphs themselves. No, the whole conduct of the action was necessary, or that I should be suffocated. In a couple of minutes I was at Hanson Street, Baker Street, in a state of mind easier imagined than described; and yet I had often rest descriptions of it in novels which professed to be strictly psychological, and often had seen upon the stage (although principally in farces) the husband racked by jealous pangs.

What had there been to laugh at in that, I wondered now? Why should the tenderest emotion of the human heart be the subject of buffoon— But what a wicked-looking set of houses were these which I was now passing! It struck me that every one of them had a certain look vicious, certainly St. John's Wood possesses a patent for——

"What number, Sir?" shouted my driver, through the little hole in the roof. "This is Cupidon Willas."

"I am about to hear it," groaned I, passing my pocket-handkerchief over my brow. "Don't mind me, my good man" (for his countenance evinced much curiosity at my voice and manner) "I know it is not your fault that I am miserable. Please to pull up at No. 7."

Of all the wicked-looking houses in Cupidon Terrace, No. 6 was, it seemed to me, the wickedest. The round eye which lighted the entrance window winked viciously in the sunlight, and in the garden door was a little grating, as though for the purpose of witnessing executions in small It was not to hear it," groaned I, passing my pocket-handkerchief over my brow. "Don't mind me, my good man" (for his countenance evinced much curiosity at my voice and manner) "I know it is not your fault that I am miserable. Please to pull up at No. 7."

Of all the wicked-looking houses in Cupidon Terrace, No. 6 was, it seemed to me, the wickedest. The round eye which lighted the entrance window winked viciously in the sunlight, and in the garden door was a little grating, as though for the purpose of witnessing executions in small It was not to hear it," groaned I, passing my pocket-handkerchief over my brow. "Don't mind me, my good man" (for his countenance evinced much curiosity at my voice and manner) "I know it is not your fault that I am miserable. Please to pull up at No. 7."

Of all the wicked-looking houses in Cupidon Terrace, No. 6 was, it seemed to me, the wickedest. The round eye which lighted the entrance window winked viciously in the sunlight, and in the garden door was a little grating, as though for the purpose of witnessing executions in small dedicated stand on the question of woman suffrage, and have for their organ object the general welfare of woman. It is rumored that one feature of the society is to give breakfasts to different public men whose influence would be helpful to the cause.

PARTY'S WEEKLY.

A Senator recently sent one of his speeches addressed to Hon. Wendell Phillips, care Rev. H. W. Beecher, Brooklyn." Mr. Beecher sent the MSS. "in the original package," with the addition, "Boston, Massachusetts," on the memorandum. "Mr. Phillips is under my care, but for safety I keep him in Massachusetts. H. W. B."

Another scientific fest is promised at Niagara. A daring fellow designs taking an aerial flight across the chasm on wings, which are now being constructed in Hamilton, Ontario.

Rev. W. H. Murray did not—as some of the newspapers reported—go to Brooklyn—to shout something in the Wilderness when he first met his congregation on his return. On the contrary, taking the "Lamb's passage," what is to not be wrong is well-doing: for he dies season we shall reap, if we faint not," he announced to them in the language of the very first sentence of vigorous Christian activity. Park Street Church was crowded to its utmost: and Mr. Murray never evidence in his appearance that life in the Wilderness had been beneficial to his health.

There is a report that the Rothschilds mean to invest $500,000 in United States Bonds.

A singular scene occurred in Buffalo early one morning not long ago. A drove of ninety Texas cattle, that had just been driven from one of the ferry-boats, became infuriated, and ran in every direction through the streets, goring and trampling every thing that came in their way. One man was tossed by a mad bull into Niagara Street Park, a woman was fatally injured, and several persons severely hurt. Some of the cattle swam across the Niagara River and scattered on the Canada shore. Had the stampede occurred later in the day, when the streets were crowded, the consequences would have been fearful.

The "great fat vaccination" seems to be exciting much alarm in London, especially among the poorer classes. One woman refused to have her child vaccinated, and was sentenced to seven days' imprisonment in consequence. One of her children had died, evidently from the effects of vaccine vesication. In England vaccination is now compulsory. Most physicians, in the and other countries, are firm in their belief, founded on long experience, that vaccination, when properly performed, is an effectual preventive of smallpox. Dr. Wyld, of London, after forty years' service in the National Vaccine Establishment, during which time he vaccinated 45,000 persons, says that none of those who had had small-pox after a small proportion have been revaccinated, which proves to his mind most satisfactorily the defense of the idea that the protective powers of vaccination are diminished or worn out in course of time. One physician of the New York Dispensary, who had vaccinated 40,000 in sixteen years, has stated that none of them had taken small-pox after the revaccination.

Mr. Wyld, who is a "man-millinee," does not think it worth while to cover every dress with trimmings. Recently, on being consulted by a lady in reference to a dress he had just finished, he declared that none should be put on it—that "it was only an 800 frock." The lady's natural idea is good, but some of the superabundant trimmings were omitted from these dresses—to say nothing of expensive ones—before the world would be better taste than is shown now in numerous cases.

According to an English physician of distinction, "Gymnastic exercises have a special tendency to produce insanity: the lacenes and colors and perplexing gymnastic dresses so act upon the eyes and imaginations of excitable persons—young ladies especially—as to destroy or impair the reasoning faculties." Is it not time they were made away with?

A few days after the International boat-race a complimentary banquet was given at the Crystal Palace, by the London Rowing Club, to the Harvard, Brown and Oxford boat-crews. A hundred and twenty invitations were issued, and among the guests were Hon. Thomas Hughes, Edmund Yates, Captain Anderson, and many other notables. Mr. Dickens made a pleasant little speech, in which he paid many compliments to the Harvards.

A nugget of gold weighing 180 pounds, and valued at $60,000, was recently taken from a mine in Downieville, California. This is, within a few pounds, the largest ever found in modern gold-fields. From the Monumental Quartz Mine in Sierra Butten, Sierra County, two men obtained in one day gold valued at $20,000.

A couple of Brooklyn burglars attempted, a short time ago, to transfer a quantity of dry-goods from a certain shop which they were engaged in, to its ecomplice on the sidewalk. One of the burglars, while pulling a piece of cloth through a broken window, dropped and fell through the hatchway. His companion fled, leaving the wretched man to writhe in agony. Subsequently the man's wife, becoming alarmed at his unusual absence, went to the store in search of him, and he was discovered lying in a mangled and helpless condition. He was removed to the City Hospital, where he died in the afternoon of the same day.

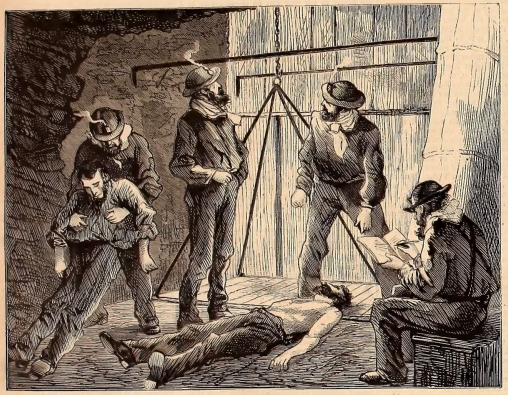
In a biography of the Czar Constantine, which has recently been written by a Russian prince, the following incident is mentioned in connection with the consumption of which he has but sixteen. The Duchess remembered a new, and, in spite of the entreaties of his doctor, insisted on dressing herself. She was in the act of putting on the court-yard of his palace, Dr. Mandt renewed his supplications; begged his Majesty to return to his apartments. The Czar refused. The remained deaf to every warning. "Sire, you are ill; it will be your death!" said, at last, Swine, it is useless you need to commit." At this expostulation Nicholas turned sharply and asked his physician by what right he ventured to constrain his freedom. He held his review, got a chill, and expired after a short illness.

Paris will earn a good name among the lovers of salmon. There are twenty-five salmon fisheries, employing over two hundred men, between the mouth of the Willamette River and Astoria, in that State. Over a million pounds of this favorite fish have been put up in tin cans, and since about two thousand barrels have been packed.

The superintendent of the new post-office lately received unsuccess proposals for the use of the floors surrounding the government property in the Park for advertising purposes. We understand that a firm has obtained the privilege two years for $15,000.

THE AVONDALE COLLIERY DISASTER—STREET VIEW IN AVONDALE, PENNSYLVANIA.

BRINGING OUT EXHAUSTED



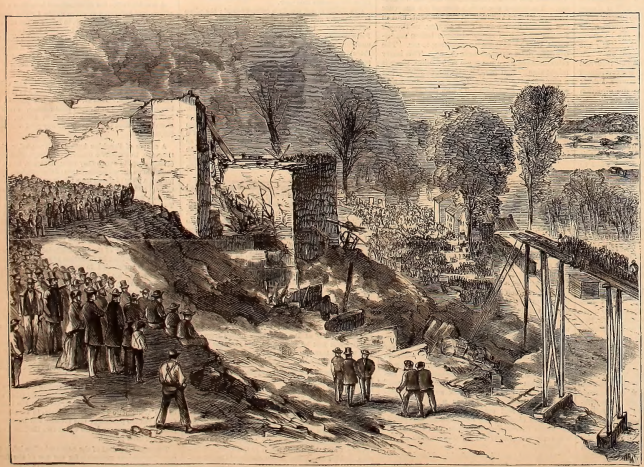
THE AVONDALE COLLIERY DISASTER—BRINGING BODIES OUT OF THE TUNNEL.

THE AVONDALE DISASTER.

THE scene of the terrible disaster which we profusely illustrate in this Number was at the Avondale Colliery at Plymouth, about twenty miles south of Scranton, Pennsylvania. It is situated in the Wyoming Valley, on the steepest and most commanding side of the Shawnee Hills. This colliery was reputed to be the best and largest in the valley. When in full working order it produced 700 tons of coal per day. For three months previous to the first of September it was idle, owing to the miners' strike. It was leased by the Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company, who also lease many other mines in the valley; and by this ingenious plan of leasing in place of opening mines themselves, they avoid the charge of being held responsible for the manner of their construction.

There is no doubt that the Avondale mine was one of the best and worst in the valley. The masonry-work, running down the sides of the shaft some twenty feet, was as strong as stone and cement could make it. The engine-house was firmly built, the machinery of the finest kind used in the colliery business, the breaker that covered the engine-house, and through which the broken coal was dispatched through a long shoot to the railroad track below, was built in the most substantial manner, and altogether the works to the casual observer seemed to leave no room for improvement. The shaft was sunk to a depth of 237 feet, with a space twenty-six feet by twelve, divided in the centre by a wooden partition, on one side of which the pure air descended to the mine, and on the other the impure vapors ascended to the top and were dissipated abroad. After going

THE AVONDALE COLLIERY DISASTER—MINERS



THE AVONDALE COLLIERY DISASTER—RUINS OF THE COAL-BREAKER.

UT EXHAUSTED MINERS.

THE AVONDALE COLLIERY DISASTER—CLEANSING THE FACES OF THE MINERS PREPARATORY TO THEIR SEPULTURE.

Y DISASTER—MINERS DESCENDING THE SHAFT.

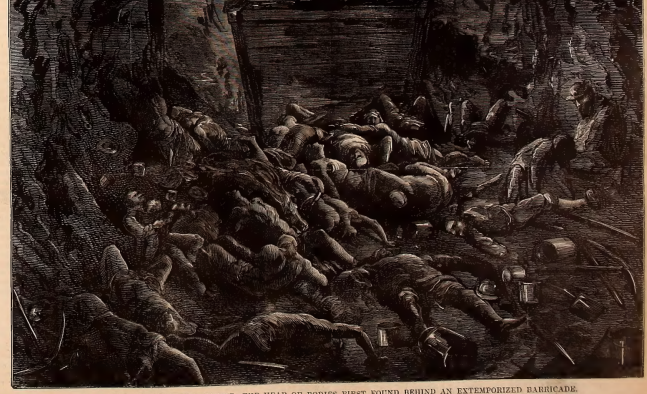
in a sheer descent to the bottom of this shaft the explorer of the mine found on either hand two long galleries, or avenues, one branching east 1200 feet, and the other west 800 feet. Moving straight onward at right angles to the shafts, and at a distance from it of 220 feet, the furnace for creating a draught of air through the galleries and chambers of the mine might be found blazing away in dangerous proximity to the wood-work lining of the passage-way reserved for the admission of the fresh air currents.

On the morning of September 6 a fire broke out, originating, as it appears, from this furnace. A spark ignited the dry scantling adjacent; the flames leaped forward to the bottom of the shaft, caught the wooden partition above-mentioned, climbed to the top, and involved the coal-breaker and the surrounding buildings in the conflagration. Whatever fresh air there was in the mine went to feed the fierce flame, while the sulphurous gases, having no longer an outlet, were forced back into the chambers and galleries of the colliery. As the buildings at the top of the shaft were consumed their ruins fell down and obstructed the only means of entrance to or of egress from the mine.

But what had become of the miners, of whom, by the first report, there were two hundred or more at work in the mine? This was the absorbing question of the hour. Their families were congregated about the opening in great numbers; and the miners from all parts of the region rapidly arrived to rescue their comrades, if possible.

About 6 o'clock P.M. a dog and lamp were sent down to test the air. The dog was found to be alive when drawn up, and the lamp had not been extinguished.

THE AVONDALE COLLIERY DISASTER—REVIVING MINERS AFTER THEIR EXPLORATIONS.



THE AVONDALE COLLIERY DISASTER—THE HEAP OF BODIES FIRST FOUND BEHIND AN EXTEMPORIZED BARRICADE.

Soon afterward a man went down, and after seven minutes returned and reported no difficulty in breathing, but said there were obstructions half-way down the shaft which he could not pass. The obstructions were removed so as to reach the bottom of the shaft by 7.15 P.M. The two men who had engaged in this work also penetrated a gangway about sixty or seventy yards, finding three dead mules, and reaching a barricade which the miners, expecting to carry it, had extemporized to shut out the noxious gases.

The next two men who descended—THOMAS W. WILLIAMS and DAVID JONES—were sufficiently rested to death. Except to recover the bodies of three men there was no further attempts were made to descend the mine until fresh air was forced down into the mine by means of a fan driven by a steam engine. These preparations were not completed until 9 A.M. on the 7th. In the mean time a body of forty-six experienced miners was organized as a volunteer force to descend the shaft and make explorations. Several parties descended between 10 A.M. and 1.30 P.M., but they returned so completely exhausted that it was not considered safe to make any further descent until the gangway was cleared of gas. Still four or five descents were made before midnight, but without effect.

Before 6 A.M. on the 8th two of the dead were found in the stable of the mine. At half past 6 o'clock A.M. a large number of miners were found dead on the east side of the shaft. The next party which descended reported that they went up the plane, just beyond which a barrier was met, consisting of a car packed with timber and coal "culm" and clothing. This was cleared away, and a little further on a similar barrier was found. One man was found on the outside of the barricade. Upon the removal of this second barrier eight dead miners were received. These were found in all conceivable attitudes. Fathers had died embracing their children, and comrades lay in one another's arms. At 9 A.M. HUGHES, the Superintendent, was found sitting down with his head resting upon his knees. The work of exploration continued all day, and by 9.30 P.M. seventy-two bodies had been brought up. As the bodies were brought to the top of the shaft the faces were cleansed, and they were thus prepared for the recognition of their friends.

By noon on the 9th one hundred and eight bodies had been exhumed, after which none were found—so that the first reports as to the number of victims must have been greatly exaggerated.

It is impossible to censure too severely the culpable carelessness of a mining company who, rather than provide, at the expense of a few thousand dollars, a second shaft for the safety of their workmen, preferred to risk this terrible loss of life. It is to be hoped that such a warning will not be lost upon other companies who have been equally negligent. We are glad that measures have been promptly taken to provide relief for the families which have been made destitute by this sudden calamity. It is a charity which appeals to all.

Our illustrations on the two preceding pages and on our first page are from sketches made by our artist, MR. THEO. R. DAVIS, at the scene of the disaster.

VERONICA.

by the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

XV. The Books.—Book X.

CHAPTER VIII.

CONVALESCENT.

"PAUL!" cried a harsh, querulous voice from behind the curtains of the bed in the guest-chamber of the shipley vicarage. "Paul! Where the devil—"

Then followed a string of oaths in English, French, and Italian; not pretty pet-names or epithetes, such as occasionally attributed in the pages of fashionable novels to irresistible young guardsmen and such-like curled darlings of the world. There was no odor of rose-water about these oaths. They were vile, fierce, blasphemous phrases, borrowed from the vocabulary of the lieutenant and degraded.

Sir John Gale was the speaker. Sir John Gale was not handsome, and angry. When that was the case, Sir John Gale was apt to express himself in the strongest, coarsest, most ferocious language in which his tongue was accustomed.

Presently the door opened, and Paul came into the room. Paul Poeli was a Piedmontese. He was a short, thick, ugly, shock-headed man, with grave light-colored eyes, set under overhanging brows. He had a scanty crop of grizzled hair, and a broad forehead, and his face was clean shaven.

He had been a courier, and in this capacity had attracted the attention, and won the favorable opinion, of Sir John Gale. The latter had elevated Paul to the post of confidential and personal attendant on himself. A "confidential" attendant might seem at first sight to be of small value to Sir John, considering that he never could possibly made a confidence to any human being. But there are involuntary confidences which we all make daily and hourly respecting ourselves. The recipient of these in Sir John's case needed to be staunch, patient, and discreet. Paul was all three.

He entered the chamber, bearing in his hand a tray covered with a napkin, on which was placed a small basin of soup.

He entered the chamber, bearing in his hand a tray covered with a napkin, on which was placed a small basin of soup.

He entered the chamber, bearing in his hand a tray covered with a napkin, on which was placed a small basin of soup.

Soon afterward a man went down, and after seven minutes returned and reported no difficulty in breathing, but said there were obstructions half-way down the shaft which he could not pass. The obstructions were removed so as to reach the bottom of the shaft by 7.15 P.M. The two men who had engaged in this work also penetrated a gangway about sixty or seventy yards, finding three dead mules, and reaching a barricade which the miners, expecting to carry it, had extemporized to shut out the noxious gases.

The next two men who descended—THOMAS W. WILLIAMS and DAVID JONES—were sufficiently rested to death. Except to recover the bodies of three men there was no further attempts were made to descend the mine until fresh air was forced down into the mine by means of a fan driven by a steam engine. These preparations were not completed until 9 A.M. on the 7th. In the mean time a body of forty-six experienced miners was organized as a volunteer force to descend the shaft and make explorations. Several parties descended between 10 A.M. and 1.30 P.M., but they returned so completely exhausted that it was not considered safe to make any further descent until the gangway was cleared of gas. Still four or five descents were made before midnight, but without effect.

Before 6 A.M. on the 8th two of the dead were found in the stable of the mine. At half past 6 o'clock A.M. a large number of miners were found dead on the east side of the shaft. The next party which descended reported that they went up the plane, just beyond which a barrier was met, consisting of a car packed with timber and coal "culm" and clothing. This was cleared away, and a little further on a similar barrier was found. One man was found outside of the barricade. Upon the removal of this second barrier eight dead miners were received. These were found in all conceivable attitudes. Fathers had died embracing their children, and comrades lay in one another's arms. At 9 A.M. HUGHES, the Superintendent, was found sitting down with his head resting upon his knees. The work of exploration continued all day, and by 9.30 P.M. seventy-two bodies had been brought up. As the bodies were brought to the top of the shaft the faces were cleansed, and they were thus prepared for the recognition of their friends.

By noon on the 9th one hundred and eight bodies had been exhumed, after which none were found—so that the first reports as to the number of victims must have been greatly exaggerated.

It is impossible to censure too severely the culpable carelessness of a mining company who, rather than provide, at the expense of a few thousand dollars, a second shaft for the safety of their workmen, preferred to risk this terrible loss of life. It is to be hoped that such a warning will not be lost upon other companies who have been equally negligent. We are glad that measures have been promptly taken to provide relief for the families which have been made destitute by this sudden calamity. It is a charity which appeals to all.

Our illustrations on the two preceding pages and on our first page are from sketches made by our artist, MR. THEO. R. DAVIS, at the scene of the disaster.

VERONICA.

by the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

XV. The Books.—Book X.

CHAPTER VIII.

CONVALESCENT.

"PAUL!" cried a harsh, querulous voice from behind the curtains of the bed in the guest-chamber of the shipley vicarage. "Paul! Where the devil—"

Then followed a string of oaths in English, French, and Italian; not pretty pet-names or epithetes, such as occasionally attributed in the pages of fashionable novels to irresistible young guardsmen and such-like curled darlings of the world. There was no odor of rose-water about these oaths. They were vile, fierce, blasphemous phrases, borrowed from the vocabulary of the lieutenant and degraded.

Sir John Gale was the speaker. Sir John Gale was not handsome, and angry. When that was the case, Sir John Gale was apt to express himself in the strongest, coarsest, most ferocious language in which his tongue was accustomed.

Presently the door opened, and Paul came into the room. Paul Poeli was a Piedmontese. He was a short, thick, ugly, shock-headed man, with grave light-colored eyes, set under overhanging brows. He had a scanty crop of grizzled hair, and a broad forehead, and his face was clean shaven.

He had been a courier, and in this capacity had attracted the attention, and won the favorable opinion, of Sir John Gale. The latter had elevated Paul to the post of confidential and personal attendant on himself. A "confidential" attendant might seem at first sight to be of small value to Sir John, considering that he never could possibly made a confidence to any human being. But there are involuntary confidences which we all make daily and hourly respecting ourselves. The recipient of these in Sir John's case needed to be staunch, patient, and discreet. Paul was all three.

He entered the chamber, bearing in his hand a tray covered with a napkin, on which was placed a small basin of soup previously—stood on the hearth-rug and talked of the weather, and the hunting, and the Colenso controversy, or whatsoever topic was then chiefly arousing the attention of the British public. Mrs. Sheardown, meanwhile, welcomed the girls, and installed them in comfortable arm-chairs, one on either side of her. Nelly Sheardown was about thirty-five years old. She had not been married more than eight years, for she and the captain had been constant to each other through a long engagement; and Tom Sheardown's head was gray before he could declare that the fight with fortune was fought out, and could claim Nelly Cherbrook for his wife. He was twenty years her senior, and there appeared to be even more difference between their ages. For Mrs. Sheardown looked younger now than she had done before her marriage, during the long years of waiting that had sickened the heart with hope deferred, and graven lines in the face.

"I'm for a your guest?" asked Mrs. Sheardown of Veronica.

"Sir John is getting much better: nearly well, thank you. It is such a comfort for papa to be assured that all danger is over. It was a great responsibility, you know, having a total stranger in the house in that state;" thus, Veronica.

"None of his relations came to see him?"

"He has first-rate friends, and has no family ties in England, Mrs. Sheardown."

"Poor old man! It is a lonely position for him."

Veronica gave a rapid glance at her hostess's honest face, and then buried her own among her flowers.

Maud laughed heartily. "Dear Mrs. Sheardown," she said, "do you know I have a notion that Sir John's ideas does not by any means hold upon himself in that light."

"In what light?"

"As a lonely old man."

"Oh! I thought—I didn't know—"

"Lady Alicia Renwick," cried Captain Sheardown's old servant, throwing open the door. And the hostess rose and went to welcome the new arrival.

Lady Alicia Renwick was the daughter of a Scotch peer, and the widow of a gentleman who had made a large fortune in some iron-works. Still further to enrich him Dantesser was a great black district whose horizon glazed at night with a hundred lurid fires. And there the deceased Mr. Renwick had owned unsightly piles of brick structures, like pyramids with the angles rounded off, and with smoke and flame issuing from their summits. Lady Alicia did not inherit all the gold that was melted out of the iron ore in these grimy crucibles. Mr. Renwick had a numerous family by a former wife, who had provided for them all, handsomely. But his relict enjoyed an income which would have appeared princely to her maiden eyes, and which she now characterized as "genteel starvation." For there is nothing we become more easily accustomed to than the possession of wealth; and a genuine love of money is one of the few passions that age, with its hollow voice crying "All is vanity!" has no power to weaken.

Lady Alicia was a tall, handsome, stiff old lady, who took a gloomy view of life. She had had a good deal of wit of a dry, bitter, biting flavor.

Her ladyship's entrance into the room was closely followed by that of a gentleman. Captain Sheardown, after having greeted Lady Alicia, called to him.

"Come here, Hugh. I want to introduce you to the vicar of Shipley. Mr. Levincourt, this is my young friend Hugh Lockwood. You may have heard me speak of his father."

"Who is the gentleman?" asked Lady Alicia, half aside, of Mrs. Sheardown, and looking about her from a dark and cosy nook, with a not unfavorable glance.

"Mr. Hugh Lockwood, Lady Alicia. You may remember, perhaps, that his father was a great protégé of the old Admiral many, many years ago, that is, before I ever saw my husband."

"Oh, ay, to be sure! I recollect it all very well now. Robert Lockwood was a Yorkshireman born and bred. He came of humble folks, small tradespeople in Shipley Magna, but he had an aspiring soul, and he got it into his head that he was born to be a great painter. Admiral Sheardown had a taste for the arts, and helped the lad to a good education. And what has he done? Not bad-looking!"

Mrs. Sheardown explained in a few words that Hugh's father had done credit to his patron's discrimination, and had attained a good position among British artists. Robert Lockwood had died some years ago. His son was articles pupil to an architect in London; and having had occasion to run Dantesser on professional business, Captain Sheardown had invited the young man to stay for a few days at Lowater House.

Presently Lady Alicia, Begbie, rector of Hamwick, with his wife and daughter, and Miss Boyce, a lady who was staying at the rectory on a visit, and these completed the number of invited guests.

Betsy Boyce, as her friends and acquaintances called her, was a simpering, blonde old lady, who prided herself on her thorough knowledge of "society." She lived in London when she did not happen to be staying at some country house. But her residence in the metropolis was never protracted; and her address when there was not revealed to many persons. She called cousins with half the names in the Peerage; and indeed Miss Boyce found a phrase or two out of that repertoire volume act as an "open sesame" to many a comfortable home where bed and board were at her service for days, or weeks, or even months. She was herself perfectly good-humored and humble minded; and, despite her eccentricities, she was kind and esteemed by those among whom knew her best. But she had taken up the Peerage as a kind of profession, just as some reverend Mussulman divine adopts the Koran. She lived by its aid very comfortably; whereas Miss Elizabeth Sophia Augusta Boyce, with very few pounds per annum to call her own, and without any aristocratic connections, would have found it a rather hard task to make both ends meet. "Besides, my dear," she would say, confidentially, to some intimate friend, "I don't really bump my body. Papa and mamma were thoroughly well connected. It never did them any good that I know of; but it may be to a great mercy for me. If it were not for my family and my knowledge of who's who, I might nope by myself in a dingy lodging from January to December. And for me, who am the most sociable creature living, and who detest solitude, it is really and truly a blessing and a mercy, under the circumstances, that there are persons who care very much for that kind of thing."

Miss Boyce, then, was not unduly proud of her descent, but she had a pet vanity, founded—as are not most of our vanities?—on a much less real and solid basis of fact; she had somehow lost her reckoning of time, thought herself still an attractive-looking woman, and devoutly believed that nature had provided her with her wig.

Captain Sheardown gallantly led out Lady Alicia Renwick to dinner, and the rest followed at due order.

To old Mr. Snowe, the banker, was allotted the honor of conducting Miss Boyce. Mr. Snowe was a stout, well-fed, well-to-do man. His manner was pompous, and the habitual expression of his heavy face seemed to say, with an air of puzzled surprise, "Am I not very well?" It did not know myself to be so very important a personage, I should suspect you to be laughing at me."

During the early part of the dinner Mr. Snowe was too busily engrossed in eating and drinking to pay much attention to his companion; but when the later stages of the repast arrived he found himself more disposed for talking. The lavish coils of false hair, flowing curls, and colossal chignon. He became a prey to a species of fascination that obliged him to watch those delicate artificial flowers which crowned the lady's head-gear, and which nodded, shook, and trembled, without ceasing, in a most lymph accompaniment to their wearer's vivacious flow of talk.

The dinner-party passed pleasantly under the genial influences of Sir John Delancey's wine. Dr. Begbie rose and, in an effective speech, rolled out in his richest tones, proposed the health of his absent friend, Captain Sheardown, and wished them many happy returns of that auspicious day, the general enthusiasm was quite equal to the task. Nelly declared the servant to fill her glass a bumper, and grasped her host's hand with her bony fingers as she stood off the Hamwick party.

Mrs. Begbie shed tears. But that may have been from habit: for Mrs. Begbie always made a point of crying at the rector's sermons. And perhaps his manly voice, alone, had power to affect her. As compensation, however, that captain Sheardown had no children, Mrs. Begbie was perfectly dry-eyed.

When the ladies left the table—by which time Mr. Snowe was openly and undisguisedly contemplating Miss Boyce's luxuriant locks with a fixed and vacant glare—and returned to the drawing-room, they resumed a theme which had been discussed at the dinner-table, and on which Lady Alicia and Betsy Boyce were the chief talkers.

"Gale? Gale?" said Miss Boyce, meditatively. "No, don't remember the name. Know if know. Sir John Gale! Never heard of him."

"How very strange!" murmured Mrs. Begbie.

"But don't you remember the name, perhaps, of whom Miss Boyce never heard?" said Lady Alicia. She spoke with a strong Scotch accent, rolling her r's very much, and pronounced "never heard" "nevvert harrd."

"Millions!" exclaimed Miss Boyce, absolutely speaking in the full flow of her voice. "Oh, millions! Your ladyship's married name, for instance, was quite unfamiliar to me, although I suppose you're—what is, I beg, often heard mamma speak of your father, Lord Strathgorm."

Lady Alicia smiled grimly.

"Well," said she, "my dear Miss Boyce, ye might very well remember poor papa yourself, for he only died a few years before mysel' thirty."

"Goodness!" exclaimed Miss Begbie, clasping her hands. "Suppose Sir John Gale's title is not to be an inheritor? A highwayman, or something. No: I don't mean a highwayman; I beg your pardon for the mistake, but I mean a swindler, or something; don't you know? Goodness!"

"Nonsense, Jenny!" said Miss Begbie's mamma. Veronica's face looked unutterable scorn, but she said nothing. The hostess asked Miss Begbie to sing, and for them, and that young lady complied, not unwillingly. She drew very good music out of the grand piano. Her mother was a accent. Lady Alicia's accent was a softened face. Betsy Boyce's quivered again as she nodded her head time to a tune of Chopin's. And the second coming of gentlemen entered in a body. Captain Sheardown took a seat beside Miss Boyce, and made her a few gallant speeches.

"Go along, you false creature!" cried Miss Betsy, smiling and tossing her head. "Men were deceivers ever. One foot on sea, and one on shore. Exactly! And you sailor animals are the most faithless of all. But I always loved the blue jackets from a girl, from a mere child! I recollect a most charming creature with whom I was full acquainted when I was a boy, an admiral of the Red, and had only one leg, and a frightful scar on his face where a cutlass had gashed one of his eyes open. He was a very seventy-four, and I adored him. It was in Ireland, at Delaney Park, in the year after—in short, I was a mere baby, not fifteen!"

"At Delaney Park? Really! That was your grandpapa's place, Maud, was it not?" asked Mrs. Sheardown.

"Possible! Are you of the Delaneys of Delaney, Mrs. Sheardown? Ah, I remember the youngest girl married Sidney Desmond. To be sure! the eldest, Hilda, made a great marriage at the end of the season. Your girl? I'm, I'm, I'm, I'm! What is she doing, poor Lady Tallis? And where is she? No one hears or sees any thing of her now."

"We do not hear very often from my Aunt Hilda," said Maud, gravely. "Do you want me to accompany that song, Mr. Sheridan's for you, Mr. Snowe?"

Maud walked away to the piano, and Betsy Boyce poured into the greedy ears of Mr. Begbie and the old banker a recital of Lady Tallis's troubles.

"It was considered a great match, the match of the year (excepting, of course, the young Earl of Mimsey, who was, you know, the richest minor in England, and married Lady Ermengarde Ermine, the day after he came of age); and, I remember, poor old Sir William Delaney was so delighted."

Mrs. Begbie, who was transported with delight at hearing the name of a visitor so fluent and familiar with these noble names, shook her head gently, and said that that was what came of worldliness. She was strange it was that parents should seek heartless grandeur for their children! For her part, she fervently trusted that Jenny would have the better part, and look for sound principles in her husband, preferring them to wealth or rank. Though, on the score of wealth, Jenny were influenced by such mundane attractions), there were few families in whose alliance she might not aspire, her grandfather having been a Gaffer—and it was unnecessary to say that the Gaffers were among the oldest gens—Scots families extant—and her paternal great-grandmamma a De Wynkyn.

"How was it, then?" asked Mr. Snowe, senior, in his pompous, deliberate tone. "Do I follow you? Was Lady Tallis's marriage an inauspicious one, Miss Boyce?"

"Mercy on us!" cried Betsy Boyce. "Inauspicious! Her husband is one of the most dreadful persons! Sir Hilda Delaney was a pretty, good-natured fool when he married her. It was like the wolf and the lamb; he gobbled her up in no time—never finished her!"

"Law!" exclaimed Miss Emmy.

Mr. Snowe cast a rolling and rather bewildered glance at his daughter, "that," said he, impressively, "is shocking, indeed."

"But how do you mean, Miss Boyce?" said Emmy, who had been quite a little literary, and was excessively inquisitive. "Of course I know that Lady Tallis was not really gobbled up—he, he, he! only a figure of speech, you know—but what did her husband do?"

Herbert Snowe's sons, and at this moment, and the conversation at the other end of the room came to an abrupt close.

Before, she woke up Mrs. Sheardown came and sat by the vicar of Shipley, and told him, smilingly, that she had a petition to prefer to him. She wanted him to allow Maud to remain at Lowater for a few days. The captain and she would bring Maud in to Shipley when they came to church on Sunday; meanwhile they would send to the vicarage for any thing she might need. In short, they had set their hearts on it, and Mr. Levincourt must not refuse.

"I suspect you are not often accustomed to have your requests refused, Mrs. Sheardown," said the vicar, gallantly. "If Maud be willing—as, no doubt, she is—I consent with pleasure to her remaining."

Presently, Maud made her way quietly across the room to Veronica. The latter was seated on a small ottoman, which was made to hold only two persons, and was so contrived that one of its occupants must turn his back on the company in the room, and face the other. And there Veronica was leaning back against the crimson cushion. The dark rich back-ground enhanced the purity of her white dress and fell prettily into of her shoulders. Familiar as her beauty was to her friends, it never failed to strike a fresh admiration on the picture presented by the vicar's daughter. Veronica was radiant with gratified pride when any admiration of her being admired. It heightened the bloom on her cheek, and made her eyes bright with a liquid lustre.

As Maud approached, a gentleman, who had been occupying the other seat on the ottoman, rose to yield her his place.

"Do not let me disturb you," said Maud. "I merely wished to say a word to Miss Levincourt."

The young man bowed, and walked a few paces apart.

Maud told her friend of Mrs. Sheardown's invitation.

At a strong hint please over Veronica's face. For it seemed like a flash of satisfaction; but then came an expression of regret; almost, one would have said, of a momentary alarm. "Shall you stay, Maud?" said she, taking the other girl's hand in both her own.

"Uncle Charles has said that I may, and—But I will not stay, dear, if you think it selfish, or if you fancy you will miss me."

"Of course I shall miss you, Maudie."

"Then I won't stay. I will tell Mrs. Sheardown so."

At this moment Emma Begbie came up to them, giggling after her manner, which was half spiteful, wholly silly.

"Miss Boyce calls Levincourt!" she exclaimed, bending over the ottoman, "and declares that you have been having with that young Lockwood! What is he like to talk to?"

"Very much like a gentleman," answered Veronica, with cold hauteur.

"Oh, a gentleman! But he isn't really one, you know. Lady Alicia knows all about his father. He was quite a common person. But isn't he handsome, this young man? You must mind what you are about if you stay in the same house with him, Miss Desmond. For I am sure Miss Levincourt would never forgive you if you were to make yourself too agreeable to him. She evidently looks upon him as her conquest. Don't you, Miss Levincourt? He, he, he!"

Veronica looked after her scornfully as she went away. "What an ill-bred idiot that girl is!" she said. Then, after a moment, she added, "Of course I shall miss you, Maudie. But you must stay. You will not go away very long?"

"Only till Sunday. Was that gentleman who was talking to you Mr. Lockwood? I had not been introduced to him."

"Yes. Good-night, Maudie. The fly is come, I suppose, for I see papa telegraphing across the room. Good-by."

Veronica threw herself back in a corner of the fly, wrapped in her warm shawl and hood, and remained silent. The vicar fell asleep. In about ten minutes their vehicle drew aside to allow another carriage to pass. It was the well-appointed equipage of the rector of Hamwick. The horses dashed along swiftly, their silver-mounted harness—if it were not fancy—flashing.

Veronica drew still further back into her corner and closed her eyes. But she did not sleep. Her brain was busy with the sifting of the crazy old fly from the Crown Inn at Shipley Magna kept up a sort of rhythmic accompaniment to the noise of strange forebodings, and plans that whirled through her mind.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"Every thing has its use," said a philosophical professor to his class. "Can any one tell me what's the use of a red nose?" asked one of the pupils. "It's a sign," said Mr. Jones, "that the gentleman has won all of the little water that passes underneath it, and reminds us of the shoals of appetite, on which we might otherwise be wrecked."

At a fashionable church, where pews are eagerly snapped up at about a thousand dollars each, and very pain and his newly-married wife recently attended public worship for the first two or three times, and were so well pleased with the preacher that they resolved to attend regularly.

Accordingly, as they passed out one Sunday, the gentleman, pointing to the sexton asked, "Any seats, sir, this morning?"

"See here, I think, on the whole, I'll come here to church. Now, I want to hire two seats—good seats, mind you, and I don't mind how dear, only let me see all that you have to let."

"Yes, sir. Do you understand you?" inquired the sexton.

"Yes: I don't mind paying four or five dollars extra for two choice broad aisle seats," replied the upstart.

"Young man," said the somewhat practical coffin-maker, "we have no seats to let; we do not do a retail business at this house."

A Game often Heard of, but Never Played.—Cricket on the hearth."

A DOMESTIC SONG.

From river mud to dinner ye, as vile is it makes my soul to grieve, and after all both take French leave? Ah, Bridget! Why roam up next into a maid, who breaks my nicest china bowl, and says she "didn't see the boy do it?" Ah, Biddy, Why pollutes the kitchen floor, and in half an hour or more has it precisely as before? Ah, Biddy, Why, when I wander fondly and base, who confiscates, under the rose, and wears by stealth my clothes? Ah, Biddy! Biddy, Why, when she comes and goes whenever she chooses, injures whatever they she sees, and then declines to work refuses? Ah, Biddy! Who slams, and bangs, and breaks, and smashes, with hammer, and rends, and knocks, and dashes, who lips, and spills, and slops, and splashes? My Biddy, Why, in fact, is to be found in all houses each such as thee? My way is dark—I can not see. For Biddy, I can only say Biddy, I only wish thou were dead, I only wish that I were free. From Biddy.

We have often heard of ships running into one another, but the other day we actually saw a house fly.

SINGLE BLESSEDNESS.

Let no temptation to a single life
Lead to a union with a worthless mate;
Although 'tis true that single life may be a fool
Would make old maids the butt of ridicule.
A single life though dreadful is at times,
Is much more happy than an ill-matched wife.

Some one was talking the other day of the inconveniences which the Slimsee Twins must suffer in their journeyings through life, and how they must ever be severed, when Robinson exclaimed, struck by a happy thought, "What a good time it is for their sisters brothers! Just imagine what they would suffer if they were obliged to walk out!"

"Do you," said Fanny Toher day,
To me upon the lawn,
Of late those tender words applied
Alike to fifty girls besides?"
"Dear one! girl" cried I, "forbear!
For by those eyes—those lips—I swear—"
She stopped me as she ran away,
And cried, "You're sworn, now kiss the book!"

A wit being told that an old acquaintance was married, exclaimed, "I am glad to hear it. The prescription is moment, he added, in a tone of compassion and sympathy, "And I don't know why I should be; he never did me any harm."

REPARTEE.

"The best man you ever had," he said,
"Would make a four-quart skillet."
"Your kindness," she replied,
"Is more than big enough to fill it."

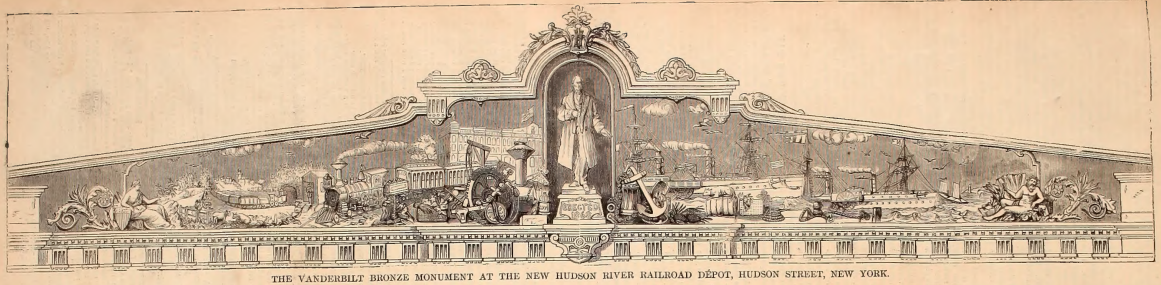
A Strong Difference.—"This medicine," said Dr. Sharp, "will cure you in three days." "Will it?" said Dr. Flat, "I will produce the change desired."

"What!" exclaimed Dr. Thunder-attack patient, "you don't say so, doctor?"

"It's a fact, Sir," said the doctor; "the science of medicine has now reached—"

"Well," said the patient, interrupting him, "it is wonderful! If you'd said postage-stamps, doctor, I should not have been surprised, but the desired change, doctor, it seems impossible."

A little girl, whose father had forgotten, at a distance, to bring her a present, on finding that he was in his dog, exclaimed, "Papa, I've a hungry dog!"



THE VANDERBILT BRONZE MONUMENT AT THE NEW HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD DÉPOT, HUDSON STREET, NEW YORK.

THE VANDERBILT MONUMENT.

EARLY in October is to be unveiled the colossal bronze statue of Commodore VANDERBILT with its allegorical accessories, of which we give an illustration on this page. This monument is erected on the summit of the western wall of the new Hudson River Railroad Dépôt, situated on the former site of St. John's Park, at the corner of Laight and Hudson streets. This work was conceived by Captain ALBERT DEGROOT, a gentleman well known as prominently connected with the steamboat history of the Hudson River, and also as the commander of the Niagara, Reindeer, and other river steamers. As soon as Captain DEGROOT had completed his designs he laid them before a committee of leading citizens of New York, fully explaining his plan and ideas, and meeting with the full and cordial approbation, as well as the prompt financial aid, of those whose indorsement he solicited.

Captain DEGROOT at once secured the services of ERNEST PLASSMAN, one of the most skillful artists in the country; and a large sum of money was expended in building a foundry for the purpose of making the required castings, two experienced metal casters, GEORGE and VALENTINE FISCHER, having been engaged to superintend this part of the work. As first planned the design was only thirty feet in length, but new visions continued to dawn on the mind of Captain DEGROOT, until at last his grand conception had unfolded to more than five times its original size; and finally, after ten months of faithful labor, the models were all completed. As giving an idea of the labor involved, every piece of this immense work was first done in clay, then in plaster, and finally in bronze.

The monument is an epitome of the life of CORNELIUS VANDERBILT, both as Commodore and as the great Railway King. It is a well-deserved tribute to the genius and enterprise of Mr. VANDERBILT, who is not less noted for his public spirit than for a well-spent life, abounding in works of unostentatious charity.

The work covers an area of 3125 square feet, measures about 150 feet in a straight line, and 31 feet in extreme height: weighs, we believe, nearly 100,000 pounds; and cost, as nearly as can be ascertained, over $500,000. It consists of an immense bronze statue of Commodore VANDERBILT, placed in the centre of a colossal bass-relief, which is contrived not only to illustrate the career and achievements of the Commodore, but also to represent the marvelous inventions of the nineteenth century, and at the same time to portray allegorically the growth and prosperity of the great American Republic.

THE NEW HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD DÉPOT, HUDSON STREET, NEW YORK CITY.—J. B. SNOOK, ARCHITECT; PETER T. O'BRIEN, BUILDER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.]

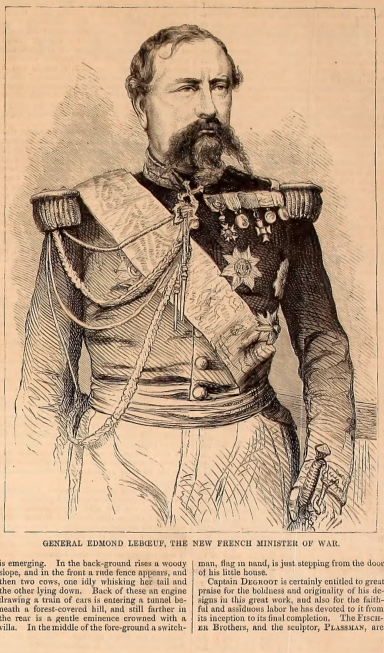
The base line upon which the bass-relief is erected is a narrow tier of blue-stone. In the centre, just beneath this, and solidly inserted in the dépôt wall, is a huge carved block of granite weighing eleven tons. On this rests a bronze pedestal 5 feet square, 14 feet high, and bearing the inscription, "Erected 1868." On the pedestal, within a spacious arched recess, stands the statue. This is 12 feet high, nearly solid, weighs four tons, and is the largest in America, if not in the world. It represents the Commodore with head uncovered and wearing a heavy fur-trimmed over-coat, his left foot slightly advanced, his right hand inserted beneath his vest, and his left extended. The bass-relief is 10 feet high at the ends, and is surrounded by an elegant granite cornice, which slopes gradually upward for about one-third the length from each extremity, turns suddenly up, runs along horizontally, and finally forms an arch in the centre over the statue. The middle portion of the cornice is decorated with ornamental work in bronze. The bass-relief is terminated at each end by massive scroll-work representing leaves and plants.

On the right hand, between the statue and the scroll, is represented the Commodore's marine life, and on the left his railroad life. At the right hand, in the fore-ground, appears, in a reclining position, Neptune, with flowing beard, a wreath of leaves on his head, his right hand grasping a rudder, a sea-monster rising from the water at his feet, and a raccoon peering around the corner of the rocks on which he rests.

In the back-ground at the right arise the forest-crowned Palisades of the Hudson, then a lighthouse is seen, and then appears, rocking on the waves of bronze, the Jred, the little two-masted "periauger," in which, half a century ago, young Mr. VANDERBILT carried passengers from New York to Staten Island at 25 cents a head. Next comes, much greater in size, completely rigged, and under full headway, the famous steamer North Star, in which the Commodore made his well-remembered voyage round the world.

Finally the climax is capped by the huge form of the steamer Vanderbilt, also completely rigged, and plowing along at full speed. In the middle fore-ground a dock appears, on which are coils of rope, bananas, pine-apples, and other tropical fruits, a huge and savage watch-dog crouched on a cotton bale, and lastly, next to the statue, a massive capstan, anchor, and chain. At the extreme left, to match the figure of Neptune on the right, Liberty, guardian of the scene, sits erect with flowing tresses and drapery, her left hand holding a sword, and her right arm resting on the national shield, from behind which an eagle is emerging. In the back-ground rises a woody slope, and in the front a rude fence appears, and then two cows, one idly whisking her tail and the other lying down. Back of these an engine drawing a train of cars is entering a tunnel beneath a forest-covered hill, and still farther in the rear is a gentle eminence crowned with a villa. In the middle of the fore-ground a switchman, flag in hand, is just stepping from the door of his little house.

Captain DEGROOT is certainly entitled to great praise for the boldness and originality of his designs in this great work, and also for the faithful and assiduous labor he has devoted to it from its inception to its final completion. The FISCHER Brothers, and the sculptor, PLASSMAN, are entitled to the best praise for the admirable manner in which they performed their labors, and may be congratulated upon the success that has attended their efforts.



GENERAL EDMOND LEBŒUF, THE NEW FRENCH MINISTER OF WAR.

GENERAL LEBŒUF,
FRENCH MINISTER OF WAR.

By an imperial decree, dated August 21, General LEBŒUF, commanding the Sixth Corps d'Armée, was appointed Minister of War to succeed Marshal NEL, deceased.

General EDMOND LEBŒUF is physically the biggest man in the French army. He was born in 1809, and entered the service through the Polytechnic School, and the Ecole d'Application of Metz, whence he emerged a full-blown Lieutenant of artillery in 1833. His promotion was very rapid. His brilliant conduct at the engagement of the Iron Gates in Algeria attracted the attention of the Orleans Princes, who took a leading part in that engagement, and he obtained his Captaincy in 1837. Like his predecessor, Marshal NEL, he distinguished himself greatly at the siege of Constantina, and was rewarded by the Cross of the Legion of Honor, and a mention in the general orders of the army. In 1840 he got a further step in the Legion of Honor for the skill and sang-froid with which he protected the retreat of a French column which was in danger of being cut off by the Kabyles. Two years later he was made a Colonel. In 1854 he went to the Crimea as head of the artillery staff with the rank of Major-General, and took a prominent part in the battle of the Alma. He was appointed Lieutenant-General in 1857, and two years later the whole of the artillery of the Italian expedition was placed under his supreme command. The French say but for his timely aid in bringing up an overwhelming number of guns to bear on the Austrian right, commanded by BENEDEK, VICTOR EMANUEL'S army at Solferino would have been crushed, and the position of the French army seriously compromised. Since then he has commanded the camp at Chalons, and in 1866 it was he who was dispatched to Venice to receive the province from the Austrian Government. From 1848 to 1850 he was in command of the Polytechnic School, and at that time he was popular with his eleves on account of his liberal views, and his abhorrence of martinetism. His friends state that he is an able and fluent speaker, and a good administrator.

DEATH OF THE LION-TAMER LUCAS, IN PARIS.

THE tragedy which we illustrate on this page took place at the Hippodrome at Paris on the 18th of August.

About four o'clock the great lion-cage, as was the custom every day, was brought into the arena. All four of the lions walked around with such calmness as to inspire no fear. During some days past LUCAS had noticed their agitation; the previous Sunday, on beginning his second representatión, he had said, "Two exhibitions in one day are too much."

THE LION-TAMER LUCAS, IN THE PARIS HIPPODROME, ATTACKED AND FATALLY INJURED BY HIS LIONS.

The lion-tamer entered the cage and commenced his exercises with a few strokes of the whip. The animals awoke and began to growl; then, when LUCAS undertook to make them lie down by the power of his eye alone, a lioness sprang on him and threw him on the ground. The crowd uttered shrieks of terror. LUCAS tried to rise, but the great lion threw himself on his breast and thus rendered it impossible for him to stir. In this position two of the beasts seized their keeper, one by the thigh and the other by the neck, and buried their teeth in his flesh. Then a servant of LUCAS, who had never before been near the animals, entered the cage, and seizing a musket, began beating the terrible enemies with all his might.

"Run away!" cried LUCAS, "leave me to die alone." But the groom redoubled his blows, answering, "I will die with you."

Indeed, the unhappy man would doubtless have been devoured, like his monster, but not one of the animals, a blind lioness, throwing herself furiously into the midst of the sanguinary group and thus separated them.

LUCAS was at last drawn out of the cage, mutilated and covered with blood. His servant followed him, but only received a wound. This brave fellow, whose name is PÉRÉ, is of Spanish extraction. Before belonging to LUCAS, in whose service he has been for about eighteen months, he was attached to the Madrid circus, kept by REVES. M. REVES is now the owner of the four lions of the Hippodrome, which have been previously exhibited at the Cirque and Porte Saint Martin, and which have already caused the death of three men.

After receiving the attentions of a physician, the keeper was carried to the house of his father-in-law. The physicians counted twenty-five wounds, three of which were very severe; one in the throat and right cheek; another in the left arm, in the right arm and a half deep, and presenting a gaping opening as large as a silver dollar; and the third in the thigh, where the teeth of the lioness were in the mouth, hands, breast, and other portions of the body.

The ambulance physician of the servant, PÉRÉ, was unrewarded. The lion-tamer, LUCAS, died August 23, in the most terrible agonies.

FRENCH SENATUS CONSULTUM.

The Paris Journal Officiel publishes the text of the Senatus Consultum, which is promulgated in the name of the Emperor, and is signed by Rouher and countersigned by Duvergier. The following is a synopsis of the document:

ART. 1. The Emperor and the Corps Législatif have the privilege of initiating laws.

ART. 2. Bills which are dependent on the Emperor; they deliberate under his presidency, are responsible, but can only be inspected by the Senate.

ART. 3. The Ministers may be members of either Chamber; they have the access to and right to speak in both.

ART. 4. The sittings of the Senate are open to the public, but on demand of five members the Senate may go into secret session.

ART. 5. The Senate, after pointing out modifications in a bill, may send it back for further consideration to the Corps Législatif. It may in any case oppose the promulgation of a bill, and in such case the bill can not be presented in the Corps Législatif again during the same session.

ART. 6. The Corps Législatif elects its own officers at the opening of each session. The Senate and the Corps Législatif make their own internal regulations.

ART. 7. Every individual member of the Senate and Corps Législatif has the right of interpellations. Votes of confidence or want of confidence (ordre du jour motivé) can be adopted, but they must be referred to the Emperor as a matter of right whenever the Government demands it, and the Bureaux will then appoint a commission to consider the matter, on whose report the Corps will decide whether to accept or reject the vote.

ART. 8. No amendment of a bill can be discussed unless it has been previously sent to the committee which considered the bill, and also communicated to the Government. If the Government and the committee disagree on the amendment, the Council of State will pronounce its opinion; but the final decision rests with the Corps Législatif.

ART. 9. The budgets are presented and voted by chapters and articles.

ART. 10. All modifications in customs or postal tariffs made through treaties with foreign nations will require a law to make them binding.

ART. 11. The relations of the Emperor, Senate, and Corps Législatif are changed only in so far as they are modified by the Senatus Consultum. All foreign intercourse will be settled hereafter by Imperial decree.

ART. 12. Certain articles of the Constitution, inconsistent with the above provisions, are abrogated.

POWERS THAT MAY BE.

THE English are inquiring very anxiously "what are we to do when our coal is all burned out?" and before a century has rolled away this question will be a distressing one for England. Her manufactures depend upon coal. It is possible for her to utilize petroleum instead of coal? A writer of elaborate experiments, authorized by the Government of the United States, recalled in the debate, "That convenience, comfort, health, and safety are against the use of petroleum in steam vessels: and that the only advantage to be shown is a not very important reduction in bulk and weight of fuel carried." One American scientific periodical strongly declares petroleum superior from an economical point of view, and proved that the heat from oil cost double that from coal, the quantity being measured by the heat done in evaporating water: but this estimate was based upon the present relative cost of the two materials. When coal grows dear, the aspect of the comparison will be altered, especially if, as is presumable, oil should become cheaper.

Among the undeveloped sources of heat, of which greater or less reservoirs are contained within or on the earth, natural gas suggests itself to the mind that has been thinking of bituminous coal oil. What are the processes at work in the subterranean laboratories it is not our purpose to question; but it is certain that the result of one or some of them is the generation of combustible gas like that which we are burning in our streets and houses, and squandering with a recklessness fearful to contemplate, if we at all heed economy in the matter of the blessings that Nature has vouchsafed to us. It may be that this gas is distilled by the earth's internal heat from beds of coal or coal oil; and if so, we may look for the vapor where we find the substance. It is, perhaps, more than a century since the Chinese are, and doubtless were centuries before us, great consumers of gas, if not manufacturers of it. Their borers for salt-water often pierce beds of coal, and the inflammable vapor streams out in great jets that reach to a height of twenty or thirty feet. Over these vents of civilized gas-fitters, the salt-makers catch the gas from these fountains, lead it by pipes to their works, and consume it in boiling down and evaporating the water for recovery of its useful constituents. Then, too, the tubes are laid through the streets and into houses and kitchens, and the gas is burned for illuminating purposes. The excess—for more is given off than is wanted—is conducted into the country, and burned for the sake of getting rid of it. We are not told that the Chinese work engines with their vapor fuel, and we should not be surprised to hear that they have been doing so for ages; indeed, we would be astonished if it should turn out that they have been telegraphing since the Deluge, and have photographic portraits of their great-grandfathers.

The American oil regions furnish an abundant supply of ready-made gas, which has sometimes given gas companies cause for apprehension of failing profits. The town of Fredonia, in New York State, is lighted throughout by the evaporizing process from petroleum naphtha, and in many places the natural gas is extensively burned for steam generation. A notable instance is that of the Pennsylvania Rock Oil Co. belonging to Messrs. Jarecki & Co. For more than two years they have drawn their fire and light from petroleum naphtha, and have taken up for its barrenness of fluid by an inexhaustible yield of gas. A three-inch main is constantly charged, and the pressure is so great, that the gas from its source, over a distance of 1200 feet, to the factory. The gas is of good lighting quality, and when it is not wanted for the Company's use during the night, it is led up a high shaft and set alight pro bono publico. What has become of the burning wells since the oil was plugged? Have they given out? or is their gas still escaping? or is it flowing into the coal mines, to the endangerment of the miners? If any property there is still a supply, is it worth collecting? Not now, perhaps: but if it lasts, its time may come.

A proof that coal oil is to be had on now, and ought to be utilized, is that which is derived from the bituminous coal of the waters. This is one, too, that especially concerns us, during the extent of our sea-board and the number of our lakes and rivers. The use of coal-oil lamps in sea-going vessels and fishing villages should not be the seats of manufacture, and the time may come when the light by which they work can not be carried to the sea-coast to be done, there is no reason why the power should not be trapped there, and delivered wherever it is wanted. We know that electric wires are capable of carrying considerable amounts of motive force over long distances. A little battery, no larger than a needle in Edinburgh; a weak current generated by Greenwich Observatory traverses a telegraph line and pulls the trigger of a gun at Newcastle, while another current from the same place runs to Paris and explodes a mine there, but in fall a time signal ball. There does not appear to be any strong reason why the principle here involved might not be applied to the transmission of great powers from places where the force is most easily generated to others where it can be most advantageously applied to mechanical purposes. It may be asked, what a tide mill has to do with a galvanic battery? To which we would reply that the simplest theories of the correlation of forces shows that any one description of force can be converted into any other description. Motion, which is the rise of a water-mill, can be turned into heat, or into electricity, or first into heat and then into electricity, or vice versa. To the practical side of the question, there are other means of transporting power from place to place. One of the most simple of these is by compressed air, a medium not yet half appreciated. There is no question but that a deal of waste is involved in the practice of making locomotive carry with them the means of generating their power, instead of conveying it to them from a station that might be used in some cases, though of course not of universal application. It has been tried, or soon is to be, in London, where a locomotive car is to be driven by bottled-up air, highly compressed. The car station is to be furnished with an engine to pump the air into reservoirs, two of which are to be attached to the car for each journey of ten miles length, and the stored-up force is to be converted into wheel-driving power by a small engine fixed underneath the carriage. May success attend the trial, and induce engineers of more fortune to do the same by steam—the storage of force! This is the one thing needful for turning to useful account more than one powerful element of nature that is at present wasting itself on nothing, or else doing fearful damage. What a grand thing it would be if the hurricane's power could be entrapped and made a slave of! and why should it not be? Look at what the wind has done for Holland, and what it is doing all the world over on small scales: it is power for work, a willing and a powerful servant, wanting only tasks set before it. True, it is intermittent, coming in great force when it is not wanted; but this only shows the necessity for that means of bottling power, to the perfection of which our mechanics ought to be looking.

Electricity is often spoken of as a power that may be. We have alluded to it as a medium for transporting power, but we hesitate to dwell upon it as a source, because no present prospect appears of any means of generating it upon a scale of economy that would enable it to compete with other sources of energy. If we are to consume mechanical force to get electricity, as in the case of even the most recent electrical generators of great power, we might as well use the original force at once. Where metals have to be consumed in order to galvanic currents the cost is high, too high for economical use while other power-producing materials can be procured at cheap rate in proportion to what that is to be got out of them.

Chemistry opens us better hopes. The terrible powers of explosive compounds may one day be tamed down to manageable conditions. A compound-engine of the chemical description we lately heard it proposed, and it is to be presumed that the projector had, in his mind's eye a fine combination of slowly condensing violent explosions so continuous and governable as to yield a motion having some approach to uniformity. The gas engine has of late renewed from time to a machine, and it answers perfectly. Here we have successive explosions of a mixture of gas and air, and a large piston in a cylinder, converted by crank and fly-wheel into a smooth continuous movement, perfectly under control, and capable, we fear, of the dynamite, or nitro-glycerine, or dynamite, or any mildor source of expansive vapors, should prove in the end of more general application, we by means not their energy be employed to compress air, or otherwise charge a force-reservoir that would pay out its store as necessity or circumstances require?

But there may be powers capable of exhaustion; one of these is the power of patience. So let us play our last card, which stands for a source of energy that is to be drawn from us upon us for centuries, but that we have not yet utilized to a tithe of its capabilities. We allude to the power of heat. The theoretical amount of heat that the earth receives from the sun is so enormous as to appear incredible; but setting theory aside for the present, the practical quantity is startling enough, seeing that every hundred square feet of sun-lit earth receives an amount equivalent to the heat produced by the combustion of a single horse. You may doubt the accuracy of such a deduction, from your knowledge of the comparative inefficiency of horse that are exposed to sunshine for hours together. But the fact is that a body subjected to ordinary insolation loses its heat by radiation as fast as it receives it, and almost as fast as it receives it. Prevent the escape of the heat, and then see to what a height the temperature will rise. Last summer, in the tropical 22d of July, a steak and potatoes were thoroughly cooked by the sun on the south side of a Broadway omnibus. The only apparatus employed was a cigar-box blackened inside, and with a lid formed of several plates of glass. The color lasted about an hour to oven, and before it was trapped; there was no ready escape for it, and in twenty minutes from the time of their first exposure both the steak and potatoes were done.

Ericsson's name alone has been cited as a solar engineer. But there has been another toiler in the field of sun-power. The early Spanish explorers of natural philosophy. The principle involved in the cigar-box oven, and which he had applied to the construction of what he calls a solar receiver. A metallic vessel, blackened outside, is inserted in a non-conducting protecting case covered with a glass case; it is exposed to the sun, and an extra share of heat is condensed upon it by a reflector placed behind. In less than half an hour, the vessel, if empty, is raised to a temperature of 400° Fahr. The receiver may be a boiler for generating steam, or a sauce-pan for culinary purposes, or the evaporator of a still, or an oven for cooking steaks and potatoes. A working engine was among some solar apparatus which M. Mouchot had the honor of bringing before the Emperor, at St. Cloud, in 1866; but the machinery could not be set in action because the weather was unpropitious. However, he was so pleased with the idea that he gave the subject another day's trial at Blenheim, which Phœbus favored, and all worked to satisfaction.

Dreamers of narrow mind ridicule this idea of extracting power out of sunbeams. They say the source is too intermittent—that during cloudy times and in countries not blessed with eternal sunshine it would be useless, because not constant. So there is nothing the matter. But is not the wind intermittent, and water too? Are we to set five to the wind-mill when it is becalmed, and chop the water-wheel when there is a drought? There are scores of mills in the country where wind or water furnishes the power so long as it is available, but where steam is resorted to as an auxiliary when the primary source gives out. And why should not the sun come in as an auxiliary also, to act when winds are lulled and streams are dried? Our mechanics are boastful of their prowess, and just now are in the enjoyment of a period of scope for the exercise of their ingenuity. Let them bestir themselves to get the undeveloped stores of power to work, that we may economize the resources of which we are now so reckless, and hand down to our children's children an equivalent—in the shape of perfected means and appliances—for the share of those resources which is their due, but which we are doing our very best to wrest from them.

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.

To our hearts, there's no denying,
Nothing lasting joy can bring:
Like the restless, surging swing,
Are our minds upon the wing;
Still for something ever sighing,
Ever longing, ever crying.

Each one in the crowd is being
Toward a retrograding goal:
All things boarding, reaping, buying,
But contentment do not own.
Still for something ever sighing,
Ever longing, ever crying.

For some bliss we're always sighing,
But possessing, find it—what?
That for which our souls were dying?
No; we still search for that,
After something ever crying,
Ever longing, ever sighing.

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty Cents per Box. Mailed for 60c. Sold by druggists. S. G. WELLING, 371 Broadway.

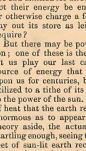
ADVERTISEMENTS

TO remove MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, and TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.

LOOK AT IT!

THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for OCTOBER is full of entertaining matter: Survey of Politics; Phillip Phillips; John A. Roebling; George L. Miller; Phrenology, Is it a Science? Answers to Objections; The Phrenologist's Prophecy; Salem Witchcraft; Our Convicts—what shall be done with them? Warming Houses; The Tiger; The Chinese Question; Shall we have Celestial Visitors? &c., &c. With Illustrations. Only 30 cents, or $3 a year. Address
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Alaska Diamonds.



The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or carbonized quartz, rivals in brilliancy to the real diamond, mounted at par over factory, in solid gold diamond settings, guaranteed solid gold, and sold by us at one sixth cost of the cost of real diamonds, to which they are equal in every particular and luminative value.

Ladies' Solitaire Rings, $5 to $30 each; Solitaire Ear-Drops, with pendant, $5 to $30;
Cluster Rings, $6 to $20; Cluster Ear-Drops, $10 to $20.
Gents' Pins, $5 to $15; Cross Pins, $30 to $35.
Gents' Solitaire Pins, $2 to $30; Rings, $6 to $35.
Studs, $5 to $15.
Cluster Pins, $10 to $25; with shank, $10 to $25.
Sleeve Buttons, per set, $6 to $18.
Studs, per set, $3 to $20.

We do our business direct from our factory, which has a world-wide reputation for its fine jewelry, and is not in sympathy with bogus concerns advertising cheap jewelry.

All orders by mail for less than $10 should be accompanied with P. O. Order or Registered Letter, and the goods sent free. Exceeding that amount sent by express, C.O.D., customers paying all express charges.

A Large Discount to the Trade. Call on or address

THE STANLEY & WHIPPLE MFG. CO.,
No. 12 South Main St., cor. College,
Providence, R. I.

JUST PUBLISHED,
THE GREAT NATIONAL SONG, ENTITLED
"The Starry Flag."
Written by H. MILLARD, Esq., the Author of "Wait-ing," "Vine at Sunrise," &c., &c.

This beautiful gem is arranged for the Piano, and every lover of his country should have a copy. Printed on heavy Music Paper. Price 50 cents. It is also contained in the October Number of HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE of Music. Price, 25 cents. Mailed free on receipt of price.
Address HENRY W. HITCHCOCK,
Publisher, 24 Beekman St., New York.
N.B.—Sold by all Booksellers and Newsdealers.

FRENCH CLOCKS,
BRONZES,
FANCY GOODS,
MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,
Opera Glasses,
FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY.
PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,
No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York.

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.

17th Sign of Gold Telegraph. 23

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS, wonderful and amusing, 25 cents a package. Lithiate of Lime, 50 cents. Send to W. C. WESTOS, 3 Astor Place, N.Y.

TROY FEMALE SEMINARY.—This Institution offers the accumulated experience of over 50 years' successful operation. For circulars, apply to JOHN H. WILLARD, Troy, N.Y.

HITCHCOCK'S
New Monthly Magazine
OF
CHOICE MUSIC, ART NOTES,
AND
Select Reading for the Family Circle.
CONTAINING
Beautiful Illustrations, Biographical Sketches, Choice Musical Compositions arranged for the Piano-Forte, Poetry, and Notes on Painting, Sculpture, &c., &c.
FORMING A SPLENDID
Illustrated Magazine for the Drawing-Room,
AND A
Valuable Library of Excellent Music.
It is issued on the 15th of every month. Price, $3 00 per Year, in advance.
Specimen Copies mailed free, on receipt of price, 25 cents each.
Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
24 Beekman Street, New York.
☞ Agents wanted every where. Write for Terms.

POPULAR SCIENTIFIC BOOKS:
HOW TO BECOME A SUCCESSFUL ENGINEER. Being Hints to Youths intending to adopt the profession. By R. H. Buel, M.E. 18mo, Cloth, Sc.
Figure, and Ornamental Drawing. By Jacob Bigelow, M.D. Profusely Illustrated. 18mo, Cloth, 75c.
THE EARTH'S CRUST. A Handy Outline of Geology. By David Page. Illustrated. 18mo, Cloth, 75c.
DODD'S DICTIONARY OF MANUFACTURES, MINING, MACHINERY, AND CIVIL ENGINEERING. 18mo, Cloth, $2.
☞ For NOTICES of the above works sent free by mail on receipt of price.

CYPRESS HILLS
CEMETERY.
OFFICE, No. 124 BOWERY, N. Y.,
(Corner of Grand Street).
TRUSTEES:
EDMUND DRIGGS, President.
A. A. LOW, Vice-President.
WILLIAM MILES, Treasurer.
WILLIAM HOWARD HADDS, Secretary.
A. S. JARVIS, HERVEY G. LAW, JOHN I. VAN ANTWERP, ALFRED M. WOOD, Trustees.
N. G. PALMER, Supt and Surveyor.

Bloomington Nursery.
500 Acres. 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.
Fruit, Ornamental and Nursery Stock, immense and reliable assortment, very low for cash.
Apples, Cherries, Plums, Quinces, Grapes, Small Fruits, Roses, Greenhouse Nursery Stock, Osage Orange Plants, &c.
Asparagus Roots, Rhubarb, Horseradish, Evergreens, Shrubbery, Vines, Bulbous Flowering Roots, Seeds, &c.
Also superior colored plates of Fruits and Flowers. Send 10 cents for Catalogue.
F. K. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

GREAT INDUCEMENTS TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Let those who want a first-class Lady's Magazine and a first-class Weekly Paper send at once for a sample copy of
THE LADY'S FRIEND
and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, and see the unrivaled inducements offered. $2 50 a year for each. $4 for both. Four copies for $8, with a splendid premium engraving. Five copies (and one gratis), $8. Sample copies of both will be sent (postpaid) for fifteen cents. Address
DEACON & PETERSON,
No. 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WEDLOCK;
OR, THE RIGHT RELATIONS OF THE SEXES. $1 50.—HOW TO READ CHARACTER. $1 25.—ANNUAL OF PHYSOGNOMY for 1870. $1 25.—MAN IN GENESIS AND IN THE GEOLOGY. 12c.—THE BIBLICAL ACCOUNT OF MAN'S ORIGIN, ATTACKED AND DEFENDED. 12c.—THE PHYSIOLOGY OF MARRIAGE. $1 25.—THE SCIENCE OF LIFE. $1 25.—THE HYGIENIC TREATMENT OF CHILDREN. $1 25.—THE EMPHATIC DIAGLOTT. $2.—THE SCIENCE OF HUMAN LIFE. $2 50.—THE SCIENCE OF HUMAN LIFE. $2 50.—THE SCIENCE OF HUMAN LIFE. $2 50

THE LAST ADDITION TO THE FAMILY

BEAUTIFUL PICTURES
FOR NOTHING.
VALUABLE READING
FOR NOTHING.
THREE MONTHS
FOR NOTHING.
A WHOLE YEAR
FOR NOTHING.

THE American Agriculturist
[Established in 1842].

A beautifully-illustrated monthly of 44 pages, full of the most interesting and valuable matter for the Farm, Garden, and Household,

Including a special department for

THE BOYS AND GIRLS.

The Pictures alone are worth more than the subscription price.

We will give the American Agriculturist, for the last three months of 1869, to all new subscribers for 1870 received in September, whether singly or in clubs.

For a club of ten and $12 00, or a club of twenty and $20 00, we give the sender the paper free for a year.

Terms, $1 50 per annum, in advance; 4 copies for $5; 10 for $12; 20 or more, $1 each.

In Illustrations and Original Matter the Cheapest and Best Paper in the World!!!

Remit by Checks, Post-Office Money Orders, or Registered Letters.

ORANGE JUDD & CO.,
245 Broadway, New York.

"OLD FOGY" LOST his lead-pencil. Use the Novelty Pencil-Holders, and avoid losing pencils.

BE BEAUTIFUL.—If you desire beauty you should use HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM.

It gives a soft, refined, satin-like texture to the complexion, removes Roughness, Redness, Blotches, Sunburn, Tan, &c., and adds a tinge of pearly bloom to the plainest features. It brings the bloom of youth to the fading cheek, and clears the rustic country girl into a fashionable city belle.

In the use of the MAGNOLIA BALM lies the true secret of beauty. No lady need complain of her complexion who will invest 75 cents in this delightful article.

LYON'S KATHAIRON is the best Hair Dressing in use.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO,
FOR CLEANING AND POLISHING.

SAPOLIO will make Tins resemble Silver. Use only SAPOLIO to Clean White Paint. From Marble SAPOLIO removes all Stains. For polishing Knives SAPOLIO is unsurpassed. For Cleaning Brass Stair-Rods SAPOLIO has no equal. If you would have clean windows, use SAPOLIO. Sample cake sent by mail on receipt of 20 cents.

Depot, 211 Washington St., New York.
Established 1809.

Particular attention is called to our SOAPS for family use.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HERRSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRUPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLEAN, Nashville, Tenn.; KNOCKEY BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; J. R. JACOBUS, Sandusky, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MRS. C. BUEHL, Pittsburg, Pa.; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; CLETTY & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HAMMEL, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; J. H. HOCHSTRASSER, Ilion, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; C. M. MUSCH, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.

THE NATIONAL LIFE
INSURANCE CO.
OF NEW YORK,
212 BROADWAY, cor. FULTON ST.

Issues all the new forms of policies, and presents as favorable terms as any Company in the United States.

Thirty days' grace allowed on each payment, and the policy held good during that time.

Policy-holders share in the annual profits of the Company, and have a vote in the election and management of the Company.

No policy or medical fee charged.

All policies non-forfeitable on the principle of the Massachusetts non-forfeiture law.

EDWARD A. JONES, President.
J. O. HALSEY, Vice-President.
J. A. MORTIMORE, Secretary.

Rev. JAMES FOSTER, D. D., Superintendent of Agencies.

Call or Send for Circular.

AGENTS WANTED.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,
WITH PURE SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson, and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods to which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY, Can not be Excelled.

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,

All goods bearing our trade-mark,

"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"

ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED; and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, CONN. SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 19 JOHN ST., N. Y.

TARRANT'S
SELTZER
APERIENT.

Remember that the Slight internal disorder of to-day may become an obstinate disease to-morrow. Be in time: meet the first symptoms of biliousness or indigestion with TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, and within forty-eight hours they will have ceased to exist.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

POLLAK & SON, Manuf'rs of Genuine Meerschaum goods. Stores: 619 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, and 47 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter Box 5046. Repairing and Boiling also done.

REMOVAL.
Davis Collamore & Co.
Have removed to their new store,
No. 747 BROADWAY, FIFTH DOOR BELOW 9TH ST.,
And now offer a very choice stock of
CHINA GLASS, AND CROCKERY WARE.
We shall also keep a full stock of SILVER-PLATED GOODS, CUTLERY, BRONZES, &c., &c.
PRICES SHALL BE LOW.
No. 747 BROADWAY, running through to Mercer St.

[Trade-mark Secured.]

"Middletown Mineral Spring Water cures all diseases of the Kidneys, Skin, and Blood more promptly than any other known remedy."

Ask for Call for TESTIMONIALS OF CURES. Sold by Druggists.

Caution.—All genuine bears our trade-mark, and the bottles and corks are branded "Nature's Remedy."

Address J. JAY JOSLIN,
Treas. M. M. S. Co.,
Middletown, Vt.

Or, S. H. Scripture, 193 Broadway, New York, General Agent.

A HOUSEHOLD WORD!
Buy your
CHINA, GLASS, SILVER-PLATED WARE, CUTLERY, and LOOKING UTENSILS, AT BASSFORD'S,
COOPER INSTITUTE, N. Y.,
and save 20 per cent.

SCHREIBER CORNETS and BAND INSTRUMENTS.
The most splendid Instruments ever made. We are manufacturing all styles, and can readily supply all orders for sets. Send for Price-List and Circular.
M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,
680 Broadway, N. Y.

BULBS for FALL PLANTING
MAILED, POSTPAID, AT CATALOGUE PRICES.
B. K. BLISS & SON,
No. 42 Park Row, and 191 Nassau St., New York, have just received a large assortment of the above, comprising all of the most desirable varieties of Hyacinths, Tulips, Lilies, Narcissus, Crocus, &c., &c.
Our New Autumn Catalogue, with many beautiful illustrations, including a splendid two-page colored lithograph of the celebrated Lilium auratum, will be mailed free to all applicants enclosing Ten Cents.
Address, as above, P. O. Box No. 3719, New York.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL
PERFECTLY SAFE.
Send for Circular to
OIL HOUSE OF CHAS. PRATT,
108 Fulton St., N. Y.
Box 2656.

STEVENS' POCKET RIFLE.

With Detachable Shoulder-Rest.
Most popular arm made for Sporting and Target-Shooting. SMITH & WESSON'S REVOLVERS, in any quantity, for cash, on one hundred pieces.
WILLIAMSON'S DERRINGERS, and other Pistols.
J. W. STORRS & CO., M'f'r's Agents,
252 Broadway, New York.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 666.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

REV. PETER CARTWRIGHT, D.D.

THE REV. PETER CARTWRIGHT, the pioneer of Methodism in the West, has now been a Presiding Elder for fifty years. In view of this fact, the last Illinois Annual Conference made arrangements for a semi-centennial jubilee, to take place September 24. Among those who take a prominent part on this occasion we may mention Bishops SIMPSON, MORRIS, JANES, AMES, and THOMPSON. Bishop SIMPSON gives a review of DOCTOR CARTWRIGHT'S career as a legislator in thirteen General Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, from 1816 to 1868. In connection with this pleasant jubilee a large number of presents were given to Dr. CARTWRIGHT as tokens of the regard in which he is held by the Church.

A complete biography of PETER CARTWRIGHT would include the history of the rise and progress of Methodism in the Valley of the Mississippi. He was born September 1, 1785, in Amherst County, on James River, in the State of Virginia. He is now, therefore, entering upon his eighty-fifth year. In a lecture which he delivered at Chicago not long ago, he said that he was living beyond his time. He had not a father, mother, brother, or sister living. His life had been one of hardship; he had known many crosses; but if he were to live his life over again, he would be a Methodist traveling preacher; he would rather choose that than be President of the United States.

PETER CARTWRIGHT'S father was a Revolutionary soldier. His mother, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was an orphan. Shortly after his birth his parents removed to Kentucky, then an unbroken wilderness, over which emigrants moved on pack-horses. When PETER was nine years old JACOB LEDGTON, a traveling preacher, held religious services in his father's cabin. This LEDGTON he styles a "real son of thunder. He preached with tremendous power, and the congregation were almost all melted to tears." A small class was soon organized in the neighborhood. This little society was visited by a "mighty revival" in 1799, and a church was built, called Ebenezer. This was in what was then called Cumberland Circuit, and Kentucky District, in the Western Conference, the seventh conference in the United States.

Logan County, where the CARTWRIGHTS lived, was called "Rogues' Harbor." Refugees from all parts of the country fled thither to escape justice. Murderers, horse-thieves, highway robbers, and counterfeiters actually formed a majority of the inhabitants, and were able to set the laws at defiance. The honest people, under the name of Regulators, combined together and formed a vigilance committee for the execution of the laws. It was in such a desperate state of society that PETER CARTWRIGHT'S boyhood was passed. "I was naturally," he says, "a wild, wicked boy, and delighted in horse-racing, card-playing, and dancing. My father restrained me but little, though my mother often talked to me, wept over me, and prayed for me, and often drew tears from my eyes; and though I often wept under preaching, and resolved to do better and seek religion, yet I broke my vows, went into company, rode races, played cards, and danced." Gambling became his besetting sin.

At length, about the beginning of the present century, Logan County became more civilized. Murderers and horse-thieves disappeared, and preaching became more frequent. About this time the Cane Ridge camp-meeting was held —a meeting protracted for weeks, and attended by from 12,000 to 25,000 people. Preachers of all denominations were present, and between one and two thousand souls were converted. This was the first camp-meeting ever held in the United States. It was about this time (1801) that PETER was converted, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The following incident illustrates the ignorance with which the early Methodist preachers in the West had to contend. The REV. WILSON LEE, preaching in PETER CARTWRIGHT'S neighborhood, took for his text, "Except a man deny himself, and take up his cross, he can not be my disciple." He urged on his congregation, with melting voice and tearful eyes, to take up the cross; no matter what it was, take it up. He made a very profound impression upon a very wicked Dutchman in his congregation, whose wife was a notorious scold. After dismissing the meeting, MR. LEE mounted his horse and rode away. After riding some distance, he saw, a little ahead of him, a man trudging along, carrying a woman on his back. This greatly surprised MR. LEE. He very naturally supposed that the woman was a cripple, or had hurt herself in some way, so that she could not walk. The traveler was a small man, and the woman large and heavy.

REV. PETER CARTWRIGHT, D.D.

Before he overtook them, MR. LEE began to cast about in his mind how he could render them assistance. When he came up to them, lo and behold, who should it be but the Dutchman and his wife that had been so affected under his sermon at meeting. MR. LEE rode up and spoke to them, and inquired of the man what had happened, or what was the matter, that he was carrying his wife.

The Dutchman turned to MR. LEE and said, "Besure you did tell us in your sarmon dat we must take up de cross and follow de Saviour, or dat we could not be saved or go to heaven; and I does desire to go to heaven so much as any body; and dish vife is so pad, she scold and scold all de time, and dish woman is de greatest cross I have in de whole world, and I does take her up and pare her, for I must save my soul."

In May, 1802, PETER CARTWRIGHT was permitted to exercise his gifts as an exhorter. In the fall his father moved down the Cumberland River into Lewiston County. Here Presiding Elder PAGE gave PETER authority to travel through that destitute region, hold meetings, organize classes, and, in a word, to form a circuit. Considering his education defective, he entered the best school to be found in the neighborhood, where he staid for a short time, and then went into the active work of the ministry. In 1806 he was ordained a deacon by Bishop ASBURY. He was married to FRANCES GAINES August 18, 1808, and in the following October early bishops: I have outlived every presiding elder that I ever had when on circuits; and I have outlived hundreds and thousands of my contemporary ministers and members, as well as juniors, and still linger on the mortal shores. Though all these have died, they shall live again, and by the power of God I shall live with them in heaven forever."

PETER CARTWRIGHT, in his journeys upon various circuits in the West, met with many very peculiar characters. And, as he himself was very eccentric, these encounters led often to amusing results. He tells the following anecdote of the conversion of two young ladies, whose mother was the terror of all preachers. He was warned not to visit them, but determined to go. The reception given him by the old lady was any thing but inviting, she even ordering him to take the door. He told her he had come to talk and pray with her two daughters. She said he should not pray in her house, and shaking her fist in his face, she again ordered him out. The contest lasted for some time. The husband was a poor henpecked man, and his wife reigned supreme. At last, telling the old woman to be seated, he kneeled to pray. He kept one eye open, for he had to watch as well as pray. In his prayer he gave a description of the woman any thing but flattering. He invoked the Almighty to love her, if possible, and do it quick. But if there was no salvation for her, he prayed to God to kill her, and damn her at once. Afterward he met her, and found her a changed woman.

Of course PETER CARTWRIGHT was a Jacksonian in politics; but the following incident that occurred in connection with the meeting of the Nashville Conference in 1818, showed that he was not to be scared by even "Old Hickory." "The city preacher," he says, "informed me that I was to preach on Monday evening in DR. BLACKBURN'S church, and charged me to be sure and behave myself. I made him my best bow, and thanked him that he had given me any appointment at all; and I assured him I would certainly behave myself the best I could. 'And now,' said I, 'Brother MAC, it really seems providential that you have appointed me to preach in the Doctor's church, for I expect they never heard Methodist doctrine fairly stated and the dogmas of Calvinism exposed; and now, Sir, they shall hear the truth for once.' Said the preacher, 'You must not preach controversy.' I replied, 'If I live to preach there at all, I'll give Calvinism one riddling.' 'Well,' said the preacher, 'I recall the appointment, and will send another preacher there; and you must preach in the Methodist church Monday evening; and do try and behave yourself.' 'Very well, said I; 'I'll do my best.'

"The preacher's conduct toward me was spread abroad, and excited considerable curiosity. Monday evening came: the church was filled to overflowing: every seat was crowded, and many had to stand. After singing and prayer, Brother MAC took his seat in the pulpit. I then read my text: 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' After reading my text I closed my book. At that moment I saw General JACKSON walking up the aisle, he came to the middle and very gracefully bowed against it and stood, as there were no vacant seats. Just then I felt some one pull my coat in the stand, and turning to my fastidious preacher, whispering a little loud, said, 'General JACKSON has come in: General JACKSON has come in.' I felt a little indignation run all over me like an electric shock, and facing about to my congregation, and purposely speaking out audibly, I said, 'Who is General JACKSON? If he don't get his soul converted, God will damn him as quick as he would a Guinea negro!'

"The preacher tucked his head down and squatted low, and would, no doubt, have been thankful for leave of absence. The congregation, General JACKSON and all, smiled or laughed right out, all at the preacher's expense. When the congregation was dismissed, my city-stationed preacher stepped up to me, and very quietly said to me, 'You are the strangest man I ever saw; and General JACKSON will chastise you for your insolence before you leave the city.' 'Very clear of it,' said I, 'for General JACKSON, I have no doubt, will applaud my course; and if he should undertake to chastise me, as Paddy said, "There is two as can play at that game."'

SEE Number in Vol. XIII.

"General JACKSON was staying at one of the Nashville taverns. Next morning very early my city preacher went down to the hotel to make an apology to General JACKSON for my insolence in the pulpit the night before. Shortly after he had left I passed by the hotel and I met the General on the pavement, and before I apprehended him by several taps he smiled and reached out his hand, and said:

"'Mr. CARWITHIN, you are a man after my own heart. I am very much surprised at Mr. MAC, to think he would suppose that I would be offended at you. No, Sir; I told him I was highly approved of your independence; that a minister of Jesus Christ ought to love every body and fear no mortal man. I told Mr. MAC that if I had a few thousand such independent, fearless officers as you were, and a well-drilled army, I could take old England."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1869.

OUR DUTY TO CUBA.

THERE was never a public question of importance enough to interest the press of Europe and America about which there was so authentically known than the Cuban question. It seems to be understood that the United States Government is making representations to that of Spain; but nothing is certainly known. To-day it is announced that a distinct proposition of sale and guarantee has been offered. To-morrow it is as distinctly denied. One moment General SICKLES has written a significant note; the next, he has written nothing. The rumor, as we write, is that he has informed the Spanish Government that there is a strong pressure of public opinion in this country to recognize the Cubans as belligerents. We are very reluctant to believe that any such step has been authorized or written. It is not easy to suppose that the Administration would threaten Spain; still less that it would found a threat upon so weak a basis. Public opinion in this country may naturally be presumed to be friendly to the efforts of all people honorably striving for Independence as a foreign power. But it is certainly untrue that there is any pressing general desire to recognize the independence of Cuba, or to take any positive step until something more is known. Cuban recognition and annexation are known to be the same thing, and it would be very far from accurate to say that public opinion in this country demanded the addition of nearly two millions of Spanish creoles and emancipated slaves to the present population.

That the Spanish government of Cuba has been harsh and cruel; that the Cubans have the right, upon proper consideration of means and chances, to attempt to secure an independence by arms; and that in the struggle they have the sympathy of all generous hearts, we have often declared. But it would be unspeakable folly for the United States to take part in every war upon the side which might seem to be in the right to most of those who knew any thing of the facts. For example, when the other Spanish-American colonies revolted, in 1810, the United States remained neutral. They continued so for twelve years, until the colonies were not only independent de facto, but there was no prospect of their ceasing to be so. Twenty years and more passed, however, before Spain acknowledged the fact. And during all this time the United States maintained the strictest neutrality with the frankest expression of sympathy for the colonies; and they departed from their neutrality only when an organized government, fulfilling all its functions, had been established.

But it was not yet be truly said that Cuba, to use President MONROE'S words in regard to the other colonies, has "declared its independence and maintained it." The revolutionary government of Cuba has the military rule of the revolutionary Commander-in-chief. The ports of the Island and the large towns have not yet acknowledged it. General QUESADA, of the Cuban Junta, says that they "need shoes, clothing, and medicines; for none are in the country. Hundreds of brave men are standing in my sight almost naked." These are facts which, as in the case of Crete, attest the heroism and the extremity of the revolutionists. As in the case of Crete, also, there is no reason to doubt that the generous heart of this country will send the needed succor. Crete held out for three years in a just and noble cause. We sympathized, we succored, but we did not recognize her independence nor concede belligerent rights. Would it have been wiser for us to do so? Is it desirable upon any just and reasonable grounds that the United States should become the knight-errant to fight the battles of all distressed people? We do not ask the question from any selfish consideration, but from the highest regard to liberty and civilization. Would either be the gainers if we should challenge every Government in the world whose principles or whose practice we do not approve?

There is still another consideration which ought not to be forgotten. We have called England to account for her conduct during the late rebellion in this country, and now are more vehement in doing so than those who demand that we shall recognize the independence of Cuba. Let us be just to England, however unfriendly we may consider her conduct to have been. During four years the Confederacy maintained absolute independence of the United States. It had an organized civil government, a recognized military force, extensive territory, collecting taxes, holding courts, making and enforcing laws. Generally it repelled our armies upon its lines of war. Even when broken through the people refused to submit, and we held the territory that our cannon commanded, and no more. The conditions that theoretically justify recognition of the independence of a revolting state can hardly be fairly said not to have existed. We did not relinquish the contest, of course, and it was known that we should not hesitate to regard recognition as war. Nevertheless LOUIS NAPOLEON urged England, by the joint action of both nations, to end a hopeless struggle upon the part of the United States. Had England consented, a treaty of alliance between those powers and the Confederacy would have followed, and our difficulties would have been incalculably increased. England declined; France would not move alone; and we were left with no other than the rebels.

What reason is there for our recognition of the independence of Cuba which would not have justified England in recognizing that of the Confederacy? Is there any comparison whatever between the vigor and duration of the war, the actuality of the government, and the maintenance of independence? And it is said that the Cubans have agreed to abolish slavery, and that our interference will lead to emancipation. That is a good reason for recognizing when the Cubans show themselves capable of independence, but not before. If they have declared an emancipation which they can not maintain, they have no right to expect that we should help to maintain it. The recognition of independence is the acknowledgment of a fact, not of a hope nor of an effort. If Cuba can secure her independence, establish a stable and free government, and abolish slavery, she will have done a great and good work which the lovers of liberty everywhere will applaud. But it is not in the interests of liberty and civilization that this work should be done for her by others. Independence is secure only among those who are able to obtain it for themselves.

PROTRACTED ELECTIONS.

THE result of the election in Maine, where Governor CHAMBERLAIN is elected by a good majority, shows the depth and extent of the feeling which would make a separate issue of the prohibitory question. It is, apparently, doubtful whether the prohibitory vote in Maine really exceeds five thousand. By no chance could the movement have done more than elect the Democratic candidate and open every gospel shop without restraint. The plurality is secured by the most noted and influential of the temperance leaders, and they very wisely received into the same organization the element of the party which was most favorable to it. We have little doubt that a result like that in Maine will attend the movement in Ohio, and the respect inspired by the considerable force of the temperance men who are also in favor of a prohibitory law. In such a law of such superior importance to all other issues as that will be properly be imperilled? This truth was certainly not established at the National Convention in Chicago that formed the new temperance party.

The result in Maine also shows that there is not that dissatisfaction with the Administration which has been asserted by some Democratic and foreign authorities to be so pronounced and universal. The Republican party would certainly be very unreasonable if it should renounce the support of Maine in November for any reason that has yet been alleged. It certainly can not be so foolish as to suppose that the financial condition would be improved under the auspices of a party that nominates Mr. PENDLETON in Ohio; nor retrenchment and economy secured by a party whose chief leaders in New York are the ring that is stigmatized by one of the party organs as "corruptionists;" nor the general tranquillity and prosperity of the country promoted by a party that proposes to keep open the question of equal rights.

The Cincinnati Enquirer asserts that the Republicans will certainly be beaten in that State. It is possible, but even Mr. PENDLETON has not yet given any proof of the probability of such a result. If, indeed, Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, of Massachusetts, were the type of the Republicans of the United States, the case would be different. If, because of errors of policy, from which no party can be free, and of corruptions which are inseparable from every party in power, every Republican should think to find a remedy by going over to the Opposition, the prospects of the Democracy in Ohio and elsewhere would be very much more promising than they are. Mr. ADAMS is emulous of that Chinese school of epicures who burned down their houses to roast their pigs. He applies their principles in politics, and not as yet, it must be confessed, with the same success. He has not as yet "tasted—crackling."

At this time the Republican party of the Convention is to settle the feuds in the city, and to refuse to recognize as the representative of the party here a committee which is merely a brokerage for office. It should make a brief and positive declaration in favor of a searching reform of the whole civil service system. It should declare in favor of the new State Constitution, and nominate candidates whose characters and antecedents would be their platform. It need not fear nor shirk. The future belongs to it if it chooses to take it. A bold reliance upon the intelligence and conscience of the State will be triumphantly justified by the result.

THE NEW STATE CONSTITUTION.

THE new Constitution of this State is to be submitted to the people at the next election, and if its provisions are understood it will unquestionably be adopted. It is a very great improvement of the present Constitution, which has been proved to be very far from that master-piece of wisdom which it was at one time supposed to be. The fundamental defects of that instrument, however, can be only partially corrected at present; but it may be fairly said that the changes are all improvements. The Convention was, unquestionably, right to do more than make such changes as were indispensable, and many amendments which experience and reason justified were rejected as being too radical. It was impossible that the entire party could agree upon all the details of the new Constitution, and it was altogether. But with every objection the amended Constitution ought to be adopted.

The first important feature of the proposed changes is the equality of the suffrage. The new Constitution abolishes the property qualification for colored voters. There can be no argument in favor of such qualification which would not logically lead to the disfranchisement of colored citizens. This was plain enough from the speeches of Mr. MURPHY and Mr. CASSIDY against the amendment, which proceeded upon the ground that the colored citizens are of an inferior race. But how the possession of a little property obviated the perils of the polls arising from that inferiority neither those gentlemen nor any body else remembered to state. The justice and expediency of removing the disability were vindicated by a speech with more force and eloquence than by Mr. MAGNUS GROSS, a fellow-partisan of Messrs. MURPHY and CASSIDY.

The term of Senators is to be four instead of two years—half of the Senate retiring every two years. The advantage of such a system of securing a certain amount of experience in legislation needs no argument.

The Assembly is to be elected by counties instead of districts, the change which increases the number of members from one hundred and twenty-eight to one hundred and thirty-nine. Experience has shown that the election by counties generally secures better men than by districts. The Assemblymen are to be paid one thousand dollars—a change which, if of no further advantage, may tend to shorten the sessions.

The changes in the Judiciary system are so excellent that they were supported by almost every lawyer of all parties in the Convention, and will be undoubtedly sustained by all the most eminent men of the profession in the State. By relieving the pressure upon the highest tribunal, the present Court of Appeals, with one judge to be appointed, is continued as a Board of Commissioners for Appeals, with jurisdiction of all cases, which must finally be determined within three years. In 1873 the question is to be submitted to the voters, whether the judges of the Courts of Record shall thereafter be appointed by the Governor and Senate or elected.

The new Constitution provides a Court of Claims to audit all claims against the State; it restricts special legislation, and the power of granting the public money; confers local authority upon local officers; concentrates official responsibility for the management of the canals; places the State prisons in charge of a Board appointed by the Governor and Senate; extends the time for the payment of the Bounty debt so as to lessen the annual tax; requires a uniform rule for the assessment and taxation of real and personal property; makes punishments for official bribery practicable; and ordains free instruction in the public schools for all persons between seven and twenty years of age.

A constitution is not usually a very attractive study. But voting upon its adoption is one of the most important acts of a citizen, and it is his duty to understand its general character. The new instrument has been widely published, and many of the papers in the State discuss its provisions with intelligence and vigor. The articles upon the subject in the Western New Yorker, at Warsaw, Wyoming County, are especially good. Between this time and the election we hope to be able to consider more in detail some of the more important changes proposed.

THE ST. THOMAS TREATY.

On the 15th of October the extended time allowed by President SEWARD to Commissioner Minister for the ratification of the St. Thomas treaty expires, and unless it be again extended by Secretary FISH the whole negotiation fails. But it can not end in this way without deep and lasting disgrace to the United States. It was a negotiation undertaken at the urgent entreaty of the Secretary of State, approved by the President. It was conducted upon the part of Denmark with the utmost honor and friendliness, and a strict regard for the wishes of the people most nearly interested. The treaty was ratified by the agents of both governments, and Senators were informally consulted before the definitive vote was taken upon the island. It was then submitted to the Senate, and it has neither been confirmed nor rejected; it has been contemptuously neglected. Such conduct is discreditable to the Senate, and it is mortifying to the nation. It authorizes every government in the world to decline to treat with any authorized representative of the United States, until it learns whether it can regard his authority as evidence of his accord with the treaty-making power. It justifies England in saying to Mr. MORLEY, and Spain to General SICKLES, "We are very glad to see you, but you will understand that we can only formally tell whether you represent the wishes and sentiments of your Government."

It is very true that the Constitution requires the consent of the Senate, and it is said that the Secretary of State has no authority to bind the country to do what he may think ought to be done—to buy the Danish West India Islands, and other real estate at what may be considered enormous prices. But the facts must be considered. The offer to buy was made by the Secretary and President of a party which controlled the Senate. It was peculiarly fair to suppose, therefore, that the Government was a unit. This probability became virtual certainty when the same Secretary's similar action in regard to Alaska was most promptly supported by the Senate, and when personal inquiry of Senators disclosed no hostility to the St. Thomas project. It was only natural under such circumstances that Denmark should take measures to sever her connection with the island; and that she should feel herself insulted by the dissatisfied omission even to consider the treaty enough to reject it. Indeed, the omission can hardly be called dissatisfied. It seems rather an unhandsome evasion of the question, because of a consciousness that no satisfactory and honorable reason could be urged for rejection. There is no doubt that a fairer power would not allow a treaty negotiated under such circumstances to be left without consideration. We would demand examination in a tone that we know Denmark can not use, and which, therefore, it is still less pardonable in us to provoke.

It is plain that the Secretary of State and the Senate should save the country from the ill fame of such conduct, and a friendly power from so gross a humiliation. Let the Secretary extend the term for the ratification of the treaty. Then let the Senate fairly and frankly consider it. If it rejects it let it state the reason, and not commit itself with an ex parte act, and then to avoid so unpleasant a complication hereafter, and to make treaty negotiations possible with self-respecting governments, let it strictly define the limits of executive action in the initiation of treaties. But we sincerely hope that a wise regard for the position of a friendly State power and for the fair fame of the United States will, in this instance and under the peculiar circumstances, induce the Senate to ratify the treaty.

CITY ELECTIONS.

In the following article we propose to point out a few of the more frauds which in the city of New York are perpetrated upon the people, and by means of which the will of the majority is set aside in more instances than the public would, without examination, suppose possible. It is not our purpose to refer to the iniquity of fraudulent naturalizations, to false registry, or to the voting by repeaters, all of which criminalities are carried on to a great extent, but simply to those frauds which are perpetrated on election-day at the polls, and in the very room who are appointed to protect the purity and honesty of the elections; to the crimes against the principle of self-government and republican institutions, which have made our municipal politics a reproach and by-word throughout the land. We shall expose only one link in a system of fraud which is so powerful in its various ramifications that it absolutely controls elections in our city, and utterly stifles the voice of the people.

The inspectors, canvassers, and poll-clerks of the elections are appointed by the Board, which is nominally a non-partisan body, composed of two Democrats and two Republicans. There are four inspectors, two canvassers, and two poll-clerks in every election district, of which there are three hundred and forty within the municipal limits. Of these one-half are selected from among the Republicans, and the other half from the Democrats; and were this selection carefully made, a perfect security would be obtained against fraud; but by reason of the many local quarrels, the running of independent candidates, the schisms in party organizations, and the united interest of rogues to deplete the city treasury, improper and unfit men are frequently selected. The result is this is carried so far that it has become a common expression among politicians "that the canvassers and inspectors have been appointed to certain candidates and denied to others"—an expression which means that the irregularities we are about to enumerate were to be committed in favor of one person and against another. And it must not be forgotten that for these illegalities the Republican Police Commissioners are almost as much to blame as the Democratic ones.

The duty of the inspectors on election-day —and to that alone we confine our remarks—is to receive the votes and deposit them in the boxes. The canvassers count the ballots at the close of the polls, and the poll-clerks keep the records, which are transmitted immediately to Police Head-quarters, and subsequently to the Board of Supervisors, who are ex officio county canvassers, and whose sole duty it is to compile the final result either in a Federal, Senatorial, or Aldermanic districts, and give certificates of elections to those candidates who have a majority in all the election districts which in their premises. By this system it will be perceived that frauds by the canvassers and inspectors, if any are committed, are fatal, and can not be concealed at any subsequent stage of the proceedings. The law requires the ballots to be returned to the boxes, and the boxes to be sealed up and sent to the station-houses; but this section is practically disregarded, and consequently there is no legal mode of going behind the returns, except by summoning every voter—a proceeding that is manifestly impracticable.

If an inspector changes the ballot which is handed to him nobody can prevent his doing so; there can be no protest, but if the fraudulent offensive he will be ejected by the police, who are employed by the inspectors, who have control in such cases by their police general authority for preserving order at the polls. Cases frequently occur where parties objecting to the reception of illegal ballots have been arrested, while those depositing them have been suffered to go free, and any protest against the action of the inspectors leads invariably to arrest and detention in the station-house. Inspectors have been known deliberately to throw out the ballots of voters and openly to substitute others, and to continue doing this for hours in spite of all remonstrances, while in other cases they have been observed to effect the substitution by a little sleight-of-hand, and more secretly. In the contested election case of M'KIERNAN vs. WALLACE, the following evidence was given:

"LEWIS H. LAFFAN was a register and inspector in this district, and he testifies that during the whole day Inspector M'QUAID received the Assembly ballots, and he dropped many of them on the floor, and subsequently drew from his coat pocket, where he had deposited in the ballot-box. Attention was called to it, and LAFFAN remarked with him, when he replied, 'You have got too much to say around here altogether; if you don't keep it will punch you in the eye.'

"In addition to the substitution proven that, in other instances, offensive and even obscene epithets were used to intimidate the voter who defined to put his ballots for MR. WALLACE. That others who insisted upon their rights to vote for the only opponent of the were violently taken from the polls by persons pretending to act in the capacity of special police officers, with no attempt on the part of the Board of Inspectors to prevent such violence."

Many other instances equally gross could be given, but these are sufficient for the occasion. They depend not upon mere opinion or common rumor, but have been frequently proved by uncontradicted evidence in open court. And as they are they do not equal in enormity the frauds committed by the canvassers. The latter officials, as soon as the polls close, proceed to count the votes. This is usually done by taking up ten votes at a time for a candidate and calling "tally;" whereupon the entry is made in his favor by that effect. But it is the unusual thing for the canvasser to take fifteen votes before he calls "tally" for one man, and require only five for the opponent, thus making an error fraudulently of five votes against one and five in favor of the other, or ten in all. In such cases the packages are immediately thrown around the room or piled on the floor to be burned up as soon as the iniquity is completed.

In one instance the poll-clerk insisted upon standing behind the canvassers who were carrying out this scheme in spite of their orders to him to sit down; and the entire canvass was suspended until a telegram could be sent to Police Head-quarters to ascertain whether the recusant was not under the domination of the canvassers. In this particular case, the President of the Board of Police replied that the poll-clerk could perform his duties in any part of the room, and the result was that the opposition candidate received a majority in that district, and in no other in his ward.

But a simpler and more effectual way of carrying the election is to change the votes bodily from one side to the other. For instance, if MR. BROWN, to whom the canvassers have been privately, receive three hundred votes, and MR. JONES, who is not approved by the political magnates of the city, obtains six hundred, the six hundred are transferred to MR. BROWN, and MR. JONES is only allowed the three hundred that were polled in favor of his adversary. By these means the tally between the politics and the returns is made to agree, and a clumsier and easier operation is performed, while the effect is equally conclusive. So far and accurately do the figures and calculations of the clerks in certain local politicians can often carry a district by a specified majority established beforehand. In one case a Ninth Ward politician was compelled by party pressure to go against a friend who was a candidate, but promised that the district should be given to the opponent by only eight majority; and he came much nearer being made many apologies because by accident the majority rose to twelve. In that case there were seventy-five actual voters in the district, but the returns showed over four hundred votes.

Publicity is always given to the names of the canvassers and inspectors who are selected by the Police Board, and unobjectionable men are often chosen in the first instance. But these are changed afterward in those localities where fraud can be most easily committed, and on the day preceding, or on the very day of election, often as late as three or four o'clock in the afternoon, the commissioners of the Board, and some tool of iniquity substituted for a good man. There is no time for appeal or protest or argument; the new man appears with his written authority in his hand, and the moment he makes any trouble he is immediately dragged away by the police. No candidate opposed to the regular organizations of either party is safe for a minute. He may imagine that he has decent and honest canvassers and inspectors, but they may be removed at any moment and their places supplied by others. In connection we make the following extract from the points in the M'KIEVER case, to which we have already referred:

"The two inspectors, M'QUADE and M'KENNA, were both supporters of WEALEN. M'KENNA admits that he has been arrested several times, and that he was imprisoned in 1864, and that he has since been locked up in the station-house 'for raising a disturbance in his house at night with his brothers.' M'KENNA and M'QUADE can't remember whether he has ever been arrested out."

It must not be supposed that we mean to say that these enormities are committed in every election district; far otherwise; this would be another slander not justified. They probably are rarely carried by other than a close vote, and the manipulation of this in a few districts will usually answer every purpose. Once it will not, the regular organizations have to submit to a defeat. But if any of our readers will take the trouble to go to Police Head-quarters on election-night they will find a number of boxes and bagging waiting there. At occasional intervals a man will be seen to enter one of these and drive off at fourteen miles an hour. Subsequently they will find that he goes to a certain district where the proper men for the purpose are in control, and that he gives them certain directions. This returns have been examined as they come in at head-quarters, the number of votes required to elect has been ascertained, and the orders thus governed by which he makes up the number. It is thus that free expression is given to the will of the people in the city of New York, and Democratic majorities are rolled up which overwhelm the votes of the honest Republicans throughout the State.

We have only referred to a few instances in support of our statements, but we could give dozens of cases which afford positive evidence of public rumor, but duly sworn to, either before some committee of the Legislature or in the presence of the court. Every point that we have specified can be readily sustained, and is perfectly well known to all the practical working politicians of the city. Nor is the sole injury traceable to the ballot-box, but is a consequence of it and of the knowledge of the impossibility of fighting against it. People become discouraged when they find that it is useless to struggle against a superior power; they surrender without an effort when they are assured beforehand that such an effort would be in vain; and especially are the smaller politicians certain to submit to the dictation of the controlling body, when by resisting they could effect no good, and would be sure to incur a dangerous enmity.

THE PRINCE AND THE EMPEROR.

The recent speech of Prince NAPOLEON ought to be studied by party orators as an illustration of independent party criticism. The cousin of the Emperor, a probable member of the Regency should the Emperor die, and a possible successor to the throne, is really of the Emperor's party. But he has outlived many illusions and penetrated many more. He is, to borrow a theological phrase, a rationalist in supernaturism. He does not deceive himself by supposing that any glamour surrounds his heavy cousin in the minds of Frenchmen, and he knows that the family glory proceeds from the uncle. He has observed men and studied history, and he has undoubtedly decided that the only hope for the present dynasty in France lies in its transformation into an entirely constitutional government. In his speech, therefore, he does not hesitate to demand it. He does not propose the end of the Empire or the only plan, but he points out its serious defects, and he criticises the imperial régime with the vigor of a friend. This is the point which makes his speech interesting as a study of true party oratory. It is serviceable, not servile.

Prince NAPOLEON says that the Senatus Consultum introduced into the Napoleonic liberty is to the strength of the empire. This he believes to be an imperial tradition, and he makes the remarkable assertion that his studies have satisfied him that his uncle, the great NAPOLEON, returned from Elba a convert to constitutional principles. He does not deny that the nature of his genius made him prone to adopt old practices, but he is sure that his reason was convinced. The difficulty with the government of LOUIS PHILIPPE was, that it represented the citizens against the people, and the catastrophe was therefore inevitable. But now, when there are ten millions of electors, the government must represent their wishes. The Prince, therefore, logically objects that the Ministers are responsible, not to the Assembly, but to the Senate, which is appointed by the Emperor. Moreover, during the six months' adjournment of the Assembly the Senate may legislate under the Presidency of the Emperor, and even vote the budget. Then the Senate alone has the right to discuss the Constitution, which is preposterous. The election districts should no longer be gerrymandered by imperial decree, and the number of cities should be settled by the municipal councils, and not appointed by the Emperor.

These are the demands which the Prince NAPOLEON makes in the interest of liberty. He perceives, with every body else, the suspicious omissions and complexities of the proposed system, and he very flatly says: "When you seriously intend to practice political liberty, you will do pretty much what all other free peoples have done and are doing." That is the substance of the whole matter. If LOUIS NAPOLEON intends to establish a free constitutional system, the necessary measures are obvious. If he does not adopt them, they may very properly be suspected. The justice of the Prince's criticisms is entirely unaffected by his personal hopes and intentions. Whether he appears in his MAJESTY'S opposition to propitiate public favor, or to act as a scout and feeler for his MAJESTY, or is merely exercising his wits to amuse himself, is not in fact the honest critic that he seems, his speech undoubtedly points out the discrepancies between the provisions of the Senatus Consultum and a true constitutional system.

NOTES.

THE late Legislature of New York omitted to ask the Governor to send to Washington a certified copy of the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment. It was suggested that therefore it would not be recorded in the State Department. The acting Secretary of State therefore wrote to the Governor, who answered that the Legislature had not directed him to apprise the Secretary of State, but that he would send the required, and forwarded a copy officially attested by the clerks of the two Houses. Thereupon the World insists that not a word of this official notice. That the Governor has nothing whatever to do with the amendment except as the Legislature may ask him to send the notice to Washington. The "official notice" which the law requires is of course a copy officially attested by the proper Legislative authorities that the notice has now been transmitted to the State Department.

THE poem upon this page was evidently suggested by the illustration in the Weekly for August 28, called "An Heroic Boy." It is not the first time that our illustrations have suggested good poems. The striking sketch of "Sheridan's Ride," which was published in the Weekly some after the Battle of Cedar Creek, which has been often attributed to MR. NAST, but which was really by MR. ETTENGE, furnished the motive for DR. READ'S poem of that name, which is now in circulation in the form of a broad-side poem of the same title. A volume of poems by HENRY ABBEY, the author of the "Stowaway Boy," has recently been published by A. D. F. RANDOLPH & CO.

WHO makes and unmakes the postage stamps? The old style was neat and excellent, the new is execrable. Always a pleasant sentiment upon the portraits of distinguished citizens, but pictures of locomotives and jockeys are absurd. We learn that there is to be another change, and we hope that the reform will be a restoration, and that stamps will "stick."

THE Gold Telegraph, erected by Messrs. ALEX. M. HATS & CO., in front of their store, No. 23 Maiden Lane, will prove as useful to all persons interested in the price of gold as it is novel and ingenious to the general public. The indicator is placed upon a pedestal ten feet high, with telegraphic connection at the Gold Room, by means of which all changes in prices are instantly and faithfully recorded upon its dial. As nearly every one in the street is more or less interested in these changes, this new arrangement can but be regarded as of great public convenience.

THE Rev. WM. H. MILBURN has just returned to New York after an absence of sixteen months in England, whither he went annually to submit to an operation upon his eyes by GRAEFFE, of Berlin, the most eminent of all European oculists. Although his sight is slightly improved, the operation was, nevertheless, not a success:

"Seasons return, but not to him returns
Day, or the sweet approach of ev'n or morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But cloud instead, and ever-during dark;
Surrounds him, from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off."

While abroad, especially in England, MR. MILBURN was made the recipient of much attention from gentlemen eminent in literary, social, and professional life. During his travels he had rare opportunities of "seeing" and hearing what was going on among the notable folk of the Old World, and these observations he has embodied in a couple of lectures: one, "What a Blind Man saw in Paris;" the other, "A Blind Man's Experience in search of Sight." These he proposes to deliver during the coming season. They can not fail to be very popular.

THE STOWAWAY BOY.

(Suggested by our Illustration, "An Heroic Boy," in the Weekly for August 28.)

WHERE three days forth upon the salty sea,
There came out to the deck a little boy;
Not wherewithal to pay his way had he,
Yet looked up to the broad free sky with joy.
His face was bright and fair, for what is good
Shines out and rare not to be understood.

But on the boy a doubting eye was cast,
And thus the questioned him the master's mate:
He said that his step-father, near a mast
Had hidden him, with food, and bade him wait
Within the place, nor sell they vessel's hold,
Where a kind aunt would give him from her store.

The mate was slow to feel the story true,
And thought the sailors gave the boy his food,
And often questioned him before the crew;
The boy replied with steadfast fortitude.
At last the mate avowed the glaring lie
Should be considered as the boy must die.

Thereat he bade a sailor fetch a rope,
And pointing to the yard-arm, sternly said,
"Boy, in ten minutes you will be past hope,
And know the solemn silence of the dead,
Unless you speak, and spurn the lie away."
The boy but looked and said he might pray.

Above its ball of fire the tortured steam
Shrieked, hissed, and groaned in terror and in pain:
Yet worked the busy great muscles, limb and beam.
The vessel seemed a sea-gull or a crane
Beating the air that flood with wild wind.
And round and round her watery wings were whirled.

The sky bent over the contested sea,
And, like the boy's face, was both pure and clear;
The ship's folk gathered round more anxiously,
The Lord's Prayer from his earnest lips to hear.
The mate, in tears, by resolute sore oppressed,
Caught up the boy and clasped him to his breast!

Truth's simple grandeur is her priceless wear,
And virtue's at the crown upon her head;
So plain is she that even a child may dare
To take her hand and go where she will tread.
On her shall serpent error fascinate,
She strikes it down and rules in time and fate.

Cling thou to Truth and keep her rigid line,
Nor ponder on the false on which it leans;
Truth dwells with wisdom, makes the face to shine,
Lends on to honor, is the friend of kings;
Oh, in thy trial hour, whate'er befall,
Trust her with firm faith and all in all.

HENRY ABBEY.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEW YORK has one mile of railroad to 19285.7 of population; New Jersey, one to 992.5; New Hampshire, one to 760; Vermont, one to 1000; Massachusetts, one to 997.9; Connecticut, one to 816.1; Pennsylvania, one to 1,000; Ohio, one to 1,000; Michigan, one to 849.3; Indiana, one to 689.6; Illinois, one to 718.5; Wisconsin, one to 1,043.4; Minnesota, one to 747; Iowa, one to 700; Nebraska, one to 228; Kansas, one to 407; West Virginia, one to 1044; Virginia, one to 900; North Carolina, one to 1000.1; South Carolina, one to 700; Georgia, one to 1,000; Florida, one to 343.1; Alabama, one to 1192; Mississippi, one to 890; Tennessee, one to 1,000.

Senator Brownlow, of Tennessee, has sold his interest in the Knoxville Whig, and says he has forsworn both he owns no part of any newspaper establishment in that State whatever.

Governor Chamberlain's majority in the Maine election in September, is estimated at about 9000 over both the other candidates.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Emperor Napoleon was sufficiently recovered to appear in the streets of Boulogne on the 21st. Two days later he assisted at a Council of Ministers.

The remains of Lady Palmerston, deceased, have been interred in the family vault in Westminster Abbey.

The title of Baron is conferred on the State Department at a letter from Liverpool to the contagion called murrain, Washington that a bull has been broken out among the cattle or hoof and mouth disease in England. Although not as fatal as the rinderpest, at which it is similar, it has occasioned much concern and the importation into the United States.

Victor Emanuel has consented that his son, the Duke of Genoa, shall be a candidate for the Spanish throne. The prospects of the Duke of Genoa, as a candidate, are reported to be encouraging.

The Spanish press is quite excited on account of General Sickles's note to the Government intimating that the United States may shortly recognize the Cubans as belligerents. Some journals go so far as to say that he will be dismissed before he quits Spain because he favored the annexation of Cuba to the United States.

Thomas John Penn, the last descendant of William Penn, recently died in London.

CAUGHT IN A SHOWER.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

THE HUMBOLDT CENTENNIAL.

THE 14th of September—the centennial anniversary of the birthday of ALEXANDER HUMBOLDT—was celebrated generally throughout the country. In Boston there were three distinct celebrations, the most important of which was at the Music Hall, where Prof. AGASSIZ delivered an eloquent eulogium upon the scientific career of his great countryman and predecessor in science. But the most remarkable of the celebrations in this country took place at the New York Central Park, where was unveiled a bust of Baron HUMBOLDT, of which we give an illustration on this page.

It is a somewhat singular fact, that the only busts that have yet been located in Central Park are those of SCHILLER and HUMBOLDT, both Germans. This bust of HUMBOLDT is said to be the best in existence. It was made by Prof. GUSTAV BLAESER, of Berlin, who was a friend of HUMBOLDT in his lifetime, and who possessed the only mask ever taken of him. He has recently modeled a bust of HUMBOLDT for the King of Prussia.

The bust of HUMBOLDT in Central Park is located near the Scholars' Gate, at Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street. It rests on a square pediment of granite, and has a total height of twelve feet from the ground. It is about three times the size of life, and presents a most attractive appearance. In front it bears the inscription, "ALEX. VON HUMBOLDT;" on one side the name of the artist, "GEBR. BLAESER—Berlin, 1869;" and on the other the names of the makers, "GEORG HOWALDT & SOHN, gegr. Braunschweig, 1869."

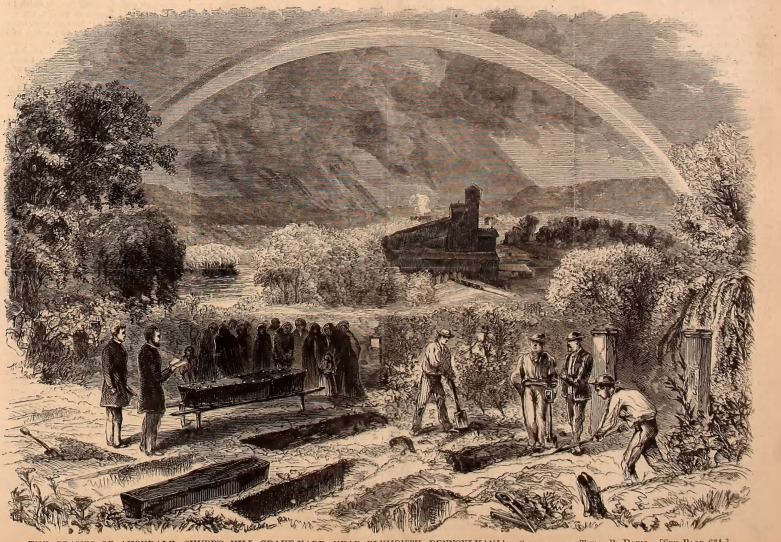
The number of persons present at the celebration was not less than 25,000. On either side of the bust a platform was erected, covered with a large awning, and hung around with bunting (the American and German flags intertwined). Small American flags also decorated the front and sides of these platforms. The one on the right was reserved to the speakers, the Committee of Arrangements, and the invited guests, and the other was appropriated to the reporters. The various singing societies, having filed into the Park, took places in front of the bust, the flags of these organizations being grouped together on the left of the orchestra, which was seated in front of the northernmost platform.

BUST OF BARON ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT, NEAR THE SCHOLARS' GATE, NEW YORK CENTRAL PARK.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.]

At 2 o'clock the assemblage was called to order by C. E. DETMOLD, Chairman of the Humboldt Monument Association, and after the orchestra had performed the overture to "Oberon," he formally presented the monument to the Commissioners of the Park, with an appropriate address. Then the statue was unveiled by FRED. KUHNE, consul at this port for the North German Confederation, and WILLIAM AUFERMANN. ANDREW H. GREEN replied to the presentation address, and his graceful speech was followed by a scholarly and elaborate address by Prof. FRANCIS LIEBER. Speaking of the appropriateness of locating the bust in this city, he said:

"HUMBOLDT, though a German in the lineaments of his character and talents, was, of all modern men, the one whose endeavors, aspirations, and fame were least limited by national demarkations. If we take the word Catholic in a sense agreeable to its etymology, he was the most catholic man in modern times. Europe, Asia, and America were equally his by visit and discovery. He wrote scientific dissertations with equal satisfaction in German, French, and Spanish. New York is for the most international, or, as the Greeks would have expressed it, all-national place in the world, where Asiatics, Africans, and Europeans meet, traveling eastward or westward. This is the fittest, real and symbolical, of the place where we now stand, for the monumental image of ALEXANDER HUMBOLDT—a fitness which will be increased by the proposed Museum of Natural History to be established in yonder building, in former times an arsenal of the United States. A German collection of great value has already been purchased for this purpose, by means furnished by liberal citizens of ours; and the traveler, BECKMANN, the pupil of AGASSIZ, the follower of HUMBOLDT, will be the director of this collection."

It is now ten years since HUMBOLDT's death. The celebration of September 14 was not simply a recognition of his services to science, but also a tribute to the human intellect.



THE GRAVES OF AVONDALE—SHUPP'S HILL GRAVE-YARD, NEAR PLYMOUTH, PENNSYLVANIA.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 634.]

MY BROTHER LEONARD.

By JULIA KAVANAGH.

It has always seemed to me, since I passed those giddy but happy years of youth when we feel too much to care to think—it has, I say, always seemed to me, that some of us are born to act and to suffer, and others to sit passively and look on. From childhood upward to this present hour—when I sit writing alone, a white-haired woman, in an old chateau of Provence—to be the silent witness of my brother Leonard's life has been my lot. No lover ever came to me in dream of love ever crossed my path. But I do not regret it; no, I do not regret it, though I am now a childless old maid, pale and withered. If love, with its blessings and its torments, had sought me, if a husband had taken me to another home than this, what should I have known of this shy and noble heart which grief never conquered, but a great joy broke and stilled forever?

According to the world's estimate my brother Leonard's life was not an eventful one. For in this, too, the years allotted to the actors in the great drama of life are unequally divided. Some get the glorious destinies. Their star sets or rises in a sort of conspetuous splendor, and after a long track of light behind it through the dull pages of history. So far as I can see, they are not more noble, more heroic, more beneficent than others of whom there is no record, who live and die unremembered save by a few faithful hearts. But, after all, what matter? What is it to my brother Leonard in his grave if the world never knew that it lost in him a pure heart, efficient and true as that which once beat in the breast of Bayard—of the knight who knew neither reproach nor fear, and who died in the midst of a living without a stain? My brother Leonard never wielded lance or sword, but there are other battles fought in life than those in which blood is shed; and of all who ever struggled nobly against adverse fate, who knew how to bear defeat, or, harder still, how not to triumph over a conquered enemy, none were ever more worthy of honor than this unremembered man.

He was the younger and I the youngest of a large family of children, all born in this old Provençal nest built on a rock above the Mediterranean Sea. It is an old manor enough, as you will think it so; I like its yellow sun-burnt front and the square tower which rises above its low roof, and its many arched windows, with stone balconies, which flash again in the fiery light of the setting sun. I like its broad view of an azure sea with a whitened sail thereon, and even the old vine which surround our old home I like too. For in that desert our green garden is like a beautiful oasis, cool and shady. It is an old-fashioned garden—they have none such now—with straight alleys and clipped trees; here and there are a few heathen statues, moss-stained and mildewed, appear in the bowers; and on the lawn, in front of the house, a handsome fountain sends up all its waters, howsoever hot the noonday sun may be. But why do I speak of all this? I am the last of the line, I suppose, and in my heart of hearts their once hot Provençal blood is dying away feebly.

We were great and rich once, say the records of Provence; but the religious wars proved our undoing. We were Catholics, and had many a fight with our old foes and neighbors, the Huguenots of Saint Saint Foys, who held the new faith. We beat them, of course; but though we were fierce and revengeful, we scorned to enrich ourselves with the spoils of our enemies; and as they soon bent to the storm, the warfare which well-nigh ruined us left them rich. Better times succeeded them, and worse times for us; they married heiresses and throve, while we wedded poor girls, had large families, and got poorer and poorer. We had but a slender pittance left under the First Napoleon's reign, but we hated the De Sainte Foys, whose old château can be seen from our hill went on adding wings and building "pavilions," while our poor old manor remained much the sight of it fed our hate. As a child I looked at it with wrath; and even now, when it holds all that is dearest to me, I never care to gaze at its broad façade.

My brother Leonard and I were the only survivors of a large family, and many years older than us. Both our parents were dead, and we lived here alone with a maiden aunt, a pale, faded woman, now dead. I am now, why glided noiselessly about the old rooms and seldom spoke.

All the De Sainte Foys were handsome, and all the De Launays were tall. My brother was six feet high, a gaunt, thin young man, with harsh features, keen eyes, and hasty eyebrows. He was a great sportsman, yet most conscientiously tender-hearted. I never saw him strike his dogs, I never saw him hurt a fly; once his gun was out of his hands he was the gentlest of creatures. For all that he was a great hater. Especially did he hate the Comte de Sainte Foy, Bonaparte, and perhaps he hated him all the more that the De Sainte Foys were devoted to the new dynasty, and spent all their time in Paris. I remember the scornful looks my brother often cast on the closed windows of their château, when he met them, "he cannot even keep his servers; any thing for money, any thing for rank; just like them!"

I was not in a convent when I was ten years old, and I remained there till I was seventeen. The nuns were very kind to me, but spite their kindness I pined for my old home, and the sea dashing up the beach, and the green garden with its mutilated statues and its little fountain. So, when I stepped out of the convent-gates into the little carriole which had been sent for me with our old servant Saint Jean, I was, spite a few tears shed at parting from my kind companions, as gay as a lark. The sun was setting when we reached home. The sun-burnt hind looked delighted with fire and gold, and our old manor seemed almost fresh and young again in the glorious light. I skipped lightly out of the little jolting car; I ran up the stone steps, still as worn and uneven as of yore; I entered the hall and hall with all the grim De Launays looking down at me from the walls—we were not a handsome family—and I felt the happiest creature on earth till my aunt, coming down stairs to meet me, told me that Leonard was away in Paris, and that no one knew when he would come back. This sobered me at once. I felt anxious. The times were troubled. Napoleon had left Elba and been crushed at Waterloo. Louis reigned in Sainte Foy, I knew, was a proscribed man, for we had met a party of soldiers in search of him. Yet, sadly-constantly, my heart, the young hearter, was safe! "Oh yes, quite safe," answered my aunt. Then, looking at me wistfully, she added, "Of Rose"—she was the youngest sister of mine seems now!—"we have a guest. Our old cousin the Viscount died, you know, leaving a widow and child almost destitute; they are both here, and are likely to remain. You will do well to be friendly with them. Madame Delange is a great beauty, and has been rather spoiled, and her little girl is very willful; but still," said my aunt, looking at me in her doubtful way, "you will try to be friendly with them." Youth is inclined to friendliness, and so my aunt's cool reception did not overpower me, I cheerfully promised to be all that the beautiful Madame De Launay could wish. I had an immediate opportunity of showing that my amiable I was; she did not appear, and when my aunt left me to attend to some domestic matters I remained alone.

But does solitude really exist for youth with the delightful companionship of its thousand dreams and hopes? Is it not better than any sitting about it like gay motes in the noonday sun? Besides, could I feel lonely in the home of my childhood? I went all over the house, and found it unchanged after all those years; then I ran down to the garden, so fresh and spicy in the morning dew, to the melancholy green nook, I looked fondly at the poor old statues and fancied that they looked back kindly at me. I was half crazy with the joy of being home again.

Of all the rooms in the manor there was one which, even as a child, I had loved best—the upper room in the square turret, whence there was a view of land and sea unrivaled in the province, it was said. I remember I had climb up to it now, like the Lady of Malbrook in the ballad, and gaze at a blue sea and a pale sky, where white stars hung. Then, through the horizon was still rosy with departed fires! Perhaps I might even see a boat gliding into the entrance—one of those low boats with broad lateen sails which I had so often thought of in my juvenile convent home.

There is a broad central staircase in our manor, with steps of massive stone and balustrades of iron, which runs from the ground floor to the house, and ends in a long corridor, full of doors, all leading to untenanted chambers save one. Which gives access to a small, winding wooden stairs that climb up the body of the square tower, and take one to a little room with four windows and a terrace outside. This room I entered now, for my breath has failed me of late; my sight, too, is weak and dim, and sees no more than it once beheld from the top of God's world, but I was light as a bird then, ay, and as keen-eyed too, and in a few minutes I had reached the room in the tower. It was just as I had left it, even my childish remembrance of it. I had ever known it bleak and bare-looking, and now it had a mouldy sort of look. Nevertheless, there was a flask of wine on a table, and when I cautiously lifted up an old piece of tapestry which divided the room from the terrace, I discovered a low camp-bed behind it. "I suppose some servant sleeps here," I thought, and stepping out through one of the windows on the terrace, I looked around me with a delight which made me forget all the evening cares of my childhood and clear, the sea lay calm and lovely beneath me, and far as the eye could reach there spread a noble land stretching away in the distance, looking hills. It was very fine, but I had no time to linger over the beauty around me. It was resumed if ever, and I returned quickly to the room within. Hiding behind the shutters of the open window I listened and peeped in.

"I tell you I won't!" cried a shrill voice; "and I never said that I could. You must marry him."

The low weeping of a woman answered him. I saw the man first. He was no servant, as I had thought, but a gentleman, and, though long dead youth, one of the handsomest men I had ever seen. He stood facing me with his arms folded across his breast, and a careless, defiant look in his dark eyes. He was speaking to the clear evening sky. The lady was leaning against the wall with one of her hands resting on a chair. I could see her at the back, but could not see her face to me I was bewildered at her beauty. He was handsome, but enchanting loveliness are the only words that can describe her. If such she looked to me when overpowered by sorrow, what must she have been when gladness beamed from those deep blue eyes, and happy smiles played on that sweet young face with its cloud of golden hair? I was a child, and had seen handsome creatures out of the fairy tales, and I was all amazement to see them here.

"O heavens!" she cried, wringing her white hands in an agony of grief, "have I betrayed him for that?"

"Why need he know it?" asked her companion, drawing toward her. I was very young, very innocent, and would not understand their meaning; but some instinct made me rise to me when the door of the turret-chamber, which had remained ajar, opened, and my brother Leonard came in with such a look on his white face as I had never seen there before. She uttered a low cry, and starting back he turned pale as death; but Leonard raised his hand, and uttered an imperious "Hush!" which silenced them. For a moment the room was so still that I could hear the low dash of the water on the shore below.

"So that is the end," said Leonard, looking at them in sorrow and in scorn; "that is the end of trust and faith in man and woman. I can answer—I will answer—for myself. I shall deal first with you. As the widow of my cousin you asked me for a home, and I gave you one. When you came to this house with your child, your beauty, I confess it, touched my heart; but if you had not one day given me to understand that you had seen my love, and that it might be welcome, I never should have wooed a lady so young and beautiful as you are. On such a basis, however, I spoke, and was accepted. I promised to become your protector and the father of your child; and you, I suppose, promised to be true to me. How have you kept your pledge? Speak—but no, do not answer; be silent—let not at least your lips be perjured, even though your heart is false." He ceased: he was dreadfully agitated, and the lady sobbed pitifully: but he soon recovered, and turning to her companion, he said, almost calmly: "You, Monsieur De Sainte Foy, came to me in your pavil, and, trusting to my generosity and honor, bade me reverse the old feud of our ancestors by saving your life. How did I receive you? Like a brother. And how have you requited me? You know me to be your errand I went to Paris. Well, Sir, I have succeeded; you are pardoned. You can leave this house; you can see her before me more. I will go back openly to your own home, where you, too, have a child, Sir, a boy, for whose sake you implored my protection, but much, much sooner do not forget to take this baby with you."

"I can not—I am married," sullenly said Monsieur De Sainte Foy, for the first time attempting to answer my brother.

"You are a widower, Sir," answered Leonard, gravely; "I pity the wife died while I was in Paris. I repeat it, you can take this lady with you. And, Sir," he added, with a look of scorn which, even beneath his heavy eyebrows, "let me advise you to do her justice. She is the widow of your kinsman, and she has no protector now. I say no more; you are my guest, and though you have forgotten it, Sir, I remember it still." So he sayings, he turned and left the room. My eyes were blind with tears, and my heart was full of sorrow for my brother Leonard. I stood a while shaking down in my hiding bosom as he came out then, when I was, or at least when I looked calm, I entered the room. The guilty pair had vanished: they left the manor that night, and this was the story of my brother's youth.

From that day forth Leonard was an altered man. He became silent and bookish—a great reader. His gun was added to the rusty old armor in the hall, and remained there unused; his days were spent in the library. His two hounds, Capitaine and Diane, used to go and seek him there, looking at him with wistful questioning eyes as if they thought he was unkind to caress and a kind word, they could not lure him forth. "Why should I go and murder poor harmless creatures? I never wronged or betrayed me?" he once said, and that was the only allusion I ever heard him make to the treachery that had darkened his existence. The blessing of a long life was not granted to the betrayers. Both died within a year of their marriage. A young De Launay brought up in Paris, and seldom came to Provence; his step-mother's child was adopted by a distant relation of the family, and lived with her mother; she, too, married and died young; we never saw her. And thus time passed, and I, the youngest child and favorite of my aunt's death kept house for my brother Leonard, a hale and vigorous old man, whose locks were gray indeed, but whose eyes were as firm and whose eyes were as keen as ever. He was cheerful, too, and the joyous heartiness of his laugh was something to remember in a man of his years. We left home rarely, and the last time that business took us forth our return was made memorable by a very unpleasant event. We had been a week away, and I felt heartily glad when I saw once more the square tower rising above the trees, and the old manor. Leonard, too, uttered a relieved "Ah!" as the helped me to alight, and Geneviève, our trusty old female servant, came forth to meet us with a beaming face.

"Thank Heaven!" she said, crossing herself, "it had come back safely, and you are safe, too, and gone away, but all was right now, and the little girl had come quite safely, praised to Heaven!" A real cheer of thanksgiving her grandmother had been foolish and wicked enough to marry a De Sainte Foy, the child—glory be to all the saints!—did not take after that breed."

Here was news for us! The relations of that poor little orphan, on such scarce and scanty a soil with such a scanty nourishment her as we, had taken advantage of our absence to deceive poor Geneviève. Without uttering a word my brother opened the door of her sitting-room. In a large room, with brown oaken walls and a polished floor. A stream of red sunshine from the west was pouring in through the farthest window, that at which I always sit, because it has a deep recess in the thick wall, on which I put my work. To this ledge the little stranger had climbed, and there she now sat in a forlorn attitude, with her feet gathered beneath her, and her little hands clasped around her knees. She might be six or seven years old. She looked fair as a lily in her deep mourning, and when she turned toward us, and shook back her yellow curls to look at us with wistful wonder in her deep blue eyes, I knew that we had found the most beautiful grandmother. I looked at my brother Leonard. His heavy brows were bent, and his keen eyes fastened on the child with a steady gaze. He smiled, too, rather a grim ironical smile, which seemed to say, "So the traitress has come back to De Launay after all." But the little thing returned his look very fearlessly, and, to my surprise, smiled up in his face, and never minded me.

We had not the heart to send her away. We kept her, and I soon loved her dearly. She was a good, lovely, and joyous creature. It was like having a bird in the house, or any thing bright and gay, to have her in the house. Leonard never took the least notice of her. I sometimes fancied he did not see her, so unconscious did he seem of her presence. Yet of us two it was this child and servant whom the man of reserve child preferred. She would leave me any day to sneak after him. Lucie had been a year with us when Geneviève, who doted on her, came in one afternoon with startled looks. The child was missing; she had been searched for over all the manor, and she was not to be found. My brother looked up from his book, and rose. I followed him up the central stairs, then up again in the tower to the chamber, which he unlocked, and there we found Lucie fast asleep in his chair, curled round like a faithful little spaniel waiting for its master.

My brother never said a word, but took her up and carried her down stairs, still fast asleep, and when Lucie woke she was on his own knee, in his arms, and from that day forth in his heart. They were seldom apart. If you heard my brother's stately tones calling for Lucie, you also heard a pair of little feet pattering after him. His loud, cheerful laugh was ever echoed by a child's voice chiming in with it, and if he looked himself up in the library for a book to read, the case was vain unless Lucie stood by the window: for Lucie would climb up to the sill, jump down, and, stealing behind his chair, lay her rosy cheek on his and mingle her golden locks with his iron-gray curls. How could he help loving a creature so endearing—one who thought, did, loved, and hated as he did, and who detested the De Sainte Foys as cordially as if she had been a genuine De Launay? I tried to check the feeling in the first place from motives of Christian, and in the second because the De Sainte Foys were in the shade just then. The son of my brother's betrayed love fell ill and died, and squandered or gambled all his large property away. The old chateau itself would have gone if he had not died rather suddenly, leaving his son son, a young man of whom report spoke well, and who, after his father's death, came to Provence with the intention, it was said, of remaining. It seemed strange to see the windows of the old château open again after they had been closed so many years; but we were glad to do it.

Monsieur De Sainte Foy had not been back more than a month, and Lucie was about seven years, when he unexpectedly called upon us one morning. I was working, Lucie sat by me unwinding silk, and my brother was reading, when our solitary servant, Geneviève, showed in the young man—all the De Sainte Foys were handsome—with a manly young face, in which I felt my heart to read a hereditary perfidy, but could not. There was truth in his dark eyes, truth in his smile, and truth in the very sound of his voice.

"Monsieur De Launay," he said, coming forward, "our cousins have not been friends, I am told; but I am young, I feel guiltless of the past, whatever it may be, and have no wish to cherish its remembrance in my heart. I had come to offer some to you hoping that you will be so good as to grant your neighborly advice and friendship as one who, though a stranger in this place, means to live and die in the home of those who have gone before him."

My brother looked very kindly, and held out his hand, and thus a league of amity was struck between the last of the De Launays and the last of the De Sainte Foys.

I had always deplored the old feud, but I had my fears about this reconciliation; and when young De Sainte Foy, who had married my brother's advice, became a frequent visitor at our house, I plainly told those fears to Leonard. Lucie was very lovely and very young, and both if the young gentleman should be smitten with her, and win her heart! "Well, and if they should love, there would be the harm?" he replied, very kindly.

Ah! what changes time can bring in its train! My brother would have wished for it, and when months passed, and no change came over the spirit of a dream, I read disappointment in his looks. Well, I was disappointed myself. Lucie grew each young, both handsome, both gifted and good, and both exactly suited to each other, as seemed to me. I could not imagine how they were without pleasure and parted without pain, as unconcerned as if the magic of the words "love" and "lover" were to them. Besides, I longed for a love-story. There had been none in my own life; my brother's had ended in bitterness, and my world out there perverse young things give me one? It would have been so pleasant to see them adoring each other, wandering about the garden hand in hand, and going through their pretty idyl in the green garden of our old manor. I was sorry that they did not care for each other, and I used to help saying so to my brother one evening as we walked alone in the garden. Lucie was up in the tower: she had taken a great fancy to it of late, and went up to it every evening.

"And I, too, am sorry," replied Leonard, shaking his gray locks regretfully: "for, Rose, I like that young man very dearly; strange that a De Launay should say so, is it not? But he does not care for the child, and love will be free. Where is she? In the tower, as usual. Let us go to her. I could close down here."

We had not known why I opposed Leonard's wish.

I seemed to have a presentiment of coming evil, and yet all I thought was that the stairs were steep and high, and that the exertion would be too much for my brother. But he only laughed, and said he would go and see what state the child was reading up there. He was soon tired, as I had foreseen, and obliged to rest on the dark stairs of the tower. A sound of voices from above came down to us. Lucie, if she was there, was not alone. I heard my brother breathing heavily.

"Leonard," I whispered, "let me go," for it was a man's voice that mingled with hers.

He did not answer, but he put me by; in a moment, as it seemed, he had reached the door and pushed it open. I followed him in. Lucie was alone in the room. Without looking at her, my brother went straight to the window, and said, calmly, "Lucie, you may come in, Sir."

And thus summoned, young Monsieur De Sainte Foy left the balcony and entered the room. I looked at them both. There they were—the two ingrates—as I had seen them so many years before; beautiful and deceiving, again bowing in the kind friend and the generous enemy; but they were younger than in those by-gone days, and I could read a deeper trace of grief on their two faces. My brother looked at them with the very look which I remembered—a cold and angry look; and he said, in a cold, hard voice:

"I have read somewhere that what has been is; that the same men and women have again and again to do the same deeds over and over, and I find the truth of it this day. You, Monsieur De Sainte Foy, come to me, your benefactor's enemy, asking our old animosity to be forgotten; and when I opened my house to you, as if you had been only a stranger, you abused my hospitality. Even so did your grandfather act, Sir, when I saved his life many years ago. Hush! you will speak directly. You," he added, turning to Lucie, "have betrayed me, your adopted father, as she whose image you are betrayed me, but I little thought a year, nor to your mother, you chose to do so with the descendant of the man to whom I was sacrificed. I, too, fulfilled my part in the sacrifice of an old man, and I was blind, trusting, and easily deceived. Well, as I acted before I shall act again. Let the lot you have chosen be your lot. You want the young girl, Monsieur De Sainte Foy? Take her! For the sake of the few drops of De Lancac blood which flow in her veins no one harm in the house till she becomes your wife; but I shall thank you both to have the wedding over quickly, and then let me see either of you no more."

Lucie buried her face in her hands and sobbed pitifully; but the young man became crimson and said, passionately,

"You are unjust, Sir; we have been imprudent, but treachery was not in our thoughts. I repeat it, you wrong us."

"Do you mean I am angry?" replied my brother Leonard. "Why, you could not help yourselves. It was in your blood to betray me, and it was not for me to be deceived by you."

"Ah! do not say so," cried Lucie, attempting to detain him as he turned to the door; but he who had so loved her looked at her with a look that she shrank back afraid. So we left them, and, turning back, I saw her, sinking on a chair, pale as death, while her lover stood there after my brother, gnawing his nether lip, as if he still smarted under the sting of those bitter words —"It was in your blood to betray me."

Sad and bitter were the days that followed this ill-fated evening. I attempted to say a few words for my brother, but my heart failed me, and I swear was, "Keep her out of my sight till they are married."

He was a willful man—one, too, whom the memory of a great wrong had embittered. It was useless to dispute his commands, and I told Lucie so.

"I have deserved it," was her only answer; and she submitted, and kept out of his way.

The wedding was to be a speedy one, according to my brother's wish; but, oh! how joyless were the few preparations, and with how heavy a heart I made mine! Three days before this he appointed for the marriage I again tried to move Leonard. I was a clear and calm evening, and we sat together on the wooden bench in the bower where the dilapidated Pan is ever playing on a broken reed. I pleaded for the two culprits. I spoke of their youth, of the wish he had felt for their union, of forgiveness and indulgence. He heard me out, then said to me:

"I trusted them, and they deceived me without need, without cause. By what magic can I ever trust them again?"

I felt silenced. What is there, indeed, that can restore a lost faith? Still, I was seeking for some argument wherewith to meet his own, when we were both startled by a sound of steps on the graveled path. Lucie and young De Sainte Foy stood before us. My brother's pale face flushed; he took a slight hectic tinge, and he looked angrily at them both, but said not one word.

"Monsieur De Launac," said the young man —and I had never seen a nobler and a more loyal look on man's face than I then saw on his—"we would not thus intrude upon you if we could help doing so, but we can not; be so good, therefore, as to bear with us for a few moments."

"Speak," impatiently said my brother.

"All you have to say is this: love was born and ripened in ignorance; our interviews were the result of accident; we never designed to deceive you, or to betray your trust, and you have laid upon us the burden of a sin and a shame which, however much appearances may condemn us, we will not bear. We love each other sincerely dearly, but having no other means to convince you, we have resolved to part forever rather than give you the right to think that we, the descendants of two who unhappily wronged you, have combined to betray you in your old age as you were betrayed by them in your youth. In your presence, therefore, and with her full consent, I give up all claim to this young lady's love. Here I bid her adieu forever, and let the bitterness of this parting be a penance for the imprudence which has cost us both so dear."

I looked at Leonard; I could scarcely see him, my eyes were so dim with tears; but he replied, in a low bitter voice:

"Yes, the old man has but a few years to live. It will do to wait till he is in his grave, will it not?"

"Ah! we have not deserved this!" cried Lucie.

"No, we have not deserved it," answered her lover. "Sir, you wrong us very much indeed. A thought so cruel as that of waiting for your death never came to us. Your wrong is to be irrevocable. My house and land are to be sold, and the first vessel which leaves Marseilles will take me to India. We may never meet again; and if we do, years will have passed over us—years and their changes. If you do not trust us, if you think we are acting a part and speculating on your grave, the sin be yours, not ours."

"Marvelous!" replied my brother Leonard, with a low, ironical laugh. "A young man gives up his mistress, a girl gives up her lover, and all for the sake of a gray-headed old man! Do not ask me to believe it."

"Sir, it is not merely for your sake that we part," said Monsieur De Sainte Foy, with more light in his dark eye; "it is also for the sake of our honor. Our error has sullied it, but our sacrifice shall redeem it. Sir, you yourself, Sir, you our accuser, shall confess it."

My brother was staggered, but he would not relent.

"Yes, yes, I know," he said, impatiently; "you think I am one of those soft-hearted stage fathers, who, when the lovers kneel, weep over the blessing in the last act. You are mistaken. If Lucie gives you up, she must give you up entirely. I will not bear, like a fool—entirely I ask for no sacrifice; I expect none. But if you do give up this thing for the sake of your honor, you must not look for mine."

"We mean it so," answered the young man, in a low tone. "Lucie." He turned to her. She twined her arms round his neck, for a few moments they stood before us in the pale moonlight, clasped in so passionate an embrace that it seemed as if they would never part. Then they fled. Neither spoke, neither wept; but when I looked at them—so young, so fond, so noble, and so handsome—and thought that they were to part, I could not restrain my tears. My brother looked on unmoved, and remained cold and relenting. Young Monsieur De Sainte Foy at length put her by, and walked away without bidding us farewell. She stood looking after him, pale and tearless.

"Lucie," quietly said my brother, "you may call him back, if you please, to-morrow."

She looked at him swiftly, with a vague hope, poor child; but there was no relenting in my brother's eye, so back she went to her room, to only shook her head, as much as to say, "I do not repent."

I have often wondered how my dear brother, so generous, so kind, could be so hard to these two. But he had trusted them entirely, and it seemed his very heart had been broken. He was deceived him. Indeed, there was no reason why they should have done so. It must have been the wayward impulse of youth, which, from the first into this needless secrecy, giving sweetness to a hidden love. I could have made all these allowances for them, if others did not; but Leonard could not. He was hard because he was himself the soul of truth and honor, and he was unrelenting because the memory of his old wrong had never left him. It may also be, that in his secret heart he thought that the two could easily forget him, and forgive them in the end; but it was not to be.

Lucie bore this great trial with quiet fortitude. She looked pale, and her old joyousness was gone; but if she grieved or wept, she kept both from me and everyone besides. To her father she was as gentle and affectionate as ever. His manner to her was unaltered, save for a slight shade—a very slight shade—of more severe sadness. I think my heart must have been young still in those days, for I kept on hoping to the last. I used to watch my brother's inflexible face, trying to read signs of pity or forgiveness in his harsh features, but I saw them not. Then, I confess it, I acted a little lie. I went out daily, sheltered under his hearing, or lock persistently at the château of the Sainte Foys, when we were in the garden, or sometimes in the house, but whenever Lucie left the room; but my brother would not see, he would not hear—he never remembered me, nor gave me the opportunity I wanted. At length I got desperate, and spoke to him one evening.

"Leonard," I said, "will you not relent? Do you know that young De Sainte Foy's house and land are for sale, and will go to the highest bidder? Do you know that he sails for India tomorrow on board the Memphis?"

"You have seen him, then," Leonard, knitting his heavy eyebrows, "and he has asked you to say all this to me?"

"I have seen him, but not spoken to him," I replied, a little angrily. "He is the shadow of his former self—so pale, so worn, so sad, has he grown at all this. Do not let him go, Leonard."

"He will come back when I am in my grave," answered Leonard, moodily. It was useless to argue. Mistrust had taken an iron grasp of him, and would not let him go again.

The evening of the following day we missed Lucie. Geneviève told us that Mademoiselle had gone up to the tower: I guessed what had taken her there, but Leonard did not seem to think that she might wish for solitude, for he said to me, "Let us go to her."

Never shall I forget the sight that met us as we entered that ill-fated room. It was full of a broad ruddy glow which came from the sea, lighting up the coast for miles around; a vessel was on fire! My heart seemed to stand still in the horror of that moment, and yet how I remember the pale evening sky, with the round white moon so dim and Lucie's ghastly face and wild eyes, as she stood gazing on the cruel sight in mute despair!

My brother stared at the burning vessel. "God forgive me, miserable sinner!" he cried—"God forgive me!" And he sank back with a groan, and would have fallen but for me.

He never recovered that blow; for it was the Memphis whose destruction we thus witnessed, and young De Sainte Foy on board. He had sailed in her, was not among the few who escaped to tell her lamentable history. He was the last of his name, and with him, and the line of our landed proprietors, ended.

And Leonard, as I said, never recovered that blow. His vigorous old age gave place to decrepitude; his gray hairs grew white, his form was bent, his step became feeble and unsteady. The knowledge of his innocence and hardness had doomed that brave and true young man to a cruel death. I could comfort Lucie, his darling, to go through the agony of such a grief, was more than he could bear. He brooded over the bitterness of remorse.

The weather was fine, and that part of the garden where he could sit and look at the château of the Sainte Foys, now closed and shuttered on its ancient tenants, was that which he liked best. He would sit there, gazing at the shut-up mansion for hours at a time. When I found the house him from this bitter contemplation he only shook his head and said: "It was an old quarrel, a long quarrel, and its hatred ages, but the De Sainte Foys had the best of it in the long-run, Rose. For better perish on board the burning Memphis—their own best, their own life for honor, than live to be a hard and revengeful old man."

This was the thought that was killing him. He took like a child, and the doctor was recalled in, "and then you may hope to save him."

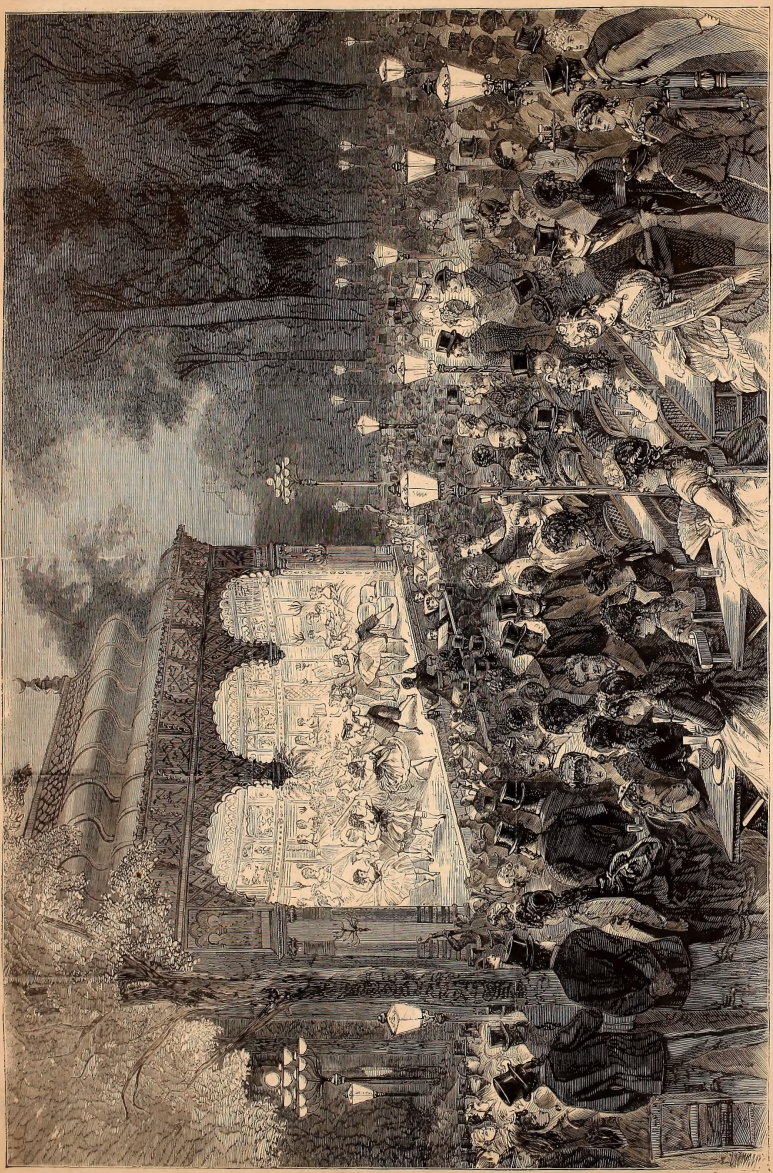
Make him forget! I would have laid down my life for it—oh, how gladly!—but it passed my power; Lucie herself did her best, and failed. Then she, too, really fell and suffered, and never showed. She was a generous little creature, and from that day forward her grief clung to her heart, and kept it there fast locked from our view. Her one thought seemed to be to help to console, and no longer read now, though when he could not go to the garden to look at the château of the De Sainte Foys he would sit in the house with a book lying unread before him, his moody eyes ever seeming to gaze on the tragic ending of the ill-fated Memphis. And he once more was intensely cold to Lucie. She would stand in upon him as she had so often stolen in her childhood, and by her chair, or at her feet, sit and silently believe she had never loved him more tenderly than she did then, perhaps because of the same old grief pressing on both they both suffered, and which, as I saw with an aching heart, was wasting them both away. This had lasted three weeks—weeks that are years—when the end came.

We were all sitting in the garden, I remember, in that very arbor where the poor girl had first met her lover, and by whom Geneviève used up to us with startled looks.

"Monsieur!—Mademoiselle!" she gasped.

He is alive—he is here!"

My brother rose as with an electric shock. His strode rose as with an electric shock. His strode rose as with an electric shock. His strode



AN OPEN-AIR THEATRE IN PARIS.—[See Page 637.]

THE LITTLE PEACE-MAKER.

SEPTEMBER.

FLASH out, thou glowing ember
Of a year that is expiring,
With the flame of red September
The maple woodlands firing;
With the sparkle and the glinter,
And the flash of royal wine,
Warm our chilly hearts ere Winter
Shall seal thee with his sign.

The sumach bush is turning
To gold and crimson splendor,
The maple woods are burning
Far in the distance tender;
The tinted hill-sides glimmer
Within a purple haze,
Their brightness growing dimmer
As fade the Autumn days.

The vines, in gorgeous tangle,
Over hoary rocks are trailing;
Each roughened point and angle
With brown and scarlet veining;
And where the pine-tree towers
The purple asters bloom,
Lifting their starry flowers
To light the emerald gloom.

The apple-tree commences
To shed its fruitage mellow,
Beside the orchard fences
The goldenrod is yellow;
And all the green things growing
Have ripened to their full,
With Autumn sweets glowing
And golden over all.

Flame higher, fading ember
Of a year that now is dying,
While the haze of red September
Are on the hill-sides lying;
In the beauty and the sweetness
Of these perfect Autumn days
Crown all the year's completeness
With a coronal of praise.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book I.

CHAPTER X.

THE GAUNTLET.

SIR JOHN GALE, after his first appearance in the vicar's parlor, came daily to sit there.

His afternoon visit became an established custom, and, after the second time, it seemed as though he had been familiar there for years.

He grew stronger very quickly. It was not long before he began to speak of departing. There seemed, indeed, to be no valid reason why he should linger at the vicarage. And yet he staid on.

"I shall go abroad as soon as we have some assurance of milder weather," he said to Mr. Lewincourt. "Spring is delicious in Italy. I shall wait, however, until I hear that the Alps are not too impassible; for, of all things, I detest a sea voyage, and the two hours in the Channel are always worse to me than a week's hard travelling. Meanwhile—"

"Meanwhile, why not remain here?" said the vicar. "There is no need for you to make a move until you set off for the south."

To this Sir John Gale replied that his instruction at Shipley vicarage had already been long enough; that he should never forget his host's kindness, but it behooved him not to trespass on it too far; that, although he certainly had no ties of friendship or relationship which specially claimed his presence just then in any other part of England, he must nevertheless make up his mind to set off south to Shipley as soon as the doctor's permission to travel could be obtained.

All this, with more to the same purpose, said Sir John Gale. And yet he lingered on.

The spring set in early, after a severe winter. By the beginning of April there came soft, bright days, with a southerly breeze which tempted the inmates of the vicarage forth from the house.

Scene-and-arrangement-mindedly followed the dinner-party at Mrs. Sheardown's.

One afternoon Sir John, beholding from his chamber-window Miss Lewincourt strolling in the garden, presently ventured forth to join her.

"May I walk here, Miss Lewincourt?" he asked, pausing at the threshold of the glass door that led into the garden.

"Oh, by all means! But is it sunny enough here? For the morning-gown you wear, and if you are not afraid to venture further, you would have more warmth and a southern aspect there, beyond the gate."

So Veronica and her father's guest wandered slowly on and on, looking out over the country, dappled with cloud shadows, gazing at the far, hazy horizon, pausing now and again for a moment, till presently proceeding in their course until they reached the church-yard of St. Gildas.

Sir John declared that the balmy air was a cordial that he could take more good than any medicines. Still, warm as it was for the season, he dared not sit in the church-yard to rest, and, as he turned to go back, he was evidently tired.

A frown darkened his face. "I ought not to have come so far without Paul," he said. "I am still so de—so unaccountably weak."

"It is my fault!" exclaimed Veronica. "Let me be Paul's substitute." She offered Sir John the support of her arm with perfect tact and self-possession, as though it were the most natural and ordinary proceeding in the world.

After that occasion the daily walk became a matter of course.

The temporary absence of Miss Desmond from the vicarage was by no means regretted by Sir John. In truth, he did not like Maud. Some word to that effect escaped him in speaking to Veronica.

"You must not say that to papa, Sir John," said she, looking quietly up at him.

"Say what?"

"That you do not like Miss Desmond."

"Of course not. I never said so to any one. It would be untrue. Miss Desmond is a very charming lady, very charming and very young, and perhaps her youth explains a slight touch, the very slightest touch, of—self-sufficiency. Yes. We grow tolerant and sceptical as we get older. Helas!"

"Maud is not self-sufficient. She is only very earnest and very honest."

"Miss Desmond is happy in having so warm and generous a friend. I am sure you have been kind to her out of respect for Miss Desmond. I have no doubt that she possesses the most admirable qualities; only her manner is a little—a little hard and chilly, if I may venture to say so."

"At heart she is really very impulsive."

"Is she?"

"But she has great self-command in general."

"I am bound to say that she must have. Any thing less impulsive than Miss Desmond's manner I have seldom seen. But forgive me. I will not say another word that shall even seem like disparagement of one for whom you entertain so warm an affection."

Sir John spoke with a winning deference of sweetness of manner, and looked with indignized admiration into the beautiful face by his side.

Such looks were now not rare on his part. Veronica, in her retrospective meditations, could recall many such glances; could recall, too, many soft words, so soft as to be almost tender, spoken in her ear during the progress of their meadow or garden. She was flattered and touched by the deference toward herself, and by the whole-hearted appreciation of her father, to whose affection her presence seemed to be imperious, almost arrogant, to the rest of the world.

Others had been admiring and deferential before now. But Vere would endure her scornful raillery with abject submission; but then Mr. Vere was habitually submissive to every one, and was, after all (she reflected), a very insignificant individual indeed.

That young man, that Mr. Lockwood, the other evening had shown himself very sensible to the fascinations of her brightness and her beauty. He was not abject, truly. No; he was simple and modest, and he looked, and spoke, and moved in a way which showed that he thought himself the equal of any one among Captain Sheardown's guests. Nevertheless, in Veronica's apprehension, he was not so. Although she had chosen to put down his manners to his ill-breeding, she had been, to a certain degree, mortified by her contemptuous tone.

Sir John Gale had a different kind of person from this young Lockwood, whom perhaps fate had been educated by the bounty of Admiral Sheardown.

To be "my Lady Gale!"

The words rang in her ears. She whispered them to herself in the solitude of her chamber. Wealth, station, and all that was alluring to the girl's vanity and ambition, were in the sound.

In these modest years of her youth a thing which, as some think, the deepest and most abiding impressions are made on the character, the kind of thought which is subjected to every one was an essentially ignoble one. The possession of such delights as may be summed up in the vague word "fine" (fine dress, fine jewels, perfectly taught to look upon as an sin to be attained. As she grew older, and, with her father's help, her fine shipley-in-the-Wold became clear to her apprehension, an eating discontent took hold upon her like a slow fever at times, in recalling her mother's stories of her young days in Florence, a passion of envy and longing would make the girl heart sick for all that. And that those things which had made Stella Barletti gay and happy would have altogether satisfied her daughter. Vere had inherited her mode and less simplicity. Stella liked to "far figura," as the Italian phrase goes; to make a figure in the world. But her mother's ambition was a very daring wing. She was perfectly contented to accept Rossian hospodnesses laden with comeralds, or even Russian ones of gold and lace, crowned with paste diamonds and enameled with effrontery, as her social superiors, and to enjoy the spectacle of their splendor and grandeur exactly as she enjoyed the spangles and tinsel of the ballet in carnival.

Not so Veronica. She would willingly be second to none. There were moments when the chance mention of Maud Desmond's family, or an allusion to a speech of the ancient matriarch at Delaney, made her sore and jealous. She would even be rendered irritably impatient by Maud's indifference to the grandeur or fame of her ancestry; though the least display of pride of birth on the part of her father's ward would have been intolerable to Veronica's sensitive taste.

Yet Veronica was no monster of selfish consistency. She was impulsive, generous, and impulses and longing for a nobler aim in life. But the first shock of practical effort and selfdenial repulsed her like a drench of ice-cold water. There came no reaction, no after-glow, and she shrank back shivering, with a piteous cry of, "I can not be good."

She knew herself to be wretchedly dissatisfied. And, although her youth and bodily health at intervals asserted their elasticity, and broke forth into a wild flow of gayety and good spirits, she was yet, at nineteen years old, secretly consumed by dreary discontent.

Then she told herself that it was easy for happy people to be good. "If I were but happy, I should be good and kind and generous," she said.

And latterly she thought had taken possession of her that it would make her happy to become my Lady Gale.

Opportunity is the divinity which shapes the ends of most love affairs, let even the rough-hewn how they will. Under the favoring influence of residence beneath the same roof, daily walks together, and evenings spent in each other's society, the intimacy between the vicar's daughter and the stranger sojourning in her father's house grew apace. The disparity of age between them offered no obstacle to the familiarity of their intercourse.

There are some men who accept the advance of age, and even make a step to meet it; there are others who painfully and eagerly fend it off; again, there are some who simply ignore it. To this latter category belonged Sir John Gale. You could not say that he indulged in any undue affectation of juvenility. He merely seemed to take it for granted that such affectation would have been entirely superfluous.

Even after the first moment of seeing Veronica he had been struck by her remarkable beauty. And not the least attraction in his eyes was the consonant between her loveliness and her position.

"Who the deuce would have dreamed of finding such a girl as that in an English country parsonage?" he said to himself.

In their conversations together Veronica had spoken of her mother's early life, and had not attempted to conceal her own longing to quit Shipley-in-the-Wold, and Daneshire altogether, for other and brighter scenes. He had noted, with a sort of cynical good-humor, the girl's aspiration after wealth and display; her restless discontent with the scarcity of the vicarage, and the love of admiration which it required no very acute penetration to discover in her. But these points of character by no means disinclined her to Sir John. Coupled with a plain face or an awkward manner they would have—not disgusted so much as—bored him. United to rare beauty and a quick intelligence they amused and attracted him. And then, to complete the spell, was that young girl's reliance without which all his rest would have wasted their sweetness on Sir John Gale: the fact that this young, brilliant, and beautiful girl desired very unmistakably to be pleasing in his eyes.

> If she be not fair for me,
> What care I how fair she be?

might have been said, and said truly, by the connoisseur, respecting the loveliest woman ever cast in mortal mould. Time and self-indulgence, in proportion as they had indurated his heart, had rendered his egotism more and more keenly sensitive.

It gratified his egotism to be, from whatever cause, an object of interest to Veronica. He cared not to ask himself whether she would have lowered her beautiful eyes to have regarded him in that manner if he had been poor and delicate. His wealth and rank were part of himself; inseparable from that capital I, which filled up for him so large a portion of the world's universe.

"The girl would make a furore if she were known," he said to himself. "Her coloring, hair, and eyes are perfect. And she has spirit enough for Lucifer!"

Nevertheless he had not gauged the height of Veronica's ambition.

Day by day, and hour by hour, the attraction she exercised over him by her beauty grew stronger.

"You are a votary of Mrs. Grundy, then, as your friend," he said to her one day.

"As Maud?" answered Veronica, laughing. Then she continued, with a disdainful toss of her head, "No, truly; I suppose my Italian blood renders me incapable of worshiping at that shrine. Dio! Life is so short! And so little sweet! Why embitter it voluntarily with Mrs. Grundy?"

"Yet in some quarters—confess now—you are a little afraid of her?"

I might answer you as you answered Maud: am I a pickpocket to be afraid of the policeman?"

Miss Desmond's retort did not hit the case. The policeman only administers laws: Mrs. Grundy makes them."

"She shall make none for me," said Veronica, flashing very bright eyes of utter scorn.

Sir John gazed upon her curiously; but he said no more at that time. The subject, however, seemed to have a peculiar attraction for him, and he returned to it frequently.

On the Friday morning preceding the Sunday fixed for Miss Desmond's return there came a letter to the vicar from his ward. The purport of it was, to ask his leave to stay a short time longer at Lowater. Mrs. Grundy was to be at a concert at Danecester, to which Mrs. Sheardown had promised to take her. At the end of the letter were a few lines about Hugh Lockwood.

"Do you know, Uncle Charles," wrote Maud, "that Mr. Lockwood knows my Aunt Ellis? He heard something of her, and was a tutor of Mr. Tallis, and he then mentioned that he and his mother had made her acquaintance at a watering-place three or four years ago; and that Mrs. Lockwood and my aunt became quite intimate. They have not seen her for a long time; but she promised to let them know whenever she came to London. I can not have seen Aunt Hilda since I was seven years old, when she came one day to see poor mamma; yet my recollection of her is a correct one, for Mr. Lockwood describes her as a stout, jolly woman with delicate features and beautiful eyes. This is just what I remember. Only he says she is now sadly faded.

"Dear me!" said the vicar, "odd enough that these Lockwoods should have come across Lady Tallis! Here is a postscript for you, Veronica, asking you to send back some dress or other by Captain Sheardown's man. See to it, will you? Dear, dear! Losing touch of my daughter the letter, went away to his study.

Veronica read the letter from beginning to end. She read it more than once. There was a good deal in it about that Hugh Lockwood, she thought. She remembered what Miss Begbie had said about him, and her lip curled. She care for the attentions of such a one as Mr. Hugh Lockwood! Emma Begbie should change her tone some day. Parsienza!

Veronica got together the articles for which Maud had asked, and as she did so she scarcely knew whether she were glad or sorry that Maud was going to remain a while longer at Lowater House.

"Dear old Maudie! I hope she will enjoy herself." Then she wondered what Maud would say to her daily walk with Sir John Gale, and whether Maud would perceive the growing decision of his manner toward herself. And then she looked in the glass with a triumphant smile, that in a moment the blood rushed up to her brow, and she turned away impatiently. Was she afraid in her secret heart, as Sir John had said? No; not afraid of the gossiping malice of the world; not afraid of Mrs. Grundy. But she had a latent dread of Maud's judgment. Maud had such a lofty standard, such a pure ideal. Bah! People all wished to be happy; all strove and struggled for it. She, Veronica, was at least honest to herself. She did not gild her motives with any fine names. She longed to be happy in her own way, instead of pretending to be happy in other people's way.

That very afternoon, Sir John Gale announced that Mr. Vere had told him he might quit his safety venture to travel. He made the communication to Veronica as they stood side by side leaning over the low wall of St. Gildas's church-yard, and looking at the moss-grown graves, all velvety and mellow under the slanting rays of the declining sun.

"Mr. Flew was very hard and cruel," said Sir John, in a low voice. "Very hard and inexorable. I wished to him to him that my strength was not yet sufficiently recovered to render my taking a journey a safe experiment. But it was in vain. He was not cruel?"

Veronica stood still and silent, supporting her elbow on the low wall of the grave-yard, and leaning her cheek on her hand.

"Was he not cruel, Veronica?"

His voice sank to a whisper as he uttered her name, and drawing nearer, he took the unoccupied hand that hung listlessly by her side.

Her heart beat quickly; a hundred thoughts seemed to whirl confusedly through her brain. But she stood immovably steady, with her eyes still turned toward the green grave-yard.

"I don't know. I suppose—I should think not. You ought to be glad to be well enough to go away."

He drew yet nearer, and pressed the hand that lay passive in his clasp.

"You think it natural to be glad to leave Shipley?"

"Very natural."

"You like this place and this life. I have seen how unconcernal all your surroundings are to you. You are like some bright tropical bird transplanted into native sunshine, and caged under a leaden sky. Leave it, and fly away into the sunshine!"

"That is easily said!"

"You are not angry?" he asked, eagerly, as she made a move to walk back toward the house.

"Why should I be angry? But the sun is sinking fast, and papa will expect me. We had better return to the house."

"Stay yet a little instant! This may be our last walk together. What would papa do if you did not return home at all?"

"Heaven knows! I do not see the use of discussing so absurd an hypothesis."

"Not at all absurd. It must happen some day."

"There is Catherine at the gate, looking for us. I must go back."

"Ah, Veronica, you are angry with me!"

"No."

"Then it is the shadow of Mrs. Grundy that has clouded your face. Why do you come between poor mortals and the sunshine?"

"Nonsense!"

"I told you that you were afraid of Mrs. Grundy in your heart."

"And I told you that you were mistaken."

They had begun walking toward the house, side by side, but apart, and had by this time reached the little iron wicket which gave access to the lawn. Here Sir John paused, and, said, softly: "Well, I have been obedient. I have come home; or rather, you have, and I followed. Perhaps there was no great merit in that. But, Veronica, if you are not angry that I have dared to call you so, give me a token of forgiveness."

"I have told you that I am not angry."

"Yes; but you say so with your face turned away, and your hand cold. That glove that you are pulling off—give me that."

"Pray, Sir John!" murmured Veronica, hurrying at the same moment. "I request that you will not touch my hand. The servant is there, within sight."

"The glove, then! Fling it down as a gage of defiance to Mrs. Grundy, if you refuse to give it as a token of pardon to me!"

She rent the glove quickly, up the steps and into the house.

As she entered it a little brown glove fluttered in the air and fell at the feet of Sir John Gale.

THE GRAVES OF AVONDALE.

ON the outskirts of Plymouth, near the scene of the recent colliery disaster, there is an old grave-yard known as Shupp's Hill, of which we give an illustration on page 637. This, apparently, as interments do not seem to have been recently made in the cemetery proper. Tangled briers grow about the graves, and thistles bicker than one's head wave to and fro, while the golden-red lifts its bright flowers above the most pretentious marble slab. The fences had to be removed to make room for such of the victims of the Avondale calamity as resided in the immediate vicinity of the colliery.

On Thursday afternoon, September 9, the first bodies were brought to this place for interment. Widows and orphans, townspeople, and strangers were assembled on the knoll. The burial-service in the Welsh language was quickly over, and just as the crowd was dispersing a long, beautiful rainbow was set among the clouds. Far in the distance is the Nanticoke Gap, near which the eye may be seen to arise from the ruins of the Avondale breaker.

Many of the bodies of the miners were taken direct from Avondale to Scranton, and other towns, whence they had come to work in the Avondale Colliery. The Slupp's Hill graveyard is the burial-place nearest to the scene of disaster.

HEAT FROM THE MOON

A LONG-VEXED question—one which astronomers and physicists have laboured and puzzled and even quarreled over for two centuries at least—has at length been set at rest. Whether the moon reveals only as any appreciable amount of warmth has long been a moot point. The most delicate experiments had been tried to determine the matter. The honours thought he had accomplished in obtaining heat from the moon, but it will shown that he had been gathering it from his own instruments. Melloni tried the experiment, and fell into a similar error. Piazzi Smyth, in his famous Teneriffe expedition, had the effect of seeking for lunar heat above those lower and more moisture-laden atmospheric strata which are known to cut off the obscure heat-rays effectually. Yet he also failed: Professor Tyndall, in his now classical "Lectures on Heat," says that all such experiments must invariably fail, since the heat rays from the moon must be of such a character that the glass converging-lens used by the experimenters would cut off the whole of the lunar heat. He himself tried the experiment with metallic mirrors, but the thick London air prevented his succeeding.

The hint was not lost, however. It was decided that mirrors, and not lenses, were the proper weapons for carrying on the attack. Now there is one mirror in existence which excels all others in light-gathering, and therefore necessarily in heat-gathering, power. The great reflector of the Rosse telescope has long been engaged in gathering the faint rays from those distant stellar cloudlets which are strewn over the celestial vault. The strange clusters with long outcreeping arms, the spiral nebulæ with mystic convolutions around their blazing nucleus, the wild and fantastic figures of the irregular nebulæ—all these forms of matter had been forced to reveal their secret under the searching eye of the great Parsonstown reflector. But vast as are the powers of this great telescope, and important as are the revelations it had already made, there was one defect which paralyzed half its powers. It was an inert mass, will point, indeed, so that the merest infant could sway it, but possessing no power of self-motion. The telescopes in our great observatories follow persistently the motions of the stars upon the celestial vault, but their giant brother possessed no such power. And when we remember the enormous weight of the Rosse telescope, its tube—fifty feet in length—down which a tall man can walk upright, and its vast metallic speculum weighing a ton and a half, the task of applying clock-motion to so cumbrous and seemingly unwieldy a mass might well seem hopeless. Yet without this it was debarred from taking its part in a multitude of processes of research to which its powers were wonderfully adapted. Spectroscopic analysis, when applied to the stars, for example, requires the most perfect uniformity of clock-motion, so that the light from a star, once received on the apex of a slit which forms the entrance into the spectroscope, may not move off them even by a hair's breadth. And the examination of the nebulæ, which required an equally exact adaptation of the telescope's motion to the apparent movement of the celestial vault. For so delicate is the inquiry, that the mere heat generated in turning the telescope upon the moon by the ordinary arrangement would have served to mask the result.

At enormous cost, and after many difficulties had been overcome, the huge reflector was at length had its powers more than doubled, by the addition of the long-wanted power of self-motion. And among the first-fruits of the labour thus bestowed upon it, is the solution of the famous problem of determining the moon's heat.

The delicate heat-measurer, known as the thermopile, was used in this work, as in Mr. Huggins's experiments for estimating the heat we receive from stars. The moon's rays concentrated by the great mirror, was suffered to fall upon the face of the thermopile, and the indications of the needle were carefully watched. A small but obvious deflection in the direction signifying heat was at once observed, and when the observation had been repeated several times with the same result no doubt could remain. We accurately receive an appreciable quantity of warmth-rays from "the chaste beams of the watry moon." The view which Sir John Herschel had long since formed on the behavior of the fleecy clouds of a summer night under the moon's influence was shown to be as correct as almost all the guesses have been which the two Herschels have ever made.

And one of the most interesting of the results which have followed from the inquiry confirms in an equally striking manner another guess which Sir John Herschel had made. By comparing the heat received from the moon with that obtained from several terrestrial sources, Lord Rosse had been led to the conclusion that at the time of full moon the surface of our satellite is raised to a temperature exceeding by more than 280° (Fahrenheit) that of boiling water. Sir John Herschel long since asserted that this must be so. During the long lunar day, lasting some 300 of our hours, the sun's rays are poured without intermission upon the lunar surface. No clouds temper the heat, no atmosphere even serves to interpose any resistance to the continual downpour of the fierce solar rays. And for about the space of three of our days the heat goes augmenting, at close to the zenith of the lunar sky, so that if there were inhabitants on our unfortunate satellite, they would be scorched by the same unrelenting consecutive hours by an almost vertical sun.

There is only one point in Lord Rosse's inquiry which seems doubtful. The moon's primary heat from,the moon he has shown conclusively, and there can be no doubt that a large portion of this heat is reflected from the moon. But there is another mode by which the heat may be sent to us from the moon, and it might be worth while to inquire a little more closely than has yet been done whether the larger share of the heat rendered sensible by the great mirror does not thus come in this way. We refer to the moon's power of reflecting heat. It need hardly be said that the reflection and the radiation of heat are very different matters. Let any one hold a burnished metal plate in such a way that the sun's light is reflected toward his face, and he will feel that with the light a considerable amount of heat is reflected. Let him leave the same metal in the sun until it is well heated, and he will find that the metal is capable of imparting heat to him when it is removed from the sun's rays. This is radiation, and can only happen when the metal has been warmed, whereas heat can be reflected from an ice-cold plate. There has been nothing in the experiments conducted by Lord Rosse to show by which of these two processes the moon's heat is principally sent to us; nor do we know enough of the conditions of the case to form a safe to estimate for ourselves the relative proportions of the heat she reflects and radiates toward us.

THE SEYCHELLES ISLANDS.

IN these days of steam and universal exploration there is scarcely a habitable spot on the globe that is not brought to us, and in so brief as close as a neighboring village of a quarter of a century ago. Owyhee and Honolulu sound as familiar to us as Newport or Saratoga; and yet every now and then we come, in the course of our reading, upon a description of some out-of-the-way place in which we have hitherto had never before heard. Such are the Seychelles Islands, in the Indian Ocean, which the English have made the depôt for their recaptured and released on the east coast of Africa.

Concerning this little known and interesting group of islands little is known. They were in all probability discovered by the Portuguese two hundred years ago. Almost all the islands are fringed with coverers, then by the French, and finally by the English, but by them in name only. They are situated about nine hundred miles due south of the island of Mauritius, the governor of which colony appoints the officials on the Seychelles.

Although the Seychelles are visited by whalers they are apparently French. French schools, French language, French education; even the divine service is performed in the roman church in French. All the merchants, and, in fact, almost the entire personnel of the islands, are French. A few Creoles from Bourbon are likewise residentially, and an English one rarely and then only in case of necessity. The little town of Mahé, the capital, is inhabited by about ten thousand French Creoles and Africans, and has lately been brought into notice by the first call that line of the Messrs. Messageries Nationale Steamship Company have made it a way-station between the Red Sea and Mauritius.

The climate is very healthy, but the morality of the place is frightful. The marriage ceremony is a dead letter. Incest is common to be taken notice of. The author of "A Cruise in the Gorgon' makes a very comical statement to the effect that on one of the islands Mauritius (born at Seychelles) is the son of his grandmother by his own brother! The female population are as free to one man as another, and there are very few virtuous girls on the islands.

And these terribly depraved people inhabit a perfect paradise of beauty. The island at Mahé rises almost perpendicularly, fronted by a few miles of flat land, whereon stands the town. The heights, some of which are 2,000 ft. are of solid rock, and to the top covered with luxuriant vegetation. The houses are built à la Swiss, and only want the pinnacled snow-capped mountains behind them to make the comparison perfect.

On this island there are about half a dozen roads—not carriage roads, but roads on which at right angles to the hills in the back-ground, gently inclined toward them. These are lined with hedges of the Cocoanut flowers, the graceful palms and weeping-bamboos rendering them refreshing cool retreats. At evening these roads are delightful, especially when the moonlight night. The aroma from the myriads of pine-apples, limes, and roses is perfectly delicious. In the morning, before the sun has taken up the dew, a little walk before breakfast, besides exhausting one's sluggish constitutional, leaves one in a good temper for the remainder of the day.

One of the greatest curiosities to be seen at Seychelles is a kind of leaf-fly, something like the leaf-butterfly described in Wallace's "Malay Archipelago." Close attention is required to discover the insect on a bunch of leaves: to all appearances it is one of them; its body is quite green, with veins, fibres, etc. These leaf-flies are rare, and very difficult to keep, requiring fresh leaves daily. The ant and other insects perforate and devour them. When first hatched they have the appearance of small dried leaves, but soon turn green as they move about.

The soil is so rich and prolific that a walking-stick stuck into it at random would probably take root and grow. In a short walk, almost within a stone's throw of Mahé, one might be counted an endless variety of fruits—limes, pine-apples, mangoes, bananas, plantains, lychee, the noble bread-fruit, alligator pear, and many others, all growing wild, the two former choking the hedges on either side. Cocoanut plantations of herbs; clove, cinnamon, castor-oil, balsam copaiba, manioc, tapioca, sago, and cassava; trees of all kinds; the valuable gum of one description, cocoa-nut, traveler's rest—which, tapped near the root, yields a refreshing drink—sugar-cane, cocoa-nut, banana—from which, when so hard, they make tiles for houses. The cocoa de mer, as the name implies, grows by the sea-side; it is peculiar to the Seychelles, and grows nowhere else in the world; it is valuable for its fine straw; also it has a large nut which contains a kind of blanc-mange, which is very good.

The females are largely employed in plaiting this straw, and they sell the plait, enough to make a very small coat, for fifty cents. They work with ease and rapidity, but charge very high for their manufacture. The whole work of the island is performed by women, the men doing little or nothing.

BIG BELLS.

IN China bells have been made of enormous weight. Nankin was especially famous for the largeness of its bells. At Pekin there were seven bells cast in the year 1406, each of which weighed 120,000 pounds. The sound of the largest Chinese bell was very poor, owing to its being struck with a piece of wood, instead of a metal clapper. A bell given to the cathedral of Moscow by the Czar Godunof weighed 288,000 pounds, and another given by the Empress Anna, probably the largest in the known world, weighed 432,000 pounds. The great bell at St. Paul's weighs between 11,000 and 12,000 pounds, and is ten feet in diameter. On this bell is inscribed "Richard Phelps made me, 1716;" and Peter Cunningham, in his "Handbook for London," tells us that it "is never used except for striking of the hour, and for tolling at the deaths and funerals of any of the Bishops of London, Deans of London, and, should he die in his mayoralty, the Lord Mayor." We believe, however, that it tolled at the funeral of the Duke of Wellington and at the funerals of the Duke of Wellington and Dean Milman. The larger part of the metal of which it is cast is the same authority informs us, "formed the celebrated 'Great Tom of Westminster,' once in the clock-tower, Palace Yard, but destroyed by fire in 1834, when the present weight of Mr. Denison's peerless, 'Big Ben' of Westminster, was cast." It is not pretended that as Tom of Lincoln, its vibratory power, however, being greater than that of any other bell in the Kingdom. The great bell of York Minster, cast in 1835, weighs 12,000 pounds. The Great Tom at Oxford, 17,000 pounds. The great bell cast in 1845 for Montreal, the heaviest in the United Kingdom, weighs upward of 12 tons, or about 27,000 pounds. This bat, though so much heavier, is not to be heard in St. Paul's. The same spirit which caused people to build immense monasteries, and decorate churches, induced them to vie with each other in the size of their bells. The number of bells in every church gave rise to the singular and curious architecture often found in the country side. Mr. Glover, in the constant appendage of every parish church belonging to the Saxons, and is distinctly mentioned as such in the laws of Athelstan.

The custom of welcoming distinguished visitors by a joyful peal is derived from very ancient days, when the emperors, kings, and bishops used to be thus greeted.

The different modes of bells have given rise to many poems, some of which are inscribed on the bells themselves. Perhaps the finest is Schiller's "Song of the Bell," a description of the casting of the bell and its uses. The old inscriptions on bells are in some cases of historical value. Certain bells of the parish of London have the historical notes: that, for instance, at the top of the bell-tower in the Tower, which was tolled at the execution of Lady Jane Grey, Anne Boleyn, and other state prisoners; and sounded alarms of fires and other calamities.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE terrific tornado which swept with such fury all along the New England coast is believed to have traveled at the rate of forty miles an hour. A great deal of the orchards stripped of fruit and foliage, and similar disasters, would fill columns. It is wonderful there was so little loss of life, and the effects of the most unreasonable equinoctial gale. We believe a storm that occurs any time between the autumnal and the vernal equinox may be regarded as the Equinoctial, unless it is afterward overshadowed by another more furious. The height of the tornado blows, the tall chimneys blown down, of the tall spires demolished, of the shipping driven on shore, of the windows broken in,

PHYSICAL EDUCATION.

FISH CULTURE IN FRANCE.

THE French Government maintain a great establishment for fish culture. It is situated near the route from Basle to Strasbourg, and takes its name from the old castle of Huningue, near by. The principal building is a long, low structure, with a pavilion at each end and in the middle. In front are numerous ponds and water-courses, in which the young fish—trout, salmon, perch, pike, and others—are distributed. The row of poplars behind the buildings in the first view marks the line of the canal which connects the Rhone and the Rhine. The mountains upon the right, in the back-ground, are the spurs of the Swiss Alps. Those upon the left are the range of the Black Forest. The Rhine lies in the valley at their feet.

All the springs in the vicinity of the buildings are carried by a canal into one end of the structure, and the fresh, sparkling water, distributed into several troughs, runs incessantly from one end to the other, every part of the course being occupied with the process of impregnating or hatching the eggs, or nurturing the infant fish.

After the eggs have been taken from the fish and impregnated in the way which has been often described, they are placed in shallow baskets in the running water. Attendants watch them night and day, remove those that are "sick," separate those which the water masses together, change the baskets if they become foul from too long exposure to the water, and pick off every floating straw that might injure the eggs. The salmon eggs are large enough to be counted; and so complete is the organization of the establishment that records are kept of the daily changing numbers. Other eggs are too small to be known except by measurement.

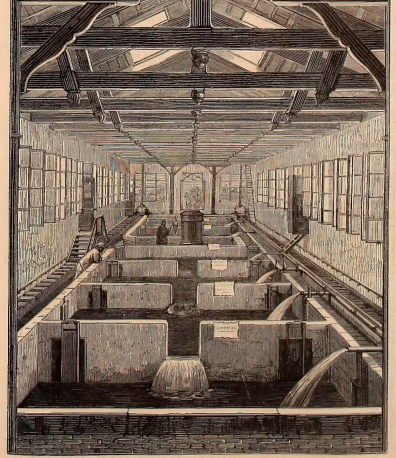
In the other wing of the building are the pools or tanks in which the young fish pass their earliest days, and from which, after proper growth, they are transferred to out-of-door pools, or sent to stock the ponds and streams of France.

The establishment at Huningue is for the benefit of the public, and the eggs are sent throughout France to all who apply, with no other charge than transportation.

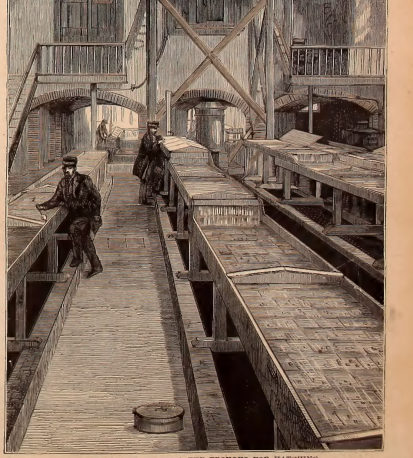
GOVERNMENT ESTABLISHMENT FOR FISH CULTURE AT HUNINGUE, FRANCE—GENERAL VIEW.

AN OPEN-AIR THEATRE AT PARIS.

THOUGH it is the customary affectation of the journalists who keep the record of Parisian gayeties to protest, about this time of the year, that the French capital is a perfect desert, abandoned by all its proper inhabitants, and only frequented by the savages of the provincial departments, or by ignorant foreign tourists who have lost their way on the wide continent of Europe, we are nevertheless credibly informed that the native bourgeoisie continue to dwell in that lively city; and we believe they may be found assembled in considerable numbers, any fine week-day or Sunday evening, at the various places, urban and suburban, where popular entertainments are provided at a cheap cost. The open-air theatres in the Champs Elysées and in other favorite haunts of pleasure contrive to draw pretty large audiences for their brisk little vaudevilles or farces, and plenty of spectators willing to be gratified by the performances of the nimble, if not always graceful and decorous, nymphs of the ballet. It is an exhibition of the latter kind, associated with the temptations of social idleness, a cup of some dainty and exhilarating beverage, alternating with cakes, or ice-creams, or comfits, or cigars, and especially with the opportunities of flirtation and coquetry under the public eye, which has attracted so many young men and maidens, besides not a few old men and children, who might perhaps have been more wisely occupied at home. But the world does very much as it pleases: and the illustration we have engraved on page 632 pretends but to show what the Parisians like to do.



INTERIOR VIEW, SHOWING THE POOLS FOR YOUNG FISH.



INTERIOR VIEW, SHOWING THE TROUGHS FOR HATCHING.

ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.

SOME years ago I knew a lapidary who gained a considerable fortune by a great misfortune. An excellent workman, honest as the day, Montin had but one fault: he was too fond of good wine, which caused him to neglect his work—sometimes for days together, to the great dissatisfaction of his employer, who in all other respects valued and esteemed him highly, both for his skill and probity.

One day Montin received from his master a diamond of the finest water to cut and polish, with strict recommendations to keep sober until the work was finished.

"I rely on your activity," said the jeweler, on giving him the stone. "I must have it without fail on the 15th of this month; and if you disappoint me this time, it will be the last work that you will ever have from me."

Montin promised exactitude, asked, as was usual with him, part of his pay in advance, and set himself courageously to work. Under his skillful hand the diamond soon began to show forth its beauty; in a few more hours it would have been finished, when, unfortunately for Montin's resolutions, a friend called on him, an old comrade, who had been long absent from Paris: what could they do but take a glass together? Arrived at the cabaret, the time passed quickly away, and Montin thought no more of his unfinished work.

During the morning his employer came to see how the polishing of the diamond proceeded. The concierge assured him that Montin had only just gone out, and would not fail to return directly, as he had for some days been working steadily and unremittingly. Only half satisfied, the jeweler went away, to return in two hours, and to find Montin still absent. Convinced he was at the tavern, the master charged one of his men to seek him, and induce him to return to his work. This was done, and Montin, grumbling between his teeth, quitted his comrade, and ascended to his workshop; but his head was no longer clear, nor his hand steady. To add to his trouble, the diamond became unfixed; he seized it hastily to replace it; his trembling fingers gave a jerk—and, by a strange fatality, the precious stone flew out of the window! Sobered in a moment by this terrible accident, Montin continued gazing out of the casement as if petrified, his pale lips murmuring the words, "Lost! lost! lost!"

For more than an hour he remained almost motionless, and was only roused from his lethargy by the entrance of his master.

"Is it thus you work, Montin?" exclaimed he; "three times have I called for the diamond, and you spend your time at the tavern. Give me the stone; I must have it, finished or unfinished."

Montin looked wildly at him without uttering a word.

"What is the matter with you?" asked the jeweler. "Why don't you answer? Have you drunk all your senses away?"

The lapidary tried in vain to speak. His tongue seemed paralyzed. At last he rose, and hiding his face in his hands, murmured, "It—is—lost!"

"Explain yourself. What has happened?"

"Out of the window."

"What! when?"

"The stone."

"Well, well, well; tell me what has occurred."

"The stone flew out."

It was now the turn of the master to become silent with astonishment; then, furious with rage, he cried, "I don't believe a word of your story; you have sold my diamond to pay for your dissipation."

This accusation was the coup de grace for Montin. He fell fainting at the feet of his master; and it was not without difficulty that he was recalled to life, or rather to a despair which amounted almost to madness. The jeweler, who understood what was passing in his mind, tried to console him, and at last succeeded in rendering him more calm.

"It is a most unfortunate accident, no doubt," said he, "but it is not irreparable.

"You do not, then, believe that I sold your diamond for drink?" and Montin, eagerly.

"No, no, Montin; you must forget what I said in the first moment of anger, and let us try to find a remedy for the misfortune. The diamond was worth £200; you must endeavor to repay me the half of that sum out of your wages, which, when you work regularly, amount to £3 or £4 a week. With industry and sobriety you will soon get out of debt."

"From this time I will work steadily," said Montin, with tears in his eyes. "Yes, that will be it, Sir, that though I have been a drunkard, I am not a thief.

"I believe you," replied the jeweler. "I have every confidence in you; you are a good workman; I will furnish you with plenty of work, and in a few years you will be right again. Will I not that visit you?"

"Oh yes, Sir! only tell me once more that you do not think I sold the diamond."

"I repeat, on my honor, that I only said so in the first moment of anger. I am convinced you are an honest man—in fact, I prove it by trusting you with more work."

"Yes, Sir, that is true, and I promise you I will not disappoint you. I will repair my fault: the lesson has been severe, but it will not be without its fruits."

Montin kept his word—he rose early, and worked indefatigably; the lost stone was replaced by another, which was polished as if by enchantment. Faithful to his promise, he went no more to the tavern, and became a model of steadiness and industry. At the end of the year he had paid a considerable part of his debt. Sixteen months passed thus, when one fine morning in May, having finished his work, he placed himself at the window, and watched the boats passing and repassing on the river which flowed close to the walls of the house. Suddenly his eye was attracted by a brilliant bright glittering on the extreme edge of an old chimney. What was his surprise to discover his half-polished diamond! It seemed as if a breath would precipitate it into the water beneath; and yet there it had been for so many months suspended between Heaven and earth!

At this sight his emotion became almost as great as on the day when he had seen it disappear out of the window; he dared not remove his eyes, fearing to lose sight of the almost recovered treasure.

"It is—it is my diamond, which has cost me so many tears," said he; "but how shall I reach it? If it were not for that, I will take every precaution; not too fast!—let me consider well!"

At this moment his employer entered the room.

"Oh, Sir!" cried Montin, "it is there!"

"What?" said the jeweler.

"My diamond—the ruther yours. Ah, do not touch it, we shall lose it forever."

"It is true; it is certainly the diamond that has so tormented us; but the difficulty is how to get it. Wait a moment, I know how to do it." So saying, he left the room, but quickly returned, bearing in his hand a net prepared for catching butterflies. With its aid, and that of a long stick, he proceeded carefully to try and fish the precious stone—Montin, hardly daring to breathe, watching all his movements with the greatest anxiety. At last the jeweler were crowned with success, and he cried, "Here it is, Montin! I congratulate you on its recovery. I am now your debtor to the amount of nearly a hundred pounds. What do you intend to do with the amount?"

"Leave it in your hands, Sir, if you will be kind enough to keep it for me."

"Most willingly; I will pay you the interest, and if you continue to add to it, you will soon have a nice little sum," replied the jeweler.

This was the beginning of Montin's fortune. In a few years he became a partner with his master, whose daughter he married, and he is now one of the principal jewelers in Paris.

HINDOO MARRIAGES.

SORELLY is some amelioration of the Hindoo marriage law required. Tied together as infants, there is rarely much love between the Hindoo man and wife; and too often the husband (if not indeed the wife) seeks elsewhere that affection which can not be kindled on the domestic hearth. But to the women this is not all. Married while yet a baby, she is by the old Hindoo law refused once for all. Her lord and master may die before the marriage has gone beyond the mere betrothal, but she is therefore forth a widow whom no other man may wed. Old Mr. Weller might, as far as this matter is concerned, have found favor among the strictest Brahmins of the old school, so entirely in accordance with their views were his sentiments as to widow marriage. Left a widow, the Hindoo woman is for the rest of her life a slave in the household of her husband's family. No hope may she cherish of having a home and children to call her own. She may not even decently her womanly vanity by wearing the trinkets that her sex (only in India, of course) delight in. And her existence is one of hopeless drudgery and unsatisfied desires. But the Bengalee Baboo has appeared as a modern Perseus to rescue the Hindoo damsel from her chains. Already, in the face of old-world prejudices, many Hindoo widows have been re-elected to the privileges of matrimony, and as the opinions of young Bengal extend, such marriages will become every day of more common occurrence.

A HEART UNFELLOWED.

TUNE autumn mellowed the year, the year,
And by the sea
Sat an aged man, or lady rare—
I know not which—with a shell at her ear
That from the depths of the sea
Wailed this melody:

"Oh! if it were mine to love, to love,
And when wert thou
Thou should'st not be an isle of the prime,
Where, rolling backward the wheels of Time,
All bliss shall meet in an Eden clime,
And I would be the ambient sea.

"Oh! if to thee, my love, my love,
Mine eyes were given:
Thou should'st no me be the fount of light,
The star of noon in the realms of night,
And I, as worlds glowed into sight,
Would be the gazing soul of heaven.

"Oh! if, in the might of thee and love,
To dare were mine,
The throne of the world should be my seat,
The neck of the world should bend at thy feet,
And the waves of praise should roll at my seat ever,
Like that they were doubly mine and thine.

"Oh! if to thee I brought my love,
Thou
My captives of victor thought, I ween,
Should march in flowers with silken mien,
And, prostrate, homage to thee their queen,
Tell me I was the more a king.

"'Tis mine, alas! to love, not be,
Not be
Not a word? not a sigh?—I am too bold;
My hopes are in vain, and my love is cold;
Thus the empty sum of my life is told—
Thus I am naught, and naught aught to thee!"

Such were the words of the shell, the shell,
Words sad and few
But when was the voice that spoke to her ear,
That whispered and wailed forth its deep despair,
Was more than a sigh, or a tear?
Or fay, or shell, or ocean knew.

METEORS AND COMETS.

A MOST remarkable feature of modern astronomical discovery is worthy of mention. A phenomenon which men had long feared, and for which in looking upon as a meteorological one has been at length recognized in its true light, and has been found wonderfully to enhance our appreciation of the complexity of the systems which exist within the solar domain. Meteors, shooting-stars, and aerolites have their place among the attendants of the sun; and, in several instances, the orbits they have followed before the eyes of the earth have been approximately determined.

But it is rather as members of systems than as individuals that these objects acquire their chief interest and meaning. There was not much, perhaps, to attract attention to them when they were supposed to be only two rings occupying a position in space very nearly coincident with that of the earth's orbit. But it has now been placed beyond a doubt that the earth encounters fifty-six systems, at least, of these small bodies. And these systems are found to be of enormous extent. Their paths are not circular rings, but ovals of great eccentricity extending far into space, even in some cases beyond the orbits of Uranus and Neptune. It is clear, then, that we can no longer look on these systems as resembling in the remotest degree the constitution of Saturn. We are compelled to admit as a legitimate à posteriori deduction, the extreme probability, we may almost say the certainty, that such systems are to be reckoned, not by hundreds and thousands, but by millions on millions.

Nor is this all. Within the last few months the startling discovery has been made that two of the meteoric systems, at least, and probably more, if not all, are physically connected. The exact extent with the orbits of known comets. According, we are led to trace an intimate connection between the cometary and meteoric systems, and to recognize the importance of such comets as Newton's, Halley's, and Donati's.

LIFE INSURANCE.

LIFE INSURANCE in this country seems to be safer than in England. In the latter country the Albert Life Insurance Company, established over thirty years ago, with an income exceeding $1,500,000 a year, and sums insured reaching $40,000,000, has suspended payment. This means that some 16,000 heads of families see their premiums, since repayment has been made for those dependent on them vanish into air. In many businesses a certain amount of risk seems inseparable from success. But in life insurance there can be no legitimate development of trade except on the understanding that risks are excluded.

In this country the government exercises a supervision over the insurance companies. An officer, called the Superintendent of the Insurance Department, takes care that the nominal capital is both subscribed and fully paid up before the company begins business, and that on taking any fresh risk a sum is set aside which, annually invested in approved securities at a low rate of interest, will be sufficient to pay the policy at maturity. To this officer every company is obliged to furnish on oath an annual statement, in a form compiled by him, of its exact financial position. The State does not trust, however, to the oath alone. The Superintendent, if he sees reason to suspect the annual statement of any company, may at any moment make a special investigation into its affairs, and where he believes insolvency to exist he may order the company to suspend the issue of new policies until after such an investigation has been held. If the result of the inquiry does not establish the solvency of the concern, the matter is referred to the Supreme Court, the company is dissolved, and the assets are distributed among the policy holders.

REARING CHILDREN.

IT is a settled matter of demonstration that about one-half of all the children born die in their infancy. If statistical tables are correct, the mortality is greater in civilized society than among semi-barbarous or savages. It is not to be denied that the Indians lose a large number of their papooses before the second year; but not in the midst of a given population in a civilized community where all the appliances, conveniences, and knowledge are in full exercise for their presence.

The negroes of Africa and the nomadic races in Asia lose many children early; but they appear to be more successful in their efforts to rear them than the best informed people of civilized Europe or America. No doubt this assertion may be called in question. Figures are not to be disputed, however. If it be admitted that the manner of everyday life of multitudes of children is injurious to their nursing babes, one direct cause of the mortality among infants, never practiced by unsophisticated outdoor, open-air women, will be established. Our civilized mothers bundle up their babies too closely, and too often deprive them of the fresh, invigorating atmospheric air. They are wilted like cut flowers in a stifling nursery. Their freedom is too much abridged, from the mere idea that they may catch cold if exposed. The Esquimaux mother refreshes her nude nursling in an Arctic snowdrift. Circulation overdoes—the uncivilized lets nature do more.

THE NORTHERLY LIMIT OF THE OYSTER.

At the northern extremity of the Province of Nordland, between 68° and 69° north latitude, are situated the Lofoden Islands, or Vesterlaane Oerne, which are separated from the main land by the Vestfiord. This broad arm of the sea is remarkable both for its violent currents and whirlpools, among which the Maelstrom has attained a world-wide celebrity, and also from its being the most northerly limit where the oyster has been found.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE used my WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine over ten years without repairs, and without breaking a needle, although I commenced the use of it without any instruction. Have used it constantly for family sewing, have quilted a whole quilt of the largest size, and it is still in complete order, runs like a top, and bids fair to be willed to those who come after me, with better powers of production than an unbroken prairie farm. MRS. H. E. G. AREY.

Whitewater, Wis.

DR. AYER'S LABORATORY, that has done such wonders for the sick, now issues a potent restorer for the beauty of mankind, or the curative work advancing age is so prone to diminish and destroy. His VIGOR restores gray locks on the bald and gray pates among us, and thus lays us under obligations to him for the good looks as well as health of the community.

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty Cents per Box. Mailed for 60c. Sold by druggists. S. G. WELLS, 571 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO remove MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, and TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.

"AROUND THE WORLD."

SUBSCRIBE FOR THE

NEW YORK OBSERVER.

$3 SO PER ANNUM.

SAMPLE COPIES FREE.

SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,

37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS, wonderful and amusing, 20 cents a package. Lunary or Love, 50 cents. Sold to W. C. WESTS, 3 Astor Place, N.Y.

JUST PUBLISHED—OCTOBER NUMBER OF

HITCHCOCK'S

New Monthly Magazine.

CONTENTS:

MADAME MALIBRAN. Portrait and Biography.
LEONARDO DA VINCI. Portrait and Biography.
MARRIAGE IN GREAT BRITAIN.
CHEAP PUBLICATIONS. Editorial.
ART NOTES.
DRAMATIC NOTES.
MUSICAL NOTES.
POETRY AND CORRESPONDENCE.
MUSIC.
THE STARRY FLAG. For Voice and Piano.
MY SOUL TO GOD, MY HEART TO THEE. Do.
KISS WALTZ. Piano.
KIT FLANNAGAN'S FAIRY. Voice and Piano.

Specimen copies mailed free, on receipt of price, 25 cents each. Sold by Booksellers and Newsdealers.

Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK,
Publisher, 34 Beekman St., New York.

Agents wanted every where. Write for Terms.

FRENCH CLOCKS,

BRONZES,

FANCY GOODS,

MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,

Opera Glasses,

FINE WATCHES AND

JEWELRY,

PARIS AND VIENNA

NOVELTIES,

WEDDING PRESENTS.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,

No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York,

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the City, and are offered at Low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

Geo. Eliot's Novels.

HARPER'S LIBRARY EDITION.

ILLUSTRATED.

FIVE VOLS., 12MO, 75 CENTS EACH.

Vol. I. ADAM BEDE. (Just Published.)
II. THE MILL ON THE FLOSS. (Just Published.)
III. FELIX HOLT. (Ready this Week.)
IV. ROMOLA. (In Press.)
V. SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE and SILAS MARNER. (In Press.)

"George Eliot's" novels belong to the enduring literature of the century.—Tribune. They have the faithfulness of its pattern, but the texture of its stuff. —Examiner.

Few women—no living woman, indeed—have so much strength as "George Eliot," and, more than that, she never shows it to degenerate into coarseness. With all her so-called "masculine" vigor, she has a feminine tenderness, which is nowhere shown more plainly than in her descriptions of children.—Boston Transcript.

It was once said of a very charming and high-minded woman that to know her was to instil a liberal education; and we are inclined to set an almost equally high value on an acquaintance with the writings of "George Eliot."—London Review.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above volumes by postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 75 cents.

CYPRESS HILLS CEMETERY.

OFFICE, No. 121 BOWERY, N. Y.,

(Corner of Grand Street),

OFFICERS:

EDMUND DRIGGS, President.
WM. J. PEASE, Vice-President.
WILLIAM MILES, Treasurer.
WILLIAM EDWARDS, Secretary.
J. S. GIBBONS, HERVEY D. LAW, JOHN I. VAN ALST, ALFRED M. WOOD, Trustees.
N. G. PALMER, Supt. and Surveyor.

$100 in every THOUSAND.

We have lately introduced some new

Boxes of Initial Stationery, with fancy RUSTIC Stamping, which we think will meet the taste of the ladies.

And to further facilitate the sale of this really fresh article, we propose, as an assortment, to pack

$100 00 in every Thousand Boxes,

in Prizes varying in amount from

$1 00 to 00.

Put up in neat boxes, and sent to any part of the country, postpaid, for 25 cents each.

Address MERRILL & MACKINTIRE,
SALEM, MASS.

WEDLOCK;

OR, THE RIGHT RELATIONS OF THE SEXES. $1 50.—"HOW TO READ CHARACTER." $1 50.—ANNUAL OF PHYSIOGNOMY for 1870. Only 25 cents.—MAN IN GENESIS AND IN GEOLOGY. 75c.—THE PHRENOLOGICAL ACCOUNT OF MAN'S CREATION, tested by Scientific Theories of his Origin and Antiquity. By Joseph P. Thompson, D.D., LL.D. 12mo. Price $1. Sent first post by

S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y., Publisher.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR

STRUGGLES and TRIUMPHS OF P. T. BARNUM.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF. IN ONE LARGE OCTAVO VOLUME, NEARLY 800 PAGES.—PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.

33 Elegant Full-Page Engravings.

It embraces FORTY YEARS' RECOLLECTIONS of his busy life, as a Merchant, Manager, Banker, Lecturer, and Showman, and gives account of his first imprisonment, his Failure, his Successful European Tours, and Important Historical and Personal Reminiscences, replete with Humor, Anecdotes, and Entertaining Narrative.

It contains his celebrated Lecture on the ART OF MONEY GETTING, Rules for Success in Life, and much for which he was offered $5000. We offer extra inducements to Agents, and pay freight to first purchaser. Send for 32-page Circular, with Specimen Engraving and Terms to Agents, or

J. B. BURR & CO.,
Publishers, Hartford, Conn.

Remarkable Success!!

The New Standard and Popular work for Cabinet Organs and Melodeons!

CLARKE'S new METHOD

FOR

REED ORGANS.

The Best Teachers and Players are using it.

Price, $2 50. Sent postpaid on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., BOSTON.
C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

FURNITURE.

We invite buyers to visit our extensive warerooms and examine our large stock of Suites for Parlors, Chambers, Dining Rooms, Libraries, &c., manufactured under our supervision, from the best materials, and warranted in every particular.

With unequaled facilities and a ripe experience in manufacturing, we are convinced that we can not only be too much when we say to buyers that, taking quality into consideration, we can not be beaten as to prices.

WARREN WARD & CO.,
Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers and Dealers,
75 and 77 Spring Street, corner Crosby.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any yet offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. Its appearance has copied the attention of scientific men, and has now been called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured on our own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

PRICE FROM $18 TO $32.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent post-paid, on demand.

Goods sent by Express, C.O.D., with charges.
Address JULES B. HUGUENIN, WATCHES,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

Bloomington Nursery.

500 Acres. 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.

Fruit, Ornamental and Nursery Stock, immense and reliable assortment, very low for cash.

Apples—including most magnificent stock of yearlings; also hardy Northern sorts, such as Duchess of Oldenburg, Hislop, Transcendent, and other Crab Apples—3, 4, and 5 years.

Peaches, Pears, Cherries, Plums, Quinces, Grapes, Parent and Everbearing Strawberry Plants, Raspberries, New Rose Plants, Roses, own roots; Tulips, Hyacinths, Narcissus, Iris, Phlox, Lilies, Spireas, Ornamental Trees. Also superior colored plates of Fruits and Flowers. Send 10 cents for descriptions.

F. K. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

SWEET QUININE.

SWEET QUININE is warranted equal—free for free—to the sulphate (bitter) Quinine, with the important advantage of being a sweet instead of bitter.

SWAYNE'S PILLS are RECOMMENDED of the sickening and poisonous properties. It is the only Quinine ANODYNE and SOOTHING OPIATE yet discovered.

SVAPNIA.

Sold by druggists, prescribed by best physicians.
SWAYNE, HOYT & CO., Lessees, Philadelphia.

5000 BOOK AGENTS WANTED for 1869 Harding's New Illuminated and Illustrated BIBLES and

LIFE OF CHRIST and BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

The work of the year ready for delivery. Address for Catalogue of the best-selling Subscription-Books published,

W. W. HARDING, Philadelphia, Publisher of Harding's Pictorial Family Bibles.

THE BEST WRINGER.

THE RELIANCE.

With Keyed Rolls and Spiral Cog-wheels, manufactured by PROVIDENCE TOOL CO., Providence, R.I.
NEW YORK STORE, 98 BEEKMAN STREET.
Also, HARDWARE, STEAM-FITTERS' and SAILMAKERS' GOODS, &c., &c.
Manufacturers of
PEABODY BREACH-LOADING FIRE-ARMS.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 83 Murray Street, New York.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album containing 20 full-size pictures, sent post-paid, for 25 cts.; 8 for $1: 26 for $2 25 per dozen. Circulars free. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N. Y.

THE CELEBRATED IMITATION

Gold Watches and Jewelry.

THE COLLINS METAL, THE ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE ORIDE.

The $15 Watches, in appearance and for time, are equal to gold ones costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, at $20, are not surpassed by $200 gold watches. For TIME, ELEGANCE, FINISH, and DURABILITY, no imitation of gold can begin to compare with the Collins Metal. Excepting the intrinsic value, it is equal to gold. Every watch fully warranted by certificate.

CHAINS FROM $2 TO $8.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Ear-Rings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Charms, Gold-Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and equal to gold in appearance.

TO CLUBS:—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send the seventh Watch free of charge. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express, to be paid for on delivery. Money need not be sent with the order, as bills can be paid when goods are taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. We refer to Messrs. Dun, Wiman & Co., Mercantile Agency, New York. Descriptive circulars sent free. Parties wishing to write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only agency is No. 335 Broadway, cor. North St. (up stairs), New York.—C. E. COLLINS & CO.

MADAME FOY'S

COMBINED

Corset Skirt Supporter and Bustle.

Is just the article needed by every lady who would consult health, beauty, and ease, and which no offense goodshave been sold within the last year, and the demand for them is constantly increasing.

HARRIS, ALDWIN & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers,
New Haven, Conn.
D. B. SAUNDERS & Co., Boston.
MASS.: LEE, ALEXANDER, BROS., & Co., Philadelphia; ALEX. & BRO-THER, Baltimore; KAUFFMAN & BLUM, New York, are our Agents.

PIANOS and ORGANS.

Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of first-class makers, for $315 and upward. Second-hand Pianos, $75 to $150. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $30 to $175, at Brooklyn Depot, No. 106 Fulton Street.

WATCHES FOR THE MILLION.

THE GREAT TRADE-IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION (Incorporated by the State) sell FINE GOLD and SILVER WATCHES at one dollar above the wholesale jobbing system, at $10 each. Be sure to obtain a circular before buying elsewhere. Address as follows:

Address MICHELIN & CO., Managers,
Broadway Corner, Grand St., New York.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machines. The best machine in the world. Stitch alike on both sides. Fred machine on trial. For further particulars, address

THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

SOMETHING NEW.—In musical circles the Estey Organ and the Estey Piano are the most durable and have the finest tone, remarkable for their sweetness and power. The Vox Humana and the Jubilante are the greatest novelties and best inventions ever introduced. ESTEY & CO.,
Brattleboro, Vt., Sole Manufacturers.

WANTED—AGENTS.—To sell the Abernathy Sun Kniting Machine. Price, $5. The simplest, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit 20,000 stitches per minute. Liberal inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

PARLOR STEAM ENGINE: made entirely of Metal; Boiler and Furnace complete: will work for hours if supplied with water. No danger; a child can work it. Sent free, with instructions, for $1 00. Sent free for 25 cts. Address
WALTER HOLT, No. 102 Nassau Street, New York.

WANTED AGENTS.—$75 to $200 per month, in every town, to introduce the celebrated and NEW NOVELTY SEWING MACHINE. A new thing with the latest improvements. Price for Dual Machine, $15; with Table and Foot power, $25. Send for Circular, with Gift worth $5 to Agents. Address
W. S. HILL, Manchester, N. H.

$1 50 procures, postpaid, ATWATER'S PATENT PENS, the BEST WRITING PENS ever made. Sample dozen by doz., instantly and perfectly. "The thing for copying."
A. T. ATWATER & CO., Brooklyn, N. Y.

TROY FEMALE SEMINARY.—This Institution offers the accumulated advantages of FORTY YEARS' SUCCESSFUL EXPERIENCE. Address apply to JOHN H. WILLARD, Troy, N. Y.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $100 per month and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marion, Ohio.

VINEGAR—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without using drugs. Price by circulars, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

TYLER WATER WHEELS.—Over 3000 in successful operation. Address TYLER, Tuttle's Machine Co., Claremont, N. H., for reduced price-list.

$1140—How I made it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fuller, N. Y.

Use B. A. Fahnestock's Vermifuge.

THE CLIMAX KNITTER!!

This is, without question, the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. It is small, light, neat, simple of construction, durable, works very rapidly, has but one needle, knits the old-fashioned knitting-needle stitch (and two others) with light or heavy, single or double yarn, sets up and narrows its own work, and needs no weights. It knits close or loose stitches, hollow or flat work, large or small fabrics, anything that can be knit by hand, and in a much better manner. A child can learn to work it, and can learn to do so much sooner than to knit with knitting-needles. There is nothing to be done but to thread a needle and turn a crank, until the heel is reached, which is formed in the usual way. It is durable and so sewing; the same is the case with the toe.

The price of the Machine is but $25 00, which places it within the reach of every family. It is designed to be the very popular machine for the agents, general and special, exceedingly liberal terms for which will be offered. Send for Circular.

Address ESSICK KNITTING MACHINE CO.
S.W. corner 11th and Chestnut Sts., Philadelphia, Pa.

A LADY who has been cured of great nervous debility, after many years of misery, desires to make known to all fellow-sufferers the sure means of cure. Address, in confidence, a stamp, MRS. M. BRITT, P. O. Box 5063, Boston, Mass., and the prescription will be sent free of charge.

$100 to $250 per Month guaranteed. Sure pay. Salaries paid weekly to Agents every where selling our Patent Everlasting Pens and Clothes Lines. Call at, or write for particulars to the Grand Wire Goods Co., 16 Beekman Street, N. Y.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any colored hair or beard to a permanent Black or Brown. One Comb sent by mail for $1. Sold by Merchants & Druggists generally. Address Magic Comb Co., Springfield, Mass.

$25 A DAY.—$3 new articles for Agents. Samples free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

A Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Volumes of the Current United States is for the MAGAZINE 54 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 80 cents a year, (which can be had yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 54 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions will generally begin with any Number, when no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the Number next after the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the first Number issued after the receipt of his order.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on the wrapper of the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the time of subscription closes. It is necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting, a Post-Office Money Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the subscriber.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name of the publication should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Each Insertion in Harper's Weekly.—Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $75—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 00 per Agate Line—each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE WORLD-RENOWNED

FOGGAN'S GENUINE ORIODE GOLD HUNTING-CASE WATCHES

are manufactured on strictly scientific principles, having all the brilliancy, durability, and exact appearance of pure gold. They are the cheapest and most reliable and costly description of Genuine Gold Watches. Scientific and practical men are now engaged in a thorough test and analysis this wonderful substance, and pronounce it a remarkable work of nature, and believe it to be the natural condition of gold, which probably takes thousands of years to become fit for use—hence its value. Doctors, Engineers, and Expressmen, the most exacting of our patrons, pronounce it thoroughly demonstrative in strength, durability, accuracy, and utility of the Fusee Movement, and pronounce them excellent as reliable time-keepers. Ladies' and Gentlemen's sizes. Open-faced or Hunting. Beautifully ornamented. Also, *Stem-winding and Stem-setting Waltham Watches

"WOMAN'S KINGDOM IS AT HOME."

Sold by every first-class Grocer.

THE HALFORD
LEICESTERSHIRE
TABLE SAUCE:

THE BEST ARTICLE IN USE
FOR EVERY GENTLEMAN'S TABLE.

HIGHLY RECOMMENDED BY PHYSICIANS.

IN USE AT ALL THE BEST HOTELS, viz.:

PARKER HOUSE, Boston; FIFTH AVENUE, New York;
CONTINENTAL, Philadelphia; SHERMAN HOUSE, Chicago,
&c., &c., &c.

For Family Use it is preferable to all other.

Sold from St. Paul to New Orleans.

Sold from Portland to San Francisco.

General Agents, who sell in their respective cities at uniform prices to the Trade:
CARTER, MANN, & CO., Boston; G. W. FETTES & CO., 70 Murray St., New York;
CHANDLERS & CALDER, Providence, R. I.; J. T. WARREN & CO., Cincinnati, O.;
J. & C. CAMPBELL, Philadelphia, Pa.; M. GRAFF & CO., Chicago, Ill.;
SAWYER, JONES, & CO., Cleveland, O.; D. NICHOLSON, St. Louis, Mo.;
RUSSELL & HALL, New Orleans, La.; HOSTETTER, REDINGTON, & CO., San Francisco, Cal.

☞ At once the BEST and the CHEAPEST. ☜

Only Fifty Cents per Pint Bottle.

NATURE'S REMEDY
MIDDLETOWN MINERAL SPRING WATER
IT WILL CURE YOUR ILLS
H. M. S. Co. Middletown, Vt.
[Trade-mark Secured.]

Middletown Mineral Spring Water cures all diseases of the Kidneys, Skin, and Blood more promptly than any other known remedy.

☞ Call for TESTIMONIALS or CURES. Sold by Druggists.

Caution.—All genuine bears our trade-mark, and the bottles and corks are branded "Nature's Remedy."

Address J. JAY JOSLIN,
Treas. H. M. S. Co.,
Middletown, Vt.

Or, S. H. Scripture, 199 Broadway, New York, General Agent.

REMOVAL.

Davis Collamore & Co.

Have removed to their new store,

No. 747 BROADWAY, FIFTH DOOR BELOW 8TH ST.,

And now offer a very choice stock of

CHINA GLASS, AND CROCKERY WARE.

We shall also keep a full stock of SILVER-PLATED GOODS, CUTLERY, BRONZES, &c., &c.

PRICES SHALL BE LOW.

No. 747 BROADWAY, running through to Mercer St.

WE PUT GENUINE WALTHAM Watches into the hands of purchasers in any state, territory, town, village, or frontier settlement, at the lowest New York wholesale prices. The Express Companies take them from us and deliver them to the customers in any part of the Union, however remote. The package can be opened, and the watch examined, and not till then is the purchaser required to pay for it; and if on examination it is not satisfactory, there is no obligation to receive it. Our descriptive and illustrated Price-List gives full information in regard to the watches, and our plan of sending them by express. Every one should have a copy. We send it postpaid on application; no return stamps required. When you write, please state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly.

HOWARD & CO., Jewelers and Silversmiths,
No. 619 Broadway, New York.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOND-ARY MANUFACTURING CO., 158 Church St., NEW HAVEN, CT.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless machines on you, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

THE LYCEUM.—No. 1.—contains the names, subjects, and terms of over two hundred of the best LECTURERS, MUSICIANS, and READERS of the country, with valuable advice to LYCEUM COMMITTEES. Specimen copy sent on receipt of stamp, by JAMES REDPATH, Boston, Mass.

FOUNTAIN PENS. One dip writes 4 pages. $1.50 a gross, postpaid.—Penknife and Pencil combined.—Eraser and Pen-Holder combined, and 12 Fountain Pens, 50 cents, postpaid. Sell at sight. AGENTS WANTED. CITY NOVELTY CO., 404 Library St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRIPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCUNE, Nashville, Tenn.; KUNKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; C. M. MCRAE, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MRS. C. BLUME, Pittsburg, Pa.; ELLERY & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HAMMER, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; J. H. HINTERMISTER, Ithaca, N. Y.; H. S. MACIER, Rochester, N. Y.; H. UTLEY, Binghamton, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, MASS.; CURRY BROS., Providence, R. I.; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, CONN.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, CAL.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C. W.; E. PIELU & BRO., St. John, N. B.

BE BEAUTIFUL.—If you desire beauty you should use HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM.

It gives a soft, refined, satin-like texture to the complexion, removes Roughness, Redness, Blotches, Sunburn, Tan, &c., and adds a tinge of pearly bloom to the plainest features. It brings the bloom of youth to the fading cheek, and changes the rustic country girl into a fashionable city belle.

In the use of the MAGNOLIA BALM lies the true secret of beauty. No lady need complain of her complexion who will invest 75 cents in this delightful article.

LYON'S KATHAIRON is the best Hair Dressing in use.

HOME INVESTMENT.

GOLD LOAN
OF
The Rochester, N. Y., Water Works Company:
SIX PER CENT. BONDS, DUE 1889,
OF $1000 EACH.

INTEREST is MAY and NOVEMBER. Principal and Interest payable in Gold, at Union Trust Company, New York.

We offer for sale

$400,000

of this loan at EIGHTY-TWO AND A HALF, and accrued interest in currency.

The entire property is mortgaged to the Union Trust Company for the protection of the bondholders, and the bonds are issued by them only upon the certificate of John C. Trautwine, C. E., appointed by the bondholders, approved by the Board of Directors, that the money has been actually expended upon the works. Pamphlets containing the reports of the Engineers, W. Minor Roberts and J. C. Trautwine, upon the progress of the works; also copies of the acts granting this Company their charter to supply Rochester with water, furnished upon application. Upon the most moderate estimate, the rental from the works, when completed, will be annually, double the amount required for interest upon the bonds. Having personally examined the works, we can confidently recommend this loan to the public as a safe and profitable investment.

$150,000

UTLEY & DOUGHERTY,
No. 11 Wall St.

WARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

Ask your Family Physician what he thinks of TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT. He will tell you that it combines the properties of a mild purgative, a stomachic, a febrifuge, an alterative, and a detergent; in short, that it is five valuable remedies in one.

SOLD UNIVERSALLY BY DRUGGISTS.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.

MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOSCOPICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CELEBRATED

TRADE MARK. REGISTERED 1868.

BRAND BLACK ALPACAS.

The Brand of Alpaca, on account of its fineness of cloth and richness of color, has become the Standard Alpaca now used in the United States.

These goods are greatly improved in Weight, Bloom, and Shade for the Fall and Winter wear; and, being made of the very finest material, they are absolutely superior to any Alpacas ever sold in this country, and are now one of the most fashionable and economical fabrics worn.

These beautiful goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in New York, Brooklyn, and in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

WM. I. PEAKE & CO.,
46, 48, & 50 WHITE ST.,
Sole Importers of the Brand for the United States.

THE
NATIONAL LIFE
INSURANCE CO.
OF NEW YORK,
212 BROADWAY, cor. FULTON ST.

Issues all the new forms of policies, and presents as favorable terms as any Company in the United States.

Thirty days' grace allowed on each payment, and the policy held good during that time.

Policy-holders share in the annual profits of the Company, and have a voice in the election and management of the Company.

No policy or medical fee charged.

All policies non-forfeitable on the principle of the Massachusetts non-forfeiture law.

EDWARD A. JONES, President.
J. O. HALSEY, Vice-President.
J. A. MORTIMORE, Secretary.

REV. JAMES POTTER, D. D., Superintendent of Agencies.

Call or Send for Circular.

AGENTS WANTED.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French patents, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY,
DURABILITY,
and CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
Wallingford, Conn.

Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N. Y.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List.) Baltimore, Md.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 667.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE THORN IN THE FOOT.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1869.

LOUIS NAPOLEON'S NEW SYSTEM.

IT is announced that the majority of the Prince Imperial of France will be declared upon his next birthday. This fact, so ominous and recent illness of the Emperor, so serious that the Empress abandoned her Eastern tour, must remind every Frenchman who really desires permanent repose for his country that the prospect of obtaining it is rapidly disappearing. Nearly seventy years ago NAPOLEON said to LAFAYETTE, "The French are unfit for liberty." LAFAYETTE answered that they were tired only of license, and their sufferings from the abuse of liberty made them only the more desirous of real freedom. "And that," he said, "Citizen First Consul, the French expect from you."

When LOUIS NAPOLEON overthrew the French Republic, he said, substantially, that nothing was to be hoped from a government of doctrinaires and visionaries quarrelling among themselves, and that he would justify his usurpation by the tranquility and confidence which he would bestow upon France. This was the significance of his famous remark, "the empire is peace." In a certain sense he has redeemed his word. During the seventeen years of his reign there has been no serious public disturbance in France. He has silenced Paris. In the Mexican war Italy he maintained the national prestige; and although in the later Italian movement, and in Mexico, his majesty was at fault, the incompetency did not lead to domestic trouble. The principle which he extols in his "Life of Cæsar," Cæsarism or absolute personal government, has been the guide of the imperial régime. But the fatal fault of the system has been evident from the beginning. The empire may be peace, but the Emperor is the empire. While LOUIS lives the power that establishes his rule continues; but when Cæsar dies Cæsarism is impotent.

The present situation of France is the final criticism of LOUIS NAPOLEON. He has sought his own glory, not the welfare of France, and he has not been able to see that, even for himself, a true patriotism was the best policy. He has preferred a strictly personal government, and in so doing, despite the claims of his friends that he is a remarkably sagacious man, and despite a certain reputation for political study and philosophy due to his "Napoleonic ideas," he has shown that he has not comprehended the cardinal principle that a stable and progressive government is one of laws, not of persons. In the last days of a fierce civil war lasting for four years the President of the United States is assassinated, but his death does not in the least degree affect the operation of the government, and, while it terribly shocks, it does not injuriously disturb the public mind. But at the end of seventeen years of undisputed and peaceful supremacy, the mere prospect of the death by illness of the Emperor of France is the sure portent of confusion and dismay.

For this situation LOUIS NAPOLEON and France are equally responsible—the Emperor for supposing that permanent order could be established upon personal supremacy, and the French for not demanding a constitutional system. This has indeed been the demand of a party; but it was not so plainly the resolution of the country that it could not be disregarded. And that it has been disregarded is not denied. LOUIS NAPOLEON has chosen by restrictions of the press and by his whole system of centralization to be deaf to the voice of the nation, conscious him of a supremacy rightful to use it as that he seized, and makes his usurpation a crime. No reason can be urged for the concessions of the Senatus Consultum now that were not urged by valid ten years ago. The moment for an absolute ruler to begin a constitutional régime is when he is in the fullness of his power and renown, not when his force is failing, and the constitution is seen to be a tub thrown to the whale. LOUIS NAPOLEON'S true policy was the extremest constitutional liberalism, and that is almost the only form of government which France has not tried within the last century.

The radical defect of the system now proposed by LOUIS NAPOLEON is, that the Ministry is not responsible to the people. If the change in the direction attempted is necessary, then a more radical change is imperative. A Ministry responsible to a Senate which the Emperor appoints is not a responsible Ministry in the legitimate sense. The point for which LOUIS NAPOLEON ought to hope to provide is the peaceful succession of his son. But how does the Senatus Consultum do that? It is plain that the security against trouble when the Emperor dies would be the conviction of the people that they really have the power. The new system does not assure them of that. The majority of the Prince Imperial may be declared, but nobody can declare that of the empire. "At any moment the Emperor may die, and apparently the empire must fall with him.

THE SICKLES NOTE.

WE have never supposed that the Administration would choose this moment to threaten Spain, or to depart from the honorable tradition of American neutrality. We have therefore been constantly unwilling to believe that propositions of the kind reported for a settlement of the Cuban question had been made to the Spanish Government; and we are not surprised to learn that the note which General SICKLES was said to have addressed to that Government, conveying a menace, was not approved at Washington. Nothing could well be more superfluous and insulting than to say to Spain that if she did not more differently we should recognize the Cubans as belligerents. This, however, is merely the reported threat of the note. As we said in our last, it is useless to know precisely any thing upon the subject.

The United States need not threaten. Their power is recognized and assured. Their respect for treaty obligations, and the amity of nations, and their own neutrality laws, have been demonstrated. Whenever it shall seem to them that good faith requires, and the general welfare demands, intervention, or concession of belligerent rights, or recognition of independence, in the case of any struggling people on any shore, they will not hesitate to declare it, and with the full consideration of every consequence. And especially under this Administration would they act without Buncombe. The proper course for the United States Government to pursue, with a due regard for its friendly relations with Spain, and for the present condition of affairs there, is to wait, to propose any thing, is to offer friendly mediation. When that is declined in the same spirit, there is an end of the matter. If the war should continue, the Government would watch it narrowly, and act accordingly.

If the war upon the Spanish state in Cuba is distinguished by peculiar barbarity, it is becoming in any power friendly to Spain to remonstrate at its discretion. But it should remonstrate in the name of humanity and civilization, and not make the occasion to bluster. Every remonstrance of this kind implies a reserved possibility. If the warfare is so inhuman as to provoke remonstrance, the alternative of Spanish solution be disdained or unheeded, the warned nation is prepared for all consequences. Should it appear that the note of General SICKLES contained nothing more than the usual remonstrance of this kind, the perturbation of the Spanish press would be entirely unnecessary. But if it were conditional upon any expectation, that perturbation would hardly have arisen.

It is to be presumed, therefore, that our Minister has gone further, and as a politician estimated in the manifest disposition of Spain it is impossible that he has seriously transcended his instructions. The London Times says there is no doubt that the alternative offered Spain by the United States is abandonment of the island or American recognition of the insurgents, and apprehends severe events. The Times is unquestionably mistaken. The Administration would not take such a responsibility, and it would not be sustained by public opinion if it did. The probability that the annexation of slavery in Cuba has been determined by the home Government, and that negotiations have been begun for the severance of the island from Spain. Does it not occur to the Times that these are facts the conduct which it attributes to the United States Government is ridiculous? If they should we be surprised to learn whereas Spain else does not do what she has already done?

When the Cortes and Congress meet, the Cuban question will probably not be settled. We still doubt whether Spain will offer absolutely to part from Cuba. As we said some weeks since, it is more likely that before yielding to the revolution she will offer to grant justice, a plan of reforms, and a vote of the Cubans upon the question of separation. Confess, if it faithfully proposed, Spain would will not depart from the national traditions of conduct in such circumstances, and will not allow any supposed desire of annexation to influence its action.

CATHOLIC PROTESTANTS.

ALTHOUGH when Pope PIUS THE NINTH was elected to the chair of ST. PETER he began his Pontificate by the display of a liberal political spirit, although, after the gloomy régime of GREGORY THE SIXTEENTH, the words and acts of the new Pope seemed to promise a millennium of joy and progress to the Roman States, and a fresh inspiration to the piety of the Church, it was tranquilly said by those who thoroughly comprehended the nature of the Church, that if PIUS were only another GREGORY THE GREAT or HILDEBRAND, he could rule the Church to the centre, and shake the religious world; but if he were only what his career to that time had led every body to believe, then he would be a leaf upon Niagara. POOR PIUS has certainly not been a HILDEBRAND; but he has summoned a Council.

It is more than three hundred years since there has been a General Council of the Church of Rome, and its authority is so vast and vague in assumption, and so undecided in fact, that to invoke it has always seemed to threaten more danger than profit to the Church. The call for the present assembly by a Pope who has denounced the whole spirit of modern civilization as irreligious, and whose organs have plainly foreshadowed the enormity and stringency of the dogmas likely to be declared, has, of course, profoundly moved the great body of Roman Catholics.

The consequences are already begin to appear. The two old tendencies in the Church, the Ultramontane and the Gallican, are becoming daily evident. The names describe in general the liberal and the anti-liberal movement—the assertion of universal ecclesiastical supremacy, and the protest against it. The Bavarian Prime Minister has expressed his dissatisfaction. Austria quietly awaits events, but will, of course, resist any extraordinary assumption. Most significant, the press chronicle of the Roman Church among European laymen, has declared his sympathy with the Germans, who protest in advance against the probable action of the Council; and the telegraph announces that the Dominican Father HYACINTHE, the honeyed tongue of the Church in Paris, has abandoned his convent, and has published a letter to the General of his order, protesting against the Pope and Council, and against doctrines and practices of the Church which he asserts are anti-christian.

Such signs are significant. When Pope INOCENT censured FENELON he submitted without a word. But he is not the age of INOCENT, and a priest who defies the Council in advance is not likely to yield to its demands nor to dread its anathema. If the conservative and reactionary party in the Church in Council—and in ecclesiastical assemblies it generally prevails —there will be many a MONTALEMBERT, many a HYACINTHE, who will be forced to oppose the decrees of an authority which they are taught to believe infallible, or to admit that an infallible body may be mistaken in the subjects to which its infallibility extends, or to renounce their Church altogether.

As yet, indeed, the reasons for assembling a Council which can only confirm and declare what the great perils of its probable action have not been made evident. It was hardly worth while, for the sake of declaring the dogma of the divinity of the Virgin Mary, to run the risk of convulsing the Church; and what can be gained by the assertion of the personal infallibility of the Pope more than the cost of a schism? To those who are not of the Church the spectacle will be interesting; while among the most extraordinary incidents in history would be the declaration of the highest authority of the greatest multitude of Christians in the world, that the era of the greatest general enlightenment and active progress, the period of breaking chains, and of the most careful study of human welfare, was radically hostile to the spirit of Christ.

THE NEW YORK DEMOCRATS.

THE New York Democratic Convention was an assembly of the most noted party leaders; but nothing in its proceedings commended it to the sympathy of those who believe that this is a truly democratic government intended to secure equal rights for all the people. Mr. TILDEN exhorted his friends to let by-gones be by-gones, and declared for the right to be called white labor against the Chinese immigrant and the colored citizen. But he did not intend to forget the by-gones, because, including a bloody war, were the work of Democrats, and that certain dogmas of the party must be abandoned because the people had spurned them; nor did he intend to unconsciously that in a country of which a seventh of the population is colored, and which invites immigration, to declare by word or race against another as to forbid fair play, and to encourage hatred, confusion, and anarchy.

Mr. TILDEN having said that he did not wish to see any immigrants coming to the country who could not be amalgamated with the population in one homogeneous mass, Mr. O'GORMAN said that the population of Europe would flock against the colored native vote in Georgia. Mr. O'GORMAN also said that the Republican party had obtained influence by "interpreting that sentiment among the angry passions, which now, thank God, is eradicated from the American heart." The transient emotion and angry passion which have given the Republican party power, which maintain its continued dominance in the minds of the most intelligent men and in the most enlightened parts of the country, were the love of liberty and the perception of the relation of justice to national prosperity, which have abolished the most infamous slavery against the protest of what is called Democracy, and have proclaimed the equal rights of all American citizens against the most desperate Democratic endeavors.

Mr. TILDEN and Mr. O'GORMAN, and all Democratic orators and conventions, may be very sure that it is not by contrasting the history, character, and measures of the two parties that they can hope to make converts among intelligent Americans. Mr. CASSIDY, who is one of the ablest of the Democratic editors, and who is understood to have written the resolutions, also points us to the history of his party from the beginning. But surely he, equally with his friends the orators, knew that the reason the Democratic party was constantly defeated from 1860 to 1868, during the deadly struggle to save the country and the government, was the universal conviction of the American people that a party which had furnished every rebel and every sympathizer with rebellion was not a truly patriotic party.

MR. SUMNER'S SPEECH.

MR. SUMNER'S speech at the Massachusetts Republican Convention took the ground that the chief consideration in the pending election is the position of the State upon the great national questions. His very property assumed that if Massachusetts, of all the States in the Union, should, upon some issue of prohibition, abandon her place at the right of the Republican line, that line throughout the country would be dismayed and demoralized; and by its defeat not only would the grog-shops in Massachusetts and elsewhere be free from all without restriction, but the policy which is most favored at such resorts would become the policy of the country. The speech, by its forced construction of the great national issues, undoubtedly had a powerful effect. The action of the Convention was singularly harmonious. The only question which the Democratic might have arisen—that of prohibition—was declared not to be one of party, but one which should be properly left to the Legislature.

The points of the speech were that the national faith must be kept to the uttermost with the freedom and the credit; and that while the most liberal policy should be pursued through justice, our foreign policy should be peace through honorable and friendly neutrality. Cuba should not be recognized as belligerent, because belligerency is a fact, and recognition is not accomplished revolution. Against England the case was re-stated as in the speech in the Senate, in which Mr. SUMNER stated that he did not demand damages, but simply declared the nature and extent of the claim of the United States.

This plain and those in the New York Convention show how entirely our politics proceed upon general and national, not upon State and local issues. Mr. SUMNER, indeed, said in the New York Convention that the Democratic Canal Board had cleaned out the canals. But the remarks he made could not be regarded as controlling upon the whole question. The tendency of which we speak is inevitable, and it is instructive, nor is it to be deplored.

THE SCHOOLS.

THE Board of Education has resolved that the Latin and Greek languages shall not be taught in the College of the City of New York. Mr. LARREMORE, the President of the Board, claimed that it was not the business of the trustees to decide whether the College was a desirable institution or not. It has been founded by the State; he and his associates have been made guardians; and as the language are a recognized part of every college curriculum, it is, in his judgment, the duty of the Board to allow the pupils that, unless positive can be urged against it. This he has not found, and he warmly advocated the study of the Latin and Greek, and opposed dropping them from the course. The Opposition made the mistake of underestimating the value of the classical studies as a reason for discontinuing them in the College. It was not urged that they had, but not for the reason that they are valueless.

This question being settled, there are subjects of more importance that will demand the attention of the Board. It is alleged that the accommodations of the schools are wholly insufficient, and we have even read one statement that thousands of children were excluded for this reason last year.

The one thing that we can all clearly see is, that ignorance is fatal to a popular government, and that a thorough kind and degree of education are so indispensable to the public welfare that the State is justified in providing for them at the common expense. Unquestionably, also, the same consideration would justify making that education obligatory.

First of all, there must be room enough in the schools, and the school-houses must be not only sufficiently spacious, but perfectly secure, well-lighted, and properly ventilated. Of course, in the city of New York, with the rapid increase of the population by immigration, it is not easy to keep pace with the demand of such accommodations. The schools must be built in every part of the city, and the highest prices for land, material, and labor must necessarily be paid. These indispensable expenses are very great, but they are unavoidable, and the Board should not hesitate to ascertain, from statistics and calculations which are at hand, just what is necessary for the proper school accommodation of all the children, including in the estimate a liberal rate of salary to skilful teachers. Let them report to the public, but take care to show that the money will not be wasted. The new Constitution provides that instruction shall be free to all children in the State. Economy is always desirable; but parsimony in the support of schools is not economy. We do not believe that the taxpayers will grudge the payment of any sum for school purposes, so long as they are persuaded that it is honestly necessary.

It is true that the proper lines of a public school education are necessarily arbitrary, but they may still be drawn with a great deal of uniformity and precision. It is to be a general and not a special training; it is to furnish the elementary instruction, which at his own inclination and expense the scholar may afterward develop. We hope that the new Board will have plenty of work and a definite policy, and not fear to trust the public good sense upon this most important of public interests.

TRADE AND THE CROPS.

THE principal trade thus far this season has been with the South and Southwest, and on a scale which shows a decided improvement in those localities in financial power, due mainly to the results of the cotton crop for the year ending on the 31st of August last. The total crop amounts to 2,260,557, in addition to 362,398 on hand on the 1st September, 1868; which, together, have yielded from two hundred and fifty to three hundred millions of dollars to the cotton-growing States; while this advantage over former years that, having at the same time produced more food than is usual, the net profit from cotton equals that of those years when double the quantity of this staple was grown. Of the crop of this year 1,444,668 were exported to foreign countries, 821,924 were consumed within the limits of the North-western States, and 173,203 in Virginia and the Cotton States—giving a total of 995,127 consumed in the United States, which quantity includes 230,903 bales burned, and 141,160 the estimated stock on hand on the 1st September, 1869.

It will be thus seen that foreign states contribute to this renewed strength of the South in the proportion which 1,444,668 bears to 2,297,795; and that the States north of Virginia and those of the Northwest in the proportion which the figures applicable to them bear to the whole produce.

The exemption in Virginia and the Cotton States—173,203 bales or thereabouts—shows the extent of the manufacturing industry in cotton fabrics which has grown up in the South —a result of the close of the war. This manufacture consists of cotton yarns and coarse shirtings and sheetings, the latter distributed quite largely in New York in free competition with cloths of like description proceeding from the old establishments. This industry will no doubt increase with advancing immigration into their midst, and all the materials for success are found in the Southern States. Cotton and woolen mills are also springing up in the West, which supply their respective localities with many articles of trade.

The time is not distant when the Eastern and Northern States will bear the same relation to the Southern and Western in manufacturing industry that the European manufacturers now bear to us. The foreigner now supplies only fine goods, in the manufacture of which in four or five years we shall be actively engaged the result of successful competition with us in the coarser fabrics which the spread of mills over the South and West will occasion. No other resource is left to us; and it may safely be assumed, if protection to our industry is not too much reduced, that we shall advance to the new condition of things in the foreign markets to which we shall be driven, with the skill and activity necessary for success. No American can examine the display of goods which are now in progress in this city without just pride at the advances made within a few years in woolen and dress goods—advances which leave no question of the eminence soon to be attained.

Another change has occurred in the condition of the trade. More than one-half of the buyers from that quarter during this season are of the Jewish persuasion—a fact very perceptibly felt during the Jewish holidays, when the quite frequent and very well observed, leading to diminished sales by the jobbing and importing houses on the days when they occur. It will be recollected that during the war the Jews passed the lines of both belligerents very freely, as it was difficult to distinguish to which section they belonged by what they had carried by way of profits. The old houses of the South, which were in the habit of giving long credits to the planters, were many of them either killed or wrecked out as the result of the conflict, and a new system of trade and new men followed. The aversion to long credits is shared not only by the new traders, but here also, and there is consequently greater safety in this respect. Efforts have been made this season to extend the credits on cotton goods, on the ground that the profits of the purchasers would be light, and that payment from home customers was expected only after the new crops began to come to market; but the effort was generally resisted by our leading houses.

Northern and Western buyers have not arrived very freely thus far, owing to their ability to receive goods rapidly, and to the tendency to hold low stocks which is common among the small dealers. Chicago has become a large distributor for the region pierced by her railroads, and she buys from first hands more generally than usual. Money not being plenty among Western farmers, they are confined to the supply of immediate wants; and although it will continue to be good and remunerative, it is not likely to partake of speculation in any part of the season.

The condition of the country as to its crops is now being regarded, at least in portions of the Northern States, with anxiety. A drought of uncommon severity had prevailed along the Atlantic coast, and it has become necessary to resort to stores laid up for the winter to supply the want of pasturage. The corn crop in light soils has been severely injured, in some cases entirely destroyed. In the southern county of Westchester farmers not favored with living springs have been obliged for nearly a month to send long distances for water, and they are now learning what is the full meaning of the English during the season of 1868. The autumnal equinox, which has been awaited with anxiety, has occurred; and as the drought has not been very general, the new useless pastures will scarcely be restored this year. Water, however, is abundant.

The crops of small grains had been gathered throughout the Southern Atlantic States before the drought set in. In portions of South Carolina and Georgia the dry weather has affected the cotton as well as the corn, having into view the whole cotton-producing region, there is scarcely a doubt that the quantity will be as large if not larger than the crop of 1868-69. Shipments of wheat from the South have been restrained by the fear that it will be necessary to call upon this cereal to supply the place of corn.

In the Northern States the crop of cereals was quite good, but owing to the severe rains which fell at harvest-time much wheat has been injured, and the movement has been delayed in ripening in the Northwest that an early frost would inflict serious damage.

The vast extent of the whole Union, and the varieties of climate which we are favored, do not permit uniformity either in the benefits or the injuries to the farmer which attend the annual production. Neither the continuance of drought nor the undue prevalence of severe rains is ever general over the entire country, and all do not simultaneously suffer. The advantage which some portions enjoy in the way of fertility more grain than we shall need for consumption, but not much from Atlantic ports to satisfy the wants abroad. Whatever the harvests of 1869-70 will produce as large rewards as did that of 1868-69 is much discussed. There seems to be no fear that the production of cotton in the cotton-growing States sufficiently in excess of the last crop to affect the demand for what we shall have to sell; but it must be remembered that consumption is great and at home were not generally able to make a profit last season, and it can scarcely be expected but they will run their mills for another year at a loss. The stock of cotton goods in the middlings during the week which ended on the 18th September, due very much to the approach of new shipments, it has been long understood that 34½ cents for middlings could be maintained only during the prevalence of the scarcity which the nearly total consumption of the crop of 1868-69 occasioned. The demand for cotton goods is a necessity, and she will make as powerful efforts to accomplish it as have been made since last season, when it became thus far, to command the market-price of grain.

Business, however, of all descriptions was brought to a pause on Thursday and Friday by the calamity of the Gold Panic. The latter is conducted on a scale of frightful extent and with the effrontery which disregards the substantial interests of the community. At this point, "Hans Breitmann's Party." It is irresistibly delicious. Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers have issued the poems in a very handsome and pretty volume, with a grave glossary at the end.

By the death of Mr. JOHN RIDGEWAY, on the 4th of August, Boston lost an exemplary citizen, and the country one of its most remarkable inventors. He was well known as the inventor of the RIDGEWAY "Vertical Revolving Battery," which did not succeed, securing the adoption of his invention by the United States Government, but it has received from army and naval officers the highest commendation.

The first number of the College Review, a neat and attractive monthly of the form of the Nation, has appeared. We learn that the editor is Mr. F. C. GILBERT, and that the literary reviews are by Mr. W. L. STONE, who has also a general supervision of the paper. The opening number has some timely and interesting articles, and the foreign correspondence is announced as of especial interest. A story by the late WILLIAM L. STONE opens gracefully, and we do not doubt that the College Review will heartily agree with the remarks upon College Education, and give a hearty welcome to the view who appeals peculiarly to their sympathy, and who will be devoted to their service.

THE Times says that "Paraguay is a republic threatened by a monarchy," and, therefore, appeals to our sympathies as republicans. So old Venice was a republic, but we doubt if Republican liberty suffered severely when it was overthrown. The people of Paraguay have as much share in their government as the people of Turkey. It is not with the name of Republic, but with the life and spirit of government, that Americans naturally sympathize.

MR. HENRY MORRISON, a gentleman hitherto unknown to us, sheds a good deal of light upon the present political situation in a late speech before the Young Men's Democratic Committee. His view of the Democracy, especially, is inspiring and novel. MR. MORRISON remarked that,

"The genius of the Democratic party was as eternal as the country, and that both must expire simultaneously, without hope of resurrection by the light of the past. In the silent watches of the night the watchman's responsibility was that his sisters were there in their weeds and in their volume rolling in; and in this moment of exposure and trial and undoubted good and evil of Democracy—her timbers strained but sound—was floating—yes, it was! In the darkest days, when faith had not faded, the morning dawned. It broke, and with it came the sun upon the deck, bearing on its wings their omen and their pride: she came with evidence that the United States had set her foothold and wreckage, for on each leaf and evergreen, in letters of light and life, spoke in the Democratic party, was inscribed, 'Excelsior.'"

After observing at some length that greatness and prosperity were the glory were the glory with the Democratic party, and reviewing our political history with what the reporter invidiously describes as "considerable accuracy," the orator concluded by exclaiming:

"Say not that republics were ungrateful. They had their way. Even in CLELLAN's night they were displeased by jealous interference, was illustrious; whose fame shone like the sun and was reflected in all eyes—men dazzled them with incomprehensibility when they should have been gratified. Johnson, Democratic as he was, administered the government as a Democrat takes advantage of the interregnum which success of his party has created, and so saves a nation in spite of the allegiance of the first principles of their existence. Johnson, like CLELLAN, would be lost sight of in the expanse of reason and justice in the admiring but intelligent gaze of the people, and would be eclipsed in the reign of the so-called Republican party. Russia has her Poniatowski, Austria her Hungary, England her Ireland, and America her South. Democracy said unto blood, 'Rise,' and it rose up and lived. Unbound, they rose disenthralled and free, and resumed their place among the sovereign States of the world and perpetuated Union, and by the living light and life of the Democracy. The Democracy was and is. Once returned to heaven, redeemed, regenerated, and released by the mercy and the humanity of a people, they claimed their birthright and their attributes of immortality."

If not entirely perspicuous, this will yet be universally agreed to present the subject in a very striking manner.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

M. CATACAZY, the new Russian Minister, presented his credentials to the President on September 24.

The Democratic State Democratic Convention met at Syracuse September 15. The present State officers were renominated.

The Massachusetts Republican Convention met at Worcester September 22, and was unanimous for Senator SUMNER. Governor Claflin was renominated.

GEORGE F. PEARCE, of the famous Powell Exploring Expedition to Colorado, has returned to Chicago, and reports that the country traversed through which he traveled is barren and not susceptible of cultivation to the extent that was supposed.

The damage inflicted upon the wheat crop in Minnesota by the late storms is estimated at 20 per cent.

The engineer who a few weeks ago caused the Mast Yard explosion has been acquitted by the jury.

We give on page 634 a table, showing the remarkable fluctuations of the value of the New York City from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., September 24, 1869.

FOREIGN NEWS.

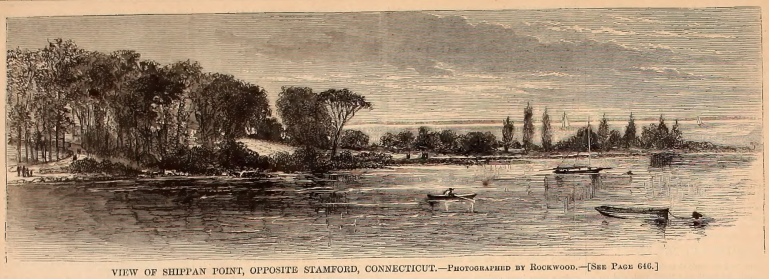
THE Paris papers recently published a letter from the preacher-monk, Father Hyacinthe, addressed to the Father General of the order of Barnabites, announcing that he abandons his convent, and ceases henceforth to wear the habit of his order. He declares that he has a reason for this radical step, he declares that he can no longer be a member of the Holy Synod of Barnabites, before the Pope and the Council, against doctrines and practices of the Church which he believes, as he contends, are not in accordance with the principles of Christ. Father Hyacinthe has published also the letter of Pere Hyacinthe as a great religious and political manifesto.

Father Charles Loyson Hyacinthe was born at Orleans, France, in 1827, and received his education at Pau. In 1852 he was ordained at St. Sulpice, in Paris, and for a period of fifteen years was a professor in the main while he studied theology four years at the Sorbonne, graduating as Master of Arts and Doctor of Theology at Nantes. Having passed ten years in the service of the Church of God as a priest, he entered the convent of Carmelite Friars, he became a member of this order, and began to preach at Toulouse. In 1864 there, his sermons, delivered at Notre Dame, were received with a revival of the old fervor. In 1865, he preached at Bordeaux, and in the Advent season of 1866 at Toulouse. It was during the summer of 1868 that he made his first appearance in the pulpit of Notre Dame, having preached in Lent, and afterward at the Church of the Madeleine. His sermons in Notre Dame, having proved so attractive, he eloquence and boldness of his utterances attracted public attention, and he became at once a brilliant reputation. He is a most popular preacher, and it is from this fact that his recent sermons excite such wide-spread comment. The latest report from Paris intimates that the Father Hyacinthe has left his convent, and at present is living with his wife and child as declared in the home of his parents.

Our last advices from Spain report a revival of the republican movement against the Government. The time is fast approaching for the Cortes, both the Republicans and the Carlists, to battle. There has already been a barricade fight in the streets of Barcelona, and an outbreak seemed imminent in Madrid. Cuba and the Republican leader, had recently addressed 30,000 people at Saragossa.

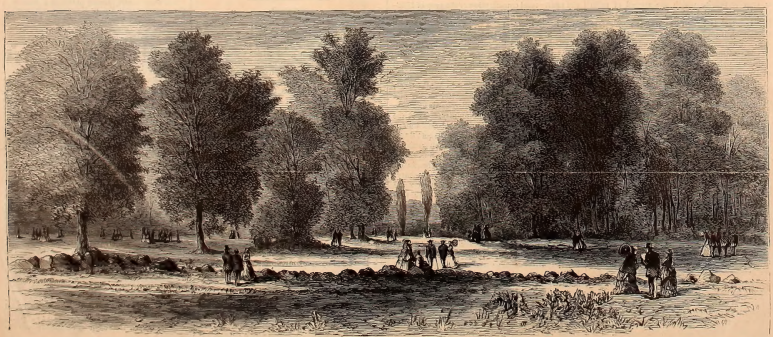
We have from Cuba a confirmation of the Las Tunas victory. Cespedes has assumed command of the Cuban forces.

The Pope has politely informed Dr. Cumming, of England, that these only will be admitted to the Oecumenical Council who are in accord with the papal idea.



VIEW OF SHIPPAN POINT, OPPOSITE STAMFORD, CONNECTICUT.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.—[SEE PAGE 646.]

SHIPPAN POINT—JOHNSON AND MILLER'S AUCTION SALE, SEPTEMBER 21, 1869.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.—[SEE PAGE 646.]



SHIPPAN POINT—VISITORS INSPECTING PROPERTY PRELIMINARY TO THE SALE OF SEPTEMBER 21, 1869.—PHOT. BY ROCKWOOD.—[SEE PAGE 646.]

BARBARA UBRYK, THE INCARCERATED NUN OF CRACOW.

BARBARA UBRYK, THE INCARCERATED NUN.

OUR readers will remember that, a few weeks since, we published a detailed narrative from the Vienna Presse of the incarceration of the Cracow nun, BARBARA UBRYK. We give this week a portrait of this victim of conventual cruelty.

The Hull Convent scandal, in England, and this Cracow disclosure have each excited the most profound attention throughout Christendom, and have done much to disabuse the popular mind of the romantic notions so often associated with convent life. These revelations have also led some of the European governments to insist upon the right of exercising inspection over convents, as over other institutions where the lack of such supervision might lead to abuses.

The following is the substance of the information made public soon after the discovery of BARBARA UBRYK'S incarceration:

About the 20th of July, an anonymous notice reached the Criminal Court at Cracow to the effect that in the Convent of the Carmelite Barefooted Nuns one of the order, named BARBARA UBRYK, had been forcibly kept in close confinement in a dark cell for twenty-one years. The Vice-President of the Criminal Court, RITTER VON ANTONIEWICZ, immediately laid this information before a judge of inquiry, who, in company with the public prosecutor, repaired to the bishop, VON GALECKI, with the request to permit them to enter the convent. Herr VON GALECKI suggested to the judge that the notice might have arisen out of a false report; but when the officer of justice urged him to give him an ecclesiastical assistant, he declared that he would grant the request in his capacity as Papal delegate, and sub-delegated the Papal prelate SPITAL, a very intelligent and worthy priest. In his company and that of his actuary, KWIALKOWSKI, the judicial witnesses, STANISLAUS GRALEWSKI and THEOPHIL PARYL, the judge drove to the convent. The latter, which is one of the strictest female orders, is situated in one of the most beautiful suburbs of CRACOW. The convent was first entered by Father SPITAL, and the commission went to the upper corridor, followed by the nuns, one of whom showed the judge the cell of Sister BARBARA. This cell, between the pantries, close to the dung-hole, had a walled-up window and a double wooden door, in which there was a movable grating, through which, very probably, food was handed in. The cell, seven paces long by six paces wide, was opened, but it is almost impossible to describe the view this piece of inquisition of the nineteenth century presented. In a dark, infected hole, adjoining the sewer, sat, or rather cowered, on a heap of straw, an entirely naked, totally neglected, half insane woman, who, at the unaccustomed view of light, the outer world, and human beings, folded her hands and pitifully implored: "I am hungry: have pity on me; give me meat, and I shall be obedient—" This hole, for it could hardly be called a chamber, besides containing all kinds of dirt and filth, and a dish with rotten potatoes, was deficient of the slightest decent accommodation. There was nothing—no stove, no bed, no table, no chair—it was neither warmed by a fire nor by the rays of the sun. This den the inhuman Sisters, who call themselves women, spiritual wives, the brides of heaven, had selected as a habitation for one of their own sex, and kept her therein in close confinement for twenty-one years—since 1848. For twenty-one years the Gray Sisters daily passed this cell, and not one of them ever thought of taking compassion on this poor outcast prisoner. Half human being, half animal, with a filthy body, with thick knock-kneed legs, hollow cheeks, closely shaved, dirty head, unwashed for years, came a hobble-looking being forward, such as DANTE in his wildest imagination was unable to picture, with her deeply-sunk eyes staring on one spot, such this wretched victim in her cell in the Convent of the Carmelites. The judge immediately ordered the nun to be clothed, and sent himself for Bishop GALECKI. The bishop was deeply moved, and, turning to the assembled nuns, he solemnly remarked them for their inhumanity.

THE OLDEST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN NEW ENGLAND, AT WICKFORD, RHODE ISLAND.
SKETCHED BY CHARLES E. HUBD.—[SEE PAGE 647.]

AN ENGLISH FARM SCENE.—[SEE PAGE 647.]

"Is this," he said, "what you call love of your neighbor? Fiends, not women, these you are, to let this that you purpose to enter the kingdom of heaven?" The nuns ventured to excuse their conduct, but the bishop would not hear them out, but, "putting with a fearfully wild gesture and in great excitement to the Sisters," they are out angels!

This fearful personal history, which was brought to the light of day by the above alone, shows what iniquity may be covered by the sacred name of religion even in this 19th century.

SHIPPAN POINT.

SHIPPAN POINT, of which we give a view on page 644, is a beautiful and fertile peninsula of 300 acres in extent, opposite Stamford, Connecticut. The surface slopes in every direction, and it is surrounded on all sides by the most picturesque scenery. In front, stretching westward and seaward for a long distance, lies Long Island Sound, with Long Island beyond. Through the groves and orchards of Shippan Point several miles of serpentine roads have been recently constructed, and other improvements are in progress. One of our illustrations on page 644 represents the sale at public auction of a portion of the property at the Point, by JOHNSON & MILLER, on the 21st of September.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book I.

CHAPTER XI.

SIR JOHN IS DISCUSSED.

DURING the first four or five years of Maud Desmond's stay at Shipley, Lady Tallis had written several times to Mr. Levincourt, asking news of her niece, and requesting the tidings of her own troubles and injuries in long, tangled skeins of sentences, wherein verbs and their nominatives were never invoked together in intricable confusion. Moreover, as she wrote with very pale ink, on very thin paper, and crossed each page of writing, the trouble of deciphering her epistles speedily became a greater one than Mr. Levincourt was willing to give himself.

Her ladyship's mode of expressing herself was singularly enigmatical. This did not arise from any intention of being mysterious, but simply from what the vicar styled "a puzzle-headedness," and from a conception of the grammatical construction of the English language considerably at variance with the best authorities.

Lady Tallis invariably wrote of her husband as "he." This was intelligible until some gentleman individual requiring the same personal pronoun appeared in the letter. But when that other individual—whoever he might be—had also to be mentioned, the difficulty of distinguishing the "he's" became considerable.

Add to this that every word which could be abbreviated was cut down to two or three letters: "which" became wh, "your" yr, "morning" mg, and so forth. As the writer of the letter-paper were so inestimably precious to the writer that they must be economized at all hazards. Enough, in truth, she had to write in both of the one and the other as she knew what to do with.

Mr. Levincourt would glance at the beginning and the end, and then would fold up the letter, saying to himself, as he put it on his desk, that he would read it carefully "by-and-by."

As years went on the communications between Lady Tallis and the family at the vicarage grew rarer and rarer. Her ladyship was traveling about. The town-house was let on a long lease. Her address was uncertain. It became more and more apparent—or would have become so to any one taking the trouble to consider the poor lady's epistles with patience and sympathy—that her married life was wretched. She would, she said, very gladly have received her niece for a while, but "circumstances" forbade her doing so." What those circumstances were, the vicar knew with tolerable accuracy.

Veronica, too, had learned from her mother more of Lady Tallis's history than was known to Maud. Mrs. Levincourt had often expressed her contempt for Lady Tallis's weakness in submitting to be crushed and tyrannized over by her husband, and had said that the woman must be an imbecile.

Veronica was inclined to think so too.

Occasionally Maud had spoken of her aunt to the vicar. "I should like to see Aunt Hilda," she had said. "She is the only one left of dear mamma's relatives. And I know mamma loved her very much."

Then the vicar had explained that although Mrs. Desmond loved her sister, she by no means loved or esteemed her sister's husband: and that there was no possibility of Maud's desire to see her aunt being gratified, unless Lady Tallis should come to Shipley-in-the-Wold.

Once Maud had said a few words to Veronica on the subject.

"I can understand plainly," said she, "that poor Aunt Hilda is very harshly treated, and very much to be pitied. During dear mamma's lifetime I was, of course, too mere a child to know any thing about it. I remember once Aunt Hilda came to see mamma; and she cried and talked very excitedly, and mamma sent me out of the room."

"I think," answered Veronica, "that Lady Tallis's history may be summed up in a few words. She was good-natured and weak. Her husband was bad-natured and strong. Eece!"

"But I wonder why he does not love her? Aunt Hilda had beauty and gentle birth and a kind, sweet nature."

"I believe, Maud, that men love what amuses them. Now it is possible to be handsome, and well-born, and good-natured, and yet to bore people to death."

When, during the first day of her stay at Leicester House, Maud discovered that Mr. Levincourt could not hear aunt, she asked him many questions about her.

"I am unfortunately not able to tell you as much of Lady Tallis as my mother would be," answered Hugh Lockwood.

"Mrs. Lockwood and my aunt were quite intimate, were they not?"

"They lived in the same boarding-house at Torquay for some time. My mother was an invalid, and had been ordered to go to Devonshire for the winter. Lady Tallis was there alone; so was my mother; and they found each other's society more congenial than that of the rest of the people in the house."

"And Aunt Hilda was quite alone?"

"Quite alone. At first we supposed her to be a widow; but after a short time she became very confidential with my mother, and confessed that her husband was still living, but that—that—her marriage was not a fortunate or happy one. You must understand, Miss Desmond," proceeded Hugh, seeing Maud's countenance fall and the color flush into her cheek, "that Lady Tallis volunteered this statement to my mother, however, has a singular power of winning confidence. It has more than once happened to her to receive the most serious particulars of family private history from almost total strangers. I think that if you knew her you would not distrust her."

"I never distrust people," answered Maud, looking up candidly into his face. Then a thought came into her mind, and she added, hastily, "Not quite never—of course I am bound in conscience to own that there are some faces, and especially some voices, which inspire me with distrust, perhaps unjustly."

She was sitting alone with her hostess next evening before dinner. Veronica still was struggling with the blaze of the fire. It was that peaceful hour between day and night when old people are apt to dream of the past and young people of the future.

"Maud," said Mrs. Sheardown, "do you know when your guardian's guest is to take his departure?"

"Not certainly. As soon as it was well enough to travel, he said. I left him in that stage. That is vague, of course. But I should think he might go by this time."

"That sounds a little like 'I wish he would go.'"

"Does it?"

"You don't like this Sir John Gale, Maud. Have you any reason for not liking him, or has he one of those faces or voices which inspire you with distrust?" This was a confession, Maud. I have a strange distrust of this man, and with less excuse than you; for I have not even heard his voice or seen him long. It is one of what I call my presentiments, and what Tom calls my unreasonable feminine prejudices. I wish the man were fairly away out of the vicarage. Does Mr. Levincourt like him?"

"Very much. Uncle Charles finds him amusing, and able to talk upon subjects which my guardian seldom has an opportunity of discussing."

"And Miss Levincourt—does she like him too?"

"Oh— Yes; I think so."

"That he admires her is a matter of course. She is very handsome."

"Veronica has the most beautiful face I know."

"Yes, she is strikingly handsome Our young friend, Hugh Lockwood, was quite captivated by her beauty the other evening."

"Yes."

"I warned him not to burn his wings, for I do not think a poor man would have much chance with Miss Levincourt."

"N—no—I don't know."

"I don't—and she would be deliberately mercenary—only—only I don't think she would happen to fall in love with a poor man."

"Dear Mrs. Sheardown, I always cite you as one of the most just persons I know. But—don't be angry with me—I do think you are a little unjust to Veronica."

"Am I? I will try not to be, Maudie."

"It would seem presumptuous in me to talk to you in this way, only that I, of course, know Veronica so thoroughly. She has fine qualities; indeed she has."

"She has, at all events, one good quality, which I am willing to admit; she is fond of you, I truly believe."

"Indeed she is, Mrs. Sheardown. And you don't know how I try her. I lecture her and scold her sometimes terribly. And you know I am two years younger than she. And yet she bears it all so well. I am sure that if Veronica loved only flatterers she would detest me."

"Who is it that does not detest Miss Desmond?" demanded Captain Sheardown, entering the room at this moment with Mr. Hugh Lockwood.

"Never mind," returned his wife; "the reference you heard on coming in concerned neither you nor Mr. Lockwood."

"We have been to Shipley-in-the-Wold, Nelly."

"What took you to Shipley-in-the-Wold?"

"Captain Sheardown was kind enough to go, partly on my account," said Hugh, "I wanted to have a look at the church there; and as we are to go to Dancester for the Sunday service due to-at the vicarage—and that his master would be leaving Shipley at the end of the week."

"Oh, how relieved and glad I am to be rapidly, not to tell me that, the very first thing!"

"So you see, you need not attempt the very disagreeable duty of giving a word of counsel to Mrs. Levincourt."

"I disagreeable enough! And ten to one I should have done no good by it. Well, Sir John is going, and it is all smooth. Maud will be delighted to get rid of him."

"I am not to understand why you two should take such a hatred to the man, though! As for you, Mrs. Nelly, you know simply nothing whatever about him. He may be a model of manly virtue for any thing you can tell."

"I hardly think that a boon companion of Lord George Gordon's is likely to be that! But I am willing to allow him every virtue under the sun; if he will only relieve Shipley vicarage of his presence."

"There's the dinner-bell. Come along, you illogical, prejudiced, unreasonable—dear little woman!"

CHAPTER XII.

THE VICAR IS NOT ALARMED.

RAIN, rain! It poured down on the open country. It dashed and stripped from gutter and gargoyle. It sank deep into the miry uplands, and covered the marsh-rushes on the wide flats with beaded pearls.

The sun went down amidst clouds that looked like dun smoke reddened by the reflex of a distant conflagration.

Splash, splash, from the slated eaves came the sit-water-drops on to the evergreens outside the sitting-room window at Shipley vicarage. Splash, splash, splash!

The log hissed in the chimney. They always consumed their coal fire with a log of wood at the vicarage of an evening. It was a custom which Stella Levincourt had brought with her from foreign parts. She said she liked the smell of the wood.

Not that the pungent, acrid odor was grateful in her nostrils; not that the blue flame leaped brighter than the deep glow from the steady coal; but that the economical and unsentimental housewife (who had learned to cherish a sixpence with the lingering grip that had been wont to cherish a Louis or a napoleon) must on the extravagance of a log of wood upon the evening fire.

It was the memory of her youth that she loved, and to which she offered this slight sacrifice. Phantoms of old days revisited her in the pale gray smoke that curled up on her hearth-stone, like the shades of departed friends at the Styx.

And the custom survived her. It was continued on the same ostensible ground as that on which she had originated it—"because I liked the smell of the wood." Veronica "thought the bright flame so much prettier than the steady coal-fire, that Hugh had once described."

The vicar of Shipley-in-the-Wold sat alone by his hearth. He was deprived of the light that outlet from the corner had left him, and the vicar missed his evening chat.

Maud was still at Leicester, and Veronica had gone to pay a long-promised visit to old Mrs. Plew, the surgeon's mother.

"Mrs. Plew is always due to drink tea with her so often," Veronica had said. "I ought to go. I will walk over there after the afternoon exercise in the school-room."

The vicar had made no opposition at the time. But now that he was alone he began to think himself lonely and ill-used. Veronica was at home, evening after evening, while there was a stranger in the house. But she cared nothing for her father's society. She had communicated that he might feel solitary. She had declared herself to be moped to death, and so had gone out to seek for change. Selfish girl! How selfish and inconsiderate people were!

Splash, splash, splash, fell the rain from the slates of the roof. In the garden the spring rain was falling, fine and close. Now and again came the west wind, flying fast, and with a sweep of his wings scattered the trembling drops, and dashed them against the window-panes.

Each time that the vicar heard the rain pattering against the glass he looked up from his book and moved uneasily in his chair. Sometimes he stirred the fire. Sometimes he moved the reading-lamp. Once he rose, went to the window, drew back the curtains, and put his face close to the glass, and looked out into the darkness. As his eyes got used to the darkness he could distinguish the outline of the old yew-tree, solidly black, against the vague, shadow-like clouds. A wet stormy night! How would Veronica get home? Joe Dowsett had gone to Shipley Magna to buy corn, or the vicar would have made him take a mackintosh and water-proof shoes to his young mistress. It would not suit either of the women out in this weather. Then he sighed, and went back to his chair and his book.

"No. But she distrusts and dislikes the man. I am not fond of Veronica Levincourt, but I can not help feeling that I ought to hold out a hand of womanly help to her—ought to give her a word of counsel. The girl is motherless, and, in spite of all her self-confidence, we must remember that she is but nineteen. I wish I had invited her here with Maud. I wish, to say the truth, I was afraid of Hugh Lockwood getting entangled by her. He was greatly taken with her beauty. I—I—I am very foolish! How would lend her to encourage him without the smallest compunction."

"Well, my dear child," said the captain; "this Sir John Gale will be gone in a few days, and—"

"Is he going?"

"Yes, to be sure! Oh, I forgot to tell you. His man—a little foreign fellow, who called this his man—a little foreign fellow, who called this place to us at the station-garage—said that his master would be leaving Shipley at the end of the week."

"Oh, how relieved and glad I am! I was stupid boy not to tell me that, the very first thing!"

"So you see, you need not attempt the very disagreeable duty of giving a word of counsel to Mrs Levincourt."

"I disagreeable enough! And ten to one I should have done no good by it. Well, Sir John is going, and it is all smooth. Maud will be delighted to get rid of him."

"I am not to understand why you two should take such a hatred to the man, though! As for you, Mrs. Nelly, you know simply nothing whatever about him. He may be a model of manly virtue for any thing you can tell."

"I hardly think that a boon companion of Lord George Gordon's is likely to be that! But I am willing to allow him every virtue under the sun; if he will only relieve Shipley vicarage of his presence."

"There's the dinner-bell. Come along, you illogical, prejudiced, unreasonable—dear little woman!"

CHAPTER XII.

THE VICAR IS NOT ALARMED.

RAIN, rain, rain! It poured down on the open country. It dashed and stripped from gutter and gargoyle. It sank deep into the miry uplands, and covered the marsh-rushes on the wide flats with beaded pearls.

The sun went down amidst clouds that looked like dun smoke reddened by the reflex of a distant conflagration.

Splash, splash, from the slated eaves came the sit-water-drops on to the evergreens outside the sitting-room window at Shipley vicarage. Splash, splash, splash!

The log hissed in the chimney. They always consumed their coal fire with a log of wood at the vicarage of an evening. It was a custom which Stella Levincourt had brought with her from foreign parts. She said she liked the smell of the wood.

Not that the pungent, acrid odor was grateful in her nostrils; not that the blue flame leaped brighter than the deep glow from the steady coal; but that the economical and unsentimental housewife (who had learned to cherish a sixpence with the lingering grip that had been wont to cherish a Louis or a napoleon) must on the extravagance of a log of wood upon the evening fire.

It was the memory of her youth that she loved, and to which she offered this slight sacrifice. Phantoms of old days revisited her in the pale gray smoke that curled up on her hearth-stone, like the shades of departed friends at the Styx.

And the custom survived her. It was continued on the same ostensible ground as that on which she had originated it—"because I liked the smell of the wood." Veronica "thought the bright flame so much prettier than the steady coal-fire, that Hugh had once described."

The vicar of Shipley-in-the-Wold sat alone by his hearth. He was deprived of the light that outlet from the corner had left him, and the vicar missed his evening chat.

Maud was still at Leicester, and Veronica had gone to pay a long-promised visit to old Mrs. Plew, the surgeon's mother.

"Mrs. Plew is always due to drink tea with her so often," Veronica had said. "I ought to go. I will walk over there after the afternoon exercise in the school-room."

The vicar had made no opposition at the time. But now that he was alone he began to think himself lonely and ill-used. Veronica was at home, evening after evening, while there was a stranger in the house. But she cared nothing for her father's society. She had communicated that he might feel solitary. She had declared herself to be moped to death, and so had gone out to seek for change. Selfish girl! How selfish and inconsiderate people were!

Splash, splash, splash, fell the rain from the slates of the roof. In the garden the spring rain was falling, fine and close. Now and again came the west wind, flying fast, and with a sweep of his wings scattered the trembling drops, and dashed them against the window-panes.

Each time that the vicar heard the rain pattering against the glass he looked up from his book and moved uneasily in his chair. Sometimes he stirred the fire. Sometimes he moved the reading-lamp. Once he rose, went to the window, drew back the curtains, and put his face close to the glass, and looked out into the darkness. As his eyes got used to the darkness he could distinguish the outline of the old yew-tree, solidly black, against the vague, shadow-like clouds. A wet stormy night! How would Veronica get home? Joe Dowsett had gone to Shipley Magna to buy corn, or the vicar would have made him take a mackintosh and water-proof shoes to his young mistress. It would not suit either of the women out in this weather. Then he sighed, and went back to his chair and his book.

In the kitchen old Joanna was knitting a coarse gray stocking, feeling rather than seeing her work; and Catherine, with the solitary candle drawn close to her, was trimming a smart cap.

"How solitary-like the house seems now!" exclaimed the latter, after having plied her needle for some time in silence.

"Quiet," responded Joanna, briefly.

"Oh, quiet enough! But for that matter it wasn't much better. Like a little life in a place. Somehow, Sir John being here, and Paul, liv ened us up a bit."

"You're a queer notion of liveliness, Catherine. It was more like deadliness a deal for one while! And very nigh lossy deadliness, too." The old woman nodded her head in grim satisfaction at her joke.

"Well, but there was something going on all the time. Not but what Paul gave us little enough of his company; and as for Sir John, I didn't hardly see eyes on him from week's end to week's end."

"No great loss, neither!"

"Lawn, Joanna, why are you so set agin' Sir John? I'm sure he was quite a handsome-looking gentleman for his time of life. And behaved handsome too, when he went away."

"My liking ain't to be bought with guineas. Nor yet with five-pound notes."

"Well," observed Catherine, reflectively, "I think guineas helps liking. I hate stingy folks."

"You're young and foolish. It's a pity my wisdom and judgment mostly comes when folks hasn't no more need on 'em."

There was another and a longer silence, during which the wind blew higher, and the rain rattled against the casement.

"We shall have Miss Maud back to-morrow, I suppose," said Catherine. "She's a nice young lady; only a bit high. I don't mean high exactly, neither; but—she has a kind of proud keeping you at a distance somehow. Miss Veronica's more to my taste."

"H'm!" grunted out old Joanna, with closed lips.

"She's a bit overbearing sometimes," pursued Catherine. "But then she has such taking ways with her when she is in a good humor."

"Did ye ever remember Miss Veronica taking any trouble about anything? I don't mean if somebody else to take trouble, and her getting the credit of being very kind and generous for it! but right-down putting of herself out of the way for you quietly, where there was no show-off in the matter? Because I've know'd her ever since she was born, and I can't call such a thing to mind."

Catherine opined, under her breath, that Joanna was "very cross-grained."

The old woman's ears were quick enough to catch the words, and she answered, emphatically, "No, Catherine, you're mistaken. It ain't crustiness as makes me spek as I spoke then; but I'm nigh upon fifty year longer in the world than you, and I've seen a deal of people, high and low. I'd do more for that young lass than you would; but, all the same, I read her as plain as print. I tell you, it makes me sorry to see her sometimes."

"Sorry! What for?"

"What for? Well, there's no need to say whether it's for this or for that; but I am sorry to see a young creature with no more religion than a heathen—Lord forgive me!—and her head turned with vanity and vainglory, and caring for nothing but show-off and being admired. I tell you, if Miss Veronica was sent to live among black Indians, she'd paint herself blacker than any of 'em, if that was the best their considered handsome. Ah, deary me, Catherine child, don't get to think too much of that rosy face of yours. It is pretty now. You needn't plume yourself up. God made it, and he didn't make it to last very long."

"There's the door-bell!" said Catherine, jumping up, not unwilling to escape from Joanna's moralising.

In a few minutes the hall-door was shut heavily, and almost immediately afterward the vicar rang his bell.

"Was that Miss Veronica?" he asked, as the girl entered the room.

"No, Sir; it was Jemmy Sack, Sir. He brought a message from my young lady to say as she wouldn't be home to-night."

"Not be home to-night!"

"No, Sir. Jemmy Sack saw Miss Veronica at the school-house, and she bade him say, as it threatened rain, she should very likely stay at Mrs. Fletcher's for the night. And you wasn't to be alarmed, please Sir."

"Alarmed! No, of course I am not alarmed. But—What can Jemmy? Is he gone?"

"Yes, Sir; he's gone. He wouldn't hardly stay long enough to give his message. He was running down with rain."

"Ha! It is raining still, then, is it?"

"Pouring, Sir. And the wind was in the rain against your face so as I couldn't hardly shut the door."

"Let me know when Joe Dowsett comes back."

"Yes, Sir."

"What o'clock is it?"

"After eight. I looked at the kitchen clock just afore I came up stairs."

When Catherine related to her fellow-servant what had passed, the old woman shook her head.

"Ah," said she, "that's the way. The strange face is gone. There's nobody at home to admire my lady, so off she goes to make a fool of that soft-hearted little surgeon, that would just lay down and let her walk over him, if she had a mind to."

"But, Joanna, it's a real bad night. I don't wonder as she didn't like the walk home, all along that sloppy lane, or through the churchyard, as is worse a deal, and lonesomer."

"It ain't sloppiness, nor yet church-yards, that could keep Miss Veronica if she wanted to come. And, what's more, if Miss Maud had been at Plas-y-Mor when you have said at old Mrs. Fleyer's, For Miss Maud she do take her up pretty short about her goings on with that soft little man. If there's any body on God's earth as Veronica minds or looks up to, it's Miss Desmond. And I've wished more than once lately that Miss Maud hadn't been such a fine lady herself."

"Why?" asked Catherine, gazing with openmouthed curiosity at Joanna.

"Why! Never you matter. I may ha' been wrong, or I may ha' been right; but all's well that ends well, as the saying goes."

And with this oracular response Catherine was fain to content herself.

THE SUMMER POOL.

Tansy is a-ringing to the summer air,
The blue and brown and yellow of the grass,
The stubble bird is creaking in the wheat,
And perch'd upon the hedge the yellow-hammer
Flaps his wings tinsel. O the golden world!
The stir of life on every blade of grass,
The motion on the fur on every bough,
The glad feast every where, for things that love
The sunshine, and for things that love the shade!

Aimlessly wandering with weary feet,
Watching the woolly clouds that wander by,
I come upon a lovely place of rest.
A still green quiet, with soft sound and stir
The shadows of o'erhanging branches sleep,
Dappling the silvery hours over the grass.
Over whose soft stillness ever and anon
The feathery cirrus blows, like thistle-down.
I pause, and leaning on my staff I add
A shadow to the shadow on the grass,
And down the stem shoot down upon me, with a hum
Of little wings, a murmuring of boughs,
The dusky and the gaudy insect here
Within this small green world. Overshadowed
By dusky greenery, though the sun is bright
The sunshine throbs on fields of wheat and bean,
Downward I gaze into the dreamy blue.
And part with a waking sleep, wherein
The green boughs rustle, feathery wreaths of cloud
Are softly piloted by gliding wind,
The air is still, no bird sings any more,
The distant lowing of the cattle dies,
I am alone in all the world with God.

The wind dies—not a leaf stirs—in the pool
The fly scarce moves a crumpled wing, a bold bee breath
Until my sense is numb, listening silently
For the far footsteps of the coming Rain!

While thus I pause, it seems that I have gained Rest, peace and joy, and all the summer showed
To trivial things that, at another hour,
Had passed unheeded. Now the air shall stir
Shivers, the shadows in whose midst I stand
Tremble and blacken—the blue sky or the pool
Be closed and covered with a shrill, sharp cry,
Oiling its wings, a swallow darteth past,
And wanting flowers hasten their fair breast up
Their leaves to feel the coming shower. O hark!
The rain comes, and the thirsty earth
And up above me, on the glistening boughs,
Patters the summer rain!

Into a nook,
Screen'd by thick foliage of oak and beech,
I creep for shelter: and the summer shower
Murmurs around me. In a dream I watch
And listen. And the sweet, soft rain sounds
The pattering rain, the murmurous sigh of leaves,
The deep warm breathing of the aroused air,
They sink into my soul—until at last
Comes the soft ceasing of the gentle fall,
And lo! one of my little wings in the pool
Opens again, while in a silvern gleam,
The sun breaks through the parted leaves,
Or, shaken downward by the summer wind,
Fall melting on the pool in rings of light!

THE NEW STATE CAPITOL AT ALBANY.

We publish on page 648 an engraving of the new State Capitol building at Albany. Our illustration is from a photograph of the head of the ring of the shield, and shows the general character of the edifice. It has been designed in the Renaissance style, similar to that of the Louvre in Paris, and many of the finest modern public buildings in Europe.

The location is a very commanding one, the grounds having about 170 feet above the level of the Hudson. The main walls of the building will rise to an elevation of 150 feet above the level of the adjacent streets, and the corner and ventilating towers from 20 to 90 feet still higher, while the main tower will reach a height of 300 feet above the street. From its cupola the valley of the Hudson, for more than thirty miles north and south, and of the Mohawk for the same distance west, will be seen, as well as the intervening slopes and plains, for a circuit of more than twenty miles radius.

The open public grounds around the Capitol will have an area of ten acres, and when the building is completed the Capitol Library, the Governor's mansion, and Congress Hall will all be removed, leaving a park on the east front of 1,000 feet long and 320 feet wide, the ornamentation of which will be made to conform to that of the structure.

The chief avenue, State Street, will continue this open space for nearly half a mile eastward to the river; on the north will be Washington Avenue, 100 feet wide, and on the south the continuation of State Street; and on the west Swan Street. All of the streets which formerly crossed this large area are now closed by law. The grand north and south entrances will be exactly in the line of Hawk Street, the grade of which falls off rapidly, both to the north and south. Thus, standing upon almost the highest ground in the city, with the land falling off in all directions, except to the west, surrounded by these wide, open parks and broad avenues, with its big walls and still higher pavilions, turrets, and towers, this building will appear to great advantage.

The exterior walls are 230 feet long north and south, and 380 feet east and west. There are four entrances; three of which will be to the first-floor, and the west one to the second-floor, upon which will be the legislative halls and Library. Three of these portices will be arranged with carriage entrances.

The main entrance will be at the east front, and will be approached by a very broad flight of steps in front up to the level of a broad terrace which will surround the whole east front. From this terrace will extend another broad flight of steps to the level of the first-floor, and will lead to a large vestibule, from which will extend broad corridors to all parts of the building. On the left of the main entrance will be placed the suite of rooms designed for the use of the Governor, of his secretaries, and of the Military Department; and on the right will be rooms for two or more of the State officers, with whom the Governor has the most immediate official relations.

On the second, or principal floor, will be placed the Senate and Assembly chambers, and the State Library, all of which (in elevation) will occupy four stories, making 45 feet of height. Rooms for the Committees, and other purposes, will also be placed upon this floor.

The Senate Chamber will be 75 by 55 feet on the floor, with a gallery on three sides, of 20 feet more width. The Assembly Chamber will be 92 by 76 feet on the floor, surrounded by a similar gallery, which in both chambers largely increases the area of the upper portion. The Library will occupy the whole of the east front of these two stories, and will be 283 feet long and 45 feet wide. This will be the most important room in the building, and perhaps in the world. Its large area and lofty proportions, its views toward the north, east, and south, overlooking the city, and bringing in the valley of the Hudson and its western slopes for miles in each direction, will make it a favorite place of resort at all seasons of the year, even by those who have no taste for the mental pleasures afforded by its 300,000 volumes.

The great tower is 66 feet square, and the upper portion will be a quadrangular dome of nearly 100 feet in height, which will be the principal access to which will be had by a spiral staircase.

In the middle of the building will be a court or court of light 90 feet by 60, to give light and air to the inside rooms. This court will be a grand and attractive feature, being treated in the same elaborate manner as the exterior fronts, and will no doubt ultimately have its fountains and be surrounded with statuary.

The plans for the foundations have been prepared with great care. The entire structure will weigh 150,000 tons, and the great responsibility in the heights of the various walls, and the distribution of the enormously heavy fire-proof floors, and corresponding loads with deep piers, bring very unequal weights upon the parts of the foundation adjacent to each other, and without care in the distribution would settle unequally and crack the walls, as is so frequently seen in modern private, and even in many of our public buildings.

The stone foundation of the walls commences on concrete, and is made of large blocks of closest immediately under the six tons weight, laid in regular courses, the first one of nearly the width of the concrete, and each successive one narrower by offsets, so that the wall is contracted to the width necessary to support the structure, arranged so that they will afford an equal bearing on each square foot of the centre of gravity of the walls and the weights which they are to sustain.

The work has been carried on with very rapid progress. Several hundred masons, stone-cutters, and laborers have been employed on the building, and several thousand men at the various quarries and in transportation.

All of the stone and the other materials which have been brought in by railway or water have been unloaded by steam-derricks, and hauled up the hill on the railway, on cars specially built for the purpose. The Commissioners expect to complete the foundations and a considerable portion of the superstructure before or before winter.

The building is estimated to cost four millions of dollars, exclusive of the cost of the land and the furnishing, decoration, or ornamentation which may be hereafter ordered by the Legislature. It will require four more seasons to fully complete it.

The names of the Commissioners are as follows: Messrs. Hamilton Harris, John V. L. Pruyn, Ex. Officio, Thomas J. Shayer, Alonzo B. Cornell, William A. Rice, James Terwilliger, and John T. Hudson.

Mr. Thomas Rogers Kinnicut is the Architect, Mr. William J. M'Alpine is the Engineer, and Mr. John Bridgeford the Superintendent.

A VERY OLD CHURCH.

The Old Church represented in our picture on page 645 was built at North Kingston, Rhode Island, in 1707. In 1800 it was removed to the village of Wickford, where it now stands. It is the oldest Episcopal church now existing in New England. The building is guarded with the most jealous care, as a precious relic of the past. It has been closed for services only a few times since.

Within, however, one afternoon the long-closed doors were thrown open for worship; many old people of the town once more entered the pews they had not sat in since they were children. Ancient Prayer-books were brought out, and the beautiful service of the Church performed. Then the doors were closed, the broken windows boarded up, and the dust was once more left to settle on the pews, and the mould to gather on the walls. Not many years can elapse before this venerable memorial of the past will go the way its first congregation went more than a hundred years ago.

AN ENGLISH FARM SCENE.

This carefully-executed and agreeable picture, on page 645, has an air of rural quiet and repose congenial to the nature of the subject. The artist, we feel, must often have lingered at the evening hour, when the milkmaid settles to her labor, near some such comfortable homestead. The cottage, with from the principal object in the composition, has a tether round her horns, which the young woman holds; and we presume also that this cow is the mother of the white calf which straggles from her side to look at the dog, and that her maternal instincts have rendered her less amenable to discipline than the others. The secondary groups of cattle carry the eye well into the composition, and the glimpse of the farm and the stretch of rolling country beyond complete a picture which is thoroughly English in its character.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE MARCH OF SCIENCE.

Artful Ben a hint to his friend). "Bless me! five o'clock! I had no idea it was so late. How quickly time does fly now!"

Lazier. "Why, then I calc'late it's all owin' to the vast improvements effected in clocks by our great country."

A little Buffalo girl wants to know if fleas are white—because her uncle told her that, "Mary had a little lamb with the fleece white as snow."

Wild Oats.—A crop that is generally sown between eighteen and twenty-five. The harvest sets in about ten years after, and the reaper is apt to complain of a bad crop. Sometimes, two weeks'legs, a bad cough, and a large trunk filled with wild oats, is the result. We can hardly say that the yield pays for the time and labor expended in the cultivation.

NEW NOVELS.

"Near and Nearer," by the author of "Far and Wide."

"Strings of Barley Sugar," a sequel to the thrilling tale of "Ropes of Sand."

"Downy as a Sleeping Duck," a fascinating sequel to "Simple as a Dove."

"Tight as a Drum Tilted," a romance of real life, written by the author of "The Girl He Married."

"Fast Friends," a sequel to "Sweet Story, by the author of "Burned Butterflies."

"Faint Heart Never Won," a tale of most unreal life, by the author of "Fatal Zero."

"Married by Good-Humor," a sequel to the story of "Handley Cross."

There was a clergyman who often became quite vexed at the noise his children made during the study. One day one of these little children was standing by his mother's side, and she was speaking to him of it. "Ma," said he, "I don't want to go to heaven." "Why not, my child?" "Why, ma, I'm afraid I'll see." "I'm sure I don't." "Why not, my son?" "Why, grandpapa says he never, was in heaven, for he has a wife." "Well, just as soon as he sees us he will come down to us." "Why, then, I'll stay where I am, for there are those boys here for!"

Slender Party (who is not very comfortable). "These street cars ought to charge by the pound."

Stout Party (who is). "Ah, if they did they would never stop to pick you up."

Extraordinary Phenomenon in Nature.—A fast horse.

We have it on the best authority that the ancient patriarchs wore their hair and beards so long that they could not be cut.

A lady, having discharged her cook, said, "Thank Heaven, there are no cooks in the other world!" Her husband said, "Ah, memento, remember, remember! for you know they must have a big wash, as their garments are always in a flame."

A young lawyer was examining a bankrupt as to how he had spent his money. There were about two hundred pounds unaccounted for, and the attorney put on a severe scrutinizing face, and exclaimed, with the most impressive air, "Sir, by I want to tell the court and jury how you used those two thousand pounds!" The bankrupt looked at the attorney, then winked at the audience, and exclaimed: "The lawyers got the first, the judge and the solicitor-general divided with laughter, and the counselor was glad to get the bankrupt off.

Why did the American lose the boat race?—Because they did not pull "hat/ hard" (Harvard) enough.

Where is there no end of cats?—In the Isle of Man, where there is no tails.

A Sunday-school teacher was giving a lesson on Ruth. She wanted to bring out the kindness of Boaz in permitting the reapers to drop large handfuls of wheat. "Now, children," she said, "Boaz did another very nice thing to Ruth; can you tell me what it was?" "Married her," said one of the boys.

The Illinois girl who lately lost her speech (save whispering) has had forty offers of marriage.

Receiving Tellers.—Rewarded informers.

The gas is so bad in Erie, Pennsylvania, that the boy who paid the bills uses a lantern to find the posts.

To kiss a rosy-cheeked girl, and find your mouth filled with Venetian red, and she growing pale on it, is truly awful.

An Ohio journal pointedly remarks that "every cord of wood given to the poor will be so much fuel saved from use in the next world."

Upon Caleb Cushing a spinster poetess of Newburyport once wrote an epigrammatic epitaph, as follows:

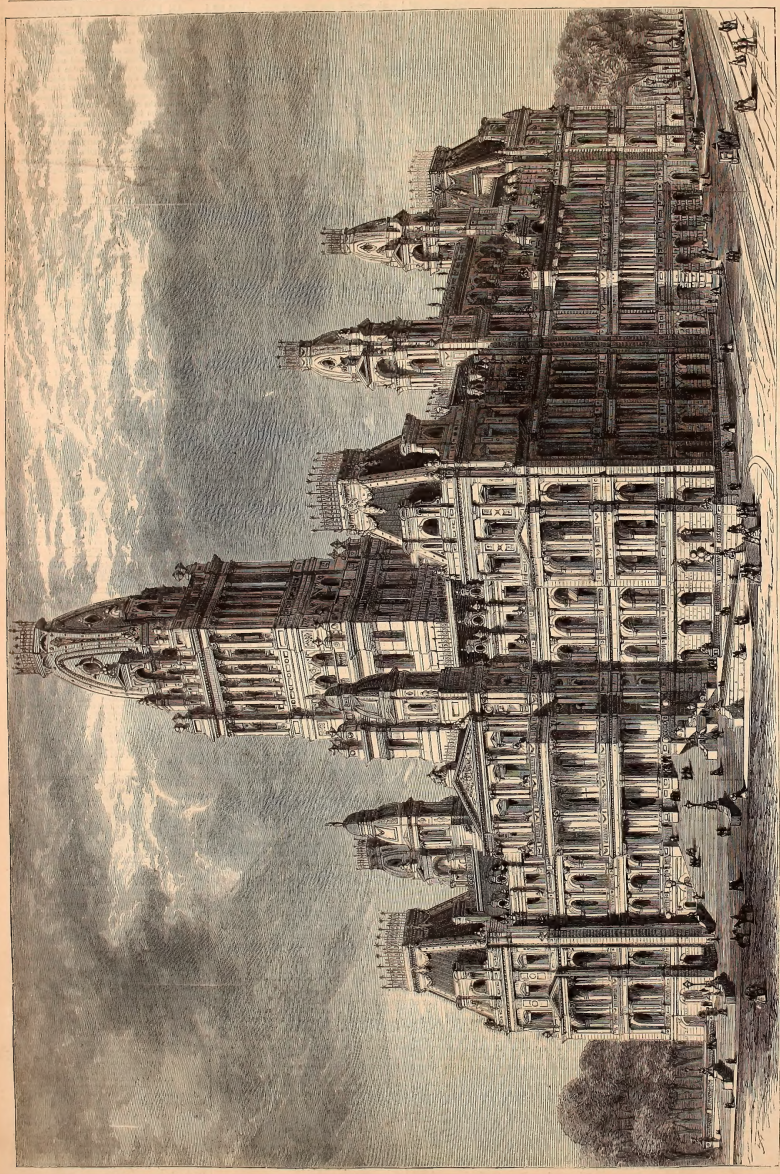
"Lay aside, all ye great,
Your titles of state,
Repose the head of your race
He has crowded his way
Through the world, they say,
And even though dead will be jostling."

Mr. Cushing wrote down the following rejoinder:

"Here lies one whose will
Without writing will be,
And green grows the grass that's above her;
She's gone where the good
Will be treated as bad,
She has gone down harmed for a lover."

An editor says, "Our best things will be found on the outside." That's the way with most of the world.

"Father," asked a little three-year-old the other day, at dinner, of his pa, "what is it that makes the lightning?" "You can't understand it now, my son," the answer. "I'll tell you when you get a little older." and the father went to his avocation. In the evening he returned, and the young, climbing upon his knee, said to him, "Pap, I know now what makes the lightning. It is God scratching matches against the sky!"



THE NEW STATE CAPITOL AT ALBANY.—THOMAS FULLER, ARCHITECT.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY E. S. M. HALSEY.—[SEE PAGE 641.]

SATURDAY AFTERNOON IN THE NEW YORK CENTRAL PARK—MUSIC ON THE MALL.

NOT A DREAM.

"WHAT I have got to tell you are plain facts. You can try and account for them by physical rules if you please, or you can take them as belonging to the category of things that are not to be explained. That is what I have done for many years. I have never told the story before, because there were those for whom it was a painful subject. They are all dead and gone now, so it does n't matter.

So spoke the old General, whom we had been teasing for a story one winter's night. Hitherto his talk had been of tigers, pig-sticking, Mahratta battles, and other Indian subjects, on which he is considered the best of authorities, and would be dilated with the rest of a boy, white headed veteran at his feet. But there was something in his tone now which seemed to prepare us for a very different topic, and we were not mistaken.

"I was then a subaltern of twenty-five (he continued), and had just got my company, when it suddenly occurred to me, without rhyme or reason, that I must get home, and go home. I was in good health, and I had a promise of a valuable civil appointment. I had no one in England to expect me, and I cared peculiarly to see again, for I had been left an orphan very early in life, and my uncle, who was my guardian — Well, let by-gones be by-gones. I have seen other youngsters with the same fit upon them. You might as well tell a quail that he need not migrate as to try and persuade them not to ask for leave; and they are not worth their salt till they get it, as I have told the Directors over and over again. At last, then, I was on me, and home I went. The voyage in those days was no hop, skip, and jump over Egypt and Paris, but a weary round of three months—if you had good weather—in sailing-ships round the Cape. I had plenty of time to think of the many really pleasant things I would do when I landed; and when at last I found myself in London I was a little disappointed.

A blame of many years plays the very deuce with one's friends and acquaintance. Some people seemed to think that I must send cards to them, when I called upon them, and others were so forgetful that I had made up my mind to make no further attempt at renewing slight intimacies, when one day, while taking my solitary dinner at a restaurant affected by "Indians" (we had not a club of our own then), the waiter came up with a card, and, "Beg your pardon, Sir," said he, "gentleman in No. 4, Sir, hopes no offence, Sir, but my master would be his Honour, Sir?" I looked at the card; "Mr. James Stuart Cazenove" was elegantly engraved thereon.

"Say I will wait," is Davenport, "and I'll be confoundedly awkward, you see, for a fellow to claim acquaintance, and you not to know who the deuce he is. I gave the waiter back the card, and the next moment its owner had taken a seat opposite me. "I should have remembered you on your own land, you know, but one does n't up with a card, and, "Beg your pardon, Sir," said he; "gentleman in No. 4, Sir, hopes no offence, Sir, but my master would be his Honour, Sir?" I looked at the card; "Mr. James Stuart Cazenove" was elegantly engraved thereon.

"Say I will wait," is Davenport, "and I'll be confoundedly awkward, you see, for a fellow to claim acquaintance, and you not to know who the deuce he is. I gave the waiter back the card, and the next moment its owner had taken a seat opposite me. "I should have remembered you on your own land, you know, but one does n't remember me. I took the name of Cazenove for a fortune I was about to enough get on years ago." In little Jim Stuart. Lord! don't you remember 'Cocky' Stuart at Dumbertey's?" Then I knew him in a moment. 'Cocky' Stuart the little rascal I had licked at school, whose verses I had done, and who had been my faithful accomplice in many a poaching adventure at poor old Dumberley's.

Oh yes! you girls may smile. You are all very well, I know, and "'deareste" and "dearest" at two days' acquaintance, but you don't know what men feel at meeting an old school-fellow, especially when one of them has been looking eleven years in India.

"Cocky" Stuart was one of your lucky ones. He inherited a fine business from his father, which seemed to take care of itself. He was made a rich man's heir, and he married well as every sensible man would. He was in London to complete some business matters connected with an estate he had recently bought, and I was one of the first batch of guests who assisted at his house-warming.

"What, a man," he said, when he had shown me over most part of the house—a huge old Tudor Gothic place which he had restored, to my thinking in great good taste—"what do you think of it?"

I told him I liked it immensely—that he had just the happy mean between comfort and quaintness.

"That's just what Bessie says—it's her doing. Have a look at it, I take no credit. It's all handiwork. I wanted to pull the place down, and build a modern house, but she would not hear of it.

"And quite right too," I told him. "Why, there's many a duke would envy you those old carved oak wainscotings, those deliciously ugly corbels and stained-glass windows. These must be a legend for every stone, and I'll be bound there's a haunted room.

"Oh! that's nonsense," he replied, rather sharply.

"My dear fellow," I persisted, "a house like this would be nothing without a haunted room. If you have ever seen a ghost, pray invest one." I just as soon be without a butler if I were you. It's quite de rigueur in such a dear, quaint old place, I assure you."

"Don't talk nonsense, Davenport."

"Nonsense! Do you call ghosts nonsense?"

"Yes, I do."

"It's very wicked to call ghosts nonsense."

"Davenport, I'd trouble you to drop the subject; I don't like it."

Of course I could say no more after this, and, it being nearly time to dress for dinner, I was shown to my room.

It was somewhat surprised when I entered it. All the other rooms I had seen were, as I have hinted, quaint, old-fashioned, with low ceilings, polished oak floors and wainscotings, some hung with tapestry, and all furnished in keeping with those surroundings. My room was a lofty apartment with a French paper on the walls, a brussels carpet, a polished steel fire-grate, and a bed and other accessories of the latest fashion. Perhaps it was that the contrast with the old fashion of the house made it appear at first harsh, vulgar, and garish. The colors on the walls and floor appeared unnecessarily bright; the two large pier-glasses with gilt frames, and a mantle-piece covered with crimson velvet, on which a handsome clock ticked loudly, and two large ornamental candelabra, gave it an unusual air for an English bedroom. "This isn't Bessie's taste, I'll be bound," I mused, as I laid my white choker at one of the glasses. "It's a room they have added to the old house, and Master Jim has had his wicked will upon it, I'll be bound! If he had taken a Clapham villa he could not have done worse."

Bessie was a very gem of a hostess, and before dinner was over her guests, some ten in number, were on perfect good terms, and all ready the laugh at certain small flirtations had been laid.

When the ladies had retired, and we were alternating in the smoking-room—a rare luxury in those days—"Cocky" took me aside and whispered, "I've got something to-day, Davy, I think. I didn't mean to be cross, you know; but don't talk about it, like a good fellow. Servants get hold of such things, and play the very deuce.

"Get hold of what things?"

"Oh! you know—about haunted rooms and that. It's all nonsense."

I was half vexed with him for thinking I would pursue a subject which could only annoy him, and, lighting a cheroot, turned to a young person who had amused me greatly by lectures on India, books of travels, and the information from tracts written by people who was a himself.

At last it was bedtime, and as I was accompanied me to my room, where he fidgeted about a good deal, and seemed reluctant to leave me. He set the clock right, I think, and asked me if I had lights that I possibly want, and walked about touching small articles of furniture, putting them a little more to his taste or left, backward or forward in a nervous way.

"Is there any thing you want?" he asked at last.

"No," I said; "nothing, thank you."

"If you do want any thing, my room is the door next to the corridor on the left hand."

"My dear fellow, I'm an old campaigner. I shall sleep like a top in that luxurious bed," I replied.

"Well, good-night. Remember the third door to the left if you want any thing. Don't forget."

As I lighted him out by the door, he took a short passage between the door of my room and the corridor, and this confirmed my idea that the room had been added to the house.

Directly opposite to where I had sat at dinner was hung the portrait of a very beautiful woman, dressed as a shepherdess of the last century, in hat and a flock of sheep in the distance. I dreamed that this picture came into my room, which suddenly became like an open field in the house, only larger. I awoke, and found the lights in the candelabra (which I had ordered to be put out) burning brightly, and very thing just as it had been when my host took his departure. I fell asleep again, and was off to dreamland, when I heard a knocking at the door, and saying that the breakfast-bell would ring in twenty minutes.

"Hi! you sleepy-head, what's the row?" he asked.

"Like a child," I replied, jumping out of bed. "I say, Jim, so glad!" he cried, with what struck me at the time as unnecessary warmth; and away he went.

When the servant came in with my shaving-water and boots, I was standing in front of the window, I got a little start. It was the window of the room I had seen in my dream! A large, old-fashioned, stone window, divided in itself, with stone copings and divisions and lancet-shaped lights, the small diamond panes in which were set in lead—a window evidently out of keeping with the room and its furniture. I had dressed for dinner the day before by candle-light, and never noticed the incongruity now so suddenly brought back my almost-forgotten dream with, as it were, a mental crash which staggered me for a moment.

Angry with myself for giving way to such fancies, of course I said the latter to no one else, and inwardly abused my host for his anachronism. "With such a window as that standing, why the deuce could he have rebuilt the room in harmony with it?" I growled.

When breakfast was over I could not help mentioning into the conversation to have another look at the picture which had troubled my repose. The original must have been very beautiful, and as a work of art I suppose was almost perfect, except for the position of the right hand—a small white hand—but, as I thought, too prominently displayed. There was something even threatening in the attitude.

As I guzed Cazenove came in, gun in hand (it was the 1st of September), and asked me for not being ready.

I told him that I was not only ready, but had been waiting for him. "Only, before we start," I said, "tell me who is that?" pointing to the picture.

"Oh, that? That's a portrait," he replied, becoming suddenly grave.

"So I suppose; but of whom?"

"Oh! of some one belonging to people who used to live here long ago.

"Connected with the surface family, I should think, from their selling their ancestors?" I said.

"But, I beg pardon, perhaps she was some relation of your own?"

"God forbid!"

"Well, I'm sure you have no reason to be ashamed of her personal appearance. Show me as beautiful a girl living now, and I'll show you a man who would make a fool of himself for her," I said.

"I've begged and prayed Bessie a score of times," he muttered, angrily, not appearing to heed me, "to let me have the infernal thing locked out of its panel, or painted over, or something—it's a fixture, confound it!—and she won't. I'll do it, though, in spite of her. For God's sake, Davenport, don't stand there fooling like an idiot! Come and shoot, if you're coming."

This was the second time he had broken out at me rudely, for no apparent cause, and I began to think that my fortunate friend had had a bad temper left him among his other legacies.

At dinner he did me a grievous wrong. Contrary to all law and custom, in defiance of the British Constitution, and the Habeas Corpus act from an exceedingly nice little girl, whom I had taken down, and sent me to the other side of the table, on the pitiful plea that there were two ladies together there. I remembered afterward that this change brought me with my back to the picture.

The manor had been badly preserved by Cazenove's predecessor, who never lived on it, and we had a good deal of walking for our twenty brace. I was glad indeed when our fair hostess told us we were to have a day's rest, instead of the next in the shooting season, and that the best thing we could do would be to go to bed. If I were a man to write for sheeting I am also an animal, I had one that night; but I could not sleep. I could not help thinking of the beautiful shepherdess—the lovely lady hard, and wondering why my host had spoken so irritably in answer to my questions about her. What did he mean by saying "I'll be forbid" with so much vehemence when I asked if she were a relation? Why should he want to destroy so admirable a painting?

Small things affect a man with the fidgets on him. The fire was burning brightly in its polished grate, lighting the room so that almost every object was visible. Of all the rooms in the world, it was the last to have any such legend as I had heard on the day before connected with it. A thing of yesterday, with the smell of French polish and new carpets not yet laid in a way, what association could it possibly have with a lady who probably died before Queen Anne? What story, beyond what was told in an upholsterer's bill, could belong to it? When midnight struck, and a cold shiver passed over me, I said to myself, "Davenport, my boy, you got your liver in the tropics. Dwellers in the tropics can not afford to play tricks with their health. Go to sleep—fever you ought naturally resolved to sleep. Small things, I say, affect a man with the fidgets on him. The fire wants mending, and I don't do it? Empty the water-jug on it?—that would rust the reflecting bars, and bring on my head the maledictions of an injured housemaid. I'll look off the couch—where was I to put them? Besides, there were no tongs, and only a sort of gigantic skewer for a poker. I'll read—I had had words of that fire and its new-fangled irons as I turned my back on it and tried again to sleep.

And so I fell into a tremendous doze, during which the light faded away; and then there came over me that pleasant sensation when says, "You may as well turn over on your other side, and you will go fast asleep." I turned over, and saw that the old enemy of my rest was on the opposite side in total darkness, save where the moonbeams fell in through the window. This struck me as odd, and I turned back again, being impressed that the heavy cloth curtains were drawn close when I went to bed. "Bother the curtains!" I grumbled, and then in the act of jumping out of bed to shut it out, when another light shone suddenly from the opposite side of the room. It was—I solemnly awake to my senses as I am at this moment—saw that the size, shape, furniture, every thing about the room was the same that it had become the room of my dream the night before!—a sombre oak-panelled room, with a high vaulted roof, in which the moonlight waved to and fro in the night-air mournfully. Even the bed, on which I sat in horror, was not what it had been. Any one who has seen the rich, massive and dark heavy drapery, embroidered with quaint devices, as the state-beds of kings and queens in olden times were used to be, beautiful as they are, I instinctively turned toward where I fancied I had seen the picture the night before, and there it was, and I saw—but the picture, BUT THE ORIGINAL, standing with a lamp in one hand, and the other in the attitude of the picture, but with this difference—that the palm was pierced through and through as though by a stab, and blood trickled from it on the ground. There she stood in her fanciful dress, and a look, not of pain or of anger, but of deep unutterable sorrow, branding the figure and features so innocent and beautiful, for, I suppose, some minutes, though they seemed hours to me, that I walked slowly toward the room, close to the wall, and vanished the instant that she returned to the spot where I had first seen her, and again in dark shadow.

Now, I dare say there are some of you who will say that all this can be explained; and so perhaps it can, so far. You may argue somewhat in this wise:—"The old-fashioned part of the house had made an impression on my mind which was strengthened by the contrast presented by my bedchamber. The portrait in the dining-room had also made an impression. I had dreamed of the latter, and, naturally enough, gave it a fitting back-ground." So much for what you will, no doubt, call my first dream. You will go on to urge that, "overtired with a long day's shooting, and with a touch of intermittent fever on me, that first dream made an impression which developed itself into the second." I say again, so far such an explanation might pass. But when, impelled by terror—of which I was afterward heartily ashamed—I knocked up Cazenove, his first words were—

"My God, Davenport! Have you seen her?"

Then I knew in a moment why he had answered so impatiently my nonsense about haunted chambers, and the inquiries I had made about the portrait.

"I have seen some one," I replied, "and it may be a trick. Bring your lamp and come at once."

"Not for the world!" he cried, drawing back. "She never appears a second time to the same person. She has been once, and is not seen yet. You may take the light and satisfy yourself without the slightest danger. It is all over."

I went back to my found-every thing exactly as it had been—the thick curtains closely drawn over the window, and the fire still burning. Then I rejoined my host in the corridor.

"Don't blame me for what has passed," he said, in a low voice, "until you hear my excuses. I have a haunted chamber—worse luck! Look here."

As he spoke he lifted the tapestry, and disclosed a small door, which I saw from its position should lead into the room I had just left. "Go in," he continued, opening it by pressing a spring, "and look about you. No, there is nothing to fear; I tell you again, she never appears twice to the same person. Go in, and judge for yourself if there be any trick."

I went in, and found myself in what appeared, at first sight, to be a passage between the corridor and my bedroom, but on examining the outer wall I recognized it, with a cold shudder, as the wall of the room against which the bed had been standing that I had passed. I looked up, and there was the dark vaulted room, there were the tattered banners. The new room had been built inside the old one.

The Dream theory will not do now. A dream may make an impression on the mind, especially if which the sleeper has seen or known of when awake. I had never seen that room; it was hid from me after the building of the house of brick. I had every reason to suppose that I was in a new part of the house. How, in a mere dream, could I have made a thing at which I had number within a chamber? Again, with regard to the picture, I was half in love with the winning face and graceful figure of the original of the fair shepherdess. In a mere dream I should have made her the central figure of gay scenes, court revels, music, and the like, which, I am thinking, I fancied she must have graced. How could I invent such an improbable thing as that her portrait had already been painted in my dream-thought?—that she should be wandering about alone at night with that awful look of despair fixed on her face?

It was no dream.

"Of course, there's no more sleep for either of us to-night," said Cazenove, as I rejoined him. "Come into my dressing-room, and I will tell you all I know about this miserable business."

I was angry with him for what I considered his unfair treatment, and had determined not to tell him; but there was something so dejected in his voice and manner that I checked myself with the words that were on my lips, and followed him in silence to his room.

His narrative was a long and not intelligible one, for he rambled into many details which had nothing to do with the story, and wasted a good deal of time talking about his bad luck, and grumbling generally; so I shall not trouble you to sit in the shape into which I reduced it afterward, with the help of some further conversation.

Cazenove's grandfathers were friends. On the exile of King Charles the Second was a certain Sir Hubert Dyke, a gentleman who had done things in his time for the Spanish Main which would not call by ugly names, but who was a stout soldier, a faithful subject, and—what was more to the purpose—a man of large means—a thing, indeed, his exploits among the galleons of the Don.

When he must have been nearly sixty he married a young Frenchwoman, of whom when I say that she was very lovely I have told you the best that can be said of her.

"I'll tell you my own again"—that is to say, he was brought back to waste other folks' property; and Sir Hubert and his wife got their own. Cazenove considerably improved by having passed through the hands of a crop-eared knave, who, if half the stories of his conduct as a landlord be true, was worth a whole regiment of lawless dare-devils like Sir Hubert.

The latter's estate was held in honor of Restoration at the manor, and its beautiful lady was the life and soul of the revels, not the least splendid of which was a mask composed by Dryden, in which she appeared as a shepherdess. Among the company was a then unknown artist named Lely, who painted her portrait, and had the honor of painting her portrait on a panel in the dining-room. The fame of that mask went abroad, and the King himself commanded its repetition.

But for one thing Sir Hubert would have been a happy man. Among my lady's train, and the actress with her in that mask, were a certain countryman of hers, who, it turned out, had wooed her before she had charmed the eye of the exbuccaneer, and whom she loved in spite of her marriage-vows. Dark hints reached Sir Hubert's ears, and I dare say he would have stood on scent ceremony with the disturber of his peace, but that there was the royal visit and the grand entertainment; and, as the exile could not be performed without Monsieur Le Goffe, his hateful presence had to be endured. Only one-half of the truth appears to have been known to Sir Hubert, for he is reported to have been most affectionate and courteous toward his beautiful wife up to the last.

The mask went off more brilliantly than before, and all that is known with any certainty of what followed is, that shortly after midnight a wild piercing shriek was heard, and my lady rushed to the King's chamber, calling for help and justice, and showing her hand pierced through and through by a dirk. The result day the establishment was broken up. My lady is said to have returned to France, and to have entered a convent. The short obtained a military command in Scotland, but Monsieur Le Goffe was never heard of again. The legend goes that the lovers were surprised: that the lady threw her arms round Le Goffe to protect him from her injured husband's fury, but that he stabbed him be the heart through her head.

The scandal was hushed up, as such things could be in those days when great people were concerned; but no one could live in the same chamber, and eventually the fine old house was sold for about a fifth of its value.

"I took a look as I was," said Cazenove, "I made no inquiries. I saw the place and liked it; so did Hessie. I offered a sum for it which I thought ridiculously small, and to my surprise it was accepted. Not a servant belonging to the vicinity would consent to live with us, and at last the truth leaked out—the place was haunted! Bessie said it was all nonsense; that the state-chamber was far too large and gloomy for a bedroom; that its dark walls, and the shadows and noises in the vaulted roof, created fancies; and as we could not pull it down without ruining the house, we built a modern room inside, which you were the first to occupy. But you see it is no use; there is a curse upon the place."

"Has it appeared in any other part of the house?" I asked.

"No, never."

"She has appeared to many persons?"

"To every one who has slept in that room—once."

"And—tell me truly, Cazenove, what has followed?"

"Oh, it's no use talking about it any more," he replied, with a renewal of his old petulance.

"Cazenove, I insist on knowing. There is something you wish to conceal—out with it, man! The thing is done, and can not be helped. What has followed?"

"That no one has chose to whom she appears never marry."

* * * * * * *

"And were you ever married, General?" asked a pretty girl who sat next him.

"Never, my dear," replied the old soldier; "but whether that was my fault, or the ghost's, I can not say."

"You think it really was a ghost?"

"What am I to think?"

That is a question which has yet to be answered.

ON AN ICEBERG.

I was once summoned home from my travels on the Continent by very important news. There was no time to lose in getting back, so I went as fast as I could to Havre, and took the first ship that sailed for New York. It was in the month of June, when I considered the most pleasant time in the year to cross the Atlantic; and though I found after leaving that my ship was an old and rather leaky concern, yet I did not feel any very great anxiety.

We went on for several days; and as we were favored with a fine breeze, perfectly fair, we made very rapid progress, and soon came within the region of the Banks of Newfoundland.

But here a stop was put upon our progress. On the second day after we arrived on this spot the wind died away altogether.

For an entire day we lay becalmed, with the ship tossing lazily over the huge ocean surges. All hands were very impatient. Each moment had been in high glee at our quick progress, and had expected by this time to be sailing in New York Harbor; now but his patience and speed the greater part of his time in cursing alternately the wind, the waves, the sky, the sun, the ship, and his own luck.

This did not help the matter at all, however. In fact, worse things than a mere calm were in store for us. During the night of the second day and when we arose in the morning it had closed in all around us with a density that I had never imagined before and have never since seen equaled.

Here was a pretty situation. A dead calm, a smooth sea, and not a breath of wind. I blamed myself a thousand times for not going on to Liverpool and taking an ocean steamer.

However, there was no remedy but patience. Patience we had to be whether we liked it or not.

In the middle of the following day, however, we felt a slight breath of air. It was the first breath of the glorious wind which now again was blowing favorably as before. Through the day it increased, blowing stronger every hour, until, when I went to bed, I retired with the pleasing thought that every hour carried me ten miles nearer to my home.

I slept soundly.

But suddenly, at about three o'clock in the morning, as far as I can recollect, I was awakened by a sudden crash which sounded like thunder in my half-aroused senses, and seemed to shake the ship to pieces.

In a moment I was out of my berth and up on the deck.

Great Heaven! what a spectacle there met my gaze!

All around was the blackness of darkness. The wind was howling fiercely through the rigging. The sailors were running wildly to and fro. The captain was standing like a man paralyzed, and, beside him, while he wrung his hands, "We're lost! we're lost!"

I spoke not a word to say one, but quickly and nimbly, as a cat, I leaped down from the quarter-deck on to the poop deck and rushed forward. It was so intensely dark and thick that I could see but little with distinctness. Yet a strange feeling of intense cold made itself evident even then to my senses.

I leaped upon the forecastle.

Then a sight of horror burst upon my view.

High before me, extending out of sight, was a vast precipice—apparently a huge mountain of immeasurable proportions. And at this the ship was crashing and plunging. At each stroke of the ship huge masses came thundering down, and falling with deafening noise into the ocean.

What was it? Was it the rocky coast of Newfoundland? or was it a lonely rock in the middle ocean?

It was neither. I soon knew all.

It was a vast iceberg!

The ice itself was not colder than the chill that rushed through every nerve as this appalling thought burst upon my mind. Then in one moment an utter sense of ruin, of hopeless desolation, took away my breath.

But now there was no time to lose, nor was there time even to mourn. For the ship, acted upon by the long rolling waves of the Atlantic, was driving with fearful violence full against the enormous mass. I heard the crashing ice—I heard the shattering of timbers—I heard the rush of the water as it poured into her.

The ship seemed alive, struggling like some drowning wretch to save her life. The groaning of her parting timbers sounded like a human voice—the voice of one in agony.

A mighty wave of gigantic size now lifted the quivering mass high into the air. Retreating backward it bore its body with it. Retreating for some considerable distance, but only to hurl it back with more tremendous force. Returning with redoubled power it dashed the fair building against the enormous mass. I, who was standing on the prow, was thrown as though I had been a straw, off from the shattered hull. I felt prostrate and almost senseless upon the iceberg, on a declining surface along which I shot for a long distance, until I was stopped by an upright mass of ice.

All around me I heard a burst of fearful sound—a sound of crushing ice, falling masses, roaring waters, crumbling masses of ice, and howling winds, while high and distinct above them all arose a shrill wail of human agony which shall never be forgotten by me, until my ear is closed to all earthly sounds forever.

* * * * * * *

"Miserere!"

Alone there in the thick darkness, clinging to the mass of ice before me, with the tongues howling around, and the horror of horror at the fate of my companions, it was wonderful that through the accumulated terrors of that fearful moment my mind passed without failing beneath the unequaled trial.

"Miserere!"

I too reclaimed the last word of my companions, and sunk senseless upon the ice.

How long I lay I know not. I could not have been less than an hour, but at last sense returned, and with it all the recollection of my situation.

I came to my feet painfully.

I was first aware of my own physical condition. Yet before doing any thing I cast a look around.

The fog had cleared away altogether.

The touch of cold which I knew before me, its deep blue surface reflecting the gorgeous rays of the sun which was just rising. There was not a breath of wind, and the ocean was as undulated as a mountain lake.

I cast a glance downward to see if there was a single vestige of the ill-fated ship.

Alas! not a single vestige could be seen. Not a plank—not even a chip floated on the water. All had gone down. Not a wretch was saved. I only—I only had escaped to tell the tale.

I was standing upon a broad surface of ice nearly half an acre in extent. It was smooth and slippery as glass. The mass nearly level, but was at the lower end of it, and had been stopped by a high wall against which I had struck.

The iceberg, was of immense height and magnitude and grandeur. At the side of the slippery surface where I stood it went sheer down perpendicularly into the ocean. This surface extended over on either side for an immense distance. Its edge ought to be called a coast, so extraordinary was its extent. On the other hand, behind me it ascended far into the air. Not all at once or abruptly, but by a series of terraces, until at last far away in the distance seemed to touch the clouds. The terraces were regular and even. At intervals along the ascent arose magnificent pinnacles of ice, from the topmost point a vast spire of glittering ice shot up straight into the skies for at least a hundred feet. Seen from a distance it looked like some glorious city, some magnificent capital such as we read of in the fantastic story of the Arabian Nights.

Alas! to me there was no time for admiration or wonder. All this I took in at a glance. I quickly returned to myself.

I was chilled through. Fortunately I had slept that night with my clothes on, or it would have been worse with me. As it was, my hands and feet were perfectly numb.

I rubbed my hands violently, struck and beat them, and at the same time ran up and down stamping my feet. The violent exertion brought warmth into my system. My hands began at length to have something like sensation, but my feet were frozen.

I began to think now with greater despair upon my situation.

There was no hope for me!

I could see all around. Not a sail was upon the vast expanse. Yet on one side I could not see. It was hidden by the lofty island of ice.

In a moment my resolution was formed.

"I will go there," I said, aloud. "I can but die. To stay here will be to perish slowly. To go there will be to seek a chance for life. Moreover, it will distract my thoughts, which here will drive me mad. I will go."

And go I did. I set forth boldly. I mounted terrace after terrace as I went along on a journey such as no man has ever undertaken before. Buoyed up by the dear hope of life, I went bravely on.

Deep chasms intercepted me—awful precipices rose before me. My footstep disturbed immense masses of ice, which came crashing down, yet still I went on.

What will not hope make a man do?

On! on! Nearer! nearer! And now the summit is near—nearer—nearer. It is gained! There, at last, I stand at the foot of the lofty pinnacle—alone on my vast iceberg!

Alone! Oh, what is that upon the ocean?

Never before was the presence of men so dear to his despairing fellow.

There, out to sea from me, was the form of an ocean steamer, slowly passing by on the course toward America. I saw the tumult, the hurry, the throwing of the life-preservers.

I was seen.

The steamer bore to. A boat was let down, and in a few minutes was within hail. I pointed back to the other side of the island.

Back again I went—shrieking—praying—singing with joy and gratitude.

I was saved!

A jump from the sea, and I was caught up and taken into the boat and into the steamer.

I am a saved man—and an artificial foot which I now am compelled to use ever reminds me of my fearful adventure.

LOST.

THE moon comes out and glimmers,
The stars like diamonds gleam,
And long grey boughs are waving
O'er a pleasant mountain stream.

And my thoughts travel backward
Into the long dead years,
And your face comes before me,
Seen through a mist of tears.

We met—we loved—we parted,
The story ever new;
We lived—we hoped—we waited,
And so the long years grew.

A vast sea rolls between us,
A gulf that time has made,
New habits grow upon us,
Old beauties pale and fade.

Take one last look behind you,
Into the vale of years,
Does my face come before you,
Seen through a mist of tears?

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

UNTIL there is some change in the law by which the confinement of Lunatic Asylums is practiced, almost any one is liable to be adroitly captured, and unscrupulous persons can shut their quarters from the desirable for any who are not either morally or mentally insane. Instances have been recently brought to light in this city and in Hartford—latterly, cases are frequently occurring which show clearly that the present law affords no protection, at least, of harmful wrong-doing. Ambition, revenge, and cupidity may find in it an easy method of putting out of the way any one who is troublesome or undesirable. Any little eccentricity may be brought as proof of insanity, and if that be wanting, two unscrupulous can easily be found who will pocket a bribe and testify as is required. Charles Reade does not portray too darkly in his "Hard Cash" the horrors which a sane person might experience if confined in a "retreat" for the insane.

Another accessory has received a new addition in the shape of a lake of pure water which suddenly made its appearance one day last August, where a few seconds before a field of corn had been growing. The land fell in with a crash like thunder. All sorts of theories have been formed to account for the phenomenon. The event transpired in the village of Moll, near Steyer, in Upper Austria.

The Sheffield Scientific School at Yale College has received a large addition of physical and mechanical appliances, recently purchased in Europe by Professors Lyman and Norton. The number of students at the Scientific School is this year larger than ever before.

From Salt Lake City there comes a story of an attempt made by one of Brigham Young's daughters to elope with a Gentile lover. She was discovered, however, and carried back to the king's castle and locked up to prevent further mischief.

Statistics show that there have been forty-one fatal cases of sunstroke in New York city within the last eighteen years. The months in which these cases have occurred indicate clearly that the majority of them have not occurred in what are called "dog-days." Facts confirm the opinion that dogs are not given much to sunstroke.

It is said that many quarrels which occur between brothers, sisters, husbands and wives, and other persons who habitually room together, may be referred to electrical changes in their nervous systems consequent upon lodging together night after night. There is nothing that will so derange the nervous system of a person who is eliminative in nervous force as the ill at ease in bed with another person who is absorbent in nervous force. The absorber will go to sleep and rest well, but the eliminator will be trembling and tossing, restless and nervous, and wake up in the morning fretful, peevish, fault-finding, and discouraged.

Yankee, who doubtless spends her evenings meditating by the kitchen fire, has invented a machine that the pitch of the singing of crickets depends directly on the temperature. Can not crickets be utilized, and barometers be superseded?

M. Sorrolevy, the patentee of a new kind of coffin made of paper, seems to believe in the adaptability of paper to all the needs of civilized life. His object in introducing it into the manufacture of coffins is to obtain a perfectly air-tight, water-proof, and decay-defying shell, which nothing from without can penetrate, and which, from within, will be impervious. To express paper coffin, in which these conditions are said to be fulfilled, is a solid looking structure, very much resembling in build and thickness the ancient mummy cases preserved in the British Museum.

An English magazine, reviving the question of the woman's rights, has suggested as "ladies' privileges," bidding the fair sex to consider how far they surpass the stronger sex in all the bravery which tends to recall their partners, walking attendant at their sides, like ravens or jackdaws, in sober black, while they appear in the finest colors of Persia, Ind, and the Indies of Araby, and despoiling the very rainbow of its hues for the ornaments of their charms. In this then reflect how differently all this is arranged in the world of birds, beasts, and savages. The tiger in the jungle tenderly and with paternal pride or pleasure in beauty than that which Nature has bestowed upon his spouse. The lion only wears the mane. The peacock spreads his gorgeous plumage in the sun, while it has pleased Providence to make the peahen a very so-so affair. And so it is with the civilized pair, from the feathered and plaid-bedaubed savage in his wigwam to the Grand Turk on his throne. In the lords of creation for whom the tailors make the rich and showy robes. And contrasting husbands, fathers, and brothers with wives, mothers, and sisters, the pertinent query is made, "Is all this to stand for nothing?"

A new method of curing hay has lately been tried in England, and promises to succeed so well that the man's interest in haymaking will not be so intensely essential as it has been in past times. By this method the grass is taken from the field as fast as it is mown, and subjected to a blast of hot air for about ten minutes, when it is perfectly cured, and fit to be stowed away. The hot air is obtained from a furnace, and is drawn out by means of a revolving fan, worked by horse-power.

Can any thing be sadder than the last words of a little boy who lately died from injuries received by being run over in the street: "Don't whip me, father: I'll never do so again!" He was only seven old.

Chicago has a couple who met for the first time on Friday, courted Saturday, were "engaged" on Sunday, and married on Monday. The divorce is expected soon.

Boston has recently organized a National Musical Association, the objects of the society being to elevate the people to an appreciation of music, to improve the social standing of professional musicians, and both to create and supply a demand for educated musicians and good music. This enterprise grows out of the Peace Jubilee.

The "Aged Brotherhood" of Portland has been very successful, and now includes 118 veterans between the ages of 60 and 80. The annual inspection by the organization an "Aged Sisterhood," as there is great difficulty in finding any widow of 60 years of age.

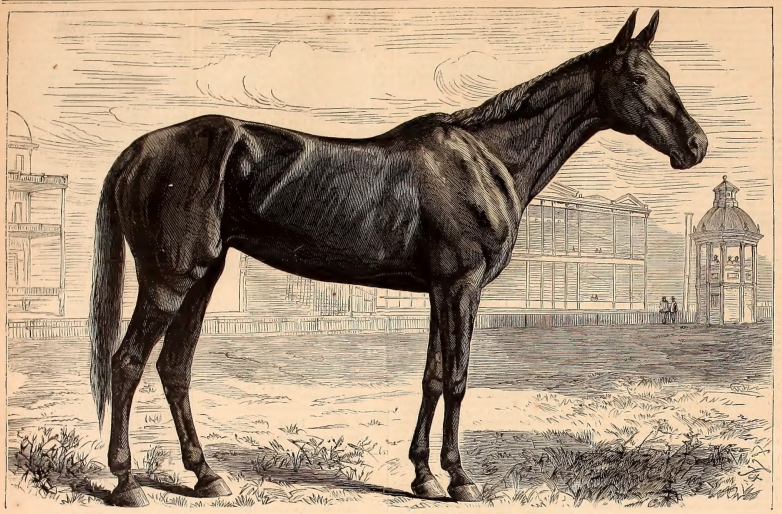
Between two of the highest of the Adirondack Mountains, at the bottom of a crevice a thousand feet or more in depth, precipice-walled and gloomy, lies Avalanche Lake, 2000 feet above tide-level. It is surmised by many that this lake and Lake Colden, at the south of it, were once one sheet of water connected by a deep ravine. A slide, rolled down from Mount Marcy, choked up the channel, threw back the waters, and the lake, avalanche born, was formed. Last August a furious storm of wind and rain occurred among the Adirondacks, and it is supposed that during that storm a mighty avalanche rushed down the side of Mount Colden, hurling into Lake Colden a huge and literally making a dam across it, and dividing it into two lakes. Another many difficulties he visited the wild spot found on this occasion—that as yet the dark waters were muddy from recent disturbances. The new lake swarms with floating timber. It is predicted that after a few more mountain slides Avalanche Lake will become Avalanche Pass.

The lake which is now known as the so called "An Obstacle to Longevity beyond Seventy," which has been revealed to a learned Englishman, being nothing more or less than a drought in a modified epiglottis. A paper was recently read before the British Association, in which was a careful examination of five thousand throats, it had been ascertained that in all persons over seventy the position of the epiglottis was reversed, without a single exception. Consequently it is argued that those who are so unfortunate as to pos sess this reversed epiglottis will not live beyond seventy. This new discovery may be important to life insurance companies. But query, Where is the line of nature may yet be revealed whereby pendant epiglottises may erect themselves after the age of seventy? The question is left to the future.

Rev. Dr. E. O. Haven, recently Inaugurated President of the Northwestern University in Illinois, remarked in his address upon that occasion, "I can not doubt that she (woman) has an equal claim with man to all the advantages of a liberal education. Nature can not be duplicated for the accommodation of the sexes any more than churches. There is no sex in learning any more than in law. It is the supreme prayer for man to determine this question for woman than it is for woman to determine it for man. Science should be free to all.... I doubt not that before the nineteenth century shall close, all the best universities in Europe and America will educate both men and women."

Buffalo proposes to have a public park. The ground which will be taken for the purpose possesses unusual natural advantages. Trees are already growing upon it, a few feet through. A year or two hence unusual springs contribute value to the proposed site or the park.

The Metropolitan Tabernacle in London, where Mr. Spurgeon preaches, is a large and rather elegant edifice, with a portico and six massive Doric columns in front. The house seats five or six thousand, though, including those who stand, the audience usually is not less than seven thousand. Two deep galleries go all around the interior. A semi-circular platform, projected from the front of the lower gallery, is occupied by the speaker, who stands but before him a small table upon which are a Bible and hymn-book.



"LADY THORN."—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY SCHREIBER AND SON, 818 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.]

FOUR FAMOUS TROTTERS.

WE give on this and the next page four illustrations representing some of the most famous trotters that have recently distinguished themselves on the American turf.

"Lady Thorne" is owned by JAMES D. M'MANN and WELCH; her sire was Mambrino Chief; her dam, Gano. Her best time in a one-mile heat has been 2 minutes 19¼ seconds.

"Goldsmith Maid," owned by JACKMAN and DOBLE, was sired by EDSALL'S Hambletonian; her dam was Old Abdallah. Her best time in a one-mile heat has been 2 minutes 19½ seconds.

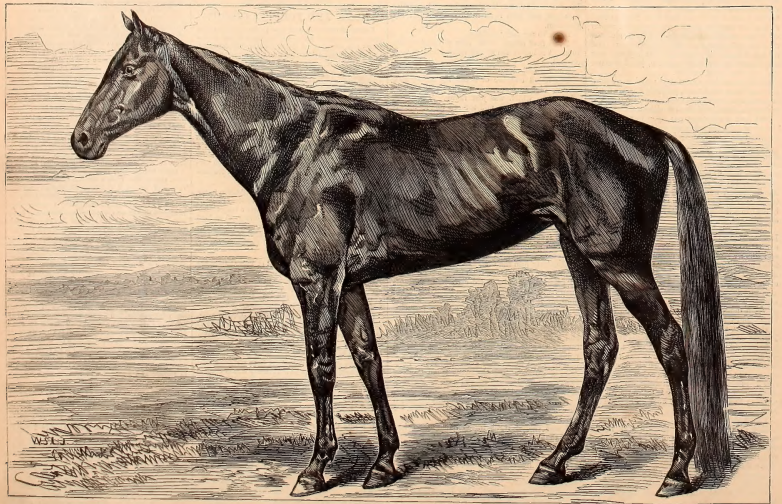
"The American Girl," owned by WILLIAM LOVELL, was sired by Cassius M. Clay, Jun.; dam's pedigree unknown. Her best time in a one-mile heat has been 2 minutes 19 seconds.

"The Mountain Boy," owned by Commodore VANDERBILT, was sired by Major Winfield; dam unknown. His best time in a one-mile heat has been 2 minutes 21 seconds. He is said to lack wind, and not to be good for a long heat, but is admitted to have the best trotting movement ever witnessed on the course.

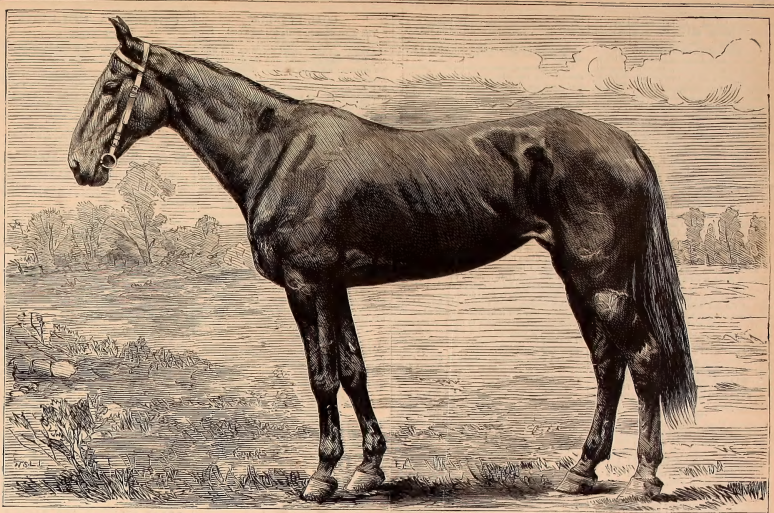
The three trotters first mentioned contested the course at Prospect Park Fair Grounds, Long Island, September 28. The following account of this affair was given in Wilkes's Spirit of the Times for September 4:

"The great trot on Saturday last, between three of the best mares that ever came together on the turf, was one of the finest ever witnessed any where, and the fastest that was ever seen on the Island, if we except the three heats of Dexter at the Fashion against Ethan Allen and his running mate.....

"First Heat.—American Girl had the pole, and Lady Thorn was second in position. After several efforts, in one or two of which Goldsmith Maid broke near the score, they got the word, American Girl having a trifle the best of it. On the turn American Girl led a length, and Lady Thorn was second. At the quarter, in 36½, Lady Thorn was at the girths of American Girl, and Goldsmith Maid two lengths behind. The wind was now behind them, and they squared



"GOLDSMITH MAID."—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY SCHREIBER AND SON, PHILADELPHIA.]



"THE AMERICAN GIRL."—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY SCHREIBER AND SON.]

away fast and free. Half-way along between the quarter and the half mile Goldsmith Maid broke. The others kept up at the rate, and at the half mile American Girl and the Lady were head and head. Time, 1m. 9¾s.; the second quarter having been trotted in 35½s. On the lower turn the old mare showed a trifle in the lead. Goldsmith Maid broke again. At the three-quarter pole Lady Thorn led American Girl only a neck. The pace was strong and the interest intense. The two big mares swung around the last turn close together, and came on in a whirl of dust. In the straight bit DANIELS laid on the whip, but it was no go, and the long, low stroke of the Lady cut the Girl down, although she had the inside, and beat her by a neck, in 2m. 20½s. Goldsmith Maid was two lengths behind them, and her backers began to look blue.

"Second Heat.—A strong friend of the old mare's and of DAN FETER'S carried the news over to his bedside, whereupon he said, 'The track is smooth and hard; she's fit to trot for a man's life, and they won't beat her!' So thought the public, for she was made the favorite at two to one against the field. Six times they scored before they got the word, American Girl having become somewhat unsteady. The old mare moved like clock-work, never expended an ounce of exertion that was not required, and never seemed to pull a pound. At the start American Girl had a trifle the worst of it. On the turn Thorn led a length, and Goldsmith Maid was two before American Girl. There was a break on the part of the Maid, and she took a little gallop. At the quarter in 36s. she was at Lady Thorn's haunches, and American Girl was three lengths behind. Again it was hot work in the second quarter, and the fine old mare again trotted it in 33½. Before they reached the half-mile pole she and Goldsmith Maid were neck and neck, but at the pole the Lady led half a length —time, 1m. 9¾.—American Girl five lengths behind. The work was still very strong and close between Thorn and Goldsmith Maid. The latter nearly overhauled the old mare, but again the long, steady stride got her into difficulty, and carried her to a break. Still she came again, and at the three-quarter pole the Lady led half a neck. But now the strong, staying power of old Thorn began to tell a tale. Goldsmith Maid broke again at the head of the short home-stretch, and the Lady won it by six lengths. American Girl was six lengths behind the Maid. Time, 2m. 20¾. When Mr. McMAHON and the old mare passed by the stand they were saluted with much clapping of hands and cheering.

"THE MOUNTAIN BOY."—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.]

"Third Heat.—Any odds on Thorn, and no takers. At the start American Girl led a trifle, and Lady Thorn went on second. Down they to reach the pole from behind; but "Adams" knew just about where a sulky could go and where it couldn't. On the turn the old mare took a slight lead, and at the quarter in 36s. she and American Girl were neck and neck, and Goldsmith Maid a length behind. The pole was very near again in the second quarter. It was trotted in 33¾., and American Girl led a length at the half-mile in 1m. 9¾., and Goldsmith Maid a length behind Thorn. The latter took the lead upon the turn; but the race was so close that they were as near together, all around as might be, at the three-quarter pole. American Girl now made a skip, and the long, steady stroke of the old mare began to more them down. She lasted the longest, as before, and coming clean away from them at last, won it by four lengths in 2m. 20¼. Thorn saved a little for a last effort, and beat American Girl two lengths for the second place."

SUMMARY:

PROSPECT PARK FAIR GROUNDS, L. I., August 28.—Purse $1000—$2500 to the first, $1000 to the second, and $500 to the third horse.

James McMann's br m Lady Thorn	1	1	1
Budd Doble's br h Goldsmith Maid	3	2	2
Ben Daniel's b m American Girl	2	3	3

TIME—2.20¼—2.20¾—2.20¼.

NEW YORK GOLD MARKET FLUCTUATIONS.

FROM 10 A.M. TO 3 P.M., SEPT. 24, 1869.

10.03	150	12.10	133
10.04	150¼	133	133
10.08	150	12.35	136
	150¼	12.36	136
10.50	150¼	12.36	136
10.56	150¼	13.17	134
10.57	150¼	13.17	134
11.00	150¼	13.17	134
	150¼	13.28	136
11.01	150¼	13.28	136
	150¼	13.30	136
11.02	150¼	13.54	136
11.07	150¼	13.56	136
11.08	150¼	1.00	136
11.10	150	1.02	135
11.15	150¼	1.05	136
11.16	150¼	1.13	136
11.19	150	1.30	135
11.20	150	2.00	134½
11.21	150¼	2.09	134½
11.23	150¼	2.10	134½
11.24	150¼	2.11	134½
11.30	152	2.11	132
11.34	150	2.12	132
11.35	152	2.13	132½
	152	2.13	132
11.36	152	2.14	132
11.40	152	2.14	132½
11.46	160	2.14	132½
	160	2.14	132½
	160	2.14	132½
11.52	160	2.14	132½
	160	2.16	132½
11.59	160	2.18	132½
11.58	170	2.19	132½
	155	2.19	132½
11.59	160	2.20	132½
11.59	140	2.20	132½
12.00	160	2.20	132½
12.00	150	2.31	132
12.06	140	2.32	132
12.07	150	2.33	132½
12.08	140	2.36	132½
12.09	147	2.36	134½
12.10	140	2.36	134½
12.16	141	2.36	134½
12.17	140	2.36	134½
12.19	138	2.36	134
12.20	140	2.36	134½
	135	2.53	134½
12.30	134	2.53	134½

CLOSED.

COMMERCE.

COMMERCE in its general sense means no more than a reciprocal communication, intercourse, or correspondence between man and man; but usually it is restricted to mercantile intercourse between individuals or companies of different nations.

Trade, properly speaking, is that traffic which is limited to one particular county or town, but in familiar conversation it is frequently used synonymous with commerce; as the West India trade, the African trade, etc.

Trade began when men, becoming civilized, associated in large communities, and it was found necessary for each individual to follow but one employment—and the superfluity of the produce of his labor be exchanged for that of his neighbor; this was called barter.

But it soon was found inconvenient, because it frequently happened that one person wanted the commodity of another, without having any thing to give in return that could render exchange desirable.

This inconvenience was remedied by taking the precious metals, gold and silver, in exchange for every kind of commodity that could administer to the real or imaginary wants of mankind.

They were made the medium of exchange at first by weight; but, as weighing them afforded no security against the debasement of their quality, they were coined into money, bearing a particular stamp, significant of the weight and quality of the metal contained in the piece—to counterfeit which has always been considered a capital offense.

In the course of time, as the wants of men increased with the refinement of their manners, they found the produce of a single country insufficient to supply them; they therefore explored distant regions, bringing home such produce as they could not find in their native land, and exchanging it among their own superfluities. Such is the origin of commerce.

Trade and commerce may be, with propriety, considered as the means of enabling to present usage the latter may be called foreign, the former domestic commerce.

So great is the advantage arising from an early attainment of commercial knowledge that thousands, who have taken pains to acquire it, have risen to opulence, and many have in consequence discharged some of the highest offices in the state.

The Egyptians were the people who first extended their commerce to foreign lands, by the encouragement they gave to navigation. They were a luxurious but prudent people; for while they indulged themselves in the costly products of other lands, their industry enabled them to export so many of their own as apply to repay the balance greatly in their favor.

What rendered it more peculiarly favorable to commerce was the enterprising spirit of its inhabitants, and subordinate to this was the level nature of the country, which afforded a facility of making numerous canals, thus rendering internal intercourse easy.

When every other advantage is equal, commerce will flourish most in those countries that exercise the most sagacity and enterprise in facilitating it.

The Phœnicians next, possessing only a narrow slip of land on the coast of Asia, raised themselves by their extensive commercial transactions to a high consideration among nations; they are said to be the first people who reduced the commerce of the world to a system.

After the destruction of Tyre, the capital of Phœnicia, it was transferred to Carthage, became the chief seat of commerce; and so successful did it prove, that in a comparatively short period that favored city contained no less than 700,000 inhabitants; and above three hundred cities of Africa were dependent on her, and she had colonies in Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia.

After the destruction of Carthage, the city of Rome became mistress of the profitable trade of the East Indies. This, however, introduced a refined luxury and elegance, which, while it brought the fine arts to the highest degree of perfection, was carried to such excess, as ultimately to cause the destruction, not only of commerce, but of the state itself.

We derive a few remarks the insurance or assurance of ships and merchandise from losses at sea. This has been adopted and considerably improved by modern nations.

The city of Bruges next, in the Austrian Netherlands, became from its situation the emporium of Europe; but the riches acquired by the inhabitants rendered them idle, inattentive, and negligent. They became oppressive and proud, that commerce which had been the chief source of their opulence. In a short time they felt the ill effects of their folly, and Bruges declined as rapidly as it rose.

Antwerp next became a celebrated trading city, and its inhabitants possessed immense wealth so deficient in the former city a permanent state of prosperity might reasonably have been expected. But their unbounded bigot, Philip II. of Spain, commencing a religious persecution in the Netherlands, and introducing the hated inquisition, thousands of artists, manufacturers, and merchants took refuge in foreign countries, and thus the sun of Antwerp's prosperity set in darkness.

An extension of the intercourse of nations is between civil liberty and commercial freedom and national prosperity—where the former, the latter can not reasonably be expected.

England being at that time governed by a princess (Queen Elizabeth), who possessed superhorted heretical opinion, great numbers of these refugees settled in her dominions; there they encouraged trade, and from the introduction of that commercial greatness which England has since attained, in spite of Government attempts to exploit industry for the benefit of courts.

The commerce of most of the ancient nations was principally that of fruits, salt, skins, rice, sugar, cloths, linen, perfumes, jewels, precious metals, precious stones, and flax and wool. But compared with the present day commerce in ancient days was small, for in the year 1698 the value of the exports from England to all the world amounted to only £2,030,640. And this was some time after the first founded colonies in America. In 1806 English exports were declared to be of the value of £43,000,000, and the imports in proportion. True, they have fallen something since, on account of the general depression of the last few years.

We may well pause a moment to inquire where are the nations whence commerce flourished of old? Where is she now? Greece, Carthage, Imperial Rome, Venice, Pisa, Genoa? Where are the confederated maritime cities—the Hanse Towns, once the mistresses of the northern? Where are the discoverers of the passage to India by the Cape, and the first settlers in America, the Portuguese, Spaniards, and the Dutch? Alas! their spirit, prosperity, and glory departed to the Anglo-Saxon race, and there it yet remains. And the English Bights, Goldwin Smiths, and Macaulays, declare that the United States will yet become the power, manufacturer, and carrier of the world, and that while the English are only distributors of the treasures of others, America will be the distributor of her own!

COAL IN INDIA.

THE great want in India has been coal. For some years past it has been found in some parts of Bengal and the Central provinces, but with very little effect compared with the demand for the mineral; and even the local railways, when English coal is scarce, have to be fed with wood, to the canger of the trains and their contents, which have suffered severely at times through accidents by fire. But a new discovery has been made in this direction, promising most important results. An extensive field of useful coal has, we are informed, been found at the sandstone districts of Chanda, in the Central provinces, the chief town of which is about eighty miles from Nagpore. The discovery is due to Mr. Lucie Smith, the deputy commissioner of the district, who followed up the traces of a slaty coal picked out of the bed of the Wurdah, and the search has been continued, it appears, by various scientific gentlemen ever since 1865. Conclusions have been arrived at with great caution; but at length a report has been made to the Supreme Government of so decisive a character as to warrant more active and extended operations.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF CELEBRATED HORSES.—We have excellent instantaneous photographs of Lady Thorn, Goldsmith Maid, Lady Thorn group-ed, Mountain Boy, Confidence, Bradly, and Geo. Palmer. Sent by mail on receipt of twenty-five cents each, or six for one dollar.

ROCKWOOD, 839 Broadway.

TARR AYER'S PILLS for all the purposes of a purgative. For constipation, Headache, Biliousness, Liver Complaint. By universal accord they are the best of all purgatives for family use.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO remove MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, and TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.

NOW READY—OCTOBER NUMBER OF HITCHCOCK'S MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS:

MADAME MALIBRAN. Portrait and Biography.
LEONARDO DA VINCI. Portrait and Biography.
MARRIAGE IN GREAT BRITAIN.
CHEAP PUBLICATIONS. Editorial.
ART NOTES.
DRAMATIC NOTES.
MUSICAL NOTES.
POETRY AND CORRESPONDENCE.

THE STARRY FLAG. For Voice and Piano.
MY SOUL TO GOD. By BERT TO THEE. Do.
KISS WALTZ. Piano.
KIT FLANAGAN'S FAIRY. Voice and Piano.

Specimen copies mailed free, on receipt of price, 25 cents each. Sold by Booksellers and Newsdealers.

Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK,
Publisher, 24 Beekman St., New York.

☞ Agents wanted every where. Write for Terms.

PATENT STEEM-WINDING WATCHES.

COIN-SILVER HUNTING CASES, $31; EXTRA FINE, $38.
SOLID GOLD
Hunting-Case Full-Jeweled Lever Watches, $45, $48.
Extra, $56.
Ladies' Size, $38; Extra, $40; Enameled, $46.
COIN-SILVER
HUNTING CASES, 7 JEWELS, $16.
AMERICAN MOVEMENTS.
Every variety. Latest, Lowest Prices.

And Watches of description, Plain or Jeweled and Silver Cases, at Importers' Rates.

Goods sent by Express, C. O. D., to be paid for only after they have been received, examined, and accepted.

S. H. MOORE & CO., Importers,
Nos. 32 & 34 Maiden Lane, St., N. Y.

Full Descriptive Price-Lists sent free.

NEW INDISPENSABLE HAND-BOOK.
HOW TO WRITE; HOW TO BEHAVE,
HOW TO DO BUSINESS.

In one handsome volume of 600 pages. Sent by free post for $2 25.

Also, Just Published:
WEDLOCK; or, The True Relations of the Sexes. By Mrs. A. M. REID. READ CHARACTER. a Self-Examiner, with 100 Illustrations: $1 in paper, in muslin, $1 50. ORATORY; a Hand-Book. $1 50. THE NEW ANNUAL OF PHRENOLOGY for 1870: only 10 cents. Specimens sent free. Send on for the Natural Sciences. Agents wanted.
Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

FURNITURE.

We invite buyers to visit our extensive warerooms and examine our large stock of Suites for Parlors, Chambers, Dining-Rooms, Library, &c., &c., manufactured under our supervision, from the best materials, and warranted in every respect.

With unequaled facilities and a ripe experience in manufacturing, we are confident that we are not promising too much when we say to buyers that, taking quality into consideration, we can not be beaten in prices.

WARREN WARD & CO.,
Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers and Dealers,
No. 10 Canal Street, corner Crosby.

WANTED, live men, who can give security for their honesty, to distribute "packages" of "Wonders of the World" among families, and collect the same. Address J. C. TILTON, Pittsburgh, Pa.

TROY FEMALE SEMINARY.—This Institution offers the accumulated advantages of over 30 years' successful operation. For circulars, apply to JOHN H. WILLARD, Troy, N. Y.

MAPLE LEAVES, enlarged and improved. The Ten-cent Magazine, popular, and the cheapest Magazine published. It will be sent from now to the end of 1870 for 40 cents. Send in subscriptions without delay.
O. A. ROORBACH, 102 Nassau St., New York.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE,
NEW YORK.

The next Academical Year will begin on the 1st MONDAY (4th) of October. The students of the College will attend for matriculation on that day at 9¾ A.M.

Candidates for the FRESHMAN Class will present themselves for examination on Friday, Oct. 1st, and Saturday, Oct. 2d, at 10 A.M.

Applicants for admission to advanced classes, and those required to be re-examined, will present themselves on Saturday, Oct. 2d, at the same hour.

For Circulars and further information, apply to REV. DR. BARNARD, President; or to HENRY DRISLER,
Senior Professor and Acting as President.

New Trotting Prints.

"SCORING—COMING UP FOR THE WORD." Little Fred. Needle Gun, Jessie Wales, Belle Brooks, Lady Maud, Lucy, and Old Jim, in their next trot over the Prospect Park Course, May 19, 1869. Size, 22 x 13 inches. Price, $3.

"THE BRUSH ON THE HOMESTRETCH." American Girl, Goldsmith Maid, Lucy, Bashaw Jr., Rhode Island, and Geo. Wilkes, in their great trotting match for $1000 purse, Prospect Park Fair Ground, May 19, 1869. Size, 22 x 13 inches. Price, $3.

"WON BY A NECK." Lady Thorn, American Girl, and Goldsmith Maid trotting their great race on the Prospect Park Fair Grounds, August, 1869. Lady Thorn winning in three heats, in 2:20¾, 2:20¾, 2:20¼. Size, 30 x 13 inches. Price, $3.

"GOING TO THE TROT." Size, 22 x 28 inches. Price, $4. Showing the "trotting public" going down to the track, in one of the Park horse-cars.

"COMING FROM THE TROT." Size, 22 x 28 inches. Price, $4. A capital picture, representing the "public" on their way home.

"TROTTING CRACKS AT THE FORGE." Size, 22 x 28 inches. Price, $4. A busy scene at a blacksmith-shop. Lady Thorn, Lady Eagle stopping for the foreground, while Mountain Boy is led in by a groom.

"A STOPPING-PLACE ON THE ROAD." Size, 22 x 28 inches. Price, $4. Scene under the shed at one of the well-known harness stands in the habitues of Harlem Lane, on a summer afternoon.

"TROTTING CRACKS AT HOME." Size, 22 x 16 inches. Price, $3. The interior of the stall mate. The horses in the foreground are the famous Aubin-Clinton, Fearnot and Edwin Forrest.

Any of the prints will be carefully enveloped, and sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Please state that you saw this advertisement in Harper's Weekly. Address CURRIER & IVES, Publishers,
152 Nassau St., New York.

GREAT ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC TEA COMPANY,
NO. 8 CHURCH STREET,
P.O. Box 5506. New York City.

An organization of capitalists for the purpose of importing Teas and distributing them to Merchants throughout the country at Importers' prices. Establishing a New System of Price-Lists.

TYLER WATER WHEELS.—Over 3000 in operation. Address the manufacturers, Sullivan Machine Co., Claremont, N. H., for reduced price-list.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1870.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and the BAZAR, 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 40 cents additional for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the NUMBER for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the current Number and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription will expire. Due notice is given when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to order a discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it will be of no value when paid to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

☞ A New Story by WILKIE COLLINS (Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," etc.) will be commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY early in November. New subscribers will be furnished with the Weekly from the commencement of this story to the end of 1870 for $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS:

Harper's Magazine—Whole Page, $300: Half Page, $150: Quarter Page, $76—each insertion; or, for a long space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE

FOR THE

NEW YORK WEEKLY,

THE PEOPLE'S FAVORITE JOURNAL.

The Most Interesting Stories are always to be found in the

NEW YORK WEEKLY.

At present there are

SIX GREAT STORIES

running through its columns; and at least

One Story is Begun every Month.

New subscribers are thus sure of having the commencement of a new continued story, no matter when they subscribe for the

NEW YORK WEEKLY.

Each number of the NEW YORK WEEKLY contains several Beautiful Illustrations, Double the Amount of Reading-Matter of any paper of its class, and the Sketches, Short Stories, Poems, &c., are by the ablest writers of America and Europe. The

NEW YORK WEEKLY

does not confine its usefulness to amusement, but publishes a great quantity of really Instructive Matter, in the most condensed form. The

N. Y. Weekly Departments have attained a high reputation from their brevity, excellence, and correctness.

The PLEASANT PARAGRAPHS are made up of the concentrated wit and humor of many minds.

The KNOWLEDGE BOX is confined to useful information in the manner of subjects.

The NEWS DIGEST gives in the fewest words the most notable doings all over the world.

The CHESS AND CHECKER COLUMNS contains answers to inquirers upon all imaginable subjects.

AN UNRIVALED LITERARY PAPER

IS THE

NEW YORK WEEKLY.

Each issue contains from EIGHT to TEN STORIES and SKETCHES, and HALF A DOZEN POEMS, in ADDITION to the SIX SERIAL STORIES and the VARIED DEPARTMENTS.

The Terms to Subscribers:

One Year—Single copy.....Three Dollars.
" " Four copies ($2.50 each).....Ten Dollars.
" " Eight copies.....Twenty Dollars.

Those sending $20 for a club of Eight, all sent at one time, will be entitled to a copy free. Getters-up of clubs can afterward add single copies at $2.50 each.

STREET & SMITH, Proprietors,
No. 55 Fulton St., N. Y.

FRENCH CLOCKS,

BRONZES,
FANCY GOODS,
MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,
Opera Glasses,
FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,
PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES,
WEDDING PRESENTS.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,

No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York,

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has strongly occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogisms of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured by the new factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

Price of Watch, Gold $10 or $12.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid, on demand.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLE,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

Bloomington Nursery,

500 Acres. 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.

Fruit, Ornamental Tree, Nursery Stock, immense and reliable assortment, very low for cash.

Japan—Splendid, rare and magnificent stock of ever-flowering Roses, many hardy Scarlets, such as Duchess, Geologue, Hindoo, Tennessee, and other Crab Apples—1, 2, and 3 year.

Evergreens, Vines, Climbers, Plumas, Quinces, Grapes, Forest and Evergreen Trees, Nursery Stocks, Osage Orange Hedge Plants, Roses, Bedding Plants, Dahlias, Chrysanthemums, Iris, Spirella, Lilies, Gladiolus, Amaryllis, &c.

Also superior colored plates of Fruits and Flowers. Send 10 cents for Catalogue.

F. K. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

THE MYSTERIOUS PUZZLE. A Great Novelty. Sent by mail for 25 cents.
WALTER HOLT, 109 Nassau St., N. Y. Box 3583.

THE CELEBRATED IMITATION

Gold Watches and Jewelry.

THE COLLINS METAL, THE ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE ORIDE.

The $18 Watches, in appearance and for time, are equal to gold ones costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, at $20, are not surpassed by $100 gold watches. The FINE, ELEGANCE, FINISH, and DURABILITY, no imitation of gold can begin to compare with the Collins Metal. Excepting the intrinsic value, it is equal to gold. Every watch fully warranted by certificate.

CHAINS FROM $2 TO $8.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Ear-Rings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Bracelets, Fancy Pieces, Charms, Odd-Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—When Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send the seventh Watch free of charge. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express, to be paid for on delivery. Money not to be sent, unless the cash can be paid when goods are taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. We do not send goods C. O. D. All orders, therefore, must be sent directly to us. In ordering, state plainly the name, town, county and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only store is

No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth St., up stairs. New York.—C. E. COLLINS & CO.

☞ ALL SUFFERERS ☜

From Pulmonary Diseases, Nervous Debility, Female Weaknesses, or Chronic Disorders of any nature, and all who have been long depressed, rendering recovery a

NERVOUS TONIC AND INVIGORATOR,

SHOULD IMMEDIATELY USE

WINCHESTER'S

HYPOPHOSPHITES,

THE SPECIFIC REMEDY FOR

CONSUMPTION!

ALSO FOR THE CURE OF

Nervous and General Debility, Bronchitis, Asthma, Neuralgia, Paralysis, Wasting Scrofula, Loss of Strength, Fetid and Impeded Respiration, Rapid Indigestion, Impurities of the Blood, Low Spirits, and the worst forms of Chronic Diarrhœa, Male and Female Complaints.

PROFESSIONAL TESTIMONY.

☞ "AS SURE A REMEDY IN Consumption AS Quinine is in Intermittent Fever, and as certainly A PREVENTIVE AS Vaccination in Small Pox."—Dr. Churchill, late Physician to the Sardinian Embassy, London.

"I would say to all who have one tenderness to Consumption, TAKE THIS REMEDY, AND THEY SHOOTS the better."—W. W. Townsend, M.D., Unionville, Pa.

☞ Circulars Free. Write for one. ☜

For sale by Druggists and Dealers in every city, town, and village throughout the United States and Canada. Prices $1 and $2 per bottle. Large size, or Six sized, $5.

J. WINCHESTER & CO., Proprietors.
36 John St., New York.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., 50 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

JUST PUBLISHED:

THE

GREAT NATIONAL SONG,

ENTITLED

"The Star Flag."

Written by H. MILLARD, Esq., the Author of "Wait-ing." "Five American Boys," &c., &c.

This beautiful gem is arranged for the Piano, and every one in the country should have a copy. Printed on heavy Music Paper. Price 10 cents. It is also published in the Golden Chain of HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE (now ready). Price, 20 cents. Mailed free on receipt of price.

Address PUBLISHER (Box 4,643), New York.
BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK,
Publisher of Sheet Music, New York.

N.B.—Sold by all Booksellers and Newsdealers.

"WE CAN'T DO WITHOUT IT."

SO SAY THE SUBSCRIBERS TO THE NEW Y RK OBSERVER.

$3 PER ANNUM.

SAMPLE COPIES FREE.

SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,
37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

SWEET QUININE. SWEET QUININE is warranted to relieve Headache (if not caused by sulphate (bitter) Quinine, with the least possible disturbance to the system, and to be the most agreeable and sweet liquid of bitter.

SVAPNIA. SVAPNIA Overcomes Habitual Wakefulness by the use of small doses of SVAPNIA, ADMINISTERED AS ANODYNE AND SOOTHING OPIATE IN CONVULSIONS.

Sold by druggists, prescribed by best physicians.

SEARLE, TAINTER & CO., Sole Proprietors.

5000 BOOK AGENTS WANTED for Harding's New Illuminated and Illustrated Bible, entitled

LIFE OF CHRIST and HUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

The work is now ready for delivery. Address for Catalogue of the best-selling Subscription-Books published.

W. W. HARDING, Philadelphia, Publisher of Harding's Pictorial Family Bible.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 98 Nassau St., New York.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any colored hair or beard to a permanent Black or Brown. One Comb sent by mail for $1. For sale by the trade generally. Address Magic Comb Co., Springfield, Mass.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR

STRUGGLES AND TRIUMPHS OF

P. T. BARNUM.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF. IN ONE LARGE OCTAVO VOLUME—NEARLY 800 PAGES—PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.

33 Elegant Full-Page Engravings.

It embraces FORTY YEARS' RECOLLECTIONS of his Busy Life, as a Merchant, Manager, Banker, Lecturer, and Showman, and gives accounts of his Experiment, his Failure, his Successful European Tours, and important Public and Private Personal Reminiscences, replete with Humor, Anecdotes, and Entertaining Narrative.

It contains his celebrated Lecture on the Art of Money-Getting, delivered before the Women's Christian Association, which has received 800. We offer extra inducements to Agents. Don't wait to the Worst. Apply for 32-page Circular, with Specimen Engraving and Terms to Agents.

J. B. BURR & HYDE,
Publishers, Hartford, Conn.

GREAT INDUCEMENTS TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Let those who want a first-class Lady's Magazine and a first-class Weekly Paper send at once for a copy of

THE LADY'S FRIEND

and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Both Complete Publishing Establishments. $2.50 a year for each. $4 for both. Four copies for $8, with a premium to the getter-up. Five copies (and one gratis), $8. Sample copies of both will be sent (postpaid) for fifteen cents. Address

DEACON & PETERSON,
No. 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

USEFUL INFORMATION FOR RAILWAY MEN.

Compiled by W. G. HAMILTON, Engineer. Second edition, revised and enlarged. 1869. 12mo, 400 pages, morocco, Gilt Edges, $2 00. D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 23 Murray and 27 Warren St., N. Y.

☞ Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price. ☜

PIANOS and ORGANS.

Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of Rosewood Cases, for $175 and upward. New Cabinet Organs for $65 and upward. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $30 to $150, at 481 Broadway, N. Y. HORACE WATERS.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machine. The best machine in the world. Agents write on both sides. First machine on trial. For further particulars, address

THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

PSYCHOMANCY, Fascination; or, Science of the Soul, as applied to the purposes of life. 400 pages. Cloth. By Herbert Mayo, M.A. A curious book, for inquisitive people. It contains complete instructions to acquire this wonderful power over men or animals. Can be obtained by sending postage stamps and address to

FOWLER & WELLS & CO.,
41 South 8th Street, Philadelphia.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $8, $12, $16. Office, $15, $20, $30. Send for a circular to KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.
15 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

SOMETHING NEW.—In musical circles the ESTEY ORGANETTE is the topic. They are the most durable and have the finest tone, remarkable for their sweetness and power. The Van Hornsen and Van Jubilants are the greatest novelties and best invention ever introduced. J. ESTEY & CO.,
Brattleboro, Vt., Sole Manufacturers.

WANTED—AGENTS—To sell the American Combination Machine. Price $15. The simplest, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings in an hour. Liberal inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNIT-TING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

VINEGAR—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without drugs. Address H. C. BRADLEY & CO., Worcester, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

WANTED AGENTS.—$75 to $200 per month, to sell the celebrated Grover & Baker Sewing Machines. A NEW NOVELTY SEWING MACHINE. A new Shuttle Machine, with Automatic Tension. Price $35, with Table and Foot power, $55. Send for Circular, with Cut of Machine and Terms to Agents. Address W. S. HILL, Manchester, N. H.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 50 full-size pictures, mailed, postpaid, for 75 cts.; 8 for $1; $3.25 per dozen. Circulars free. Address ROBERT H. MOUR, Holland, N. Y.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

15 Rich and Rare Articles for 25c.

Address Box 4702, East Boston, Mass.

$25 A DAY.—35 new articles for Agents. Sample free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$1140—How to make it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fuller, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Have just Published,

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 882 Illustrations, chiefly Drawn on Wood by the Author. Harnitic, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, Octavo, 1,100 pages. Price, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Full Morocco extra, $10 00.

UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Mental Philosophy; embracing the Three Departments of the Intellect, Sensibilities, and Will. By THOMAS C. UPHAM, D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Bowdoin College. In Two Volumes, Vol. I.: Intellect; Language. Vol. II.: Sensibilities; Will. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75 per volume.

THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By JAMES GREENWOOD, the "Amateur Casual," Author of "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "Rambles Beyond Railways," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

FAMOUS LONDON MERCHANTS. A Book for Boys. By H. H. Boyesen. With Portrait of George Peabody and 34 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

SIGHTS AND SENSATIONS IN FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND: or, Experiences of an American Abroad. By EDWARD GOOD BUTLER. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

SANDS'S PHILOSOPHY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, the Pupil, the School. By NATHANIEL SANDS, A.M. 12mo, $1 00.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH! A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Careful Consideration of the Question how Small Places are Involved in Amateur Farming, with much Valuable Advice and Information. Also, about Purchasing Large or Small Places in the Rural Districts. By Horace Greeley. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

A PARSER AND ANALYZER FOR BEGINNERS, with Diagrams and Suggestive Hints. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, Author of "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language," &c. 16mo, Cloth, 40 cents.

HITCHCOCK: a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Colleges, and for Private Study. By Rev. E. O. HAVEN, D.D., LL.D., President of the Northwestern University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro," "Contributions of the Amazon," &c. With Ten Maps and Fifty-one elegant Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By GEORGE C. SCOTT. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 50.

THREE SEASONS IN EUROPEAN VINEYARDS. Treating of Vine-Culture, Fine Drinks and the Vine; Wine-Making and Wines, Red and White; and Brief Observations on Drinking and Morals. By WILLIAM J. FLAGG. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

The New Novels

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition.

ADAM BEDE. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents.

THE MILL ON THE FLOSS. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents.

FELIX HOLT. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents.

☞ To be followed by Geo. Eliot's other Novels. ☜

IN SILK ATTIRE. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FOUND DEAD. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of Two," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

COUNTESS GISELA. By E. MARLITT. Translated by A. Nahmer. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

META'S FAITH. By the Author of "St. Olave's," "Mrs. Jerningham's Journal," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FALSE COLORS. By ANNIE THOMAS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HETTY. By HENRY KINGSLEY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.

CORD AND CREESE. By the Author of "The Initials," "Quits," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS:

New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.

VANITY FAIR. 32 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.

THE VIRGINIANS. 150 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE NEWCOMES. 102 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 64 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HENRY ESMOND AND LOVEL THE WIDOWER. 12 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

☞ To be followed by Charles Reade's other Novels. ☜

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

"I AM INFALLIBLE"

A NEW DISCOVERY!!

PHALON'S

"VITALIA;"

OR,

Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaccident matter, requires no shaking up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "Vitalia" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the direction being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!

AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,

CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,

517 Broadway, N.Y.

STEREOPTICONS, MAGIC LANTERNS, and DISSOLVING-VIEW APPARATUS, with the improved Calcium Light, for Public Exhibitions, Sunday-Schools, &c. Easily and cheaply mastered, always attractive, and pays well. Send for Catalogue. T. H. McALLISTER, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N. Y.

"OLD FOGY" LOST his lead-pencil. Use the Novelty Pencil-Holders, and avoid losing pencils.

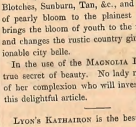
BE BEAUTIFUL.—If you desire beauty you should use HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM.

It gives a soft, refined, satin-like texture to the complexion, removes Roughness, Redness, Blotches, Sunburn, Tan, &c., and adds a tinge of pearly bloom to the plainest features. It brings the bloom of youth to the fading cheek, and changes the rustic country girl into a fashionable city belle.

In the use of the MAGNOLIA BALM lies the true secret of beauty. No lady need complain of her complexion who will invest 75 cents in this delightful article.

LYON'S KATHAIRON is the best Hair Dressing in use.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'



SAPOLIO,

FOR CLEANING AND POLISHING.

SAPOLIO will make This resemble Silver. Use only SAPOLIO to clean White Paint. From Marble SAPOLIO removes all Stains. For polishing Knives SAPOLIO is unsurpassed. For cleaning Brass Stair-Rods SAPOLIO has no equal. If you would have clean windows, use SAPOLIO. Sample cake sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.

Depot, 211 Washington St., New York.

Established 1809.

Particular attention is called to our SOAPS for family use.

DR. JNO. V. BURTON'S

TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO. It entirely eradicates the horrible habit in any form and under any circumstances, the nervous poisonous great nourishing and strengthening, and is an excellent tonic and superior, enables the stomach to digest the heartiest food, makes long refreshing, and is unsurpassed. Price Fifty Sixteen and absence of mind restored. Price Fifty Cents per Box, Post Paid. Sent by mail to any part of the United States, with full directions, pamphlets, circulars, &c., on receipt of price. Agents wanted. Address, DR. T. K. ASHBY, Hackensack, N. J.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

☞ Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations.

[Trademark & Copyrighted.]

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., OR ST. LOUIS, MO. CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties pairing off worthless cast-iron machines, and of the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

THE LYCEUM.—No. 1,—contains the names, subjects, prices, and terms of over two hundred of the best LECTURERS, MUSICIANS, and READERS of the country, with valuable advice to LYCEUM COMMITTEES. Specimen copy sent on receipt of stamp, by JAMES REDPATH, Boston, Mass.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,

46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HERRSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRUEY, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; C. M. MEIGS, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. R

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII. No. 668.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

PUBLISHED AT THE OFFICE

FATHER HYACINTHE.

FATHER CHARLES LOYSON HYACINTHE may be properly called a "Catholic Protestant." His present position may be best explained by a brief allusion to the peculiar claims and dogmas upon which Pope PIUS IX. so strenuously insists. When this Pope was first elected great hopes were entertained by the best educated and most advanced of Roman Catholics that a new era would then be opened for the Church—an era characterized by a liberal policy, which, while it maintained the Catholic faith, would denounce errors and correct abuses. These hopes have been disappointed. Notwithstanding the liberal political spirit manifested by PIUS IX. at the beginning of his Pontificate, he has proved one of the greatest enemies to the progress of the age. If he had been content with a negative or neutral policy, he would have been secure against opposition from within the bosom of his own Church. But he has assumed a belligerent attitude, and has arrayed the ultramontane or anti-liberal party against the Gallican or liberal. By calling an Œcumenical Council, to meet next December, for the assertion of universal ecclesiastical supremacy, he has awakened the spirit of opposition, of which Father HYACINTHE is one of the best and ablest representatives.

Father HYACINTHE was born at Orleans, France, in 1831, and completed his education at Pau. In 1853 he was ordained at St. Sulpice, in which parish he subsequently officiated as a priest; but in the mean time he studied theology four years and taught philosophy at Avignon, and afterward theology at Nantes. Having passed ten years in the Lyons Convent of Carmelite Friars, he became a member of the order, and was first a preacher in that city. While there his sermons delivered at the Lyseo were considered remarkable. During Advent, in 1863, he preached at Bordeaux, and in the Lenten season of 1864 at Perigueux. It was during the summer of 1864 that he made his first appearance in Paris, preaching the Conference of the Madeleine, and afterward at Notre Dame, having prepared a course of sermons for Advent. Here he at once, by the eloquence and boldness of his utterances, attracted public attention and gained a brilliant reputation. He is a most popular preacher, and it is from this fact that his recent letter protesting against the coming Council, and the fearful policy which that Council is pledged to support, excites such comment. It is reported that Father HYACINTHE has left the convent, and that he will at the home of his parents await the decision of the Council.

Father HYACINTHE is known in Paris as the "preacher-monk." Some idea of his appearance, and of the effect of his eloquence, is conveyed in the following graphic sketch, written by one of his hearers in 1867:

"But now the tall Swiss halberdier, making a passage along the aisle, announces the approach of Père HYACINTHE, and instantly his whole sea of faces is turned toward him, with an expression of sympathy so intense as seemed enough to electrify one who came in all simplicity and sincerity to bring to them the words of life. He followed slowly, with his eyes cast down, his fine pale, sad, mourning face sign of the pulpit, he knelt down and buried his face in silent prayer. Rising, he began with the sweet and majestic form, and for some moments regarded in silence those to whom he was to speak, while a deep sigh involuntarily escaped from his large chest.

"Although I was already under the magnetism of this extraordinary man, my eye, as an artist, took in all the surroundings of the scene. In rustic effect nothing could exceed the beauty of the tableau—the dark back-ground of the pulpit, in ancient carved oak; the form of the preacher, rendered more striking by the robe of his order (he is a Carmelite monk, and wears a long serge gown, with only sandals on his feet, with his white cowl thrown back upon his shoulder, his head shaven so as to leave only a chaplet of hair upon his brow, while the light from above fell upon his bare head, and his countenance, so sad and beautiful, yet responding with quick sympathy to all seemed to wear a deeper gloom, as if in sympathy with the darkness which was described; and when he repeated our Saviour's words, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' it seemed as if every heart shuddered at the cry.

"As Christ suffered and agonized for man's salvation, so should man himself struggle and suffer unto death, that he may be saved—these was his theme. But how do men carry on this spiritual war? Here the preacher turned from the Divine Sufferer to the world which He came to redeem—a world full of sorrow and sin. Instantly we were in the midst of the nineteenth century—with examples of guilt which all could recognize. He drew his pictures from actual life, portraying the tempter and the tempted; and in his charges of selfishness and crime he seemed as if he would array all men at the bar of Divine justice. He did not spare any class or profession—not even his own—but drew a fearful picture of the unworthy priest.

"'It is not by hypocrisy,' he said, 'that the bad priest dishonors his ministry. Hypocrisy is a thing vulgar and base, soon unmasked, which can not long deceive any one; but it is by that cold, cruel Pharisaism, which puts the letter in place of the spirit, the law, which puts the form of sanctity, in a religion which is all dogma in place of charity, in a religion which is all love. It is not with hands hard and cold that the priest must touch the wounds and sores of humanity, but as a mother, in her love for her children, covers the plague-spots which mark the outbreaking of revolting disease. It is with burning lips that he is to suck the poison from the very blood of the death-smitten; it is with tears of charity and of tenderness that he is to work and to purify the sinful soul!' As he said this there was in his voice, and in the whole expression of his sad and beautiful countenance, something of the tenderness of a father: he seemed to yearn toward those who listened to him with an irresistible attraction; and with one of his electrifying gestures he threw open his arms as if he would take upon his own heart the griefs and the remorse of every troubled spirit.

"'I give you but a faint outline of his sermon, though every word was engraven on my memory. But I only refer to repeat his arguments and illustrations. I will give you my impressions of his power, for it was the man, in his eye, his gesture, and his voice. In true eloquence there is something which escapes analysis—a power beyond words—a magnetism subtle and mysterious, which penetrates the inner being, which can not be described, but which is only felt as the intensest action of the human soul. To many who understand the effect I must point for you that countenance so noble, now grave and calm, and now wearing a look of ineffable tenderness. His gestures were full of energy and animation. There was intense life in every limb and every motion. Now he supersaid as if he were the accuser of his hearers, flashing the light of conscience on every deed of guilt. At such a moment you might believe that you heard another SAVONAROLA thundering against the vices of the age. Then suddenly his tone changed, and his manner became tender and almost caressing, as if he would draw the multitude to the feet of Him whose agony he described.

"In rebuking the spirit of this world, which has such empire over men, a priest has an immense power from his own example of self-abnegation. The Protestant pastor comes to the pulpit from his comfortable home, from the sweet companionship of his wife and children. But the priest has no domestic ties. He has no home, and no one to love him more than others. If a monk, he has taken a vow of poverty, and lives in a cell. His life is one of daily self-denial—at least such is the theory of his order—and he speaks to the popular heart and conscience, exalted in public esteem by this impression of extraordinary sanctity. I need not say that many priestesare far enough from realizing this ideal of their profession—that they are very coarse and commonplace, alike wanting in intellect and in moral elevation. But others there are of a different stamp—and at least try to live up to a saintly ideal, with whom life is a daily self-crucifixion—men full of the sweet impulses of nature, yearning for human sympathy, who are yet doomed to live in solitude, craving a love which they can never know. In the gospel of this contradiction between its tastes and its actual existence jives and adjusts to all human life. But what a power it gives to him who can thus speake out of his lonely and desolate heart to others in sorrow, using the very words of the Christian Consolator!

"In the PÈRE HYACINTHE it is easy to see the struggling of two natures. Under that coarse monk's dress throbs a great human heart. As CARLYLE said of EDWARD IRVING, 'He strove to be a priest in an age often to the character,' so it seems as if this man also were striving to realize, even here in the gayest city in the world, and amidst the allurements of modern degeneracy, the heroic type of one of the old confessors.

"In recalling this marvelous preaching it seems to me that there is in it something of the scenes as well as of the spirit. I will not use the word unusual, for it would not express my thought, nor be just to the preacher. But there is an element of passionate emotion which is so marked in the writings of SAINT TERESA and Madame GUYON—a dignifying of human with Divine love, an overflowing of a heart yearning for affection, but finding all domestic ties, pure and sweet in a love for all mankind. But what a fascination in this eloquence, and how irresistible to move to God and to men!

"If you think me carried away by my enthusiasm, I can only give you the more sober impressions of others. Our Protestant friends here speak with homage to his genius and eloquence. M. DE PRESSENSÉ says that his manner is the union of dignity and natural gifts with the most consummate art. It seems he does not shun Protestant society. Not long since he passed an evening at Madame AGÉNORIE MOHON's, and they were charmed with his dignity and courtesy. Although he goes every where in the dress of his order as a Carmelite monk, with his naked feet shod only in sandals, yet his bearing is so distinguished as that of a gentleman of the Court of LOUIS XIV."

FATHER CHARLES LOYSON HYACINTHE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

In this connection the following extract from the letter of Father HYACINTHE, which has created so much excitement, and which was addressed to the General of his order at Rome, will prove interesting to our readers:

"The present hour is solemn. The Church passes through one of the most scathing, dark, and decisive crises of its existence before long. For the first time in 300 years an Œcumenical Council is not only convoked, but declared necessary; such is the expression voiced by the Encyclical. It is not in such a moment that a preacher remains in the more dogmatical prohibitive positions, whom the prophet reproaches as unable to distinguish "sour mud, non salubris latrum." The times are never silent. I am not one of them, but nevertheless I am not a dumb dog. Therefore, as you see me, and I have always been ambitious to place my steps where they might, if necessary, lay hands, in the cause which they have left. I raise, therefore, before the Holy Father and the Council, my profession as Christian and preacher against those doctrines and practices, calling themselves Roman, which are not such Christian, and which in their encroachments, always most insidious and most baneful, tend to change the Constitution of the Church, the basis as well as the form of its government, and even the spirit of its piety. I protest against the divorce, no implies as it is famous, which is sought to accomplish between the Church, who is our mother according to eternity, and the mother of the nineteenth century, of whom we are the sons according to the times, and toward whom we have also some duties and attachments. I protest against the more radical and dreadful opposition to human nature, which is attacked and wounded by recent by these false doctrines in its most indestructible and holiest aspirations. I protest, above all, against the sacrilegious perversion of the Word of the Son of God himself, the heart and the letter of which are equally trodden under foot by the Pharisaism of the new law. It is my most profound conviction that in France in particular, and the Latin races in general, are deserved over to social, moral, and religious anarchy, the principal cause is without doubt not in Catholicism itself, but in the manner which Catholicism has during a long time been understood and practiced. I appeal to the Council about to meet to seek the remedies for the excess of our evils, and to apply them with an ardent zeal for gentleness. But if force in which I do not wish to share come to be realized—if the signal were to be not more than that of the deliberations than it has already in its preparation—if in a word, it is deprived of the essential characters of an Œcumenical Council, I will cry to God and men to call another Council in the Holy Ghost, that is the spirit of party, and representing really the Universal Church, not the silence of some men, the oppression of others."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1869.

☞ A New Story, splendidly Illustrated, by WILKIE COLLINS *(Author of "*The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone"), will be commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY in November, 1869. New Subscribers will be supplied with the WEEKLY from the beginning of the Story to the end of 1870 for $4 00.

THE NEW YORK CAMPAIGN.

THE platform of the late New York Republican Convention will be regarded with the utmost satisfaction by every citizen in the country who sympathizes with the fundamental principles of liberty, and it is strongly and honorably contrasted with the Democratic platform of the previous week. The Convention declared that the national honor should be maintained without equivocation, that the Fifteenth Amendment, securing in the Constitution the equality of all citizens of the United States, should be adopted, and that the Government should be supported in the recognition of Cuban belligerency, whenever the facts in its possession should justify such a declaration.

The platform is positive and frank. We should have been glad to see an approval of the proposed reform in the civil service, and a recommendation of the new Constitution of the State. But what is said is so well said, and is so important, that we can wait. It is enough that the civil service reform has already been generally discussed, and is perhaps too imperfectly understood to be a subject upon which the party can safely vaguely pronounce. All Republicans are known to be the authors of the proposed improvements in the fundamental law of the State. Upon the chief points of present political interest the Convention has spoken plainly, and it remains for the people to decide whether the voice of New York shall swell the chorus of history to the great principles of public policy which are associated with the proudest and most heroic epoch of our history.

It is evident from the tone of the resolutions of which we speak, as from that of the State conventions generally, that the main interest of the autumn elections, although they are State elections, is national, and not local. The question of this is that the great issues involving the honor and prosperity of the National Government have not yet been settled, and every expression of public opinion at the polls affects that settlement. In Ohio, for instance, the Democratic party supports Mr. PENDLETON, who was a favorite candidate for the Presidency against General GRANT, and who is the representative of a financial policy which is virtually repudiation; a policy which, until it is conclusively exhausted by the American people, will disastrously affect the national credit and honor. In Pennsylvania the Democratic candidate is Mr. PACKER, a gentleman known only as a Copperhead in the days when that term had a most serious significance. Both Mr. PENDLETON and Mr. PACKER were opposed to the war and to the policy of reconstruction, and are, of course, equally opposed to the Fifteenth Amendment, which removes from the domain of politics the vexing question that occasioned the war, and finally secures the honest results of the struggle.

The elections have thus inevitably a national aspect. They are the expression of opinion upon the very gravest measures of public policy.

Should the Democratic party prevail in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New York, it would not be unfair to conclude that the people of those States, and possibly of the country, believe that the national honor would not be sullied by a course which no honest private person would countenance in his own affairs, and which would be a virtual abandonment of even the security of equal rights among American citizens and the prosperity and permanence of the Union. In short, it would be impossible to separate the national from the State issue. The election of Mr. PENDLETON and Mr. PACKER could not honestly be regarded as a personal compliment to the candidates, but as General HAYES and General GEARY as Governors of their States, but it would unavoidably be regarded as a decision of much more important consequence.

This is to be regretted. It may be unfortunate that the people can not vote for Governor in Ohio or Pennsylvania, nor in this State for Comptroller or Secretary of State, without saying whether they wish to be honest to the national creditor and just to all their fellow-citizens. But that is, nevertheless, the practical question. Candidates of both parties may be equally honest and capable—if not, the dishonest and incapable should be so unanimously rebuked by the voice of public affairs and a public policy which would be as effective in the State as in the nation. Thus the success of the Democratic party in New York would defeat the State Constitution, which removes an arbitrary restriction now imposed upon a class of voters; while the success of the Republican party would be the equally popular voice the action of the Legislature in adopting the Fifteenth Amendment. The party that can be most safely intrusted with the management of the two great parties at the country. If he thinks that the financial policy of Mr. PENDLETON is wise and honorable, and that the principles of a Democratic victory in Ohio, in Pennsylvania, and of his friends in New York, promise harmony, economy, and peace to the country, he will vote the Democratic ticket in whatever State he lives. But if he believes that it is better to pay our debts honestly, and to do justice to our neighbors, to put the national faith beyond question, and to finish the work which the war left incomplete, he will support the party of the noblest record and of the best promise in our history, the Republican party.

THE NEW YORK REPUBLICANS AND CUBA.

THE New York Republican Convention resolved that "whenever the facts in possession of the Government of the United States recognized Cuban belligerency we shall heartily approve such recognition, and pledge our hearty support to any action on the part of the Government tending to the final annexation of Cuba whenever she shall have achieved her independence and her people desire such action." This is a resolution of entire fairness to Administration with which every Republican will cordially agree. The country reposes with satisfaction upon the conscientiousness of the President more than once spoken that we have an Administration singularly free from Buncombe of every kind, and which will regard our international conduct from the highest point of view. Our American traditions and of perfect good faith.

The gun-boats which were lately detained by the Government have been all released, and there has thus far not been found necessary. The question presented is whether, under the circumstances, the United States shall be made the base of Spanish military operations against Cuba. We have treaties with Spain, and our markets of ships and munitions of war are open to all the world. If the Spanish Government comes as a customer to buy a fleet and equipment, and we have no reason to suppose that they are to be used in hostilities against a nation with which we are at peace, upon what ground can the sale be prohibited by the American Government if the security is satisfactory to the American merchant? The only recognized ground of interference with such transactions is that we have declared our neutrality, and that both belligerents are equally prohibited. But we have no declaration of the belligerent rights of the Cubans, nor are they an independent people.

Yet they are our immediate neighbors, and they have been struggling for a year to throw off a foreign government which has hitherto been most harsh; and our very situation makes us almost a fatal neighbor to them so long as the present situation continues. They and their friends do not fail to remind us that in earlier days France helped the American colonies when they sorely needed succor. But the French recognition of the colonies, although most timely and serviceable, was a conscious and intentional act "of aggression toward England," the treaty of alliance of 1778 contemplates and provides for a rupture between France and England; and the United States agreed that if France captured the British West India Islands they should belong to France. The cases are in this at least essentially different, that we do not wish to injure Spain, which has never been at war with us, has sympathy with Cuba than ever France had with the American colonies. Still the unpleasant fact recurs that our geographical position makes us peculiarly harmful to the Cubans striving for independence. Spain leans her rifle upon our shoulder.

This, however, does not change the great principles that underlie international comity, and which require that no insurgents shall be recognized as belligerents—which is belligerency of an organized independence—until they show, as the American colonies had shown in 1778, not only a hope but a power to secure independence, attested by the virtual unanimity of the country and the undisputed civil supremacy of the Congress. These are the "facts" which, in the contemplation of the resolution that the Convention passed, would justify the recognition of Cuban belligerency. But meanwhile our neighborhood and the nature of the struggle against Spain make the most strenuous and persistent efforts at mediation between Spain and Cuba. This, we have no doubt, the Administration is doing with the utmost self-respect and the most earnest sympathy for the Cubans. The latter, when they began the struggle, doubtless relied upon our neighborhood as a sure help in many ways; but they should have seen that it was an equal disadvantage. Those who move in great enterprises are morally bound to count the cost. The Cubans have known that the United States will be just to them; but the best ground of their confidence is, that the United States will be just to all their duties and all their friends.

LAWRENCE vs. DANA.

THE late decision in BOSTON, in the case of WILLIAM B. LAWRENCE against RICHARD H. DANA, JUN., is very interesting and important. Mr. LAWRENCE, as is known, was a former editor of WHEATON'S International Law, and of Mr. DANA'S international law, and Mr. DANA is a later editor. The family of Mr. WHEATON were dissatisfied with the edition of Mr. LAWRENCE; and when that of Mr. DANA appeared, Mr. LAWRENCE charged that Mr. DANA had appropriated his labor in the notes, and asked that Mr. DANA'S edition be enjoined as a piracy.

But the reading matter in Mr. DANA'S notes, so to speak, the thoughts, suggestions, arguments, facts, and the results of debates and the diplomatic correspondence—all indeed that professes to be original, is allowed to be of such value that the edition can not be enjoined. The Court then considered the question of the use made by Mr. DANA of the raw material of Mr. LAWRENCE'S notes. This was merely a question of the relation of the second annotator of a work to the first, and does not involve character. All of Mr. DANA'S manuscripts were before the Court, and the question was really one of law only, not of good faith. Mr. DANA claimed that he had studied and used the notes of his predecessor as he had the works of other authors, and so they were; and that, drawing from the same authorities upon the same topics, the appearance of similarity was unavoidable. The Court upon this point laid down a rule, which Mr. DANA had failed to heed in some cases, to be fringed; and a master is to examine and report upon such instances.

If Mr. LAWRENCE'S intention, therefore, was to suppress Mr. DANA'S edition altogether, as an infringement of his copyright, he has failed, for Mr. DANA'S edition is not declared an infringement and is not enjoined. The Court says that in some instances he has transcended the proper limits of use of the labors of the previous editor, and done excessive, which is permitted, must be hereafter omitted. The decision of the Court shows that Mr. DANA is, even under its own rule, indebted to Mr. LAWRENCE for nothing but material which the scissors can cut off, and which may possibly be spared without injury.

Mr. DANA, therefore, reserves a right of appeal as to the justice of the rule laid down by the Court; but the great point in the case is decided in his favor.

THE BYRON STORY IN ENGLAND.

MRS. STOWE'S paper upon BYRON is still discussed in England, and the publication of a pamphlet a volume containing the literature of the debate, while another advertises a "Vindication of Lord Byron." Some of the remarks in the journals upon Mrs. STOWE herself has been much the same as in this country. One paper, indeed, says that she will presently be dwindled, as all those who are bold enough to tell the truth always are; and on the other hand, a correspondent who calls himself a member of Congress writes in PARIS a little feeble scurrility intended for the family of which Mrs. STOWE is a distinguished member. The most striking characteristic, however, of the communications which the subject has drawn out, is the irrelevancy of their arguments and statements to the essential point under consideration.

The note of the family solicitors is not a denial of the story, nor an assertion that evidence exists which will disprove it. Lord WENTWORTH, the grandson of Lady BYRON, writes that a manuscript was found among her papers containing account of peculiar circumstances connected with her marriage, but no accusation of so grave a nature as that which Mrs. STOWE asserts was contained therein. Lord LINDSAY also prints a letter written by Lady BYRON to her confidential friend Lady ANNE BARNARD, in 1818, alluding to the separation, but not mentioning the cause now alleged. This, however, is not in itself inconsistent with the impression conveyed by Mrs. STOWE that Lady BYRON told it to no one but her friend to Dr. (then Mr.) LUSHINGTON in 1816. Lord LINDSAY believes that Lady BYRON was a little deranged upon the subject, and Mr. WILLIAM HOWITT describes her as inexplicably cold and moody. Mr. JOHN ROBERTSON, also, declares that many persons, among them the Rev. FREDERICK ROBERTSON, believe Lady BYRON'S mind to have been "touched," and he asserts that she told many persons the story of the separation, and in many ways. He and two other friends of Lord BYRON say that Lady BYRON was of sound mind upon the subject; and he adds that the story she most frequently told is not susceptible of proof, while the one evidence which Mrs. STOWE has now and utterly incredible. But Dr. FORBES WINSLOW considers that the theory of hallucination is incompatible with the known facts of Lady BYRON'S life, and Mr. ROBERT BELL there seen good reasons for supposing her insane upon the subject of the separation, Miss MARTINEAU would have alluded to the fact in her life of Lady BYRON.

It is evident that the story itself is not so universally discredited in England as it seems to be here, although, as we said, there is little mercy for Mrs. STOWE. The Spectator and the Saturday Review, papers of the best reputation, incline to believe the story as told. The Spectator says that the truth of Mrs. STOWE'S story is "on the evidence more likely than not;" and the Saturday Review concludes that "either we must accept all this solution flatter, or we must accept Lady BYRON'S story," while the Pall Mall Gazette breaks the force of Lady ANNE BARNARD'S letter by emphasizing the fact that, as Lady BYRON did not tell the story to her parents, she would not be likely to confide it to her friend. Meanwhile, in the general discussion there has been great room for unimportant details. Thus, when Mrs. STOWE'S article was first published it was remarked, with vehemence, that she did not spell Lady BYRON'S name correctly, and that she asserted that she lived two years with her husband. But these were not the kind of inaccuracies that would weaken the probabilities of the story. It was of no significance whether Lady BYRON lived with her husband a month or twelve months after she knew the truth, but that she lived with him at all.

So the Philadelphia Press, in some friendly and courteous strictures upon the observations of the EDITOR in Harper's Magazine upon the general subject, points out certain discrepancies which do not affect the essence of the question. Thus it is said in the Magazine that Lord BYRON lived for three years before his marriage. No, says the Press, only a little more than two years. Again, it is said that two or three years after BYRON'S death, at the request of MOORE, Lady BYRON burned the letter. No, says the Press, it was six years after, and in reply to MOORE, but at his request. But evidently "two or three years" means a few years, and although it is inaccurate to say that it was at MOORE'S request, the substantial fact is that there was a statement of Lady BYRON'S, and that it was mentioned by MOORE'S Life. Perfect accuracy of dates and times is indeed desirable. But in this kind of discussion the vital points are alone important.

The Press, with the utmost good-nature, exhorts its editorial brethren to be "posted" before they engage in the debate; and, in charitably says that CAMPBELL was fully aware what he was about when he printed his commentary upon the "Defense of Lady BYRON." Has Dr. Shadrach read says that the most merciful conclusion in regard to it is that "it was written under the influence of stimulants, which, for the time, had deprived the illustrious author of 'Hohenlinden' alike of judgment and taste;" and Miss MARTINEAU says that "he excused himself by saying it was a mistake of hers that he did not know that he was about when he published the paper." All that CAMPBELL says in the letter quoted by the Press is that it "was a bold step on my part," which it certainly was. The Press also says that it is known to the readers of the MS. memoir of BYRON that the statement made by Lady BYRON to Dr. LUSHINGTON in 1816 does not in the least resemble "the horrible revelation" made to Mrs. STOWE in 1856. Does the Press suppose that Lady BYRON'S statement was to be found in Lord BYRON'S manuscript? How could the readers of that manuscript, Lord RUSSELL, for instance, or WASHINGTON IRVING, possibly know what Lady BYRON told Dr. LUSHINGTON, but did not tell her mother?

And is not the strongest probable proof of the substantial truth of Lady BYRON's story to be found in the fact that Dr. LUSHINGTON, to whom she told it in 1816, who is still living, and who could settle the whole matter by a word, remains silent? His simple assertion that the story told by Mrs. Stowe is not what Lady BYRON told him could not be regarded as an improper breach of professional confidence, and would dispose of the question. His silence is more convincing than all that has been said and written upon the subject.

LOOK AT THE SITUATION.

In the midst of a healthy and active trade, benefited alike by importers and distributors, the most unscrupulous gamblers of Wall Street, elevated to position and power by seizing the Erie Railroad—a sort of drift which its early friends had cast away from the impossibility of making it profitable—suddenly, as if a bolt had come from the clear sky, ran up the price of gold, buying and hauling it as it rapidly advanced, until, having reached 160, margins were called in, settlements in the consternation produced were made, a vast amount of currency was accumulated in the hands of the conspirators, and, while brokers for the combination were acting in one direction, the principals, on the sudden effluence, the conspiracy, took other roads of escape; and but one rule of action appeared to govern, which was, to pay nothing and hold on to ill-gotten gains—the Board of Gold Brokers being like a arm's-length shake hands with the indifference and contempt which will now be generally applied.

Instead of sending in to the Board the required statement of each dealer, which would conduce to a complete settlement, an injunction was preferred, its effect being to leave the vast transactions of the very unconfirmed; and all the gold at high prices in the hands of borrowers, while those who applied to the courts locked up enough currency to confuse the whole business of Wall Street. The fact of withholding a statement resulted from the conviction that the general settlement of the transactions of Friday would be ruinous, or from want of currency and in the association. What was wanted there was some controlling mind, to carry such amendments to the by-laws as would bring outstanding parties to terms. This the injunction could not prevent.

It would appear from the estimate made by a Committee of the Board that, upon a liquidation of all sales and purchases on Friday —which in the aggregate were several hundred millions—one set of parties remained short six millions in excess of which was long to the same extent. As the corner was advancing toward 160 or 162), persons who sold at 160, and on the turn of the market covered at 150, find themselves, with gold at 130, ruined, as the purchaser from them can not take, while they are held. No transaction in Wall Street at any previous time has so much defied its capacity, or produced greater confusion or more serious consequences. While it was the rule before Friday to trust anybody in the Board, in reliance upon the honor (?) which was supposed to control, now nobody trusts any body. The Gold Exchange Bank has gone into bankruptcy. Of this, therefore, the country may be assured, that the gambling fraternity are so extensively weakened, and confidence is so impaired among them, that a new set will need to grow up before the general business can be disturbed by their unseemly operations. Many of the banks of the city contribute by their loans, and by the direct action of their officers, to such opportunities for injuring all useful industry. It would be well for stockholders to drive from official position all who, under any circumstances, speculate in stocks. The taste for it grows with indulgence, and will generally eventuate in ruin and fraud. The object is not just. Accumulation of wealth, as it is the fruit of honest exertion in a useful pursuit, is not inconsistent with the general interest; but, when sought as the result of speculation with borrowed means, the actor becomes a slave to obtain what his industry has produced without rendering an equivalent, and generally will become unscrupulous in its accomplishment.

Every officer known to be tainted with speculation should be weeded out of all financial institutions, as it constitutes a clear fraud upon the trust and confidence of the general democratization. Our credit circulation is now so guarded from depreciation or diminution by the wise provisions of the Bank authorized by the issue, that the country can stand more of disaster than it could have stood under the State bank system. We shall ride out this storm with safety; but if speculators are not ejected from control, and our banking institutions handed over to the prudent and wise, who will keep the gambler at arm's-length, the time may come when a hail-storm to beat down the coming harvest, or some event not more damaging than the recent raid upon Wall Street, will bring down the whole structure of public credit beyond relief from judges who attend upon speculators to aid them at critical moments with injunctions.

The institutions of a financial character which are scattered over the Union wield an influence the very greatest over its fortunes and its morals. The time has arrived for exerting it with energy, as not pecuniary safety alone, but the general safety, is affected by their management.

It will be recollected that last year a lock-up in funds, brought about by the Erie clique, arrested the prosecution of the full trade of 1868, and inflicted wide-spread injuries. The price load was abandoned by prudent capitalists some years ago, when it was discovered that no profit to the stockholders could be made from it, considering the expense of construction and operation over a difficult route, and the competition to which it was subjected from a rival route in this State better situated as to grades and population. The Erie, thus abandoned by its unfortunate projectors and friends, fell into the hands of those who, to cover the annual loss from operating it, saw in its ill-repute an opportunity for speculation, issued convertible stock under a very questionable power conferred by the general Railroad Act.

The interests of the Company, whose joint liabilities for stock and bonds have been extended to considerably over one hundred millions of dollars, have been sacrificed solely in these nefarious operations, and the road is run and managed chiefly to advance the speculations of those who control its directory. No clearer view what it was of old, a receiver appointed in the interest of some of its mortgagees—it is doubtful which of them will ever derive benefit from the job—would be found to dispose of this scandal upon the fair fame of the State, the judiciary, and indeed the Union would avoid its termination.

The last Legislature of New York passed an act to prevent the ejection at a single election of the present Board from office. It was doubtless well done because it was to prevent a sale of the worthless stock upon the market, and permit a repetition of some scheme of plunder such as occurred in Wall Street on Thursday and Friday.

The most alarming feature of our condition is this, that such legislation can be purchased at Albany, and that the administration of the punishment in the courts can be purchased from a part of the judiciary. A shrewd observer said a few days ago that we were approaching the time when every property-holder would be chained by thieves who would have the effrontery to say, "You are mistaken; this is mine; I own it, and the key in my pocket also the judge who will so decide."

The wants of the city per day of gold for commercial transactions reach from about a half to three-quarters of a million of dollars; but such is the aid extended by banks to gambling in Wall Street, that the operations of Friday at the Gold Exchange were between three and five hundred millions—operations which had no connection with the commerce which the banks are expected to foster. This will in some way be corrected before long by placing the country on the track to specie payments. This policy will require from each bank to withdraw from speculation and to yield to the substantial interests of the people.

HARMONY OF FAMILIES.

There seems to be little doubt that LOPEZ has been at last defeated in Brazil, and that Paraguay is relieved of a most odious tyrant. There are those who have insisted upon calling the government of that country a republic, but it was as absolute a personal despotism as can be found upon the globe. From the beginning of the struggle there has been nothing which could excite sympathy for LOPEZ or inspire hope in his success. The war, which was directly for the freedom of the river La Plata, and indirectly for the progress of civilization in that unsecure and perilous region, was necessary. We have yet to hear Minister M'MAHON's account of the condition of the country and the rule of LOPEZ, for which the United States minister has been repeated. The ferocities of the "President," as related by Mr. WASHBURN, are sickening; and the world will gladly know that an alliance, offensive and defensive, of republic against President SARMIENTO is a member, has obtained control of the river.

Indeed, the people of the people of the United States in all the countries of South America is so vague that the importance of the Presidency of Mr. SARMIENTO has not been properly estimated. He is a man not only thoroughly familiar with our institutions and history, but profoundly sympathetic with their principles. He combines both the advantages of a popular government and the necessity of general intelligence for its security and permanence. During his long residence in this country President SARMIENTO made the most extensive and accurate study of our public school system; and he is sparing no effort to elevate the standard and to extend the range of education in his own land. Such a man, devoting to the highest interests of his country his abilities and the wisdom of his experience, is the most significant figure in political affairs in South America. In the Argentine Republic there is a real tendency toward high civilization, and a sagacious and representative government. The great principles of liberty and the political safeguards of freedom are pondered and practically sought. It is a country to which, especially under its present administration, our kindest thoughts and sympathies should be given; and which, if not the most extensive and powerful, is certainly the most promising of the South American States.

Brazil, on the other hand, is a country from which little is to be hoped. The Emperor, who seems to be a good-natured and somewhat cultivated man, has a way of charming visitors from the United States by praising the virtues of some of our authors; and when the pleased visitors write home that the Emperor of Brazil reads Longfellow and BRYANT, there is an effect produced which, measured by the fact, is very comical, as if Brazil were a peculiarly educated and refined country, the truth being that it is nearly dormant and backward. The Emperor occasionally, also, makes remarks about emancipation. But they evidently mean nothing more than his praises of our poets. He would probably like to see slavery abolished in his empire. But it is one of the languid, ineffective feelings common to all men of good complexion, and to all that we can learn, slavery is firmly rooted in Brazil, and will yield very slowly to the growing humanity of the philosophy and sense of the world.

It is not altogether satisfactory to observe that the victorious General of the allies in the Paraguayan campaign was apparently the Count D'EU. If it had been a native of the country, that consciousness would have inspired a self-respect which would have been of the greatest service to the future development of the people. It is unfortunate for all the allies that they should feel that they owe their success to a foreigner. But, on the other hand, Mr. SARMIENTO is the representative of a higher success, which may justly stimulate the best hope and effort, at least of his own countrymen. Over the grave, in contemplating him in his career, seems the responsibility of every citizen of the United States to justify the earnestness with which men like SARMIENTO, upon that continent and on the other, cite our example and the beneficent working of our system.

NOTES.

Ever since the brave Sir HUMPHREY GILBERT was lost at sea three hundred years ago, crying, "Heaven is as near by sea as by land," the profoundest, but also a mournful interest, has invested Arctic travel. This feeling is deepened by the story which Captain HALL tells us. He has removed all doubt from the tragical tale of FRANKLIN's fate, and that of all his companions. They tried to make their way from their ships to the outposts of the Hudson Bay Company, and perished miserably by exposure, disease, starvation, and possible foul play. Yet the heroic devotion which led a quiet citizen of Cincinnati to penetrate the Arctic solitudes and live among fatal hardships that he might learn the fate of his predecessor, can not be regarded without admiration. The North-west Passage is still unfound, but it remains now nothing but to reach the North Pole, an enterprise which Captain HALL affirms to be practicable. But blustering does not destroy the charm of mystery and fearful romance that hangs over the Arctic world. The boys of to-day, provided with the means, regenerate the story of Captain HALL that we older boys read that of Captain PARRY and Captain ROSS. It is a story of astounding attractions, and in expeditions not to find gold or ivory, but to explore regions of eternal ice and silence solely for the increase of knowledge Captain HALL, indeed, "subdue the earth," and extort all its closest secrets.

The beautiful engravings which we published last week of the four famous trotters, "Lady THORNE," "Goldsmith Maid," "American Girl," and the "Mountain Boy," have excited great interest among the frequenters of the course. The first of these fine pictures were from photographs by SCHREIBER & SON, animal photographers, of Philadelphia, to whose courtesy we have been indebted for many valuable favors.

Apropos of the Judiciary article in the new State Constitution, Mr. TILDEN said at the Democratic Convention that "men of stainless integrity, unquestioned ability and learning," were nominated, who will stand "grandly erect, and prove to the people the purpose of the Democracy to restore the judiciary to the bench." Did Mr. TILDEN serenely mean Judge M'CUNN?

Messrs. Oliver Ditson & Co. have purchased at a cost of over $100,000 the entire collection of musical works, upward of seventy in number, hitherto published by Messrs Boosheys. The catalogue includes, among other well-known books, the popular "Mason and Hoadley Piano Method," "Mason's Musical Organ Instructor," "Carmina Sacra," "Jubilee," etc. We are informed that this addition to the list of publications by Messrs. Ditson & Co. makes it equal in extent and value to that of all other publishers in the United States combined.

History and poetry celebrate no sublimer act of devotion than that of Albert G. Dreckbe, the watchman of the Passaic River drawbridge, on the New York and Newark railroad. The train was about due, he was closing the draw when his little child fell into the deep water. It would have been easy enough to rescue him if the father could take the time, but already the thundering train was at hand. It was a cruel agony. His child could be saved only at the cost of other lives committed to his care. The brave man did his duty, but his child was drowned. The pass at Thermopylæ was not more heroically kept. Sir PHILIP SIDNEY giving the cup of cold water to the dying soldier is not a nobler figure than that of ALBERT G. DRECKER keeping the Passaic bridge.

THE DRAW-BRIDGE KEEPER.

Drecker, a draw-bridge keeper, opened wide
The dangerous gate to let the vessel through;
His little boy was standing by the side,
Above Passaic River deep and blue.
While he the chains was moving in a moan of pain,
Was heard the whistle of the coming train.

At once brave Drecker worked to swing it back,
The gate-like bridge that seems a gate of death;
Nearer and nearer, on the slender track,
Came the swift engine, puffing its white breath.
Then, with a shriek, the loving father saw
His darling boy fall headlong from the draw.

Either at once down in the stream to spring
And save his son, and let the living freight
Rush on to death, or to his work to cling,
And leave his boy unhelped to meet his fate,
Which should he do? Were you as he was tried,
Could not your love outweigh all else beside?

And yet the child to him was full as dear
As yours may be to you—the light of eyes,
A presence like a brighter atmosphere,
A household star that shone in home's mild skies—
Yet side by side with duty stern and grim,
Each like child's love, was planted in him.

For Drecker, being great of soul and true,
Held to his work, and did not aid his boy,
Who in the dark, dark water sank from view.
Then from the father's life went forth all joy;
But as he felt the buck pulsh with his feet
Across the bridge in safety passed the train.

And yet the man was poor, and in his breast
Flowed no ancestral blood of king or lord;
True greatness was not his. Rich men, ye
To win from men just honor and reward;
Nobility is not of rank, but duty,
And is laborn and common in our kind.

He is most noble whose humanity
Is most complete. To be just and good
The birth-right of the lowest born may be.
Pray what we are, we are not responsible
And, rich or poor, or famous or unknown,
True hearts are noble, and true hearts alone.

HENRY ABBEY.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CUBAN EXPEDITIONS.

American sympathy with the Cuban cause has been shown more strongly than heretofore by the number of expeditions which Spanish Street can find power legislation for the aid of the Cubans. A telegram received in the city from Key West on Sunday, October 3, informs us that the expedition which a short time since left Key West in the Lafayette was safe for ports in safety and arrived off the Florida coast, where the Alabama and the Virginius and Tenere, having 600 men, 10,000 rifles, 500 sabres, and 28 pieces of artillery on board. The Alabama was in command of Gen. Rios, also informed that another expedition on a fourth steamer was being organized by General Quesada and Gen. Magruder. The entire force was expected to concentrate in the mountainous windward of the Cuban coast. The military expeditions will be protected probably by the Cuba, of which we shall hear more before the end. It is stated that 5000 American volunteers for Cuba are still in depôt along our Gulf coast.

NEWS ITEMS.

The New York State Republican Convention met at Saratoga on September 29. Governor FENTON was nominated for Secretary of State, but has since declined.

The Public Debt statement for October 1 shows a decrease during September of seven and one-half millions.

The annual meeting occurred at the State Fair at Indianapolis, Indiana, October 1. A steam boiler attached to the fire-engine exploded, killing three, wounding 28 persons, and more or less severely wounding 100 spectators. Governor Baker narrowly escaped death, and his coachman was seriously injured.

Horace Greeley, famous Western newspaper, died September 28. He was owned by Major B. G. Thomas, of Lexington, Kentucky. He was three and a half years old. His dam was "Dixie." Last spring, on the Kentucky Association track, he was made to trot 1.43½, said to be the best time ever made in this country.

The Yale-Harvard boat-race occurred on October 6, against the "American Girl," "Goldsmith Maid," "Lady Thorne," "Mountain Palmer," winning by three straight heats.

Over 300,000 immigrants arrived in this country during the year ending with June.

FOREIGN NEWS.

A commission of fifteen Deputies to the Cortes has been charged with the duty of reporting on the various candidates for the throne of Spain.

Reports from Madrid represent that the republican movement in Catalonia is gaining strength, and is to deceive the hopes of its instigators. In the mean time the Carlists are making occasion of the interruption of telegraphic communication between Madrid and the frontiers to spread false reports of which their revolutionary movement is apprehended.

Prince Bismarck has not withdrawn his note concerning Cuba. That letter has certainly had one good result in influencing the British Government to adopt a more humane policy toward the Cubans.

The Queen was host by the fall of the bridge at Kœnigsberg, Prussia, during the festival in honor of the King on the night of September 27.

The Slave Canal is practically open, water having been admitted, removing the barrier from Bitter Lake, and a steamer has passed through the canal from Suez to the Bitter Lake in safety.

The French Senate and Corps Legislatif have been prorogued to November 18.

Prince Napoleon has written a letter to Colonel Rossel, Chairman of the Socialist Democratic Meeting in London, thanking them for their address congratulating him on his liberal speech in the Senate. The Prince remains them of the bonds which have always united France and America, and continues: "For the present position bears resemblance to that at the close of the last century. France seeks to found a liberal democracy at the moment when America emerges from a great crisis, after the destruction of slavery, which dishonored the Republic. The moral force of the American people, both in the end to the same. Constitutional liberty established in Europe will place the political sentiments of France and America in as complete accord as their interests."

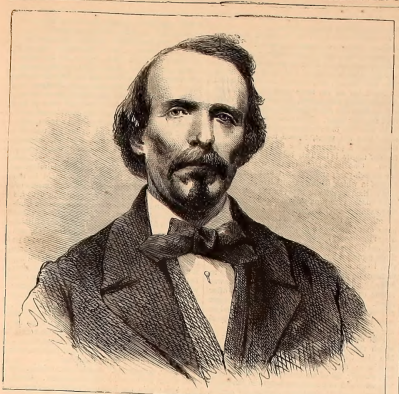
N. Y. GOLD ROOM AND STOCK BOARD.

WE gave last week a record of the fluctuations of the New York gold market during the memorable 24th of September. Those fluctuations were not paralleled during the war period. No such scene as that presented in the Gold Room on the 24th has been witnessed since the JAY COOKE and CHASE panic of May, 1864.

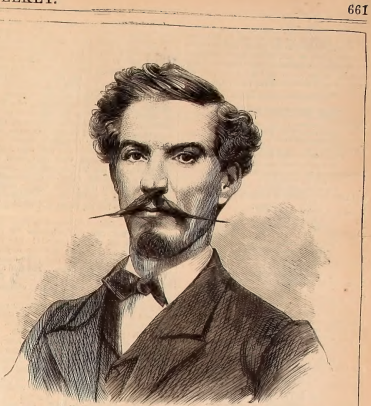
The Bulls when they met that morning were confident. Some of them boasted that they could carry gold up to 200. Much of this confidence was due to the fact that the Bulls felt secure as to any interference on the part of Secretary BOUTWELL. So they blew up their bubble; they carried gold up to 162½, which point it reached at thirty-six minutes past eleven o'clock A.M. Among the prominent operators were ALBERT SPETER, HENRY CLEWS, HORACE WALDO and his brother, Mr. COLGATE, of the firm of TREVOR & COLGATE, Messrs. KIMBER & HELSER, and fifty others. In order to bring before the reader's mind the scene of this exciting conflict between the Bulls and Bears—namely, the New York Gold Room—let him imagine a hippothetron, with a little fountain in the centre. The centre of the fountain is a bronze Cupid with a dolphin in its arms. From the head of Cupid arises a tiny silver stream, which falls in jets into the basin below. Fancy an iron railing ninety feet in circumference about this basin, then a space of some twenty feet between the walls and the fountain, and you have a rough idea of the Gold Room. On one side there are two galleries—the lower for the errand boys, and the upper for the spectators. Beyond the fountain, with his back toward New Street, stands the Secretary, recording the sales which he catches by his ear. Near him is the telegraph operator. Wires run from his machine to nearly five hundred brokers' offices, who are thus instantly informed of the state of the market, and are enabled to make their bids undisturbed by the furious excitement which rules in the Gold Room on important occasions.

THE NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE BOARD IN SESSION, SEPTEMBER 25, 1869.

SCENE IN THE GOLD ROOM, NEW YORK CITY, DURING THE INTENSE EXCITEMENT OF FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1869.



GEN. CARLOS MANUEL CESPEDES, PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA.—[See Page 663.]



GEN. MANUEL QUESADA, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE CUBAN ARMY.—[See Page 663.]

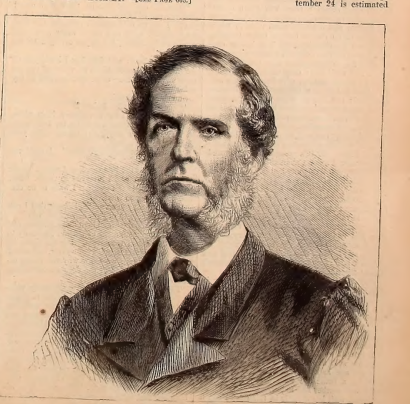
Well, as we have said, at 11.56 A.M. the Bulls were triumphant. The Bears were nowhere. In one hour and thirty-six minutes gold had sprung from 150 to 162½—12½ per cent. The scene in the Gold Room at this point baffles description. It was a scene of furious, raving, shrieking tumult. Then there was a wavering among the Bulls. A rumor had reached the Gold Room that Secretary BOUTWELL would positively sell $4,000,000 of gold that same day. In twenty minutes gold went down to 140. But three minutes after (11.59 A.M.) it was up again to 160. From that point it went down steadily until the close of the session, at 3 o'clock P.M., when it stood 133½.

On the 25th the excitement which had ruled in the Gold Room on the previous day was transferred to the Stock Board. We give on page 660 a picture representing the scene during the session of the Stock Board on the 25th. It is said that one hundred and fifty of the operators in the Gold Room are also members of the Stock Board. The confusion, therefore, produced in the latter by the operations of the 24th may be readily imagined.

An idea may be formed of the immense business of Friday, the day of the great panic, by a perusal of the following telegraphic statistics. On that day the Franklin Telegraph sent 5000 messages; the Bankers' and Brokers', 2232; the office of the Western Union Telegraph Company at the Gold Room, 900; the office of the same line at 21 Wall Street, 800; and the main line, about 5000. More than four-fifths of this number were quotations of gold. It is stated that under the pressure the wires of the telegraph in the Gold Room were melted. The entire amount of gold sold in Wall Street September 24 is estimated nt $500,000,000. This amount, upon a rough estimate, allowing sixteen dollars to an ounce, and sixteen ounces to the pound, and two thousand pounds to the ton, and one ton to each cart, would require a thousand carts to move it; and allowing twenty feet to each horse and cart, the string of carts would be about eight miles long.

THE FIRST CUBAN MAN-OF-WAR, THE "CUBA," FORMERLY THE "HORNET."—[See Page 663.]

GEN. FREDERICO F. CABADA, COMMANDING DISTRICT OF LAS VILLAS.—[See Page 663.]



GENERAL JUAN G. DIAZ DE VILLEGAS.—[See Page 663.]

THE RIPPLES' REQUEST.

Tunow us a sunbeam to play with!
We'll break it and sliver it,
Shake it and stir it,
All to the tune that the soon-breeses sing.
The wild rose that blushes
Mid green stalks and reeds
The sky-gazing lily our coming that fears,
In vain to catch it;
We waters will snatch it,
And break it in sparkles of diamonds and tears.

Throw us a bough to play with!
We'll twist it and twirl it,
And spin it and whirl it,
Giddily toss it and float it along.
Vainly it cleaves
To the half-drowning leaves
That stoop'd from the banks and are prisoners too:
Green seeds can not save it.
The breeze pluck'd and gave it
To us, and we'll play with it all the day through.

Sad——ch, send us a moonbeam!
No longer we'll play.
But quiet, so quiet,
Deep skies we will begin, lest it leave us again;
For the silvery beam
Loves to lie on the stream,
And to stir not but dream, while the night-breezes sigh;
And we scarce dare to creep
Round its silvery,
For fear it should hide once again in the sky.

A LOVER'S LEAP.

By the Author of "Carpenters' New York."

In one of the northern counties of New York which innovation and progress have not touched, or which, to quote a famous phrase of Grattan's, "modern improvement has failed to reach," is a queer, quaint, mouldy-looking little old church or chapel. How old it is, unskilled in the archæology of the region, have no means of knowing; but I should think it might well have echoed to the heavy tread of stout Peter Stuyvesant; for the region which now nearly gird it round are themselves ancient of days—almost medieval for a place like New York; and yet they have not grown up gradually from it, since the building of this church or chapel, nay this is evident, because it is so far ground that no mortal has failed to reach, is a queer, quaint, mouldy-looking little old church or chapel. How old it is, unskilled in the archæology of the region, have no means of knowing; but I should think it might well have echoed to the heavy tread of stout Peter Stuyvesant; for the region which now nearly girdles

"And few out of the window there, like a bird, I suppose," replied Chairon, grimly. "Rosebery, you have been drinking, or your jealousy has taken away your wits. Only that I can make allowance for a disappointed man like you I would make you suffer for this. Go down stairs and get away, you fool! I was a greater fool still for paying any attention to your story. Take your dime romance tales somewhere else next time."

Rosebery descended, silent and sullen, and went his way, still determined, some time or other, to convict the lovers and establish his own justification. Old Chairon said not a word on the subject to his daughter, but was very kind and tender to her all the evening. For her part, she felt deep compunction, and only waited until her next meeting with her lover to declare to him that she would keep the secret no longer.

Her time of trial was nearly over. Two days after, a handsome, very gentlemanly young man came into old Chairon's room, and told him he had come to ask for his daughter in marriage.

"I belong to a family one member of which did you a great wrong, Mr. Chairon," he said, gravely; "but I am glad to be able to tell you that he has to the best of his power endeavored to repair it. You will hear within a few days from your daughter Alice. She is now Mrs. Edward Dallas, and is the wife of my brother. I am Robert Dallas—your daughter's sister and I have long loved each other; but until the wrong done to you had been repaired we did not venture to ask you to consent to our marriage. My brother has a good heart, and some feeling of conscience and honor, and he is repentant, and will do his best to make one of your daughters happy. Give me the other."

Needless to say that Robert Dallas was accepted and welcomed.

"Then you were in the church that night?" old Chairon said, with twinkling eye.

"That night, and other nights—for it is quite a romantic story, I assure you. I was the carpenter in the room yonder—I hired the room for the purpose. I always had a taste for amateur carpentering. I planned the pole and beam machinery."

"But how did you escape that night? Rosebery swore he took away the beam and shut the window."

"Just a little venture, and a leap across a few feet of space and through some panes of glass. But we mustn't tell Elsie of that—for the present, at least. It would alarm my mother, perhaps. When the whole affair has faded into a little distance, I will venture some night to amuse her with this odd story of a lover's leap."

THE CUBAN REVOLUTION.

WE give this week, on page 661, portraits of the most prominent leaders of the Cuban revolution, which we have obtained through the courtesy of the officers of the Cuban Junta in this city. The officers of the Junta, believing that many of our readers may desire to obtain photographic likenesses of Republican statesmen and of General QUESADA, the Cuban Commander-in-Chief, have made arrangements to furnish such pictures, upon application at their office at No. 71 Broadway. The proceeds from the sale of these interesting photographs will be devoted to the alleviation of the sufferings of the sick and wounded soldiers of the patriot Cuban armies.

CARLOS MANUEL DE CESPEDES was born in HAVANA, April 18, 1819. His parents were JOSÉ MARIA DE CESPEDES and FRANCISCA DE BORJA LOPES DEL CASTILLO, both belonging to most respected and honorable families of that city.

CARLOS MANUEL passed his boyhood in the country, where he breathed in from the exhilarating air of the mountains an ardent love for liberty. Afterward he entered a convent, where he studied Latin and belles-lettres, remaining there till he attained the age of fifteen; he then went to HAVANA with the intention of studying law in the University, and completed the course, graduating in 1839, having passed a brilliant examination.

Now a lawyer, with the degree of Bachelor, he returned to BAYAMO, and married MARIA DEL CARMEN CESPEDES, who died very recently.

In 1840 he sailed for Europe, and resided for some time at Barcelona. Here he made the necessary studies for the grade of a licenciado of the law, which he obtained in 1842.

He improved every occasion to defend Cuba against the attacks which were made by Spaniards, and also formed a close intimacy with General PRIM, taking an active part in the republican conspiracy which that distinguished man had incited. He was on this account banished to France by the Spanish Government. In 1844 he came to America, and fixed his residence at BAYAMO, his native city. He obtained there great reputation as a lawyer, cultivated literature, and acquired a considerable fortune. In 1852 he was arrested in BAYAMO because of a demonstration which he had made at a banquet in favor of Cuban independence. From the prison of BAYAMO he was sent to MORRO CASTLE, in Santiago de Cuba, where he was held for five months.

In 1867, and during the early part of 1868, he suffered new persecutions from the government, and, escaping as he best could, he came over to devote himself to the cause of his country with great earnestness, attending Masonic associations and assisting at revolutionary juntas, which were commenced in July of 1868, in which he always declared himself firmly for the independence of Cuba and its emancipation from the Spanish rule. He was also an advocate of negro emancipation.

The discontent of the country increasing, the result was new attempts for reform in the system of taxation, which was as ruinous as it was unjust, under LERSUNDI's government. These attempts, with other influences, in the end brought about the revolution.

On the 8th of October the patriots began to assemble in the mill "Demajagua" of CESPEDES; and, with him at the head, five hundred patriots, on the evening of the 10th, swore allegiance to the flag of liberty.

The first encounter with the Spanish troops was at YARA. The revolutionary column, numbering one thousand, marched to BARRANCAS, which was taken on the 11th; and on the 17th they advanced upon BAYAMO.

Here the number of patriots was increased to three thousand men, and after three days of siege and combat the garrison of the town was obliged to capitulate.

At this decisive moment CESPEDES desired to perform a great act of justice. He granted absolute and unconditional liberty to all his slaves, and took with him in his march all that wished to accompany him. From this time CESPEDES has been at the head of the Cuban revolution, exhibiting the greatest patriotism, and encouraging all selfish aggrandizement. To-day he is President of the Republic of Cuba, and history will register his name among those of the great benefactors of humanity.

General MANUEL QUESADA was born in the city of Camaguey on the 29th of March, 1830, and belonged to one of the principal families of that city. He emigrated, when very young, to Mexico, impelled by the love of adventure.

Inclining to a military life, he entered the service of the Republic in 1846, and was always distinguished for his valor and intelligence. It is not necessary to say that he embraced the Liberal cause, fighting first for Don PABLO BASCONUEVA, and always leagued against the Emperor MAXIMILIAN.

As chief of a column he obtained very brilliant triumphs, and in battles with the French he had the glory of defeating them successively at ICOTIN, Tepeque del Oro, Jaleapa, Orizaba, Alpahuil, Paso Martino, Pesmelucan, and in several other actions, among which figure the memorable battles of the 5th of May, 1862, at Puebla and at Estachuca, where he was honored with the rank of General.

His most brilliant victory was that of Palo-Gacho at Vera Cruz, where he routed a large force of African Cazadores and other cavalry with a small infantry force. Also at Alpahuil, a pan that he attained to the rank of Colonel, and soon after to that of General, for his gallant conduct. The battle of Alpahuil was the first which took place between the Mexican and French troops, and this was soon followed by that of the Cruzay he took at Tepeque.

General QUESADA received medals of honor for the 5th of May and for Puebla, and was selected to fill high official posts, among others that of Governor of the States of Hiascala, Cuadhuila, and Durango.

In 1865 General QUESADA came to New York, where he has devoted himself exclusively to the cause of liberty for his country, and has labored incessantly for that object, exciting in the Cuban patriots an enthusiastic desire to strike a death-blow to the oppressors of the Cuban island. Five months before the heroic President of the Cuban Junta gave the cry for independence in YARA, General QUESADA did the same, escaping, accompanied by the distinguished patriot PABLO PEREZ, they having gone thither for the purpose of organizing the insurrection, and providing for any deficiency in their military resources. He afterward proceeded to NASSAU, from which place he superintended the insurrection of YARA.

He was enabled to collect resources there for the purchase of some thousands of arms; and with these and a number of distinguished patriots of the Sociedad Habanero he embarked in a small vessel, in the midst of a violent storm, on the 22d of DECEMBER, 1868. He succeeded in reaching the port of Guanaia, and disembarked the 27th of the same month, in spite of the fury of the elements and the fire of a small Spanish fort.

General QUESADA did not aspire to any command in Cuba, but the Court of Camaguey named him General-in-Chief of the troops of Comarca; and account of his brilliant organization of the army, and his great services to his country, he was named by the Congress, or Junta, General-in-Chief of the army of the republic, and finally taking part in the battle of Gettysburg. Taken prisoner in that battle, with a part of the regiment that he was commanding as the capacity of Lieutenant-Colonel, he was with General GRAHAM, under whose orders he was serving, carried to the Libby Prison in Richmond, where he remained confined for nine months, suffering the greatest distress and privation. While there he wrote, at the suggestion of his companions in misfortune, a little book, entitled "Libby Life," which he afterward published, and was received with great favor. After having been exchanged, and notwithstanding his feeble health, he accepted the position and performed the duties of Adjutant-General on the staff of General BURNEY; but on account of his sickness, which increased during the campaign against Richmond, he was compelled to give up the service.

Returning to his native country he was appointed by the Cuban Junta Commissioner to the American Consulate at Trinidad, which position he held from his nomination up to the outbreak of the Cuban revolution, the cause of which he ardently embraced. His position in society and his domestic happiness were sacrificed by CABAÑAS at the call of duty; and, leading the uprising in the Cinco Villas district, he began the series of arduous operations which have caused the largest portion in the Central Department of Cuba to be rescued from Spanish tyranny. Major-General CABAÑAS is actually the Commander-in-Chief of the Cinco Villas army, by official appointment of the republican government of Cuba.

JUAN M. DE LA CAMARA Y CESPEDES, a son of Cuban parents, and belonging to a respectable family, was born in Havana on the 24th of June, 1827. He lost his father at a very early age. His education commenced in his native city: but later he came to New York, and entered the college of Mr. PRUNET. On account of the circumstances of his family, he remained but a short time in this institution, and returned while yet young to Havana. There he found himself his own master; and it being very difficult for him to pursue a literary profession, he devoted his attention to the management of his estate in the country, and became a skillful planter. At twenty years of age he married, in Cienfuegos, his cousin, the daughter of his uncle, JOSÉ GREGORIO DIAZ DE VILLEGAS, a distinguished and worthy lawyer, whose landed property he managed until 1846. At that time the conspiracy of General NARCISO LOPEZ was betrayed by one of the conspirators. In that plot VILLEGAS was engaged, as were also his father-in-law and his oldest brother, FRANCISCO. These two, although convicted, were imprisoned, and suffered the most cruel treatment: at the hands of the Spanish Government, being confined for eight months in the dark and filthy dungeons. VILLEGAS escaped by reason of his being at the time in HAVANA.

On the failure of the LOPEZ conspiracy VILLEGAS returned to his rural occupations, but always cherished a lively hope for the deliverance of his country from the tyranny of Spain. The glorious outbreak of YARA, therefore, found his patriotic feelings ready to be awakened. VILLEGAS immediately repaired to aid that outbreak by a revolt in Cienfuegos, and he devoted all his attention to the securing of men and the accumulation of arms for the purpose. As he enlisted the general sympathies of his countrymen, these hastened in great numbers to compromise themselves in the movement, choosing him as their chief; but the want of arms, unfortunately, prevented his profiting by the services of all. VILLEGAS was compelled to act in this dangerous work of preparation; but at last it became impossible longer to conceal his operations, and on the 7th of February he took the field, leading a band of patriots, badly armed, but devoted to the cause. Their arms consisted of pikes, machetes, pistols, and shot-guns.

VILLEGAS left his son LEOPOLD in the city, ordering him to accompany his mother and sister but the young man, desirous of serving his country in the field, disobeying his father's orders, abandoned the city and presented himself at his father's head-quarters, saying to him, "Though I am obliged to obey your orders as a father, you can not compel me to serve my country as a soldier; and I ask of you a place as private in the ranks of the Liberating Army." Such a reply as this young man prove that he was a true soldier of a noble cause; he distinguished himself highly for his courage and intelligence.

JUAN DIAZ DE VILLEGAS is to-day one of the most distinguished chieftains of the Cinco Villas army, and it is hoped that through his courageous efforts this part of Cuba will soon be completely free from Spanish thralldom.

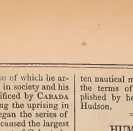
On the same page with the portraits of these illustrious Cubans we give a representation of the first Cuban man-of-war, the Cubo, formerly the Hornet. She is now fairly at sea, flying the Cuban flag, having a full crew and a heavy armament prepared to make war upon Spanish commerce.

The history of this smart blockade-runner during the last two months has been an exciting one, from the time she left the yard of REANEY, NEAFIE, & CO., at Kensington, until she completed her equipment as an armed privateer during the last few days. She has slipped successively through the fingers of the customs and revenue officers of Philadelphia, the authorities of Halifax, and of the port of New York; has shipped her guns, munitions, coal, arms, and ammunition within a short distance of the latter port; and is now at sea, and likely to do no little damage among the Spanish steamer and sailing marine.

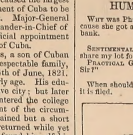
The armament of the Cubo consists of three 60-pound Parrotts, two 30-pound Parrotts, two 24-pound brass howitzers, forty or fifty copper torpedoes, ten tons of powder, and a large quantity of shot and shell, besides small arms.

The Cubo left the port of September the 4th, and on the 7th of September the Cubo hoisted the Cuban flag, and disclosed her true character. She is commanded by Captain HIGGINS, formerly of the United States Navy. She is a very fast vessel, and her only immediate trouble is likely to arise from a short supply of coal. In our news columns will be found an account of the recent expeditions which have been fitted out for the aid of the Cuban patriots.

We give on page 668 an illustration of one of the Spanish gun-boats which, as our readers will remember, was ordered to be seized by our Secretary of the Navy a few weeks since. These boats receive their hull at Mystic, Connecticut, but with this exception they have been constructed at the Delamater Iron Works of this city. Our illustration shows the first one of these boats that has been completed on her trial trip up the Hudson. She is a very snug little propeller, modeled somewhat after the old Savannah and Charleston line of steamers—a miniature Huntsville, in fact. She measures 105 feet on the keel, is fore-and-aft-schooner rigged, and carries an engine of 150-horse power. She has accommodations for a crew of forty men all told, and will carry a 100-pound Parrott gun. She can steam ten nautical miles an hour, the speed obliged by the terms of the contract, and easily accomplished by her on her recent trial-trip up the Hudson.



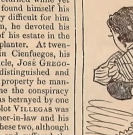
Sheridan's Dance.



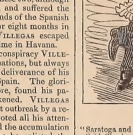
"Sorstegs and Long Branch—you have seen them," Said Charley one morning to Zoe;
"Pray tell me the difference between them,
For bother my wig if I know."
Quoth Zoe, "'Tis the easiest matter
At once to distinguish the two—
At the one you go into the water,
At the other it goes into you!"

A Louisville matron, whose husband snores badly, keeps a clothes' pin underneath her pillow, and when his snoring awakes her she adjusts the pin on his nasal organ, and then slumbers peacefully.

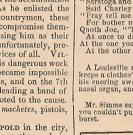
Mr. Simms says if it wasn't for the hole in the hoop you couldn't put it on the barrel, and the barrel would burst.



Gold at 160.



$160.00



Gold at 130.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WIFE was PHARAOH's daughter like a broker?—Because she got a little profit from the rushes on the bank.

SENTIMENTAL YOUTH. "My dear Maria, will you consent to be the partner of my joys and sorrows?" PRACTICAL GIRL. "How many acres in your lot, Sir?"

When should a newspaper be the sharpest?—When it is filed.

HUMOROUS.

WHY was Pharaoh's daughter like a broker?—Because she got a little profit from the rushes on the bank.

SENTIMENTAL YOUTH. "My dear Maria, will you consent to be the partner of my joys and sorrows?" PRACTICAL GIRL. "How many acres in your lot, Sir?"

When should a newspaper be the sharpest?—When it is filed.

"SOMETHING NEW."—[DRAWN BY CHARLES G. BUSH.]

BYRON, THE FORBIDDEN.

THE DAYS THAT ARE NO MORE.

Oh, memories of green and pleasant places,
Where happy birds their sweet notes twittered low!
Oh, love that lit the dear familiar faces
We buried long ago!

From barren heights their sweetness we remember,
And backward gaze with wistful yearning eyes,
As hearts regret 'mid snow-drifts of December
The summer's sunny skies.

Glad hours that seemed their rainbow tints to borrow
From some illumined page of fairy love;
Bright days that never lacked a bright to-morrow;
Days that return no more.

Safe gardens with their many-blossomed alleys,
And red-ripe roses breathing out perfume;
Dim violet nooks in green sequestered valleys,
Empurpled at the gloom.

Sunsets that lighted up the brown-leaved beeches,
Turning their dusky glooms to shimmering gold;
Moonlight that on the rover's fern-fringed reaches
Streamed, white-rayed, silvery cold.

O'er moorlands bleak we wander weary-hearted,
Through many a tangled will and thorny maze,
Remembering as in dreams the days departed,
The by-gone happy days.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In the Books.—Book I.

CHAPTER XIII.

JOE DOWSETT'S NEWS.

It was not far from ten o'clock when Joe Dowsett returned from Shipley Magna. He was in consequence an excellent servant, but he had his failings—among which might be reckoned an inability to resist strong liquor when proffered gratuitously. During twenty years Joe had not been known to be drunk at his own expense. But a visit to the Crown at Shipley Magna, where he was an old crony and customer of the head hostler, was pretty sure to result in Joe's partial inebriation.

On the present occasion he had ridden to Shipley and back on the old pony, the sole beast of burden belonging to the vicar. And Joe had presented the enormous amount of time occupied in the journey to his own remarkable humanity to the pony.

"Mustn't press him hard, the old beast," said Joe on his return, standing before the kitchen fire, the heat of which caused his wet clothes to steam again.

"No fear of you pressing him hard to come away from the Crown," retorted Joanna. "I advise you to get to your bed, and take off them damp things. Else you'll be getting a fever, or the rheumatics, or something. Only," she added, under her breath—"only we know there's a special providence for certain folks: and I'm sure you're one on 'em this night, Joe Dowsett."

"All right, Jo-anna. I feel pretty comfortable, thank 'ee. No; mustn't press the old pony. The merciful man is merciful to his beast."

At this moment Catherine came back from the sitting-room, whither she had been, according to orders, to give her master the tidings of Joe's return.

"Master's fine and vexed," she said, "at Joe being so late. He said he wanted to send Joe to fetch home Mrs. Veronica if he had come at any reasonable hour. But now it's too late."

"Why was he unwilling to let her stay at Mrs. Plew's?" asked Joanna.

"Oh, I don't know. Miss Veronica has staid there before. But the vicar said as he'd have gone to fetch her himself, only it's windy and night, and been getting worse and worse since sundown. I think master feels lonely without being used to Sir John's company. And then both the young ladies being away the first evening and all —it's much for him to bear. He says he shall go to bed, and you're to send him up a slice of dry toast and a glass of negus, with not too much brandy in it."

"Negus ain't a bad thing," observed Joe Dowsett.

"You go to your bed, Joe, for merry's sake!" cried the old woman, impatiently. "Don't stand a steaming there like a copper on washing day."

"I feel pretty comfortable, Jo-anna. I'm a friend of yours at the Crown this evening—Mr. Paul."

"Paul at the Crown!" exclaimed Catherine.

"Yes, Paul at the Crown. He pretended not to see me, and skulked through the tap-room like a rat, but I'm a gentleman. I say no thing against Sir John. But Paul—Paul's a sneak."

"Don't you talk nonsense. Paul never did you no harm," said Joanna. "And I don't believe you was at all to-night."

"You don't believe—?"

"No, I don't. Him and his master was to dinner at Danecester last night, and go off by an early train this morning. It ain't likely as Paul should be at the Crown at Shipley Magna all alone. You must have took somebody else with him. Paul would have spoke to you if it had been him. Why shouldn't he?"

Joe turned on her with crushing severity.

"P'raps you'll say I was drunk next, Jo-anna!"

"O Lord, no, I' shan't say so. Maybe you were dreaming. But never mind now. Go to bed; there's a good man."

It proved very difficult indeed to induce Joe to go to bed, however. He protested over and over again that he felt pretty comfortable. Then he required Joanna and Catherine to declare solemnly that they believed his statement about having seen Paul; which, finding it hopeless to get him to go to bed on any other terms, they unscrupulously did. Then he very unexpectedly declared that he and Paul had lived together like brothers; that there was no one for whom he felt a warmer regard; and that Paul's cold and unkind behavior had cut him to the heart. At last, by dint of scolding and coaxing, he was got to his own room, the door of which Joanna shut, with a fervent prayer that they might not all be burned in their beds, and with a gleam of comfort in the knowledge that the end of a candle intrusted to Joe would not be above five minutes.

"Ain't it queer, Joe taking that notion about seeing Paul?" said Catherine, when she and Joanna were alone together. "Do you think it could ha' been—could he have been drinking? Do folk call it when a man sees a ghost walks before they're dead, as a kind of a warning? Like that story you tell of the elder sister, and the tired lover's maid Jane. Oh, I know—a fetch. That's the name. Do you think it could ha' been Paul's fetch?"

"Pooh, child! Servants don't have no fetches. Them kind of things only belongs to great families. Don't you go scaring your wits with such fancies, or I shall never tell you no more of my stories."

"But," persisted the girl, "Joe said that the figure passed through the room very quick and silent, and with its head turned away, and—"

"Well, it was like turned away how was Joe to know who it was? It's just a drunken man's fancy, I tell you. Go to your bed. It's nigh upon eleven, and I have to see to the fastenings of the doors. Good-night. When Joe's sober to-morrow he will tell another story, I warrant."

But the next morning Joe told no other story. On the contrary, he persisted in his former statement, and could produce no proof which it was impossible to doubt. He had remarked Paul's presence at the Crown to his landlord's great surprise, and the hostler had said, yes; he knew him well enough. He was the foreign servant of that Mr. Levincourt who was staying at Danecester, and had put up at the Crown for his hunting quarters. But in reply to a question as to what Paul had come for, the hostler had professed ignorance. It might be to fetch some traps of his master's. The hostler believed that Paul had been a gentleman's servant himself at that kind left in the landlord's care. Paul had brought a fly from the hotel at Danecester, and had to fly back in it. (So the hostler) supposed that he had to carry luggage.

"But why Paul shouldn't speak to me I don't know, nor I don't much care," said Joe, the memory whose feelings toward his dear friend had come down to their ordinary level of stolid indifference since the influence of the liquor had worn off—"but Joe Dowsett was a reflection on the rest of the vicar's household."

About eleven o'clock in the forenoon Maud arrived from Lowater. Captain Sheardown had driven her to Shipley, and had left her at the vicarage viewing without slighting himself, purposing to proceed to Haymoor.

"Where is Veronica?" was Maud's first question to her guardian.

"Veronica has displeased me very much," answered the vicar. "She went to dine with Colonel Mrs. Plew, and chose to remain there all night, although she knows—or might know if she had any sense—that whatever else she may have learned, she has not learned good manners. Her sentiments on any subject whatever—that I object to her putting herself under any obligation of that kind to the Plews."

Maud looked grave, but said, sweetly, "Please don't be very angry with her, Uncle Charles. It was a dreadful night last night. Perhaps she was afraid of the walk home."

"She was assuredly not afraid of incurring the displeasure of whatever else she may have feared," said the vicar.

Maud made no further direct effort to avert her guardian's displeasure, but she took the most effectual means of putting him into a good-humor, by gayly chatting about all the little incidents of her visit to Lowater, the concert at Danecester, and the people who had been to the house.

She was in the midst of her talk, sitting, still with her hat in her hand, in the vicar's study, when the door of the room was opened with a little way, and a voice cried: "Miss Maud! Miss Maud! Would ye please step here a moment?"

The voice was Joanna's; but so shrill and muffled in its tone that an unreasoning apprehension of impending evil fell upon Maud's heart.

She sprang up, and forcing a smile, said: "Uncle Charles, I must go for an instant to say a word to Joanna. I'll be back as soon as possible. The dear old woman has some mighty mystery on hand."

She closed the study door with an instinctive care, for which she could never afterward account, and faced a countenance which seemed, like Medusa's head, to turn her into stone.

The countenance was Joanna's. But so changed, ghastly, and aged was it that Maud would hardly, under other circumstances, have recognized the familiar features.

"Is it the master, Joanna?" she asked, in quick, low tones, whose firmness surprised herself.

"My dear Maudie," answered the trembling old woman, "my sweet young lady, don't ye lose your head. It's all we've got to depend on! I feel my years now as I never felt 'em before."

Maud made a silent, eloquent gesture of impatience.

"Yes, I will speak, deary. Mr.—Mr. Plew's here. He looked in by—by—chance like. And —O Lord be merciful to us, and spare us!—he says, Miss Veronica is not at his mother's, and what's more, hasn't been there all night. And what to do, or what to say, or what will become of the vicar, I don't know!"

"Hush! Where is Mr. Plew? Take me to him. There is some mistake, some misunderstanding. No harm can have happened to Veronica, here, in her own home, among her own people! It is impossible!"

"Oh, my deary, Mr. Plew is more like a mad creature than anything else. And as to harm—My innocent young lady, it goes to my heart to hurt you, but I'm afraid—I'm sore afraid—"

"Of what?"

The old woman made no answer, but moaned and wrung her hands.

A dreadful superstition took hold of Maud that Mr. Plew had brought some fatal and decisive tidings; that Veronica was dead, and that the old servant was endeavoring to break the news to her. Collecting her senses as well as she could, she bade Joanna take her to Mr. Plew at once, and let her know the worst.

Joanna pointed to the door of the dining-parlor, and Maud sprang into the room.

CHAPTER XIV.

PLED.

JOANNA had not much exaggerated in saying that Mr. Plew was more like a madman than any thing else." He did seem to have nearly lost his senses.

"Oh, Miss Desmond!" he cried, as soon as he caught sight of Maud, and then stood dumb with clasped hands.

"Please to tell me at once," he said in earnest, indeed it will! Is she dead?"

The utterance of the word seemed to force a gush of tears into the man's eyes, but she struggled hard to command herself.

The little surgeon recovered some spark of manhood and self-control in sight of the young girl's piteous, innocent face. His professional helpfulness came to his aid, and took him away from the contemplation of his own distress.

"Don't try too violently to force back your tears," he said. "Let them come. You will not let them master you. No: I do not think Veronica is dead. No, on my honor. I would not deceive you."

"What is it then? Is she ill? Has there been any accident? Is she in danger?"

"I wish to Heaven, miss Desmond, that I could answer all your questions. All I know is, that Miss Levincourt did not sleep at my mother's house last night—did not even go there at all—and yet I was told and have by the boy that she meant to do so."

"But the boy may have mistaken her message. She may have said that she was going elsewhere. Have you asked? Have you inquired in the village? Joanna's face and—and yours have infected me with terror. But I can not—I can not—believe that there is any real danger! Can there?"

"Alarm!" echoed the voice of Mr. Levincourt, and the next instant he stood in the room.

Any attempt at concealment was out of the question. A glance at the faces of Maud and Mr. Plew sufficed to show the vicar that some terrible misfortune had happened.

"Dear Uncle Charles," said Maud, taking his hand, "Mr. Plew has told us that Veronica was not at his mother's house last night. Don't, pray don't, give way to terror, dear Uncle Charles. It has been some mistake of Jemmy Sack. I am sure of it. What harm can have happened? We should have been sure to hear of my accident, you know. Ill news always travels quickly. We were startled at first, but now I am coming to my senses a little, and I see how foolish it was to be so frightened!"

The poor old man, standing in every limb, and the hand with which she clasped the vicar's was as cold as marble.

Some time in Mr. Levincourt's case would have rushed instantly forth; would have sought here and there; would have inquired feverishly of every one. But he was spurred by their anxiety into immediate energy and action.

But the vicar was at first stunned, not stimulated, by the blow. He sank down in a chair like one whose bodily powers had been suddenly paralyzed.

"The first thing to be done," said Maud, "is to send Joe into the village. Let him go to Sack's first and question old Jemmy. Then he might go or send to the Meggitts. It is possible that Veronica may have gone there. Miss Turner and the girls were always asking her. And you will make inquiries, won't you, Mr. Plew? I see more and more how foolish it was to be so frightened!"

The vicar, as he recovered from the first shock, and as Maud's elastic courage and young hopefulness rose above the terrible shadow, began to chase away the first ghastly fear that had crushed him, displayed an unexpected phase of feeling: he grew angry. He resented the pain he had been made to suffer.

"I think, Mr. Plew," he said, in a voice whose trembling could not by any means under control, "I must say that I think it highly inconsiderate on your part to come here and cause so very terrible—an unnecessarily terrible—an alarm without having better grounds for it."

The latter part, who seemed to be entirely uninfluenced by Maud's cheering suggestions, stood silent, and cast an appealing glance at the young girl.

"Law dear, Sir!" cried old Joanna, who had remained in the room, "don't ye say that! Mr. Plew came here without knowing a thing about Miss Veronica. He was took aback and scared well-nigh as much as you was when I opened the door and he asked me where she was, and why she hadn't come home with him.

"Is Joe gone? Is he going?" exclaimed the vicar, rising from his chair, and speaking now with nervous rapidity. "Why does no one exert any energy? I shall go in one direction myself—Joe must take another—to Sack's farm—to hear! And, Plew, you—will you still search—" Then a sudden terror overcame him, and he fell back into the chair again with a groan. "My child! my child!" he cried.

"Oh, my child! At this moment she may be —dead!"

"No, no, no—not that!" exclaimed Mr. Plew, eagerly. "Not that! I do not believe she is dead. I do not believe she is hurt. That is not what I fear."

"Then, Sir, what is it you do fear? It is not this, and it is not that! What means have you of knowing? And how should you understand a parent's natural apprehensions, or undertake to limit them? Have you," he added, suddenly having caught a glimpse of intelligence that passed between the surgeon and Joanna—" have you any information that you are concealing from me?"

"No! No!"

"You have! I see it in your face—and in hers. Joanna, I insist, I command, you to speak! Plew, if you think it kind to keep me in suspense you are cruelly mistaken. Tell me the truth!"

"Mr. Levincourt, as God is my witness, I know nothing. I do not, upon my soul. But I—I had a momentary fear—a mere momentary suspicion—that—"

"Suspicion, Sir! Of what?"

"That—that Miss Levincourt might have left her home, purposing not to return to it."

"—Gone there you?" gasped the vicar; and then suddenly ceased, as though the words were arrested in his throat and were almost choking him.

"Untie his neckcloth!" cried the surgeon, springing forward. The vicar waved him off, but suffered Joanna to obey Mr. Plew's directions.

Maud looked from one to another in an agony of bewilderment.

"Left her home!" she exclaimed. "Veronica leave her home, purposing not to return to it? Why? Why? For what?"

"Whisht, my deary!" muttered Joanna, still busied about the master. "You'd ye give way. It may not be so bad as we're feared."

"So bad as what? What does Mr. Plew mean? What are you all afraid of? Oh, Veronica!"

"Here he is, Sir! Here's Jemmy!" cried Joe Dowsett, ushering Jemmy back into the room after him. "I was on my way to the farm when I met him. Now speak, you young rascal, and tell his reverence what Miss Veronica said to you!"

The boy was flushed, panting, and very much frightened, and had evidently run the whole part of his own painful excitement in hauling Jemmy Sack to the vicarage with very unnecessary violence.

"I bain't a young rascal!" said Jemmy, driven to bay. "And I told the message here last night as Miss Veronica said, so I did."

"Don't be afraid, Jemmy," said Maud, trying to soothe the boy. "No one will hurt you. You have done no harm."

"No, I knows I haven't!" retorted Jemmy.

"But you will tell us what—what Miss Veronica said, won't you, Jemmy? We are all in sad trouble because we're afraid some harm has happened to her, and we want to find out where she is."

The sight of the sweet, pale face, down which the tears were now streaming fast, and the sound of the voice, whose tones were familiar to all the boy's heart, and he professed his readiness to say all that he knew. But that amounted to very little. He had seen Miss Veronica at the school-house. But she had not remained until the end of the practising. Before twelve she had said to Jemmy that she was going to Mrs. Plew's house to drink tea, and that, as the evening was drawing out wet, he should stay there. Jemmy was to go and take that message to the vicarage. But he was not to go until quite late: not until after seven o'clock at all events. And Miss Veronica had given him a silver sixpence, and bade him earn it honestly by doing exactly as she told him.

"And so I did," protested Jemmy. "I never goe'd near the vicarage until nigh upon eight o'clock, and I was a-growing quite tired of it was soaked through, and when I got home daddy thrashed me."

Old Joanna stood by, emphasizing every word that the boy uttered by a nod of the head, a sigh, or a gesture with uplifted hands, as who should say, "Ay, ay: it is just as I feared!" Ever since the speaking of those words by Mr. Plew which so aroused the vicar's indignation she had latent but not passive—resentment in his chair. He had listened to Jemmy Sack's story in silence, and had apparently relinquished his purpose of going forth to seek his daughter. Now he rose, as though struck by a sudden idea, and hastily left the room. His footsteps were heard ascending the staircase and entering the apartment overhead. It was Veronica's chamber. The steps moved to and fro several times in the house.

The little group in the dining-parlor stood staring blankly at each other.

Maud's face recovered its flow. She was frozen by a new and but half-comprehended fear.

Presently Catherine ran in from the kitchen. People had come to give what information they could. By this time the whole village was acquainted with Veronica's disappearance. Roger the plowman's wife had seen Miss Levincourt by herself walking along the Shipley Magna road very fast. And she had said good-afternoon to her. But she (Roger's wife) thought she might not have seen her, for she was going along in a quick, scared kind of a way, looking straight before her.

Immediately after this woman appeared a witness who testified to having seen the vicar's daughter in a carriage, driving swiftly on the road between Shipley Magna and Dancecester, between five and six o'clock on the previous evening.

This man was from Shipley-in-the-Wold and Dancecester carrier, who knew Veronica well by sight, as he did most people within a circuit of twenty miles round Shipley. He had just heard, he said, down at the Red Cow that the young lady was missing. So he thought he would step up and say when and where he had last seen her.

On hearing the first words of this man's story Maud had rushed breathlessly up stairs to call her guardian. In two minutes she returned again to the door of the dining-room, and beckoned Mr. Plew to come to her.

The hall-door, Veronica, which had arisen high and confused when she had left the room, ceased suddenly as soon as her white face was seen again in the doorway. There was a pause of expectation.

"What is it?" whispered Mr. Plew, obeying Maud's summons.

"Will you please step into the study to Uncle Charles for a moment, Mr. Plew?"

She repeated him into the study. The vicar was sitting there with a paper in his hand.

"Is there news?" cried Mr. Plew, eagerly.

The vicar's face showed a strange mixed emotion—an agitation different from the first emotions of surprise and alarm which he had exhibited on learning that his daughter was not to be found.

"Yes," he said; "there is news. I am—happy—thankful—that Veronica is safe. It has been a false alarm—a mistake. I am quite relieved."

"Thank God!" cried the surgeon, fervently.

Mr. Levincourt tried to speak with some degree of self-control. His hand shook, and his features twitched.

"I have cause to be thankful," he began, and then suddenly broke down and turned away. "Tell him what I wanted, Maud," he murmured in a stifled voice. Then he bent his arms on the table, and bowed his head, and hid his face in his hands.

"Will you do us the great kindness," said Maud, addressing the surgeon, "to get rid of all those people? Thank them, and say—what is fitting."

"But what am I to say?"

Maud glanced at the vicar, but seeing him motionless, with his face buried in his hands, she answered:

"Mr. Levincourt wishes them to be told that Veronica is in perfect safety. There is no cause for alarm. He has found a letter from her."

"Impious letter," murmured the vicar, with still averted face, "that there has been a mis-understanding! that I had seen the letter soon-er— Miss Levincourt did not leave my house without informing me."

Mr. Plew hesitating, Maud made an imploring gesture.

"Pray, pray, Mr. Plew, send those people away!"

Mr. Plew proceeded to obey the vicar's directions as well as he could. The poor little man's heart was aching and his spirit was troubled. At length he succeeded in inducing the little crowd to depart. They went unwillingly and with a perfect hunger of dissatisfied curiosity. They would fain have lingered in the kitchen to talk and to hear; but old Joanna very unceremoniously bade them begone, and was obdurate forward all attempts at discussing the question of Miss Veronica's departure.

"I know as much as the vicar himself, and more than he knows, too, if he's a mind to tell me," said Joanna. "Thank God the lass isn't murdered, nor any way hurt, nor yet drowned, nor yet stopped. That's all I care to know. Now, her father knows where she is. And so I don't see as the rest is any of our businesses."

Mr. Plew found the vicar, when the surgeon, having knocked at the door of the study, had been readmitted by Maud—Mr. Plew, if I showed undue resentment, you will make us mad just now, I ask your pardon."

"Oh, Mr. Levincourt! Don't, pray don't speak of my pardon! But—Miss Desmond said you had found a letter—"

"I have found a letter from my daughter, and I am going to London to-night."

"To-night!"

"Yes."

"To meet Miss Levincourt?"

"To meet Miss Levincourt if possible. I take Maud with me. She is absent some weeks, and she can not remain here alone. I shall place her under the protection of her aunt, Lady Tullis, who is in London. If you are asked about Miss Desmond, I wish you to be able to say that she, at least, is in safety."

There was keenness in the vicar's tone as he spoke the last words which sent a pang through the surgeon's heart. He was, as Joanna had called him, "a soft man."

"I hope," said he, wistfully, "that I may be able to say so of Ve—of Miss Levincourt too."

"Mr. Plew," said the vicar, in a sincere frank and that you wish well to all us," said the vicar, suddenly. "I will trust you."

"You may, indeed, sir. I—of course I knew all along that it was of no use; and I never —scarcely ever—allowed myself to feel any thing like hope. She was so superior in every way. But I am not altogether selfish. Veronica's happiness is very dear to me. It's all over now, of course. But if—if there is any thing in the world I can do for you, or for her, you may be sure I shall not flinch."

The vicar took the little man's hand. "Ah!" he moaned, with the cruel candor of a man absorbed in his own misery, "it might have been better if she had been able to bring herself to care for you. Any thing would have been better than this! She has run away, Mr. Plew; run away with that—" he checked himself, "with Sir John Gale."

"I knew it!" cried the surgeon. "I am not surprised." But his face grew deadly pale as he spoke.

"Let it turn out as it may," resumed the vicar, "I can not easily forgive her. She has been ungrateful and deceitful. But she is my child, my only child. I can not abandon her to her fate. She writes me here that Sir John had private reasons for keeping the secret marriage—"

"Marriage! Is she married?"

"If she is not he shall answer it, the infernal villain! But, for my child, recovered to myself somewhat, "you perceive how all-important it may be not to give evil tongues a handle. You will speak of her—you will defend her—as we shall, nothing more. That is bad enough. I must go to London to-night. A train leaves Dancecester at midnight. I might drive to it by-and-by at once, but I should be no better off. We must wait for the twelve o'clock mail; there is no direct train to London between this hour and midnight. Every hour seems an age."

"Yes, yes; you must go. God grant you may find her! Have you any clew?"

A few words dropped by that man's servant, And his own intention, occupied some time ago, of going to Italy. If I can but be in time to prevent their leaving England—"

"And Miss Desmond goes with you?"

"Yes. My poor Maudie! Ah, how little your mother thought to what contact with misery and disgrace she was exposing you when she bequeathed you to my care!"

They were the first words of consideration for any human being's sufferings, save his own, that the vicar had spoken.

Arrangements were hastily made for the departure of the evening. Mr. Plew was helpful and active. He ordered a vehicle to take the vicar and his ward to Dancecester at seven o'clock. Old Joanna was to go with them. Maud's little valise sobbed as she packed up a few clothes for Maud.

"Seems like as if a earthquake had comed and swallowed us all up, miss," said Catherine. The vicar had fought hard to show a brave front to the servants, to keep up appearances; but without much success; for there was no convincing at the bottom of his own heart to enable him to persuade others that all would be well with his daughter. He was too much a man of the world to give credence to the excuses made in the hurried letter left behind her by Veronica, that weighty private reasons had prevented Sir John Gale from openly declaring his marriage, and had induced him to urge her to consent to a clandestine marriage.

"For a man of his age and position to run off with a girl!" muttered the vicar, as he paced the room, with clenched teeth. "Miserable, wretched, misguided, degraded girl! But if there is justice in heaven, she shall suffer. I will shall find that he can not thus outrage and defy the world. He shall marry her by—"

The vicar was falling into a fever and his ward drove away from the garden gate of the vicarage. As they passed the spot where Sir John Gale had been found blustering and insensible on the ground Mr. Levincourt closed his eyes and groaned aloud.

Maud shuddered at the scene recalled to her mind the fact that the accident had happened little more than two months ago.

"Two months!" she said to herself, while the tears blinded her eyes and streamed down her cheeks. "How happy we were only two months ago!"

BIOLOGY.

AMONG the various departments into which science is subdivided, biology is one which is exciting much interest at the present moment. Certain it is that nature acts by determinate laws in reproducing the same forms in the animal and vegetable kingdoms through blending and inseparation. How it so happens that the brilliant colors in the plumage of the peacock, or the stripes on the zebra, or spots on the leopard's skin are there, is quite beyond our ken. The fact is undeniable that it is so, and there philosophy leaves the subject. Every one of these animal organs has a definite shape, color, weight, and specific function to perform. Why all that organism, or how and every one of its parts should be so, can no more readily be elucidated or explained than primal forms.

Physiology is better understood than biology, yet that barely opens the way for thoughtful speculations, which, although very satisfactory in formation on the laws of life. Both of these studies have their value, because they carry a convincing argument on their footsets that if we can not explain the rationale of what is transpiring in vegetable or animal growth, or what makes the egg run in the one or the other, we certainly can not deny the existence of a Superior Power some where, which originated all vitalized mechanism and set it in motion, giving very satisfactory information

THE ANDAMAN MONKEY.

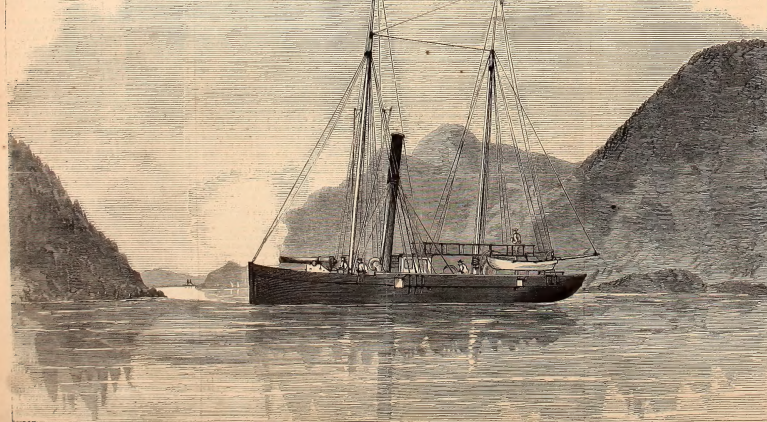
As interesting stranger at the Gardens of the Zoological Society of London, in Regent's Park, is the female monkey, of a species hitherto unknown to naturalists, which, having been for some time domesticated on board one of the ships of the Royal Navy, has learned some of the sailors' tricks. This new and unique monkey has been presented to the Zoological Society by Captain BROWN, R.N., of her Majesty's ship Vigilant. It dates its joining the ship's company from Port Blair, Andaman Islands, in the Gulf of Bengal, lat. 11° 43' N., long. 92° 47' E., in the year 1864. Jenny (for that is her name) is supposed to be eight or nine years old. For the last four years she has "served" on board the ship, and having passed all the dangers of the Abyssinian campaign, being discharged with a first-class certificate and silver chain and medal for good conduct, is now waiting to receive her share of the prizes taken during the time she was in her Majesty's service. Jenny stands about two feet four inches in height. In general appearance she is most like the "pig-tailed" monkey (Macacus nemestrinus), but is at once distinguished from that species by a remarkable arrangement of the hair on the top of the head, which is somewhat of a V shape, and is parted down the middle. The hair itself is very fine, and is elegantly arranged round the ears. The first impression upon seeing this animal is that it is intermediate between Macacus rhesus and Macacus nemestrinus. The face is by no means fierce; the features may even be called good-natured. She has been made a great pet by the sailors. The result is that she has been educated to an extraordinary degree of cleverness. She is fond of company, and her constant companion is a chicken (a regular ship chicken, with hardly any feathers), which lives with her in her cage day and night, and accompanies her in her perambulations. She walks upright on her hind-legs with remarkable facility, and with much less effort than even the performing monkeys as seen in the streets. When in an erect attitude she will carry things. Thus she will pick up her chicken, and run about with it, holding it in her arms as a nurse does her child. The chicken does not seem to mind this in the least. At the word, "Throw her overboard!" Jenny throws the chicken smartly away from her. It has been said that monkeys would talk, but that they know that if they talked they would be made to work. Now the Andamanian Jenny forms an exception to the "working" part (only that is very agreeable work) of the story; for if a soda-water bottle is given to her she will set to work to untwist the wire. This done, she will get out the cork, if it be not too tightly fixed, and then drink the contents of the bottle. Her attitude in drinking is something quite new. She sits down on her haunches, holds the bottle with both hands, and tilts the end of it up with her hind-foot, so that the liquid shall flow at the proper level into her mouth. In this attitude her appearance is highly comical, and at the same time very interesting. The most extraordinary part of Jenny's performance is that she smokes a pipe. Other monkeys will carry a pipe in their mouth, and pretend to smoke, but this is the first monkey that we have ever known actually to smoke lighted tobacco out of a pipe. Other monkeys will drink grog, but Jenny is especially fond of it, and always takes her glass with her pipe, which she enjoys quite as much as Forecastle Jack after he has been reefing topsails.

THE ANDAMAN MONKEY AT THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S GARDENS, LONDON.

LADY PALMERSTON.

THE place which Lady Palmerston held for many years in London society will not be easily filled up. There was a sunshine about her Saturday evening receptions at Cambridge House which is not usually seen in gatherings of a similar nature. The most insignificant guest was sure to be welcomed by pleasant smiles from Lady Palmerston, and by a warm greeting from her husband. Lady Palmerston's good manners were the mere reflection of her true kindliness of heart, and it is this which made them so fascinating to all around her.

Nothing is more characteristic of the typical grande dame of the past generation than the thorough business habits which she combined with the grace and gayety of the woman of fashion. A memoir of Lady Palmerston in the London Times shows that she undertook the entire management of the household at Brocket, Cambridge House, and Brandlands, as well as that of her own property: personally inspecting the accounts, leaving nothing to agents, stewards, or head servants but what fell strictly within their respective departments. Her visiting-book also was kept with all the regularity and precision of a merchant's ledger. Her services to her husband extended far beyond the evasion of the brilliant soirées at Cambridge House, and the cheering sympathy with which she soothed his labors. She had great tact in extracting information from as well as answering visitors, and was thus of great value to Lord Palmerston in his political enterprises. With all this she found time, too, to keep a journal. Another characteristic which Lady Palmerston shared with the elder generation was her predilection for youth and beauty for its own sake. She would have "those two pretty girls at her party;" and she would not have "that fat woman with her ugly daughters," although the fat woman was the wife of a county member, and the two pretty girls had neither father nor brother in either House.



SPANISH GUN-BOAT NO. 1—TESTING HER GUNS AT COLD SPRING, ON THE HUDSON.—[SEE PAGE 663.]

JAMES FISK, JUN.

IT is peculiarly fitting in this Number of our paper, in which we give especial attention to the recent operations in Wall Street, that we should give the portrait of JAMES FISK, JUN. Three years ago the subject of our sketch was comparatively unknown. Now there are few men in our city who command so large a share of public notice. He is a man of large wealth, and is the centre of attraction in Wall Street, in theatrical circles, and in the law courts.—Perhaps he has not genius; his education may be deficient; but his practical shrewdness, his almost reckless boldness, and his unparalleled effrontery, make up for the absence of these qualifications. He is known as a man who may be a friend to-day and an enemy to-morrow; as one who comes to his conclusions rapidly, and almost by instinct; and as a man whose hostility can not be provoked with impunity. Having said this, what more could we say as regards his peculiar characteristics?

JAMES FISK, JUN., is the son of a Vermont peddler. At the age of seventeen he obtained employment of a very humble character in VAN AMBURGH'S menagerie, his occupation being to assist in the erection of tents and to sweep out and keep clean the cages of the animals. His employer, noticing his capacity, promoted him to the position of a ticket collector. In this capacity he accompanied VAN AMBURGH in his various tours through the United States, the Canadas, and Europe—a service extending over a period of eight years. Leaving VAN AMBURGH at twenty-five years of age, he determined to pursue the calling of his father, and returned to his native State of Vermont for that purpose. He commenced his career as a peddler by selling small articles, such as pencils, pens, etc., on the sidewalks of the different towns of the State. In this way, by dint of perseverance, he saved a little money, and having succeeded in raising a small additional sum, he purchased a horse and wagon, and made a fresh start in life as a peddler of dry-goods. He visited all the principal towns and villages of Vermont, and succeeded in gaining so large a custom in the places to which he traveled that his humble one-horse wagon was no longer capacious enough for the conveyance of his goods. He discarded it, therefore, and invested in a much larger one drawn by four horses. By-and-by he extended his field of operations, and traveled through Massachusetts and Connecticut as well as Vermont, until, finally, the gross amount of his sales attracted the attention of a Boston firm from whom he was in the habit of buying goods. In 1860 they made proposals to him to join their house, to which he assented, and JAMES FISK, JUN., became a partner in the firm of JORDAN, MARSH, & CO., of Boston. But the firm do not appear to have been so well pleased with JAMES FISK the partner as with JAMES FISK the customer, for at the end of two years they paid him down the large sum of $64,000 to leave the firm.

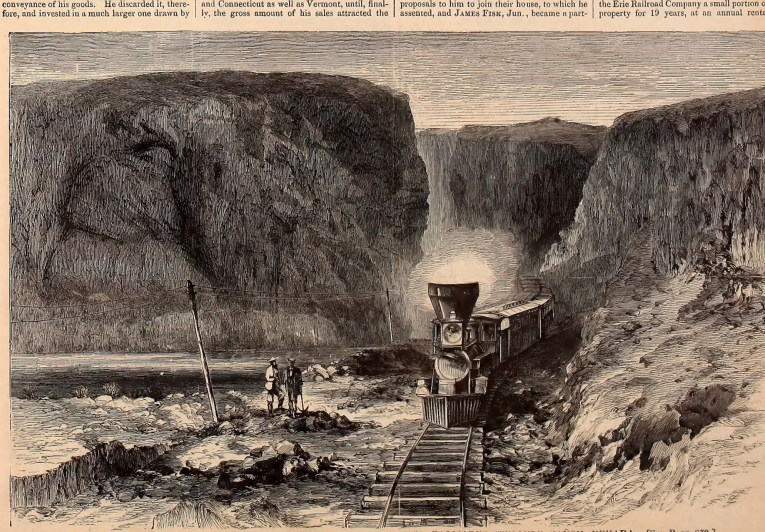
JAMES FISK, JUN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

It so happened that at this time some parties in Boston were anxious to purchase the Stonington line of steamships, then owned by Mr. DANIEL DREW. JAMES FISK was aware of this circumstance, and, thinking he could turn this knowledge to good account, he came, in 1863, to New York. Obtaining an introduction to Mr. DREW, he managed so to ingratiate himself into the favor of that gentleman that he employed him to conduct the negotiation for the sale of the steamers. In this he was eminently successful. The sale was completed entirely to Mr. DREW'S satisfaction, and the ability and shrewdness which FISK had displayed throughout the negotiation gained for him Mr. DREW'S good-will and patronage, and an introduction to Wall Street.

FISK now commenced to operate on his own account; he entered into a variety of speculative transactions in government stocks, gold, and other securities. Success, however, did not attend him in Wall Street as it had done when peddling through the country: the greater number of his speculations were disastrous in their results, and in two years time JAMES FISK had lost every dollar he had in the world. He had, however, a friend in Mr. DANIEL DREW, who in 1865 assisted him to form the firm of FISK, BELDING, & CO., for the purpose of carrying on the business of stock-brokers, and gave them substantial aid by putting business into their hands, and employing them as brokers in many large undertakings.

In 1867 Mr. FISK, in connection with Mr. JAY GOULD, succeeded in making a large sum of money by operations in Erie stock. They got control over stock to the amount of $10,000,000, and were thus able to depress the general value of Erie stock from 72½ to 35. Mr. FISK'S share of the profits resulting from these operations amounted, it is said, to $1,300,000.

Mr. FISK'S next operation was to purchase the whole of the block of which Pike's Opera-house forms a part for the sum of $820,000. This transaction was a highly profitable one. He leased to the Erie Railroad Company a small portion of the property for 19 years, at an annual rental of



THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD—PASSENGER TRAIN PASSING THE PALISADES, TEN-MILE CAÑON, NEVADA.—[SEE PAGE 670.]

$75,000. This was in itself a very handsome return on the gross amount invested in the whole property; but Mr. Fisk retained to himself the Opera-house, all the large stores, and a great number of private houses. He has also bought the building formerly known as Brougham's Theatre; and having somewhat unceremoniously ousted that gentleman and his company, he installed there Mademoiselle Irma and a French troupe of opera bouffe.

With his more recent operations, including the proprietorship of the French Theatre in this city, our readers are well acquainted. Mr. Fisk is now about thirty-nine years of age.

VIEW ON THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Pacific Railroad is no longer a theme of conjecture, but an accomplished fact. Passengers, mail, and freight pass between New York and San Francisco with the same regularity, celerity, and convenience as between Boston and Washington; the Pacific coast has been effectually brought within the national railroad system.

We give on page 669 an illustration showing a passenger train passing the Palisades, Ten-mile Cañon, Nevada, on the Central Pacific Railroad.

The business of the Central Pacific between Sacramento and Promontory Point, between which places it has been operated for the three months since the road was on the 10th of May, are (approximately) as follows, mainly in gold: Gross earnings, $1,700,000; operating expenses, $620,241; net earnings, $783,009. This income, of course, will be largely increased with the continually increasing business of the road.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I have used my Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine six years without the least repairs, doing all my family sewing, consisting of coats, overcoats, pants, and vests, down to the finest of sewing, even patching old coats and pants. Besides that, I have carned six hundred dollars ($600) in the six years. I earned thirty dollars with one needle. Give me the Wheeler & Wilson in preference to all others.

New Milford, Conn. Mrs. Lucy Durgy.

A Sure Remedy for Chills and Fever. Ayer's Ague Cure never fails.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To remove MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, and TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH and FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. Perry, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.

PATENT STEM-WINDING WATCHES.

Coin-Silver Hunting Cases, $31; Extra Fine, $32.

SOLID GOLD

Hunting-Case Full-Jeweled Lever Watches, $46; $48; Extra, $52.

Ladies' Size, $36; Extra, $46; Enameled, $46.

COIN-SILVER

Hunting Cases, $14; Extra Quality, $16.

AMERICAN MOVEMENTS.

Every variety, Lever, Lever Patents.

And Watches of every description, in fine Gold and Silver Cases, at Important Rates.

Goods sent by Express, to be paid for only after they have been received, examined, and accepted.

S. H. HODGE & CO., Importers,

Nos. 52 & 54 John St., N. Y.

Full Descriptive Price-Lists sent free.

FURNITURE.

We invite buyers to visit our extensive warerooms and examine our large stock of Suites for Parlors, Chambers, Dining-Rooms, Libraries, &c., Manufactured under our supervision, from the best materials, and warranted in every particular.

With unequaled facilities and a ripe experience in manufacturing, we are confident that we can and prove lee too much when we say to buyers that, taking quality into consideration, we can not be undersold.

WARREN WARD & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers and Dealers, and 73 and 77 Spring Street, corner Crosby.

Boosey's Cheap Musical Publications. A Complete Catalogue now ready. Sent free. Boosey's Ballad Journal," the new Half-Dime Series of the Best Songs. Sold every where, or specimen Number mailed for Five Cents.—64 Seventh-st., N. Y.

Wanted—Agents.—To sell the American Button-Hole Machine. Price $20. The simplest, cheapest, and best Button-Hole Machine ever invented. Will knit 30,000 stitches per minute. Liberal inducements offered. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., 158 Sudbury, Adams-st., St. Louis, Mo.

IMITATION GOLD WATCHES and DIAMOND JEWELRY

Are manufactured on scientific principles, none but experts can detect them, and have all the brilliancy, durability, and exact appearance of the most costly description of Genuine Gold Watches and Diamond Jewelry.

Solitaire Diamond Earrings, the most startling of the century. They have thoroughly demonstrated the Strength, Durability, Accuracy, and Utility of the Fac-Simile Waltham Watches, and pronounce them translucible as reliable time-keepers. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Swiss Movements, $12 each; Gentlemen's Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, Fac-Simile Waltham, $20; Chronometer Balance, $25; Extra fine finish Chronometer Balance, $30 and $35. Warranted in perfect running order, and to retain the color of 18-carat gold. Latest style of Chains from $3 to $10 each.

The recently-discovered Fac-Simile Brazilian Diamonds—carbonized, crystallized quartz—are equal in every respect to the real Diamond, except intrinsic value. They are mounted with genuine 18-carat gold.

Ladies' Solitaire Earrings, $5, $10, $15; Solitaire Ear-Drops, with Pendants, $7, $10, $15, $20; Cluster Sets, $15, $20, $25, $30; Cross Sets, $20, $25; Cluster Pins, $10, $15, $20, $25; Cross Pins and Charms, $6, $10, $15; Studs, per set, $5, $10, $15, $20.

Orders sent per Express, C.O.D. Orders of $10 and less must be accompanied with the Price. Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order. Customers must pay all charges.

79 Nassau St., New York.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE,

NEW YORK.

The next Academical Year will begin on the 1st Monday (4th) of October. The students of the College will attend for matriculation on that day at 9½ A.M.

Candidates for the Freshman Class will present themselves for examination on Friday, Oct. 1st, and Saturday, Oct. 2d, at 10 A.M.

Applicants for admission to advanced classes, and those required to be examined, will present themselves on Saturday, Oct. 2d, at the same hour.

For Catalogues and other information, apply to Rev. Dr. BARNARD, President, or to

HENRY DRISLER,

Senior Professor and Acting as President.

$1.—TAKING THE REINS.

GRANT, BONNER, & DEXTER.

By JOHN W. EHNINGER, N.A.

"It is a striking likeness of the horse, and, I have no hesitation in saying, the best representation of a horse in action that I have seen.

"ROBERT BONNER."

This splendid photograph, embodying three life-like portraits, is 13¾ x 7½ inches, exclusive of mounts. Sent free of expense on receipt of One Dollar.

Larger Edition, 13 x 21, beautifully mounted on India tint, at $3.00. Sent by Express, C.O.D.

Address PILKINGTON JACKSON, Art Publisher, Care of HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

FRENCH CLOCKS,

BRONZES,

FANCY GOODS,

Musical Boxes, Fans,

Opera Glasses,

FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,

PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES,

WEDDING PRESENTS.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,

No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York.

The above goods comprise one of the largest variety in the market in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

$100 in every Thousand.

We have lately introduced some new

Styles of Initial Stationery, with fancy RUSTIC Stamping, which we think will meet the approval of the public.

And to the ladies we call the notice of this really first-class article, we propose, as an inducement, to pack

$100 in every 1000 Stamped Envelopes,

in Prizes varying in amount from

$1 00 to $50 00.

Put up in neat packages, as any part of the country, postpaid, for 50 cents.

Address MERRILL & MACKINTIRE, Salem, Mass.

☞ Special Terms to Agents.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal so closely resembling pure gold as to defy detection, and has not only gained the confidence of the press in consequence of its extraordinary qualities, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and the cases are made by machinery of the best manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant these watches for ten years.

Price now $16 to $22.

Every watch warranted. A pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.

Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN, Box 44 Station D, New York City.

MAPLE LEAVES, enlarged and improved. At the best, the most popular, and the cheapest Family publication. It will be issued from the 1st end of 1870 for 50 cents. Send in your subscriptions without delay.

O. A. ROORBACH, 102 Nassau St., New York.

A LADY who has been cured of great nervous debility, premature decay of memory, desires to make known to all fellow-sufferers the sure means of cure. Address, enclosing stamp, A. M. MERRITT, P. O. Box 3033, Boston, Mass., and the prescription will be sent free by return mail.

"Popular Music at Popular Prices."

HITCHCOCK'S SHEET MUSIC

IS SOLD BY ALL BOOKSELLERS AND NEWS-DEALERS, AND MAILED, POSTAGE PAID, ON RECEIPT OF PRICE, 5c. PER COPY.

HITCHCOCK'S HALF-DIME MUSIC.—Now Ready:

150.	I'll Ask my Mother.	Earnshaw.	Tune.
149.	Have You Seen Her Lately?	Glover.	Bright.
148.	The Hard to Give the Hand.	Knight.	Waltz.
147.	She Wore a Wreath of Roses.	Millard.	Song.
146.	Spanish Maiden.	Scott.	Song.
145.	Within a Mile of Edinboro.	do.	Ballad.
144.	Coming through the Rye.	do.	Ballad.
143.	The Prince of the Valley.	do.	do.
142.	I can not Sing the Old Songs.	do.	do.
141.	Janet's Choice.	do.	do.
140.	Strangers Yet.	Clifton.	Song.
139.	Water-Lily Polka.	Rogers.	Polka.
138.	Would You be Young Again?	Clippingdale.	Song.
137.	Row, Brothers, Row. Duet and Chorus.	Sweet.	Song.
136.	Call Her Back and Kiss Her.	Clifton.	Song.
135.	The Abbeybell Polka.	Rogers.	Polka.
134.	There was a Simple Maiden.	Macfarren.	Song.
133.	Sunset Polka.	Raymond.	Polka.
132.	Hamlet, Prince of Denmark.	Guglielmo.	Song.
131.	Heaven and There.	Rogers.	Song.
130.	The Emma Mazurka.	Knight.	Mazurka.
129.	The March of the Silver Trumpets.	Wyman.	Polka.
128.	It ought not thus to be.	Abt.	Song.
127.	In Happy Moments.	Wallace.	Song.
126.	Old Simon the Cellarer.	Hatton.	Song.
125.	The Bonnie Belle.	Sedgwick.	Song.
124.	The Bridal Ring.	Rodwell.	Song.
123.	The Heart Bows Down.	do.	Song.
122.	The Love Light's in your Eyes.	Sedgwick.	Song.
121.	Waverley Polka.	do.	Song.
120.	The Drawing-Room Schottische.	Douglass.	Schott.
119.	The Bird Flies to the Boy.	Gabriel.	Song.
118.	She is not Fair to Outward View.	Sullivan.	Ballad.
117.	Little Bird on the Tree.	Claribel.	Song.
116.	Then You'll Remember Me.	do.	Ballad.
115.	When the Swallows Homeward Fly.	Rogers.	Ballad.
114.	You and I.	Balfe.	Song.
113.	Only a Look of Hair.	Peabody.	Song.
112.	Mary Emma Polka.	Rogers.	Polka.
111.	O Take Me to Thy Heart Again.	Raymond.	Song.
110.	Scotch Lassie Jean.	Rogers.	Song.
109.	Dancing Shadow.	H. Fase.	Song.
108.	Tommy Dodd.	Waverly.	Song.
107.	Good Night.	Mine.	Song.
106.	Never Mind the Rest.	Murgatroyd.	Song.
105.	The World is Full of Beauty.	Clippingdale.	Song.
104.	O that I were a Song!	Carrington.	Song.
103.	The Well-Remembered Tree.	Waverly.	Song.
102.	Smiles and Tears.	Offenbach.	Song.
101.	I love a Rose.	Lover.	Song.
100.	Go it while you're Young.	Lover.	Song.
99.	Guardian Angels.	Bellini.	Song.
98.	Molly Bawn.	Glover.	Song.
97.	Jessie.	Glover.	Song.
96.	I'm not Myself at all.	Knight.	Song.
95.	Beautiful Eyes.	Glover.	Song.
94.	The Cavalier.	Rogers.	Song.
93.	Castanella Schottische.	Knight.	Lover.
92.	Of what is the Old Man Thinking?	Stewart.	Song.
91.	Sally Roon.	Hatton.	Song.
90.	Ka-loosie-um.	Rogers.	Song.
89.	Nothing else to Do.	Robson.	Song.
88.	Crescent-City March.	Adams.	Song.
87.	Parlor Polka-mazurka Dance.	Hunt.	Song.
86.	Scenes that are Brightest.	Glover.	Song.
85.	Castles in the Air.	Copeland.	Song.
84.	The Bell goes a Ringing for Sarah.	Raymond.	Song.
83.	Kitty Tyrell.	Scotch.	Song.
82.	School for Jolly Dogs.	do.	Song.
81.	Willie went a Wooing.	Williams.	Song.
80.	Maggie Mogush.	Glover.	Song.
79.	Bessie's Hall.	Stewart.	Song.
78.	The Fairy's Well.	Culver.	Song.
77.	Oh would I were a Bird.	Waverly.	Song.
76.	Oh, you Pretty, Blue-Eyed Witch.	Balmain.	Song.
75.	My Aunty Dear.	Taylor.	Song.
74.	The Fidgety Wife.	Guglielmo.	Song.
73.	Day and Night. I Thought of Thee.	Covert.	Song.
72.	My Mother Dear.	Norvall.	Song.
71.	Birney Polka.	Lover.	Song.
70.	Chestnut-Street Belles.	Raymond.	Song.
69.	Boston Belles.	do.	Song.
68.	Be Watchful and Beware.	Glover.	Song.
67.	Were there's a Will there's a Way.	Starr.	Song.
66.	The Foreign Count.	Lloyd.	Song.
65.	The Lancashire Witch.	Raymond.	Song.
64.	Meet Me in the Lane, Love.	Blamphin.	Song.
63.	Mabel Waltz.	Irving.	Song.
62.	The Smile of Memory.	Waverly.	Song.
61.	Sweetheart.	Balfe.	Song.
60.	Boot-Black's Song.	Waverly.	Song.
59.	Bonnie Jean.	do.	Song.
58.	Five O'Clock in the Morning.	Claribel.	Song.
57.	Thomas Tuneful and his Boots.	Thymond.	Song.
56.	Pretty, Pretty Bird.	Waverly.	Song.
55.	Who Could Have Done It?	Nathan.	Song.
54.	Call me Thine Own.	I. Celair.	Song.
53.	I believe the Girls Love. Inst'l.	Offenbach.	Song.
52.	Woodside Waltz and Polka.	Bailey.	Song.
51.	Oh, Lovely Rose. Inst'l.	Richards.	Song.
50.	Petchole's Letter. Inst'l.	Offenbach.	Song.
49.	The Moonlit Wave.	Price.	Song.
48.	St. Nicholas Galop.	Bailey.	Song.
47.	Mocoppin Johnny.	Richards.	Song.
46.	Gens d'Armes Duet. Violin and Piano.	Offenbach.	Song.
45.	Green Mountain Sprites.	Raymond.	Song.
44.	Belles of Broadway.	do.	Song.
43.	The Fairy Queen.	do.	Song.
42.	Power of Love. Inst'l.	do.	Song.
41.	Rosalie. Inst'l.	Wade.	Song.
40.	I will not ask to Press that Cheek.	Claribel.	Song.
39.	The Bird and the Maid.	Claribel.	Song.
38.	The Life Boat.	Balfe.	Song.
37.	Wreck of the World. (Sacred Song.)	Claribel.	Song.
36.	Beautiful Bells.	Balfe.	Song.
35.	The Gipsy Boy.	Rogers.	Song.
34.	Olympic Schottische.	Bellini.	Song.
33.	Up in a Balloon.	Glover.	Song.
32.	There's a Charm in Spring. Inst'l.	Glover.	Song.
31.	Sweet Home Waltz.	Glover.	Song.
30.	Take Back the Heart.	Glover.	Song.
29.	Oh, Hear my Prayer. (Sacred Song.)	Glover.	Song.
28.	Still I Love Thee.	Glover.	Song.
27.	The Old Arm-Chair. 2d Long Branch.	Glover.	Song.
26.	Riding Down Broadway.	Glover.	Song.
25.	Up in the Morning Early.	Glover.	Song.
24.	Arm-in-Arm. Polka Mazurka.	Glover.	Song.
23.	The Fisher's Life.	Glover.	Song.
22.	Silver Chimes.	Glover.	Song.
21.	The Old Cottage Clock.	Glover.	Song.
20.	He Love Shines over all.	Glover.	Song.
19.	Mayonia's Secret.	Glover.	Song.
14.	Little Maggie May.	Glover.	Song.
13.	The Dainty Little Welthie.	Glover.	Song.
12.	Come Hither, my Baby, my Darling.	Glover.	Song.
11.	Genevieve Waltz.	Glover.	Song.
10.	Skating-Rink Polka.	Glover.	Song.
9.	Champion Polka.	Glover.	Song.
8.	Priest of Texas.	Glover.	Song.
7.	I Really don't Think I shall Marry.	Glover.	Song.
6.	Good-by, Sweetheart, Good-by.	Glover.	Song.
5.	Not if I Joseph.	Glover.	Song.
4.	Blue Eyes.	Glover.	Song.
3.	We'd Better Bide a Wee.	Glover.	Song.
2.	Won't You Tell Me Way, Robin?	Glover.	Song.
1.	Captain Jinks.	Glover.	Song.

Any of our publications can be had of Music, Book, and Newsdealers generally throughout the United States and Canada, or by mail on receipt of price. Other choice selections with rapidity follow.

J. L. H. D. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,

24 Beekman Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Have just Published:

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, LL.D., author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 562 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing, Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in Two Volumes, Octavo, uniform with the Rev. Dr. Coit, $7 00; Sheep, $8 00; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Mental Philosophy: embracing the Three Departments of the Intellect, Sensibilities, and Will. By Thomas C. Upham, D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy and Metaphysics in Bowdoin College. In Vol. I.: Intellect, Language; Vol. II.: Sensibilities, Will. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75 per Vol.

A GREEK AND ATTIC BOOK FOR BEGINNERS. By William Henry Waddell, Professor of Ancient Languages in the University of Georgia. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By James Greenwood, the "Amateur Casual," Author of "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "Dick Temple," "Dredger," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

FAMOUS LONDON MERCHANTS. A Book for Boys. By H. R. Fox Bourne. With Portrait of George Peabody and 54 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

SIGHTS AND SENSATIONS IN FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND; or, Experiences of an American Journalist in Europe. By Edward Dicey. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

SANDS'S PHILOSOPHY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, the Pupil, the School. By Nathaniel Sands. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

A PARSER AND ANALYZER FOR BEGINNERS, with Diagrams and Suggestive Pictures. By Franklin Alexander, Principal of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, Author of "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "Comparative Grammar of the English Language," &c. 16mo, Boards, 40 cents.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Correct Calculation of the Profits of Life as it Could be Lived in Accordance with Nature. By Robert B. Roosevelt. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By Alfred Russel Wallace, Author of "Travels on the Amazon," &c. With Ten Maps and Fifty-one elegant Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

The New Novels

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

George Eliot's Novels. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition.

ADAM BEDE. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents.

MILL ON THE FLOSS. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents.

FELIX HOLT. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents.

☞ To be followed by George Eliot's other Novels.

IN SILK ATTIRE. By William Black, Author of "Love or Marriage?" 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FOUND DEAD. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

COUNTESS GISELA. By E. Marlitt. Translated by A. Nahmer. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

META'S FAITH. By the Author of "St. Olave's." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS:

New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.

VANITY FAIR. 32 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.

PENDENNIS. 179 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

THE VIRGINIANS. 100 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

PRIOR PAPERS. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 64 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HENRY ESMOND and LOVEL THE WIDOWER. 13 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 38 cents.

PUTTENHAM'S (sic) COLOUNEY. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

PEG WOFFINGTON. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

☞ To be followed by Charles Reade's other Novels.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

GREAT ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC TEA COMPANY,

NO. 8 CHURCH STREET,

P.O. Box 5506. New York City.

An organization of capitalists for the purpose of importing Teas and distributing them to Merchants throughout the country at importers' prices. Established 1869. Send for Price-List.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 20 full-size pictures, mailed, postpaid, for 75 cts.; 2 for $1; 6 for $2; 12 for $3. Union free. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N. Y.

$25 A DAY.—$3 new articles. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me. H. S. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$1140—How I made it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fuller, N. Y.

THE BOY WHALER; OR, THE YOUNG ROVERS.
THE MOST EXCITING SEA STORY
EVER PUBLISHED IS
Commenced THIS WEEK, in No. 49
OF THE
NEW YORK WEEKLY,
NOW READY.

THE
BOY WHALER
was written expressly for the
NEW YORK WEEKLY,
By Leon Lewis,
Author of "The Silver Ship," "The Water Wolf," "The Boy Magician," etc.

THE
BOY WHALER,
Now Ready in No. 49 of the
NEW YORK WEEKLY,
containe the most vivid description of strange adventures on land and sea, in most of which the young hero, the

BOY WHALER,
takes a prominent part, and by his daring deeds proves himself the personification of juvenile bravery. Every boy should read the exciting story of the

BOY WHALER,
which is just commenced in No. 49 of the
NEW YORK WEEKLY,
and every young woman also should read the
BOY WHALER
in the
NEW YORK WEEKLY,
for the female mind will be enraptured with the lovely heroine, the charming Lily Lawrence, who shares the fortunes and trials of the
BOY WHALER.
The current issue (No. 49) of the Greatest Story and Sketch Paper in the World,
THE
NEW YORK WEEKLY,
should be purchased by parents and read to their children, for the great story of the
BOY WHALER
shows that although virtue may for a time be unable to cope with villainy, it will in the end rise triumphant.
THE
NEW YORK WEEKLY
takes pleasure in presenting to the public the great story of the
BOY WHALER,
for it is undoubtedly the masterpiece of its Author, and was written expressly for the
NEW YORK WEEKLY.

Boys! Boys! Boys!
Every boy who delights to read of daring deeds and thrilling adventures will linger in admiration over the story of the
BOY WHALER,
Now Ready in No. 49 of the
NEW YORK WEEKLY,
and for sale by every News Agent in the country.
PRICE SIX CENTS PER COPY.

Don't Forget to Buy No. 49
OF THE
NEW YORK WEEKLY, which contains the commencement of the
BOY WHALER.

THE CELEBRATED IMITATION

Gold Watches and Jewelry.
THE COLLINS METAL, THE ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE ORIODE.

The $15 Watches, in appearance and for time, are equal to gold ones costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, at $20, are not surpassed by $200 gold watches. For TIME, ELEGANCE, FINISH, and DURABILITY, no imitation of gold can begin to compare with the Collins Metal. Excepting the intrinsic value, it is equal to gold. Every watch fully warranted by certificate.

CHAINS FROM $2 TO $8.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Ear-Rings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Charms, Gold-Fringe, Hollow and Massive Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

CLUBS.—Where Clubs of Watches are ordered at one time, we will send the seventh Watch free of charge.

Goods sent to any part of the United States by express, to be paid for on delivery. Money need not be sent with the order, as bills can be paid when goods are taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. We employ no agents; orders, therefore, must be sent directly to us. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and State. Customers in the city will remember that our only store is
No. 335 Broadway, cor. Worth St. (up stairs), New York.—C. E. COLLINS & CO.

HENRY WARD
BEECHER'S
SERMONS IN
PLYMOUTH PULPIT
Are being read by people of every class and denomination all over this country and Europe. They are full of vital, beautiful religious thought and feeling. The Plymouth Pulpit is published weekly, and contains Mr. Beecher's Sermons and Prayers, in form unabridged, corrected and finished. For sale by all Newsdealers. Price 10c. Yearly subscriptions received at $4 per annum, also giving two handsome volumes of over 400 pages each. Half-yearly, $1 75. A new and beautiful Steel Portrait of Mr. Beecher presented to all new subscribers. Extraordinary offer! Plymouth Pulpit (3d), and The Church Union ($3.50), an Unsectarian, Independent, Christian Journal of 32 pages, cut and stitched, clearly printed, ably edited, sent to one address for 52 weeks for four dollars. Special Indeed! Immense canvassers are now getting up clubs. Specimen copies, postage free, for 3c.
J. R. FORD & CO., Pub's, 39 Park Row, N.Y.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR
STRUGGLES AND TRIUMPHS OF
P. T. BARNUM.
WRITTEN BY HIMSELF. IN ONE LARGE OCTAVO VOLUME—READY SEPT. 15th.—ILLUSTRATED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.
33 Elegant Full-Page Engravings.
It embraces Every Years Romantic Adventure of Busy Life, as a Merchant, Manager, Banker, Lecturer, and Showman, and gives accounts of his Imprisonment, his Failure, his Successful European Tours, and important Historical and Personal Reminiscences, complete with Humor, Anecdotes, and Entertaining Narrative.
It contains his celebrated Lecture on the Art of Money Getting, with Rules for Success. Delivered to thousands of Young Men, and now published for which he was offered $2000. We offer extra inducements to Agents, and pay Freight to the West. Send for 32-page Circular, with Specimen Engraving and Terms to Agents.
J. B. BURR & CO.,
Publishers, Hartford, Conn.

SWEET QUININE. SVAPNIA.
Sweet Quinine is warranted to contain less than one-sixth the quantity of Sulphate (bitter) Quinine, with the important advantage of being sweet instead of bitter.
Svapnia is a sure remedy for sickening and poisonous properties. It is the most perfect Anodyne and Soothing Syrup yet discovered.
Sold by druggists, prescribed by best physicians.
STEARNS, FARR, & CO., Chemists, New York.

TYLER WATER WHEELS.—Over 7000 in operation. Address the manufacturers, Bullock's Machine Co., Claremont, N. H., for reduced price-list.

$10 Watches $10

THE GREAT TRADE INDEPENDENT ASSOCIATION, Incorporated by the State of New York, and Sole Selling Agents of Watches at $10 each.

Solid Sterling Silver Hunting Watches, Stem-Winders and Setters, open-faced, hand-engraved, which are thoroughly tested, and when ordered are sealed, post paid, at the following prices:—Single Specimen, Two, Twelve, or 100 Watches, $10 each; Twenty-five and Upward Silver Hunting Watch at precisely $10. Every Watch warranted for Five Years. Cash must accompany all orders to $100. Remember, we do not sell by the single watch, but to the investment, so as enable it to our stock is worth less than the money which each Watch represents. Address THE GREAT TRADE INDEPENDENT ASSOCIATION,
Free! TAY US before forming a hasty opinion. Address,
Broadway, Cor. Fulton St., New York.

PIANOS and ORGANS.
Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of first-class makers, for $275 and upward. New Church Organs for $100 and upward. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $40 to $175, at 481 Broadway. HORACE WATERS.

WANTED, live men, who can give security for goods received, to distribute "packages" of "Wonder of the World" among families, and collect the same. J. C. TILTON, Pittsburgh, Pa.

TROY FEMALE SEMINARY.—This Institution offers the accumulated advantages of over 30 years' successful operation. For circulars, apply to JOHN H. WILLARD, Troy, N. Y.

SALESMEN.—Wanted, a few reliable, energetic salesmen, to sell by sample standard goods. Address " H. HICHARDS & CO., 44 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

5000 BOOK AGENTS WANTED for the Illustrated New Hardine's New Illustrated and Illustrated Bibles and the LIFE OF CHRIST and HUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.
The world's new book for delivery. Address for Catalogue of the best-selling Subscription-Books published.
W. W. HARDING, Philadelphia, Publisher of Harding's Pictorial Family Bibles.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.
With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 53 Murray Street, New York.

SPARKLING LITTLE BEAUTIES are Gents' Lava Diamond Pins. Exquisite specimen mailed, 24 cts. R. LEE & CO., 1272 Broadway, N. Y.

RAPID SALE!
25,000 ALREADY IN USE.
The Demand Increasing.
The Choral Tribute!
BY L. O. EMERSON,
Choristers and Singers unanimously agree that it surpasses all other works of Church Music by this popular author.
(Until November 1, Clergymen, Choristers, and Teachers who have not yet examined this valuable work will be supplied with a single copy at $1 25, postage paid.)
Price $1 50; $13 50 per dozen.
OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.
C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

Bloomington Nursery.
500 Acres. 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.
Fruit, Ornamental and Nursery Stock, immense and reliable assortment, very low for cash.
Apples—including most magnificent stock of yearlings; also hardy Northern sorts, such as Duchess, Oldenburg, Bishop, Transcendent, and other Crab Apples—1, 2, and 3 year.
Peaches, Pears, Cherries, Plums, Quinces, Grapes, Forest and Evergreen Trees, Nursery Stocks, Osage Orange Hedge Plants, Roses, own roots: Tuligo, Hyacinths, Narcissus, Iris, Spirella, Lilies, Specimens, Asparagus, &c.
Also superior colored plates of Fruits and Flowers. Send 15 cents for Catalogue.
F. K. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

THE CHURCHMAN.
THE BEST and LARGEST Weekly Newspaper, with the largest circulation in the Episcopal Reformed Church. Sent free for one month for examination, and till Jan. 1, 1870, to new subscribers for 50 cents. Address at once
M. H. MALLORY & CO., Hartford, Conn.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES
To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machines. Stitch alike. Best licensed machine. $20 dollar on both sides. First machine on trial. For further particulars, address
THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

EVERY ONE WILL FIND
ENTERTAINMENT, PROFIT, AND NO HARM IN THE
NEW YORK OBSERVER.
$2 50 PER ANNUM.
SAMPLE COPIES FREE.
SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

WANTED AGENTS.—$25 to $200 per month, expenses paid, to introduce our new and wonderful NEW NOVELTY SEWING MACHINE. A new thing, with the following combination of Hand Machine, $18; with Table and Foot power, $25. Send for Circulars, with Cut of Machine, and terms to Agents.
Address W. S. HILL, Manchester, N. H.

Agents! Read This!
WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $100 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission to sell our new and wonderful invention. Address HUNTER & CO., Alfred Centre, N. Y.

$100 to $250 per Month guaranteed. Sure pay. Salaries paid weekly to Agents every where selling our Celebrated Lightning Wire Clothes Lines. Call at, or write for particulars to the Grand Wire Mills, 1109 Market st., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any colored hair or beard to a permanent Black or Brown. One Comb sent by mail for $1 25. For sale by Merchants & Druggists generally. Address Magic Comb Co., Springfield, Mass.

$3600 a Year guaranteed to Agents. Address J. ALEAKIN, 5 P. O. Avenue, Baltimore, Md.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1870.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year . . . $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year . . . 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year . . . 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

[For Prospectuses and particulars for Remitting Moneys, Postage, &c., see the fourth column of this page.]

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains nearly DOUBLE THE AMOUNT OF MATTER furnished in The Galaxy, The Atlantic, Putnam, or Lippincott. It exceeds in about the same ratio any English Magazine of the same general class, such as Blackwood, Fraser, Macmillan, Temple Bar, Belgravia, or The Cornhill.

☞ A New Story, splendidly Illustrated, by WILKIE COLLINS (Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone"), will be commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY in November, 1869.

☞ Persons desiring to renew their Subscriptions to HARPER'S PERIODICALS will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their Names as early as convenient before the Expiration of their present Subscriptions. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

☞ New Subscribers will be supplied with either of the above Periodicals from the present time to the end of the year 1870 for Four Dollars.

NEW YORK, Oct. 15, 1869.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1870.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year; for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with the actual prepaid for the MAGAZINE, 24 cents; for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be restored without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200: Half Page, $105: Quarter Page, $56—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line: Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

"WHAT A FALL WAS THERE, MY COUNTRYMEN!"

THE CELEBRATED

TRADE MARK. REGISTERED 1865.

BRAND BLACK ALPACAS.

This Brand of Alpacas, on account of its fineness of cloth and richness of color, has become the Standard Alpaca now used in the United States.

These goods are greatly regretted in Weight, Bloom, and Shade for the Fall and Winter wear; and, being made of the very finest material, they are absolutely superior to any Alpaca ever sold in this country, and are now one of the most fashionable and economical fabrics worn.

These beautiful goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in New York, Brooklyn, and in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

WM. I. PEAKE & CO.,
46, 48, & 50 White St.,
Sole Importers of the Brand for the United States.

"PERFECTION"
Coffee-Pot.
[Patented June 1, 1869.]

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French patents, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY,
DURABILITY,
and CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
Wallingford, Conn.
Sample and Sales Rooms, 19 John St., N.Y.

NATURE'S REMEDY
MIDDLETOWN MINERAL SPRING WATER
COME TO IT
IT WILL CURE YOUR ILLS
M. H. S. Co. Middletown, Vt.
Trade-mark Formed.

Middletown Mineral Spring Water cures all diseases of the Kidneys, Skin, and Blood more promptly than any other known remedy.

☞ Call for TESTIMONIALS or CURES. Sold by Druggists.

Caution.—All genuine bears our trade-mark, and the bottles and corks are branded "Nature's Remedy."

Address J. JAY JOSLIN,
Treas. M. M. S. Co.,
Middletown, Vt.

Or, S. H. Scripture, 193 Broadway, New York, General Agent.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

FOUNTAIN PENS. One dip writes 4 pages. $1 50 a gross, postpaid.—Penknife and Pencil combined.—Eraser and Pen-Holder combined, and 12 Fountain Pens, 50 cents, postpaid. Sold at sight. AGENTS WANTED. CITY NOVELTY CO., 464 Library St., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE SECRET OF BEAUTY lies in the use of HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM for the complexion. Roughness, Redness, Blotches, Sunburn, Freckles, and Tan disappear when it is applied, and a beautiful complexion of pure, satin-like texture is obtained. The plainest features are made to glow with healthful bloom and youthful beauty.

Remember, HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM is the thing that produces these effects, and any lady can secure it for 75 cents at any of our stores.

To preserve and dress the Hair use LYON'S KATHAIRON.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO,
FOR CLEANING AND POLISHING.

SAPOLIO will make Tins resemble Silver. Use only SAPOLIO to clean White Paint. From Marble SAPOLIO removes all Stains. For polishing Knives SAPOLIO is unsurpassed. For cleaning Brass Stair-Rods SAPOLIO has no equal. If you would have Clean windows, use SAPOLIO. Sample cake sent by mail on receipt of 20 cents.

Depot, 211 Washington St., New York.
Established 1809.

Particular attention is called to our SOAPS for family use.

Dr. JNO. V. BURTON'S
TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO. In entirely vegetable and harmless. Purifies and enriches the blood, invigorates the system, poisonous great nourishing and strengthening. Never fails to remove, and so regulates the stomach, as to dispose the heartiest food, without distressing. Cures all nervousness, sick headache and dizziness, and is highly recommended. Price Fifty cents per box, post free. An immense number of testimonials can be seen at the office, with letters, testimonials, references, etc., sent free. Agents wanted. Address
DR. T. E. ABBOTT, Jersey City, N. J.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
☞ CAUTION.—Beware of humbug imitations. [Trademark & Copyrighted.]

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Makes the lock-stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $100 to any one who can sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than it makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $15 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.
CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical chain-stitch machine manufactured.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.

MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 78 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TAYLE, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCURDY, Nashville, Tenn.; KUNKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; C. M. MYERS, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MOR. C. BUSH, Pittsburg, Pa.; CLUETT & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. F. HAGADORN, Rochester, N. Y.; J. H. HOUTTENZEIL, Syracuse, N. Y.; H. S. MANCHESTER, N. Y.; H. UTLEY, Buffalo, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; COREY BROS., Providence, R. I.; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C. W.; E. PERLY & BRO., St. John, N. B.

ADDRESS TO SMOKERS.

In reply to the many inquiries made daily in regard to Meerschaum Pipes, we wish to state that we recommend, especially for home and office use, the plain Hungarian and Egg Bowls, with Weichsel Stems. They hold the most tobacco, and are the most durable and practical ones, being the easiest to clean. Or the Hamburg shape, having the largest surface to show color. For travelling and street smoking, we recommend the London Straight and London Bent.

Being represented extensively throughout the country by our goods, we are desirous to have our Pipes—which are considered equaled by none—still more extensively used by those who relish a good smoke, and find Cigars too expensive. Therefore we have reduced our prices to the following:

We will sell 1 No. 2 Pipe for $5, and charge $1 additional for every number higher: therefore No. 4 costs $6; No. 6, $10; No. 13, $15, &c. Pipes from No. 4 to No. 8 are considered full-sized ones; from No. 9 upwards, large ones. In the price is included a Case and Stem.

Nice Amber Mouthpieces for Weichsel Stems we are selling from $1 to $3 a piece.

We send Express to collect on delivery, amount and charges; but request that the amount be sent in Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order in advance, to save consignee the express-return charges.

In conclusion, we wish to state that we warrant all our goods (which we stamp with our name) to be real Amber, genuine Meerschaum, and to color, and will readily give every information in regard to it, based on thirty years' experience in the trade, having received our Diploma in 1859 by the respective commissioners in Europe; and we will ever uphold the fair fame we have acquired in the introduction of the MANUFACTURE OF GENUINE MEERSCHIAUM GOODS into this country.

We cut Pipes and Cigar-Holders of any shape or design, mount them, do repairing, boiling, and polishing. Also, Amber Work done. And, in short, all of, do not charge extortionate prices. For reference, we are in possession of commendations from thousands of our customers, representing all classes of society.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Genuine Meerschaum Goods.
STORES: 619 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel, and 27 John St., 2 St. John.
SEND FOR DIAGRAMS, CIRCULAR, AND PRICE-LIST TO LETTER BOX 5846.

A Seven per Cent.
GOLD LOAN.
$6,500,000.

The Kansas Pacific Railway, now in successful operation from Kansas City to Sheridan, proposes to build an extension to Denver, Colorado. The Government has granted Three Millions of Acres of the finest lands in Kansas and Colorado, which are mortgaged for the security of a loan of $6,500,000.

This loan is secured in the most effectual manner. It represents a small part of the appreciation, and will open the trade of the Rocky Mountain Country, and connect it with the great markets of the East. It is considered to be one of the best loans in the market.

EVERY DETAIL FURTHER RESPECTS THAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

The loan has thirty years to run, principal and interest payable in gold semi-annually, seven per cent. The coupons will be payable semi-annually in either Frankfort, London, or New York, and will be free from Government taxation. The bonds for the present are sold in currency at 90, with accrued interest.

Circulars, maps, and pamphlets sent on application.

DABNEY, MORGAN, & CO.,
53 Exchange Place, N.Y.
M. K. JESUP & CO.,
12 Pine Street, N.Y.

A HOUSEHOLD WORD!
Buy your
CHINA, GLASS, SILVER-PLATED WARE, CUTLERY, and COOKING UTENSILS, AT BASSFORD'S,
COOPER INSTITUTE, N. Y.,
and save 20 per cent.

CARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Keep the Stomach in Tone, the bowels open, and the liver active with CARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, and you brave any climate without fear.

NO DRUGGIST IS WITHOUT IT.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE and CLAVERACK COLLEGE offers a Four Years' Collegiate Course for Ladies. Graduates receive the Baccalaureate Degree. A Three Years' Mercantile Course for Ladies and Gentlemen. The best college accommodations for young men. Board and tuition in the entire course $300 a year. Re-opened September 8. Address REASON H. ANDERSON, A.M., CLAVERACK, N. Y.

FRENCH BRANDY.

Chemically Pure, Twenty-three years old, for Medicinal Purposes and Weddings, $2 50 per Bottle, or $24 per Gallon. Sent C. O. D. Imported for this Medicinal Use. P. LATOUR & CIE., 223 Pearl St., New York.

DEAFNESS & CATARRH, Specialty.—Cases literally guaranteed or money returned. By the Inventor of the Celebrated Patent Invisible Organic Vibrator for Deafness. Endorsed Treatise on Deafness and Catarrh sent for 10c.
DR. T. H. STILWELL, 763 Broadway, N. Y.

FREEMAN & BURR, FALL AND WINTER CLOTHING,
138 & 140 Fulton St., New York.

FREEMAN & BURR'S stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety. Their spacious Warerooms, 100 feet by 80, are entirely devoted to the display of a magnificent stock of Men's and Boys' Fall and Winter CLOTHING, giving purchasers an unequaled assortment from which to make selections.

OVERCOATS for all seasons. Prices ranging from $8 to $35.

SUITS for any occasion or occupation.

BOYS' SUITS and OVERCOATS for all ages from 3 to 15 years.

A LOT OF SLIGHTLY DAMAGED STOCK AT LESS THAN HALF COST.

SELF-MEASUREMENT.—FREEMAN & BURR forward CLOTHING to all parts of the country, and guarantee perfect fitting in all cases, by their new rules for self-measurement, which, with price-list and patterns of goods, they mail free on application.

The Gonzalus Hat.
For Gentlemen's wear. Just out.
Something Entirely New. The Trade supplied.
DANIEL D. YOUMANS,
HATTER & FURRIER,
717 BROADWAY, New York Hotel.
IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS.

No Longer "A Skeleton in every Household"!

THE RESILIENT DRAPERY SKIRT
"MONOCRAT."
THE ONLY PERFECT SKIRT!

It is a complete Balmoral or Muslin Skirt, with which steel springs are combined in a novel and ingenious manner, rendering it Elegant, Comfortable, Durable, and Safe.

The springs may be removed by any one with perfect ease, so that the skirt may be washed as pleasure. For sale by all first-class Dealers.

WATERMAN & MAYER, Patentees.
THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO., Sole Manufacturers.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
20 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 669.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

LORD AND LADY BYRON.

LORD BYRON.

LADY BYRON.

MARRIAGE SIGNATURES OF LORD AND LADY BYRON, JANUARY 2, 1815.

IN his prime — between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-eight — BYRON was undoubtedly one of the handsomest men that ever lived. His head, though beautifully shaped, was indeed somewhat too small for his body. Out of a whole regiment of soldiers there was only one who could wear his hat. In his youth he was very fat. At eighteen he weighed 207 pounds; but this tendency to obesity disappeared as he came to manhood. His height was five feet eight and a half inches, and his usual weight about 175 pounds. He was long and strong of limb; and, notwithstanding his slight lameness, was a proficient in athletic exercises. He was a magnificent swimmer, a clever boxer, a good cricketer, and a fair pedestrian. The defect in one of his feet has been greatly exaggerated. At his birth —owing, as he affirmed, to the "prudishness" of his mother—one foot was twisted out of its position, and so much distorted that in his childhood it amounted to a noticeable deformity. But in the course of time, by the use of an apparatus contrived for that purpose, the foot was brought to its proper position, and was perfectly well-shaped, only it was an inch shorter than the other; but it remained comparatively weak, and at times gave him intense pain. The weakness was mainly in the sole, but extended somewhat to the ankle and the muscles of the calf. At the age of fifteen he writes that he had just been able to wear a common boot upon this limb. Nothing was apparent of the defect but a slight lameness, amounting only to a scarcely noticeable limp. So slight was this that it is even now uncertain which was the limb affected. MOORE was wholly unable to decide from his own recollections; but after inquiring of those who knew him when a boy, who remembered that it was the "off leg which limped as he walked up the street," he decided that it was the right one. JACKSON, his teacher of pugilism, came to the same decision by calling to mind whether he was a right or left hand hitter. Moreover, if MOORE is to be credited, the shoemaker who worked for BYRON for years stated that it was the right foot. But that same shoemaker has furnished a written certificate that it was the left foot; and this is confirmed by the Countess GUICCIOLI. The strength of his limbs, and the soundness and capacity of his lungs, are shown by the fact that he could swim for three or four hours without touching bottom. Until he had impaired his constitution by his excesses in Italy, he seems never to have known what sickness was. In the ordinary course of nature he ought to have overpassed fourscore, and been alive to-day. During the last five or six years of his life his early tendency to obesity returned, and he became decidedly fat; while, owing to his entire abstinence from exercise, except on horseback, his limbs became so much shrunken that TURLENEFF, who stole a view of the corpse, averred that both legs were shriveled from the knee downward. The portrait which we give is from the picture which is acknowledged to be the best likeness of BYRON in his best state, just before his marriage. The portrait of Lady BYRON is from a picture painted some years later. She sat for the picture for the express purpose that it should be used as an illustration for an edition of BYRON'S poems; and it was so used, of course, with her express knowledge and consent.

TYPES OF THE CUBAN PATRIOT SOLDIERS.—[SEE PAGE 674.]

TYPES OF CUBAN SOLDIERS.

THE illustration on our first page, "Types of Cuban Patriot Soldiers," is principally interesting from the fact that it shows the importance of the negro element in the Cuban revolutionary army. It must be remembered that these negro soldiers are not fighting for the freedom of Cuba alone, but for their own also.

THE FOUR-LEAVED CLOVER.

IF it be true or no
That rhyme is a four-leaved clover,
As the old stories go,
This night I mean to discover

Ankle-deep in the dew
(With thoughts too sweet to be spoken)
I searched the grass-plot through
Till I found the fairy token.

Shyly hiding from sight
The tender grasses under;
I brought it forth to the light—
Here is my four-leaved wonder!

A small affair, if you scan
Its outward presence merely,
To thrill the heart of a man
With the hope that he holds most dearly.

But love has its mystic lore—
You may name it superstition—
And hope is the open door,
Sometimes, to a sweet fruition.

One thing this night shall show,
Or call me no true lover—
If it be false or no
That luck's in a four-leaved clover!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1869.

☞ In November will be commenced "MAN AND WIFE," a new Serial Story, splendidly Illustrated, by WILKIE COLLINS (Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone"). New Subscribers will be supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement of the Story to the end of 1870 for $4 00.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE DUTIES.

IN the present condition of our politics no demonstration of the regard and confidence of political friends can be more flattering, and none ought to be more persuasive with every good citizen, than the unsolicited summons to honorable office. The very fact that a nomination is often the result of intrigue and bargain, and that it does not always fall upon worthy persons, gives it, when wholly spontaneous, a certain commanding authority. Those who feel that a man who asks for an elective office is by no means necessarily the one who ought to have it, and that it is the duty of all who mean by citizens to do what they can to elevate the tone of politics, and to engage in them the sympathy of the best men, naturally and properly expect that no man will refuse a nomination such as we describe without the most serious reasons.

We cordially agree with this view. Nothing should persuade a man to decline the summons but an honorable and therefore imperative regard for existing duties and engagements which make the right discharge of the new duties impossible, or a consciousness of peculiar unfitness for the office. Either of these reasons will justly release him from the duty of obeying the call. And in this country, when, as often happens, the call comes to an editor, perhaps another reason may be suggested. If an editor who is constantly engaged in comment and criticism upon public men and public affairs becomes a part of the executive government, is he not laid under the strongest obligation to forego the frank treatment of all public acts and persons, whether national or local? Upon such a whole range of topics with which he has an official connection, would not his observation almost inevitably be suspected? And is not an editor who does his duty intelligently, conscientiously, and courteously sure to lose his State, his country, and his party quite as efficiently as he could serve them in any office?

The independence of the press, of which we hear a great deal of proud rhetoric, is the independence of the editor. But every editor knows, and every reader can see, how easily that independence may be disturbed. If, for instance, an editor privately solicits for his friends appointments to office, and is successful, his pen becomes naturally very reluctant to censure the appointing power. On the other hand, the appointing power, in fear of newspaper hostility, is sorely tempted to appoint the editor's candidate, even if he does not appear to be altogether worthy. Indeed, to preserve the strict and unsuspected independence of the press, and therefore to enable it to fulfill its real function in our political society, the editor must carefully avoid every thing that creates personal political obligation. The editor who has not free from "entangling alliances" he maintains his highest authority, his best influence.

Yet not the less grateful is the generous call of political friendship which summons him to other duties. If he can not listen to it, he can never forget it. It inspires him to more faithful endeavor. It strengthens him to do boldly what confidence was not misplaced, and that his decision was as wise as it was unavoidable.

NEW YORK TO THE RESCUE!

THE State elections in the year following a Presidential campaign are often hurriedly carried, in a reaction from the natural effort of the previous year, which is generally most seriously felt by the successful party. Of course this is peculiarly true if that party is one which, like the Republican, includes the more intelligent and independent voters; for such men are more impatient of strict party trammels, and are willing to express dissatisfaction by staying at home. Yet it is at these elections that the friends of the successful administration ought to appear in force, that by unanimous vote and support it. They should remember that there is another inevitable reaction following a victory in the national election, and arising from the disappointment which some portion of the party can not help feeling. No administration goes far enough in some ways for some of its friends, but it goes a great deal too far in other ways to satisfy others. A sensible man, therefore, who understands the duties and responsibilities of a citizen, will consider whether, upon the whole, he thinks the administration should be abandoned by its friends; and if he decides that it should not, he will know that the very nature of our politics demands an active and positive support.

The way to give this support is to vote for the candidates and the principles of the party in the election both unexceptionable. In this State no Republican will urge any conclusive personal objection against any of the candidates upon the ticket. Not a single personal character or of purer official reputation are not often presented by any Convention in any State. In the hands of such men the rights and political sympathies were unknown, the interests and honor of the State would be secure. But they are, also, the representatives of the principles upon which alone the party can hope to establish peace and to attain the highest welfare. Necessarily, and for reasons that we have before stated, the election is a State and is the expression of sympathy with a national policy. While the fundamental issues of a morally honorable payment of the debt, and of the constitutional amendments and legal rights are still open, New York can not vote without supporting or opposing both. To vote for Mr. LAMBOM, the Democratic candidate for Secretary of State, and for his companions upon the ticket, however personally honorable and officially efficient they may be, is to vote for Mr. HOFFMAN, and to vote against the Fifteenth Amendment as a just and wise policy.

It is a very different question from the adoption of the new State Constitution, which the Democratic platform condemns, and it is a censure upon the administration of President GRANT. The State of New York should support an honest vote for him. But a stupendous system of fraud, at which the present Governor HOFFMAN, by his confessed failure to punish the guilty, connived, apparently gave the vote to Mr. SEYMOUR. There is no doubt whatever in the mind of any candid man who has investigated the subject that enormous frauds were practiced, and almost exclusively by the Democratic party, and not without the knowledge of many of its recognized leaders. The effort to punish the honest voters of the State will, of course, be renewed this year. Is it a time for those voters to look listlessly on, and, because General GRANT is elected, suppose that the due observance whether New York sustains him or not?

During the seven months of President GRANT'S administration the public debt has been decreased by nearly fifty-seven millions of dollars. The greater vigor and efficiency which he has introduced into our contemptible system of the civil service are notorious to all. The quiet and efficient maintenance of our obligations to other nations is not less familiar. This simple, unostentatious, and severely method and aspect of his administration are most honorable, and appeal to American pride and sympathy in the best sense of those words. Does any citizen of New York who sincerely supported the late war and rejoiced in its result, who believes that whatever the difficulties may be yet that the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment is essential to a permanent settlement—does any such citizen wish that MR. SEYMOUR were President in place of General GRANT? Allowing, as we must allow in all administrations, that every appointment has not been what it should have been, is it therefore desirable that the essential honesty, ability, and lofty purpose of the administration should be condemned?

It is a plain alternative. To vote for the Democratic ticket is to vote that it is a pity that SEYMOUR and BLAIR were not elected President and Vice-President, and the policy of Mr. JOHNSON was not made the financial policy of the country. Do we wish to keep these questions of dishonor and of injustice finally in our politics forever? Does not New York stand by the war and its settlement? Is not New York resolved upon peace and upon the only reasonable condition of permanent peace? She said so last year, and her voice was stifled. Let her say so this year in a tone that no gag of fraud can choke.

THE BRITISH UNITED STATES.

TENNYSON'S "federation of the world" seems to be passing into the vision of practical politicians. MR. CARDWELL, the British Secretary of War, in a late speech, alluding to the impracticability of the present continuance of the British colonial government system, soared into prophetic flights, and exclaimed, "When the time comes, and England calls for the support of her colonies, there will be a confederation such as the world never saw under a single sovereign." This idea is elaborated elsewhere by LORD LYONS, and there is undoubtedly in the minds of some Englishmen a splendid fancy of a vast consolidation of all the dependencies of the crown into an invincible imperial league. Then Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the West Indian British islands, bound in a common interest, ruled by a common Parliament, and subject to equal laws—that is, a British United States. This is the fancy, and MR. CARDWELL'S speech merely hints at the possibility. It says, "How excellent such a thing would be, even if we can't exactly see how it can be!"

Yet, as the Pall Mall Gazette truly observes, in such a league the power of the sovereign and the Parliament of the United Kingdom to declare war for which Australia would be taxed, must necessarily be modified. That implies the creation of a responsible and truly representative of the whole empire—an imperial Parliament, by the side of which the present body would dwindle into a secondary importance, like our State Legislatures by the side of Congress. How should such a Parliament be elected, where should it meet, what should be its powers? Its powers of course be defined by and in a written Constitution; and there must, therefore, be a Supreme Court to interpret the definition, and subordinate imperial courts to administer it as it is interpreted. This, under different names, is the American system. Then comes another inevitable question, the relation of India to the united empire. Shall its government be left as it is, or committed to the new assembly, or shall India be included with the rest, making the British United States "principally Hindoo and largely Mohammedan?" Must it be governed as the Territories of our Union are? In any case, India must necessarily be a recognized question.

The proposition seems to be a dream only at present; but it is curious that it is gravely discussed. It implies such a consolidation of power as to be very different from that nothing would appear to be more unlikely than that it should be entertained for a moment. It would, besides, be a very different thing from the real interests of the smaller parts upon the general policy so evident that they would be willing to take the risks. The eminent member for Liverpool, Congress from England, however powerful his talents and persuasive his eloquence, would find that Australia, and Scotland, and England, with Malta and Gibraltar, were very too strong for him. Yet a mere dream of this kind is prophetic. It is something gained that there should be even the conception of a political fraternity so comprehensive. A very little of the wisdom that contemplates this possibility, could it have been infused into the British counsels of a century ago, would have avoided the jealous hostility that has so long divided the two great nations of the same origin, traditions, and language.

TRANSPORTATION OF FOREIGN CONVICTS TO THE UNITED STATES.

DR. LIEBER has written to Secretary FISH upon a very important subject—one upon which MR. RAYMOND introduced a bill in Congress, late in the session, in 1867, that passed the House of Representatives but did not reach the Senate. It appears that foreign governments are in the occasional habit of transporting their convicts to this country, and DR. LIEBER very properly claims that the matter should be settled by treaty. The latest, most flagrant case, is that of the Government of SAXE-COBURG-Gotha, which furnished some incurable criminals with money and the opportunity of sailing from Bremen to the United States. There is something so offensively uncourteous in such a transaction that it seems hardly credible. Would any members of the Government of that duchy, as private gentlemen, thrust rags infected with pestilence over the fence into their neighbors' gardens? Yet this is what they officially do, when they send criminals to this country. If they can not manage their criminals, why do they pretend to be a Government? and what would be the condition of civilized states if each should make the other a penal colony?

DR. LIEBER states that about a year ago the PRISON SOCIETY of New York received a letter from a convict in the prison of England asking whether some arrangement might not be made by which we should receive a certain class of English convicts who had served a certain part of their penal term, and who promised well; and SIR JAMES GRAHAM, when Home Secretary, made a rule that every convict who had behaved well during two-thirds of his imprisonment should be pardoned upon condition of quitting England. Of course they would come to this country. But the supply of that kind of population from Europe does not seem to require the stimulus of a premium. It is pleasant to know, however, that this kind of transportation is also clandestinely, and is denied when directly charged, for it shows a consciousness of its impropriety. But the custom remains, and its origin is evident. It springs from the old selfish doctrine and practice of national law. States acknowledged what may be called legal and treaty obligations toward each other, but no moral obligations in the true and generous sense.

The remedy, therefore, is as plain as the custom and its origin. It is to abolish the barbarous and barter principle, which DR. LIEBER happily expresses: "The modern law of nations is founded first of all on the principle of mutual interest." The full and generous declaration of such a principle show the immense and beneficent progress of public sentiment. This principle conceives nations as a great family, not as a league of naturally hostile tribes. It gives significance to the phrase, the family of nations. It confesses a common sympathy, a common interest, and is an unexpected and none the less cheering proclamation of the consciousness that God has made of one blood all the nations of the earth. Dr. LIEBER proposes, first, that we should stipulate by treaty that every attempted exportation of convicts to our shores will be considered a grave offense against the law of nations; and, second, that the captains and owners of the importing vessels shall be heavily fined for introducing convicts, which shall be returned whence they came at the expense of the Government. This was the substance of MR. RAYMOND'S bill. He further suggests that after such a law is passed, and in the case of treaties, the Government of the United States should proclaim that it regards such exportation as an unfriendly act.

The subject is one that deserves consideration and action, and which the Doctor treats with his accustomed point and force.

THE UNITED STATES AND CUBA.

THE Hornet, otherwise the Cuban vessel of war the Cuba, has been seized by the United States at Wilmington. If, as there is no reasonable doubt, it should be proved that she was equipped from ports of the United States for the purpose of making war upon a Power with which the United States are at peace, she will of course be condemned. Our markets, as we stated last week, are open both to Spaniards and Cubans. But the latter are not yet an independent Power. They have no recognized flag. They must, therefore, take the risks of the United States' laws of neutrality, which forbid the fitting out of warlike expeditions against our friendly allies. The facts of a Cuban commission, therefore, and of the flying of the "lone star" flag, and of an illegal attempt to create a Cuban vessel of war, do not make the enterprise of Captain HIGGINS in September essentially different from that of Captain RYAN in August.

It is not the least remarkable fact about the attempt to entangle the United States in the Cuban movement by boastful expeditions from our ports that the leaders of these expeditions are ex-Confederate officers and soldiers. Their zeal for liberty and republican institutions in Cuba or any where else we may be permitted to doubt. But there can be no doubt whatever that those who rejoiced in the escape of the Alabama from Liverpool would be unwilling to place the United States in the same position in which that escape placed England. If Captain HIGGINS'S performances should cause Spain to address to us the same kind of demand, and upon the same ground, that we address to England upon the subject of the Alabama, it may be doubted whether Captain HIGGINS would not tear his hair with anguish. Such considerations do not, indeed, affect the duty of the United States under its own laws and international comity, but they are at least suggestive.

Meanwhile, before our paper appears, the United States will probably be challenged to show valid reasons for the detention of the Spanish gun-boats. If they can not be proved to be intended to serve against Peru they must be believed, even if they are destined for Cuba. Nor do we believe that the Government of the United States will regard that fact as sufficient reason for recognizing Cuban belligerency or independence. It is not the vigor and skill with which Spain attempts to maintain her authority, but the force and success with which Cuba resists, that supply the grounds of recognition. Our laws, our traditions, our honorable obligations, beside the moral duties of sincere revolutionists, were, or should have been, fully known to the Cuban chiefs.

It is now stated in the Tribune, apparently with authority, that General SICKLES has withdrawn the offer of mediation that he made to the Spanish Government, and also that the offer, although declined, was received in the most friendly spirit. It is further reported in the World, whose correspondent is probably the President's confidant, that General GRANT is satisfied with every word of General SICKLES's note, including the threat. Then there was a threat. And the Spanish Government received it in the most friendly spirit! It is a comfort that in the vast and conflicting murmur of rumor a man may hear any thing that he wishes to hear. For ourselves, until otherwise informed, we do not believe that the United States have threatened Spain, nor that General GRANT is a Captain Bobadil. But we do believe that the Government has offered mediation upon honorable grounds, and we trust that it will renew the offer. We feel also very confident that the United States will not recognize Cuban belligerency until the facts authorize and compel such action.

TRADE AND THE CROPS.

TRADE during the past week has suffered from apprehensions produced by the gold speculation, from the difficulties attending the transportation of goods over lines injured by the great storm, and also from the belief that as the crops approached for using extensively the new crop of cotton its price would fall, and carry with it some kinds of domestic goods. The price of some fine shirtings and some prints has already been reduced, and probably during this week a further reduction may occur; but as no general panic followed the disturbance in Wall Street, and stocks are not in throughout the country, large sales are still expected in all departments of business.

So far as our crops are concerned, immense loss has already come from the drought which prevailed all along the Atlantic coast, and from recent storms. The two installments we have had of the equinoctial storm broke the drought and supplied a little pasturage; but the important wheat-growing States of the Northwest complain, and no doubt truly, of serious damage to wheat. The settlement of the Old Northwest has been so recent that farmers are not well provided with barns, and as many of them expect to thresh their wheat immediately after it is made into cocks, so as to avoid stacking, they were caught by the great rain-storm in the midst of this process. Their true policy, instead of counting a point to be kept secret, which is the general tendency, is to erect barns to save their grain.

The loss on the two crops will diminish the amount exported to foreign countries, which will be unfortunate not only for us, but for them. England is now supplying herself largely with wheat from this country. The Red Winter Southern is wanted for her laboring population, and the dry and crisp wheat of California is needed to mix with spongy wheat, which falls in a damp, owing to rains in harvest time and the general moisture of the climate. The English crop of 1868 was flinty, owing to the drought which prevailed in England.

The considerable excess in the quantity of wheat taken from us by England for the year ending September 1, over any previous year, is explained on the ground that the English harvest this year was expected to be defective before it was gathered. To the drought of 1868, however, the English want is largely due. England is compelled now to buy from this country, inasmuch as she will require probably for the year ending the first of September next, full seventy million bushels of wheat over and above what her own fields produce. The admitted defective crops in Russia and other wheat producing countries in Europe, and what is short of the crop in this country, will induce her to store more grain than in 1868–'69. Last year the wheat exported was living from hand to mouth, as there was more confidence in the ability to obtain supplies than is now felt.

The grain dealers of Europe spread themselves over this world to purchase wheat and corn at the lowest prices. They obtain the most exact information of the excess which each nation has to sell, and every dealer has a view to command the most important markets by first draining the weaker ones, which are induced to sell low from fear of the ultimate competition of the largest growers.

The information obtained in the United States of the grain crops of other countries is derived mainly from English sources, and they reach us impressed with the tone which interest prompts. Our farmers are consequently at the mercy of those who skillfully avoid purchasing from us until prices are forced down to English limits. There is but one mode of remedying this difficulty which subjects this great interest in the United States to the loss of millions annually.

Our Consular system should be used to collect statistics from all other countries of the crops and productions which come into competition in the markets of the world with our own. The statements of the Agricultural Bureau at Washington of our crops of cotton and grain, as compared with those of the previous year, are regarded as reliable and valuable. Foreign countries are thus informed of the quantity of our productions, but we lack the statistics of what others produce to put our dealers on equality with the foreigner.

During the war our foreign and our commerce was active the Consular system was extremely beneficial; but as our commerce was destroyed during the war, and is not yet rebuilt, no better employment can be found for a portion of the United States than to devote them to this service. For this purpose it would be expedient to appoint Americans and have them instructed to examine diligently and report fully on this subject. The English have an interest the deepest that can exist to know the most accurate knowledge of the condition of all food-exporting countries, as they annually expend about five hundred millions of dollars—mechanical in one year—about one half for domestic consumption; and the success of their competition with France and Germany in manufacturing industry depends largely upon what may be saved in this foreign expenditure. But as our imports exceed our exports, and the balance has been settled by bonds which will be held ever to us for years, it is the first sufficient but necessary that we shall have that knowledge of the productions of other countries that will enable us to meet the foreigner on fair terms.

This is the more necessary, as other states in Europe are by the growth of population gradually reaching the limit of their food supply, and they will be added to the list of customers for our productions.

The wheat area in the United States is gradually receding from the Atlantic on account of the habit common to most new populations of severe and rapid exhaustion of the soil. Successive crops of wheat are taken from land as it is returned to the land, as it is cheaper for the time being to break up new prairie than undergo the expense of enriching old fields. Under costly transportation it thus placed upon the consumer on the sea-board and abroad, which affects our power to compete in the English markets with the cheap wheat of India, and the inheritance of rich lands without strengthening the condition of the country in other respects, we sacrifice our most important interests. Our ability to pay our public debt must depend in a great part upon the reasonable use of our great natural facilities. It is a crime injurious not only to us but to mankind to exhaust the soil of its strength, and it should be punished by penal laws.

If our lands were cultivated on the plan of keeping up their strength, the foreigner will be obliged to pay the same profit upon what is thus raised as he pays now on a plan of exhaustion. The farmer throws off his capital annually, and ultimately squanders his estate. The old portions of the Union, unable to compete in grain production with the West, are driven into other forms of cultivation; but he who makes his land produce two blades of grass where only one grew before constitutes an exception to the general rule.

We urge upon the Government at Washington to secure the establishment of a Bureau in one of its Departments which shall with the duty of spreading before our people the most exact knowledge of the extent of the crops abroad. We have reached the condition when our resources must be made available for meeting great burdens, and we are satisfied that the industry of the country will be greatly benefited by being able to compare with the foreign countries with as much precision as they can use in ascertaining our productions.

NOTES.

IT is one of the most significant of recent facts that what is called the "Conservative" party in Mississippi—which means the Democratic and late Confederates—have nominated a colored citizen for Secretary of State, and elected him by a large majority. It is a most stinging fact. It shows that one of the tendencies of the Republican policy of reconstruction is to destroy the Democratic party, and make it necessary for politicians to propitiate the new citizens. Ten years ago, we were promising ourselves that every Democratic state in Mississippi would not have been strengthened by the candidacy of a colored man. But we remind Mr. THOMAS SPEIGHT, the colored citizen in question, that however his nomination may prove the progress of public sentiment, yet the political status of those who vote for him in Mississippi deny his race equal rights in New York and Pennsylvania, and oppose those rights every where in the country. Those who vote for him would gladly vote that he should have no vote.

THE Hon. E. G. SPAULDING, who was Chairman of the Sub-committee upon Ways and Means in the House of Representatives during most of the financial legislation of the war, has prepared a very complete and valuable "Financial History of the War"—a subject which the historians of the rebellion have very insufficiently treated. Mr. SPAULDING'S work is a most serviceable manual, fully indexed, and accompanied with ample sketch of all the plans, debates, opinions, and laws in relation to the subject. Naturally the author is somewhat prominent in his work, for he was a conspicuous figure in the legislation he describes. But nowhere else will the student find such an array of important facts and documents as in this history, which is published in Buffalo by the Express Printing Company.

MR. COX, a member of the late Democratic Convention of Minnesota, said to his brethren in that body: "For a long time we have been fighting the nigger, and we have got whipped. We have had plenty of nigger, and we are sick in the face. The nigger has been a curse, and I am tired of him. He has filled our belly full, and taken our rags off our back. In other words, he has done to the Democratic party precisely what that party has tried to do to him. And right on the same platform with truth this any party in this country which outgrows human nature and opposes human rights will, sooner or later, in his own phrase, have its legs taken off—short.

A COMMITTEE of the new Board of Education in the city of New York propose to provide for the instruction of forty thousand more children than now attend the schools, and with a reduction of $800,000 upon the school expenses of the present year. This is done by consolidation of departments, by the establishment of a daily normal school for the fourteen hundred pupils who are now in the supernumerary classes of the grammar schools, and by other minor modifications. The Board has taken time to reflect. This is not surprising, as a plan which proposes an immense increase of school facilities with a reduction of nearly a third of the current expenses seems to call for the utmost management of incompetency, or of something else.

EVEN the World is aghast at the summary exclusion of Republicans as inspectors and canvassers at the polls in Brooklyn. But it is certainly not a surprising outrage. A party which is already carry on the enormous system of naturalization and other frauds which were notorious at the election in 1868 every year, and which has erected its subordinates in the rural districts to report promptly which of the naturalized citizens would not venture to take entire possession of the ballot-boxes. There remains but one more step to be taken, and that is to make the Democratic election system in the city of New York, and that is, to prevent the Republicans from voting at all. The Democratic Democratic chief, JAMES M. MASON, took this ground upon occasion of voting for secession in Virginia. He rather jocularly suggested that a body who were in league as to vote against secession should be shot. Tammany need not, however, be at the expense of so severe and final a remedy. It knows a more quiet and effectual way. We appeal to Mr. TILDEN whether the forbidding of Republicans to vote, as well as to count, is not the true and perfect reasoning, would not make him as "serene" over the Democratic prospect as he was in September, 1868, when he came from Maine? It certainly would be in accord with the exact practices of the party that so profoundly respects the will of the people.

THE Evening Post gives the following notice of our neighbor, the Bazar: "Late numbers of Harper's Bazar show the unflagging zeal with which the proprietors and editorial staff study the interest and variety of its general contents. This paper has already attained an immense circulation and unbounded popularity; but the assertions of all engaged upon it are such as would indicate a seeking after success on the part of new candidates for public favor. The young lady who buys a single number of it will be a subscriber for life."

Captain C. F. HALL, who has lately returned from the arctic regions, with new information concerning the fate of the expedition of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN, gave an interesting account of his discoveries before the Geographical Society in this city, on the evening of October 7. Captain HALL, it is expected, will soon give a public lecture in this city, in full details of his late expedition, and will also exhibit the relics which he found in King William's Land.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE President has proclaimed November 15 to be a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer.

The Virginia Legislature was convened October 5, to act on the 15th and 14th amendments to the Fifteenth Amendments. In the House there were 72 Republicans present, and in the Senate 20 to four against the Fourteenth and two against the Fifteenth. One of the latter being a colored Republican Senator, who declined voting because the Legislature was illegal. This was followed by joint resolution, and adjourned till October 18.

The Spanish steamer Eutepe took her clearance from this port for Havana October 9.

Our national debt decreased $30,000,000, of which $2,100,000 bear interest. Secretary Boutwell estimates that on the present rate of reduction $100,000,000 per year—the entire debt would be extinguished in four years.

During the eight months from January 1, 1869, out of 1,000 letters sent from San Francisco 1,144 were to Chinese. The number of Chinese immigrants to California from 1848 to 1868, inclusive, was 168,000.

Postmaster-General Creswell has opened negotiations with the British Post-office Department for a further reduction of letter postage between the United States and Great Britain. By the existing postal convention which went into effect on the 1st of January, 1868, the single rate of postage for letters between the two countries was reduced from twenty-four to twelve cents. Mr. Creswell now proposes a further reduction from twelve to six cents, to take effect on the 1st of January next.

EX-President Franklin Pierce died at Concord on the morning of October 8. President Grant publicly announced this event, and ordered business in the Government Departments to be suspended on the day of the funeral.

The conditions under which the French Transatlantic Cable was allowed to be landed on the American shores are, it is well known, provisional. Our Government, with the consent of MM. Erlanger and Reuter, reserved to Congress the right of sanctioning or putting an end to the authorization. The eventuality which limited the independent privileges of the company's application was recently made to the French Minister of the Interior by agents of the United States Transatlantic Company for permission to land an Atlantic cable at some point on the French coast. The application, signed by two retired Generals and a Major of the United States engineers, was referred to and met by another American gentleman holding a prominent position, who was refused, on the ground that the exclusive privilege to land a cable on the French coast had been granted to the French company. The impropriety of suspending the authorization granted by the American Government to MM. Erlanger and Reuter will probably be considered during the coming session of Congress.

October 8 was the opening day of the second annual meeting of the Jerome Jockey Club, and it was the races closed. The last and great race was won by Stanley Parker for a purse of $2,000. Ten horses entered were "Palmer," "Goldsmith Maid," "Lucy," and "Dexter," "Judge Fullerton," "Tom, Jr.," "Lady Kirk," "Lexington," and "Stanley."

At Jerome Park, on October 9, there were five races. October was the first regular day of the fall meeting—the fifth was an extra or "match" day. The first race on this day was won by A. Belmont's chestnut filly, "Princess," against "Intrigue," a chestnut filly owned by A. T. Stewart. Time, 1.50, 1.51, 1.50. Belmont's "Attraction" won the second race, against Jerome's "Lizzie Lucas." Time, 1.51, 1.51, 1.51. The third race, mile heats, was won by L. P. Holland's "Corsican," which beat Jerome's "Lizzie Lucas." The fourth race sweepstakes—five entries—was won by C. P. Morris's "Lady Blackburn." Belmont's "Attraction" was second. The selling sweepstakes, 1¼ miles—nine entries—was won by Jerome's "Lizzie," Belmont's chestnut "Bonster." Time, 2.09½.

The cotton crop, it is looking up. The shipments of cotton from that port have this for this season been about twice as large.

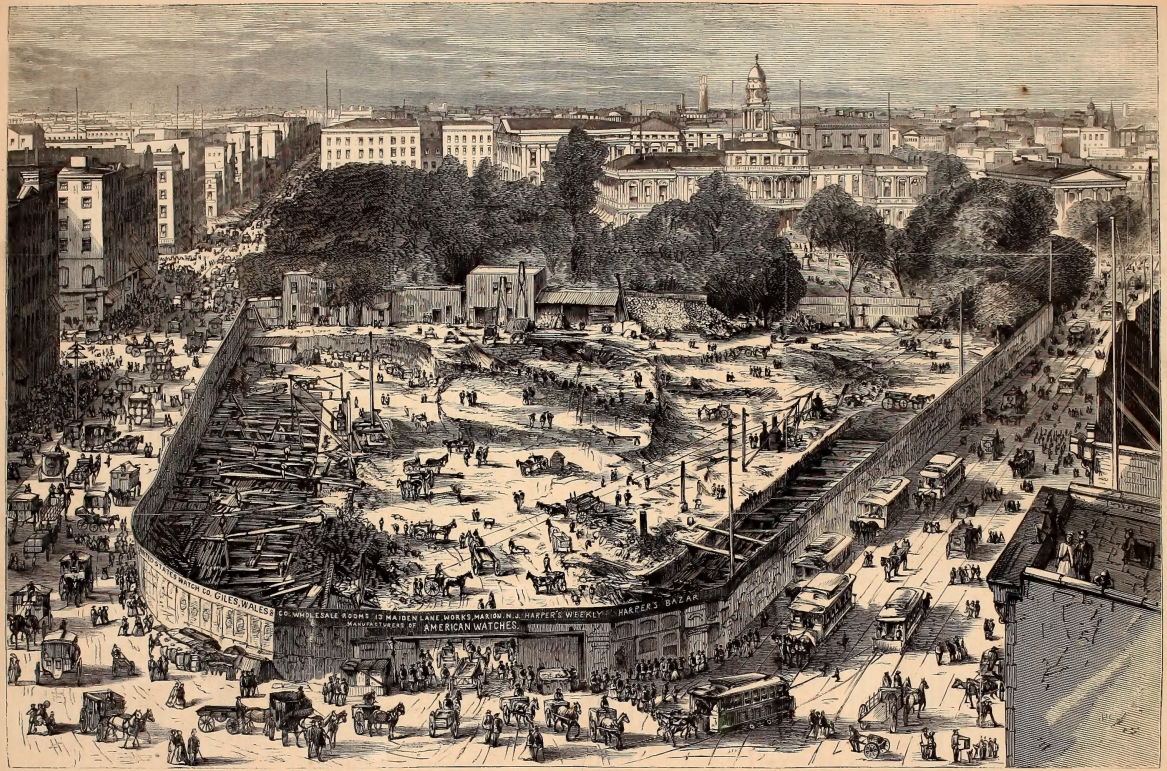
The Troy Whig has made a calculation from which it appears that the canal has fell in Rensselaer and Albany counties on October 5 and 6 to supply every man, woman, and child in the city of the north with a pail and a half gallons of water per day for a year.

The Republican State Convention of Labor Reform nomination for Governor of Massachusetts, electing Senator Wilson, and the Democrats nominated form of the Convention.

The Connecticut Republican Convention met September 29, and nominated J. L. Alcorn for Governor, and Hon. Marcus Bunce for Secretary of State.

The New York Republican Central Committee has appointed General Francis Lee for Secretary of State, and Hon. Horace Greeley for Comptroller.

A fast ran between the steamer ship Dreadnought, of San Francisco. She was lost on July 4 on the Cape de Verde Islands, on the northeast of the Island of Fuego. She had sailed from Liverpool April 18, and was 77 days and 18 hours on the voyage to Rio. The crew escaped from the ill-fated vessel in two small boats, with a few days' provisions. Two hundred days they sighted on the shell-fish which they gathered from the rocks, and on the 10th day they were picked on shore around large fires which they lighted. The crew had been without fresh water, but suffered the slightest violence. By day they pursued their course under sail, and by night rested on the rocks. On the seventeenth day after their shipwreck, fell in with the British steamer Senna Hunt, Captain Ayres. Amenden, treated them with all possible kindness and attention, and put them on board the ship Dreadnought, of San Francisco. She was lost on July 4 on the Cape de Verde Islands, on the northeast of the Island of Fuego. She had sailed from Liverpool April 18, and was 77 days and 18 hours on the voyage to Rio. The crew escaped from the ill-fated vessel in two small boats, with a few days' provisions. Two hundred days they subsis



EXCAVATING FOR THE FOUNDATION OF THE NEW YORK CITY POST-OFFICE BUILDING.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.—[SEE PAGE 679.]

CAPTAIN HALL'S ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

CAPTAIN C. F. HALL, who has recently returned home from his expedition into the Arctic regions, contributes to this Number of the Weekly numerous sketches of the interesting relics relating to SIR JOHN FRANKLIN'S expedition found by him in King William's Land.

Captain HALL sailed in the Monticello in the latter part of June, 1864. He took with him no sailing vessel, but made his ninety days' trip into King William's Land in a sledge. This was his second expedition, the results of the first having been already given to the world in his work entitled "Arctic Researches and Life among the Esquimaux." His first expedition occupied two years and four months, and the discoveries then made encouraged him to make a second attempt to learn all that could be found out concerning the fate of the FRANKLIN expedition. In his second, as in his first, exploration he depended entirely upon the native Esquimaux, and upon his own skill and resources in obtaining his information. In his letter to Mr. HENRY GRINNELL, dated Repulse Bay, June 20, 1869, Captain HALL says:

"The result of my sledge journey to King William's Land may be summed up thus: None of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN'S companions ever reached or died on Montreal Island. It was late in July, 1848, that CROZIER and his party, of about forty or forty-five, passed down the west coast of King William's Land in the vicinity of Cape Herschell. The party was dragging two sledges on the sea-ice, which was nearly in its last stage of dissolution—one, a large sledge, laden with an awning-covered boat, and the other, a small one, laden with provisions and camp material. Just before CROZIER and party arrived at Cape Herschell they were met by four families of natives, and both parties went into camp near each other. Two Esquimaux men, who were of the native party, gave me much sad, but deeply interesting information. Some of it stirred my heart with sadness, intermingled with rage, for it was a confession that they, with their companions, did secretly and hastily abandon CROZIER and his party to suffer and die for need of fresh provisions, when, in truth, it was in the power of the natives to save every man alive. The next trace of CROZIER and his party is to be found in the skeleton which M'CLINTOCK discovered a little below, to the southward and eastward of Cape Herschell; this was never found by the natives. The next trace is a camping-place on the sea-shore of King William's Land, about three miles eastward of Pfeiffer's River, where two men died and received Christian burial. At this place fish bones were found by the natives, which showed them that CROZIER and his party had caught while there a species of fish excellent for food, with which the sea there abounds. The next trace of this party occurs some five or six miles eastward, on a long, low point of King William's Land, where one man died and was buried. Then about S.S.E., two and a half miles further, the next trace occurs on Todd's Inlet, where the remains of five men lie. The next certain trace of this party is on the west side of the inlet, west of Point Richardson, on some low land that is an island or a part of the main land as the tide may be. Here the awning-covered boat and the remains of about thirty or thirty-five of CROZIER'S party were found by the native Poo-yet-ta, of whom SIR JOHN ROSS has given a description in the account of his voyage in the Victory, 1829–34. In the spring of 1849 a large tent was found by some of the natives whom I saw, the floor of which was completely covered with the remains of white men, Close by were two graves. This tent was a little way inland from the head of Terror Bay.

"In the spring of 1861, when the snow was nearly all gone, an Esquimaux party, conducted by a native well known throughout the northern regions, found two boats, with many skeletons in and about them. One of these boats had been previously found by M'CLINTOCK; the other was found lying from one-quarter to one-half mile distant, and must have been completely entombed in snow at the time M'CLINTOCK'S parties were there, or they most assuredly would have seen it. In and about the boat, besides the many skeletons alluded to, were found many relics, most of them similar in character to those M'CLINTOCK has enumerated as having been found in the boat he discovered.

"The same year that the Erebus and Terror were abandoned one of them consummated the Great Northwest Passage, having five men aboard. The evidence of the exact number is circumstantial. Every thing about this Northwest Passage ship of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN'S expedition was in complete order; four boats were hanging high up at the ship's sides, and one was on the quarter-deck; the vessel was in its winter housing of sail or tent cloth. This vessel was found by the Ook-joo-lik natives near O'Reilly Island, lat. 68° 30' N., lon. 99° W., early in the spring of 1849, it being frozen in the midst of a smooth and unbroken floe of ice of only one winter's formation. From certain evidence I have gained both at Ig-loo-lik and King William's Land, there must have been a dog of the grey-hound species belonging to one or the other of the two ships. I only know this through native testimony. It is quite likely that some one in England can tell whether there was a dog on board either of the ships when Sir JOHN FRANKLIN left in 1845.

"My sledge company from Repulse Bay to CAPTAIN C. F. HALL AND HIS ESQUIMAUX INTERPRETERS.

RELICS FOUND BY CAPTAIN HALL IN HIS RECENT ARCTIC EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

King William's Land consisted of eleven souls, all Esquimaux. Although they are as untamable as eagles by nature, yet by their aid alone I was enabled to reach points otherwise inaccessible, and when there to gain much important information relative to the fate of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN's expedition.

* * * * *

"Could I and my party, with reasonable safety, have remained to make a summer search on King William Land, it is not only probable that we should have recovered the logs and journals of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN's expedition, but have gathered up and entombed the remains of nearly one hundred of his companions; for they lie about the places where the three boats have been found, and at the large camping-place at the head of Terror Bay, and the three other places that I have already mentioned. But, however, west side of Point Richardson, however, Nature herself has opened her bosom and given sepulture to the remains of the unnamed victims that died there. Wherever the Esquimaux have found the graves of FRANKLIN's companions they have dug them open and robbed the dead, leaving them exposed to the ravages of wild beasts. On Todd's Island the remains of five men were not buried, but, after the savages had robbed them of every article that could be turned to any account for their use, their dogs were allowed to finish the disgusting work.

"Wherever I found that Sir JOHN FRANKLIN's companions had died I erected monuments, then fired salutes and waved the Star-spangled Banner over them in memory and respect of the great and true discoverers of the Northwest Passage. I carefully gathered great quantities—a very great variety—of relics of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN's expedition, for they were to be possessed by natives all over the Arctic regions that I visited or heard of—from Pond's Bay to Mackenzie River. As I was I had to be satisfied with taking upon our sledges about 125 pounds total weight of relics from natives about King William's Land. Some of these I shall mention: ate: 1. A portion of one side (several planks and ribs fast together) of a boat, clinker-built, and copper-fastened. This part of a boat is of the one found near the boat found by M'CLINTOCK's party. 2. A small oak sledge-runner, reduced from the size on which the boat rested. 3. Part of the mast of the Northwest Passage ship. 4. Chronometer box, with its number, name of maker, and Sir JOHN's broad arrow stamped upon it. 5. Two long heavy sheets of copper, three and four inches wide, with numerous bullet holes for screws. On these sheets, as well as on most every thing else that came from the Northwest Passage ship, are numerous stamps of the Queen's broad arrow. 6. Mahogany writing-desk, elaborately finished and bound in brass. 7. Many pieces of silver—forks and spoons—bearing crests and initials of the owners. 8. Parts of watches. 9. Knives, and very many other things, all of which you, and others interested in the fate of the FRANKLIN expedition, will take a sad interest in inspecting on their arrival in the States."

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book I.

CHAPTER XV.

LADY TALLIS.

It was not until Mr. Levincourt had been reated for some time in the railway carriage that he remembered that he was ignorant of Lady Tallis's address. Young Lockwood had said that she was in London, but where the vicar knew not.

"Maud!" said he, suddenly, "how are we to find your aunt?"

Maud was leaning her weary head against the cushions, and her eyes were closed. She had not been sleeping, however, for the instant they opened her eyes, and repeated the vicar's words,

"How are we to find my aunt?"

"Yes, how?" In the whirl and confusion and misery of this dreadful departure, it never occurred to any that I do not know Lady Tallis's address! Her last letter was dated from the country."

"Mr.—Mrs. Lockwood knows where Aunt Hilda is," answered Maud, after a moment's reflection.

"Yes, yes, yes," said the vicar, with peevish irritability. "Mrs. Lockwood knows! But where can these people be found? Merciful Heaven, it is enough to madden one! It is all confusion and hopeless misery!"

"Dear Uncle Charles, in this I think I can help you. I remember the Lockwoods' address. They live in a street called Gower Street. Do you know it?"

"Gower Street? Are you sure? How do you know?"

"Mr. Lockwood mentioned that his mother had a house there. Her husband bequeathed it to her, and she lives there."

"Very well, suppose we must drive there the first thing. I know of no other way."

After that the vicar closed his eyes also. But for a long time his brain was tormented by conflicting thoughts. Occasionally a gleam of something like hope darted into his mind. Might it not be possible that all would yet go well with Veronica? Some fathers would have deemed that by no possibility could it be altogether well with her. It could not be well to be the wife of a man who had induced her to leave her home clandestinely, to deceive and inflict torturing anxiety on her father; a man who had, at the least, caused a temporary slur to be cast on her reputation, and who had risked tarnishing her good name forever. But in his present wretchedness it seemed to the vicar that to know Veronica Sir John Gale's wife would in itself be happiness and peace of mind. And it must be remembered that Charles Levincourt was at heart a worldly man; that the somewhat lofty ideals and high spirit of high principle which he had observed in Sir John Gale's conversation would by no means be indicated him to refuse the honest but daughter's hand had he asked for it openly. But he was keenly alive to the disgrace of his daughter's elopement; and one less sharp-sighted than he could not have failed to see that the sharp pang he felt was caused by the reflection that Veronica had thoroughly deceived him.

At length he fell into an uneasy sleep, through which he was dimly conscious of mental pain, and of a dread of waking. From this slumber he was aroused by Maud's touch on his shoulder and Maud's voice in his ear, faltering out that she believed they must have reached London.

They were in London. The vicar's sleep-station looked inexpressibly dreary, with its long vistas ending in black shadow, its dull lamps blinking like eyes that have been watched all night and are weary, and its vast glazed roof, through which the gray dawn was beginning to glimmer.

At length we too early to attempt to go to Mrs. Lockwood's house. They must wait at least a couple of hours. But they looked so haggard, so aged, and ill that Maud tried to persuade him to seek some rest at the hotel close to the station, promising that he should be roused in due time. But he refused to do so.

"Sir here," he said, leading Maud to a waiting-room, in which was a large coke fire smouldering slowly, and where a solitary gaslight shed a yellow glare over a huge, bare, shining copper-table, "here is one of the apartment in almost darkness. "You will be safe and unmolested here. I must go and make some inquiries—try to find some address. Remain here till I return."

Maud thought she had never seen a room so utterly undesirable. No place would have appeared cheerful to her at that moment; but this railway waiting-room was the last degree cold and forlorn. She sat there covering over the dull red fire, sick, and chilly, and faint, listening nervously to the distant footsteps that fell on the platform without; to the whistle of some distant engine, screaming as though it had lost its way in the labyrinthine network of lines that converged just outside the great terminus, and were wildly crying for help and guidance; listening to the monotonous roll of the slow swing-door, the occasional sound of voices (once a man laughed aloud, and she involuntarily put her hands up to her ears to shut out the sad sound that jarred on every quivering nerve with agonizing discord), and to the loud, deliberate ticking of a clock on the mantel-piece over the fire.

At length—how long the time had seemed!—Mr. Levincourt returned.

Maud started up, and tried to read in his face if he had any tidings of Veronica, but she did not venture to speak. He answered her appealing look

"I have seen the station-master," he said. "They have not been here. But that is nothing. It is certain. The man was civil, and caused inquiries to be made among the people—oh my God, God, I should have said before this degradation!—but there was no trace of such people as I described. This man made a suggestion. They might have left the train at Uddlow, and taken either come to London by the other line, thus arriving at a station at the opposite end of the town; or—oh, horror!—they might have not reached the junction that communicates with the coast railways, and so got down to the sea without coming to London at all."

"Oh, Uncle Charles!"

"Come, my poor child, let me at least put you into a shelter you can rest in. I will take into consideration of our disgrace. You look half dead, my poor Maudie! Come, there is a cab waiting here outside."

As Maud moved toward the door to obey his summons the light of the gas-lamp fell full on her pale face, and the vicar exclaimed aloud at her startling resemblance to her mother.

It seemed to him that the sudden remembrance of his old love, thus called up at this moment, filled his heart with bitterness even to overflowing.

"Oh me!" he groaned; "I wish it were all over: I am weary of my life."

The cab rattled over the stones through the still nearly empty streets.

Maud's remembrance of any part of London was very vague. She had never been seen the neighborhoods through which she was now being jolted. It all looked squalid, mean, grimy, and uninviting under the gray dawn. At last they came into a long street, of which the further end was veiled and concealed by a dense foggy vapor.

"What number, miss?" asked the cabman, turning round on his seat.

"What do you say?" asked Maud, faintly.

"What number, miss? This 'ere is Gower Street."

"Oh!" cried Maud, despairingly. "I don't remember the number!"

The cabman pulled up his horse, and was now examining the lash of his whip with an air of philosophical indifference, like a man who is weighed upon by no anxiety or responsibility. After a minute or so he observed, with great calmness, "That's ockkard; Gower Street is nuthur a long street, and it'll take some time to knock as all the doors both sides o' the way." Then he resumed the examination of his whip-lash.

"Oh, Uncle Charles, I am so sorry!" murmured Maud. "What shall we do?"

Mr. Levincourt jumped out of the cab, and ran to a door where there was a young woman washing the steps.

"Do you happen to know," he asked, "whereabouts in this street a Mrs. Lockwood lives?"

"Mrs. Lockwood!" echoed the girl, giving her streaming arms on her apron, "this is Mrs. Lockwood's.

The vicar beckoned to the cabman, who had also alighted by his time, and who now had his paw-boned horse up to the door at a funereal pace.

"My good girl," said the vicar, "will you take a message to your mistress at once? It is of the greatest importance."

"Missis can't get up," rejoined the servant, staring first at him, then at Maud, and lastly at the cabman, from whom she received a confidential wink, which seemed to claim a common vantage-ground of Cockneyhood between himself and her, and to separate them both from the vicar and Maud.

"I will send up this card to her," said Mr. Levincourt. He took out a card and pencil, and wrote some words hastily. Then he gave the girl the card together with a shilling, and begged her to lose no time in delivering the former. To her mistress, while she was to keep the latter for herself.

The administration of the bribe appeared to raise the vicar in the cabman's estimation. The latter officiously pulled down the window-glass on his side and opened it, so that Maud could put her head out, and then stood with the handle of the cab door in his hand, ready for any emergency.

The progress of the servant to her mistress's bedroom was retarded by her efforts to decipher what was written on the card, an attempt in which she only partially succeeded. In about five minutes she came down again, and said to the vicar—

"Missus's best compliments, and the lady as you're a looking for is lodging in the room. Side on the first-floor, and will you please walk into the drawing-room?"

The vicar and Maud followed the girl up stairs into a front-room, furnished as a sitting-room. It communicated by folding-doors, which were now closed, with a bed-room.

The servant drew up the yellow window-blinds, desired the visitors to be seated, and asked, as she prepared to leave the room:

"Who shall I say, please?"

"Mr. Levincourt, and— Stay! You had better take no name, my dear ladyship, and say that her niece is here with me, and would be glad if she might see her."

The servant withdrew into the adjoining chamber, as it appeared, for the sound of voices very slightly muffled by the folding-doors was heard immediately. But in a few minutes the girl returned, begging Maud to follow her.

"She ain't up yet, but she'd like to see you, miss; and she'll come out to you, Sir, as soon as possible."

Maud obeyed her aunt's summons, and the door was left ajar, standing at the window, and looking at the monotonous line of the opposite houses. He was, in a measure, relieved by the fact that the first surprise and shock to Lady Tallis of his presence and his errand in London would be over before he saw her. He felt a strong persuasion that tact and self-possession were by no means poor Hilda's distinguishing characteristics, and he had constantly dreaded the first meeting with her. Although he had placed himself as far as possible from the folding-doors, he could hear voices rising and falling in the adjoining room, and occasionally could distinguish her ladyship's tones in a shrill exclamation.

He tapped his fingers with irritable impatience on the window. Why did not Maud urge her aunt to hasten? Every lower minute was of importance to him. He would wait no longer. He would go away, and return later.

As he so decided, the door opened, and there appeared the woman whom he had last seen in the bloom of her youth more than a score of years ago. The transformation of the beautiful Hilda Delaney was very distinct in his mind. At the sound of the opening door he turned round and looked at her startlingly at variance with that remembrance: a small, lean, pale old woman, bundled up in a dressing-gown, and with a quantity of soft gray hair untidily thrust into a brown silk net.

"My dear Hilda," said she, taking both the vicar's hands—"my poor dear friend!"

Her voice had an old, cracked sound, like the tone of a harpsichord instrument which has one given forth sweet notes; and she spoke with as unmistakable a brogue as though she had never passed a day out of County Cork.

"Ah! you wouldn't have known me now, would ye?" she continued, looking up into the vicar's face.

"Yes," he answered, after an instant's glance —"yes, I should have known you." And, indeed, as he looked, he had become familiar to his eyes. She retained the exquisite delicacy of skin which had been one of her chief beauties, but it was now blanched and wan, and marked with three or four deep lines round the mouth, though on the forehead it remained smooth as that remembrance: a small, lean, pale old with that temperance: a small, lean, pale old woman, bundled up in a dressing-gown, and with a quantity of soft gray hair untidily thrust into a brown silk net.

"My dear Hilda," said she, taking both the vicar's hands—"my poor dear friend!"

Her voice had an old, cracked sound, like the tone of a harpsichord instrument which has one given forth sweet notes; and she spoke with as unmistakable a brogue as though she had never passed a day out of County Cork.

"Ah! you wouldn't have known me now, would ye?" she continued, looking up into the vicar's face.

"Yes," he answered, after an instant's glance —"yes, I should have known you." And, indeed, as he looked, he had become familiar to his eyes. She retained the exquisite delicacy of skin which had been one of her chief beauties, but it was now blanched and wan, and marked with three or four deep lines round the mouth, though on the forehead it remained smooth as that remembr that passed. His love for his daughter had ever been marked more by pride than by deep tenderness. This pride was now trampled in the dust, and a feeling of implacable resentment arose in his mind against her who had inflicted the anguish of such a humiliation.

He raised his face distorted by passion.

"From this hour forth I disown and abandon her," he said, in quivering tones. "No one is my friend who speaks her name to me. In the infamy she has chosen for her lot live and die, may God so punish her for the misery she has caused—"

Maud fell on her knees before him and seized his hands. "Oh, hush; oh pray, pray hush, dear Uncle Charles!" she sobbed out. "Think how sorry you must be if you said the words! How you would repent and be sorry all your life long."

"For mercy's sake!" exclaimed Lady Tallis, in a tremulous voice, "what is it all about? My dearest child, you positively must not sob in that heart-breaking manner! Sure you'll make yourself ill."

"And for one who is not worth a tear!" added the vicar. "For one who— But I will never mention her name again. It is over. She is lost and gone irrecovably. Lady Tallis, I would have spared you this if I could have guessed the extent of the degradation that has fallen upon me. My presence in your house at this moment is almost an outrage."

The poor lady sat down in a chair, and pressing her hands to her forehead, began to whimper, "I'd be unspeakably obliged to ye, Mr. Levincourt," she said, "if you would do me the favor to explain. I've got head in in a wild sort of confusion. I really and truly am not strong enough to support this kind of thing!"

"A daughter of us a horrible burden to support," rejoined the vicar, almost sternly. "And God knows that mine is not the least heavy. Am I to be been entirely separated from your husband for some years?"

"Oh, indeed I have! That is to say, there never has been a legal separation; but—"

The vicar interrupted her. "He has assumed another name and has been living abroad?"

"As to that, I am sure of that, because I learned it from his agent, to whom I am sometimes compelled to have recourse for money. But for what he has been living, I assure you, my dear Mr. Levincourt—"

"The villain who has carried away my daughter—stolen her from a home in which he had received every kindness and hospitable care that my means could afford me to bestow on him—the black-hearted, thankless, infamous scoundrel, Lady Tallis, is—Sir John Gale."

THE END OF THE FIRST BOOK.

TRAFFIC IN SOULS.

A CURIOUS case of swindling was brought before a Parisian police-court, which shows a peculiar state of things with respect to the traffic in these ceremonies. It need hardly be said that a large demand for surviving relatives of Roman Catholics to cause masses to be said for the repose of the souls of deceased persons. It seems that the demand for masses in Paris is so large that the clergy in that city are not able to meet it. In order, therefore, to supply the requirements of the public in this matter, there are houses in Paris which undertake for a commission to send the fees and the orders to priests in the provinces. Availing themselves of this practice, two rogues, one of them a priest who had been laid under an interdict for life, had connection with this custom, issued circulars, which they sent to rural priests, offering to act as agents for them, and to negotiate what may be termed their bills for masses. So specious were these circulars that some priests fell into the trap, and sent undertakings to perform masses, leaving the number in blank. As the signatures were genuine, the two persons referred to were able to discover these with the friendly relatives or publishers who were intrusted with the fees and orders. But, instead of sending the vouchers, or forms, or whatever the priests desired to have, in return for their promissory notes, they appropriated them to their own uses. Many were also known to receive orders direct from the public, and there was no guarantee that they did not pocket the fees without making the least move as the only prisoner who remained to take his trial declared that his was a ready-money business, and that he kept no books. He was, he say master to get evidence against him, as the priests who had signed the bills of exchange were naturally reluctant to give evidence in a matter of this kind, which was affirmed to be in accordance with canonical rules, they felt was not creditable to them. One of these witnesses, for instance, had signed bills for 7618 francs' worth of masses, and altogether he was under the obligation of requesting 1200 masses, according to his own admission. How long it takes to say a mass is not stated, but the impression gathers from what was said in, that a priest must rise early in the morning and make long days for it if he wishes to work off such an accumulation of considerable time to work off such an accumulation as this. But great as his liabilities were, they were trifling in comparison with that of the witness who followed him; he had signed bills in that way to the amount in the aggregate of 11,265 masses. There were others whose liabilities were not much inferior; in the list of these may be mentioned one for 5312, another for 7151, another for 2736, another for 1764, another for 2350, another for 11,768, another for 2395, another for 9381, another for 9457, and another, who in proportion was a pike among minnows, whose liabilities amounted to 28,000 masses. So reckless, indeed, was one of these priests that he had signed bills to the amount of 100,000 francs, which, at the current rate of 1 franc a mass, rendered him liable to the same number of masses; in which he may be imagined that if his creditors had come upon him in a body they would have been obliged to accept a composition. There is something to be said in excuse for these peculiar ecclesiastical bills in the case of some of the priests who took part in them. Take, for instance, the case of a cure in an out-of-the-way village, whose stipend would be despised by the worst-paid of English curates, but, for instance, that his clerical vestments were completely worn out, and that neither he nor his parishioners possessed the means of replacing them; a man in such a position could hardly be condemned for resorting to a method of raising means if he bestowed in return for them the duties he incurred; he could only be charged with acting dishonestly when, to indulge extravagance in this respect or in any other, he left undone the do more than he could perform. But it is just at this point that many of the priests are said to have sinned, in order to indulge in more extravagance they became guilty of fraud. While already liable for more masses than they could perform, they incurred liabilities for the performance of others in return for books or other goods, which they immediately sold for what they would realize. That the sensation excited by the discovery of these novel frauds and their magnitude has been great and natural will be easily imagined. Few of the persons who have ordered and paid for masses can feel assured that what they have to hope from them, though some may take smile at their credulity in supposing that any good can reach deceased persons by the performance of masses, all right-minded persons will respect the motives which induced them to sacrifice their money for that from which they themselves could derive no benefit.

THE NEW POST-OFFICE BUILDING, NEW YORK.

OUR illustration on page 676 gives an accurate and comprehensive view of the site of the new Post-office Building in this city, and of the excavations now being made for the foundation of the edifice. The site is in the City Park in front of the City Hall. The work of excavation is going on rapidly. By the first of this month 18,600 cubic yards had been excavated, and over 12,000 cubic yards of concrete, and about 7,000 feet of masonry had been completed. In order to bank up the sides of the excavations and protect it from the strong under pressure or from the influence of the water, there had to be built over one thousand linear feet of bulkheads and cribs, leaving nearly nine hundred feet more to be put up. The structure, under the supervision of Postmaster A. H. Jones, and the immediate direction of Superintendent HULBURD, will, it is hoped, be speedily completed.

THE GREAT FLOOD.

THE recent storm which has caused so much destruction has not been equaled in this country, though it is generally considered a part of our autumn equinoctal, may perhaps more justly be attributed to the unusual heat of the sun and moon which has caused the recent extraordinary tidal wave. It is where the tides have been the highest that the storm has been the most severe and destructive.

This great storm also deluged a large portion of the country with rain. The rivers were swollen; canal embankments, bridges, and dams were swept away; railroads were undermined and the tracks destroyed; mills, houses, canal-boats, and railroad cars were flooded off; and there must also have been many disasters on the railroads. On the Mohawk River, in this State, rose ten feet above low-water mark. The Schuylkill rose in its valley and overflowed the streets of Philadelphia, carrying away immense quantities of lumber and coal, and interfering with the gas works of that city. The Susquehanna rose seventeen feet. The Lehigh River, in Pennsylvania, rose fifteen feet, doing immense damage in its valley and overflowing the railroad track.

In Connecticut the flood was equally ruinous. HURBARD'S cotton-mills, at Higganum, Middlesex County, were swept away; also several houses in Glastenbury. The Housatonic Dam was destroyed. In Maine lumber booms and dams were carried away. In the valley of the Hudson the flood was unprecedented. At Hoosick Falls, New York, the Troy and Boston railway train was thrown into the Hoosick River, and three lives were lost.

It is impossible to estimate the immense damage caused by this great flood: it amounts to many millions of dollars, besides the large loss of human life which has occurred. Many vessels must have resulted from the storm.

From Portland the storm spread northward. At Eastport it took the form of a destructive hurricane. In Eastport alone it destroyed more than half a million dollars' worth of property. Immense amounts were wrecked along the coast. Twenty-seven vessels were driven ashore at Rumney's Bay.

CORMORANTS' NESTS ON MAGDALENA ISLAND.

THE scene depicted in our beautiful and characteristic engraving on page 681 is on the island of Santa Magdalena, in the Magellan Strait, recently visited by a British surveying expedition. This island is midway between the South American main land and Terra del Fuego, and about twenty miles from the Chilian settlement of Punta Arena. On approaching the island hundreds of penguins and fur-seals were seen disporting themselves in the water or basking on the sand and shingly beach, while great numbers of cormorants were perched on the ledges of the perpendicular cliffs. Having landed and climbed to the top of the cliffs, the party were met by a great crowd of penguins, which came rushing out of their burrows where they lay their eggs, and, screaming in their discordant tones, endeavored to hurry out of the strangers' reach. Their awkward gait as they shuffled along on their short flippers, balancing their bodies with their short arms, and rolling themselves over the summits of the cliffs to avoid every obstacle, caused a great deal of merriment to the sailors. Many of these queer birds were soon knocked down. "When we got to the centre of the island," says Mr. BIDWELL, one of the party, "we observed a scene of the most curious description. A few shallow pools of brackish water were surrounded by thousands of cormorants, all seated on little mounds. On our coming into view over the ridge of land which inclosed the small plain, the birds nearest to us took to flight, and as they passed over the others followed their example, but they were so numerous that those underneath were unable to rise until those above had passed over, and the flapping of their wings stirred up the dry guano into a cloud of a most horrible and sickening odor. Some of the boat's crew ran in among them, adding to the confusion and noise. A rough estimate only of their number could be made, but 10,000 or 15,000 is not an exaggerated calculation. On further examination the little mounds on which they had been sitting were found to be their nests, built up of sticks and grass, and placed in rows with the most remarkable regularity, an equal distance being preserved between the nests, nearly all of which contained two or three eggs. A few eggs had already been hatched, and the scared little ones, though but a day or two old, ran off as fast as their legs could carry them into the centre of the nearest pond. The sportsmen of our party had the satisfaction of bagging a dozen or so of the wild-geese, which were known in the upper left-hand corner of the sketch; but the naturalist of the expedition was much pleased with the result of his visit to this interesting little island."

TYPES OF HINDUISM.

HOW striking a proof is it of the strength of the religious principle in human nature, that the grandest works which have ever been reared are those connected with worship! We are in the habit of thinking that we could able to look down upon our planet, his eye would be most attracted by the glittering and painted pagodas of China, Japan, and India, and the richly ornamented temples, and stupendous rock shrines of India: the Mosque of Omar, and the splendid minarets of Stamboul; the pyramids, and vast temples of Egypt, with their avenues of gigantic statues and sphinxes extending for miles: the graceful shrines of classic Greece; the basilicas of Rome and Byzantium; the semi-Oriental church domes of Moscow; the Gothic cathedrals of Western Europe; and the grand fire temples of Mexico and Peru, where, in the infancy of reason and civilization, human sacrifices were offered. But if the All-Father were pleased with the agony of his creatures!

Nowhere has that adoring principle reared grander temples than in India. Egypt may surpass them in vastness, and Greece and Rome may put a premium on the exhibiting a marvelous combination of grandeur, beauty, and variety, the religious edifices of India find no parallel in any other country. The stupendous rock temples of Western India, the magnificent and richly domed topes of Ceylon, the gorgeously carved shrines of Southern India, the tall elliptical temples of Orissa, the lovely and exquisitely finished ones of Bengal, combine with the three-faced bust of Siva in the cave-temple of Elephanta. Here the Hindu God is represented in the three characters—Creator, Preserver, and Destroyer. No Grecian sculpture so well conveys the idea of Goddess. The repose which characterizes the faces of the Creator and Preserver is not the meditation of the saint, but the calm of unbounded power and the Destroyer's face gives promise that not destruction so much as annihilation to the world. In every other instance representations of the Hindu deities are grotesque and horrible.

Some one has said that, in his exquisitely noble and beautiful mythology the Greek adored the divinity of his own nature—of humanity; whereas the Hindu's awful sense of the superhuman, of something infinitely superior to humanity, renders the workmanship of the idol a thing of no moment, and he bows before the palpable type of terror or of power. The sense of the divine presence than the Greek had when standing in ecstasy before his divine Zeus or radiant Apollo.

The great Indian peninsula is now peopled by nations of very diverse origin. Long before history unrolled the place of tradition the country was inhabited by races of men whose descendants still dwell in the jungles and wild hill-sides of India. The first invaders of the country, whoever they may have been, drove the inhabitants of the plains of the North to the hill country of the Vindhya and to the region beyond. These conquerors were themselves displaced by the Tamuls, who in their turn fled southward at the approach of the warlike Aryans, there last being the progenitors of the Brahminical Hindus of today.

Casting a glance backward as far as any history can take us, we find the land in possession of at least four distinct races—the original tribes, the first invaders, the Tamuls, and the Aryans. The religious belief of these latter conquerors gradually diffused itself through the peninsula; but the genius peculiar to the people receiving it has left its mark to the present day.

It is generally conceded that the Aryans brought pure and lofty notions of a Creator from their home in Central Asia; the modern Hinduism is a strange medley, varying in complexion from province to province, and in some places exhibiting features directly opposite to its general character. Wherever the aboriginal element predominates the religion is dark and bloody; where the Aryan is the element it is fanciful, gorgeous, and licentious; wherever the pure Hindu is in the ascendant it is lofty in speculation and gentle in its rites.

Our illustration on page 685 represents a Tamul pagoda dedicated to the bull, one of the sacred animals of the Tamul Hindus. This temple is one of two on the island of Seringham, near Trichinopoly in the Carnatic, in Southern India. The island is formed by the river Coleroon and its branch the Cavery, and its population of high repute. The bull is of immense size, cut from one solid block of black marble; and so sacred is it esteemed, that it is with great difficulty that a stranger can land on the island and approach sufficiently near to realize the proportions of the bull and the exquisite architecture of the temple—now, however, fast crumbling into ruin.

HUMOR OF THE DAY.

A CASE OF ASS-IST-IA.—A donkey tied up.

AFTER all, there is not much difference between the opinions of the opponents of Dr. Jenner. The one are Vaccinators, and the others are Vaccine-haters.

A farmer, who had engaged the services of a son of Paddy's native isle, sent him on one occasion to harrow a piece of ground. He had not worked long before a hearty shout came out of the field, "Arrah, Dennis, by the farmer went out into the field to take notes of Pat's progress, and asked him how he liked harrowing. "Oh!" replied Pat, "it goes a bit smoother now since the pig got out."

ON a white stone, in an old cemetery at Concord, Massachusetts, is this epitaph:

"Here lie the remains of Sarah Bull, Who was buried by its durability To perpetuate the memory, and by its color To signify the unsullied character of Miss Abigail Dudley."

NOT many years since a certain Vermont church was in need of a pastor. One Sabbath the minister engaged for the occasion was well known for his eccentric turn of mind, prayed for "a man from the back settlements, Lord, who can't read a bit, and who has lots of dotage, nor a young man in the goslinghood, but a man with all the requisites imaginable."

WHY is a solar eclipse like a woman whipping her boy?—Because it's a hiding of the sun.

"YOU have not one drop of the great Napoleon's blood in your veins," said Smith, out canvassing for a life-policy, to a servile fellow-citizen. "Don't I know it? I guess he'd have his whole family on my shoulders."

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN MAN AND THE CHIMPANZEE.

The chimpanzees was never known to gamble in stocks. First difference.

The chimpanzee was never known to pass life in making itself hideous and ridiculous under the pretense of fashion. Second difference.

The chimpanzee never suffered from indigestion brought on by overeating. Third difference.

The chimpanzee is not addicted to writing follow-chimpanzees, or to publish malicious things against them. Fourth difference.

WILLIE P——, a little five-year-old, was playing with a honey-bee, when the angry bee stung him. "Oh! grandma," cried Willie, "I didn't know bees had splinters in their tails."

A DARKEY'S ACCOUNT OF A SERMON.—"Well, sahs, de sermon was upon de miracles of de loaves and de fishes. De miracle was dat de seven thousand lived and de five thousand have divided between de twelve disciples; but de miracle was dat day clear."

A gentleman was praising the beautiful hair of a lady, when one of those terrible children whom Providence insists on sending into the earth as agents of hypocrisy and falsehood, exclaimed: "My hair would be beautiful, mamma says, if I did not take so much care of it as she takes of hers. Mamma never stops brushing hers, but always puts it away in the wardrobe before she goes to bed."

An imaginative young man, laboring over the gradual encroachments of womanly accomplishments, story in the manner of dress, breaks into song as follows:

"They took our coats—at first we hardly missed 'em;
And then they took our vests—we only laughed and kissed 'em;
They stole our socks—we only laughed and kissed 'em;
Our shirts they took, and left us in a fix.
Until by slow and cruel degrees,
Our pants, our boots, our hats, our breeches!
Have all been taken from us."

The following version of an ancient ditty is electrifying as a means of keeping children in the juvenile mind:

"Hey, diddle, diddle,
The cat and the fiddle,
The cow jumped over the moon;
The little dog laughed to see such sport,
And the dish ran after the spoon.

THE LATEST QUOTATIONS IN THE MATRIMONIAL MARKET.—Marriages scarce and depressed; engagements dull and declining; breaches of promise forward, and advancing; mercantile business dull; scandal market overstocked; elopements rapidly declining; settlement on the second demand: discarded lovers plenty and stock accumulating; tattling, a good investment.

RIDICULE described as coupons attached to the bond of matrimony.

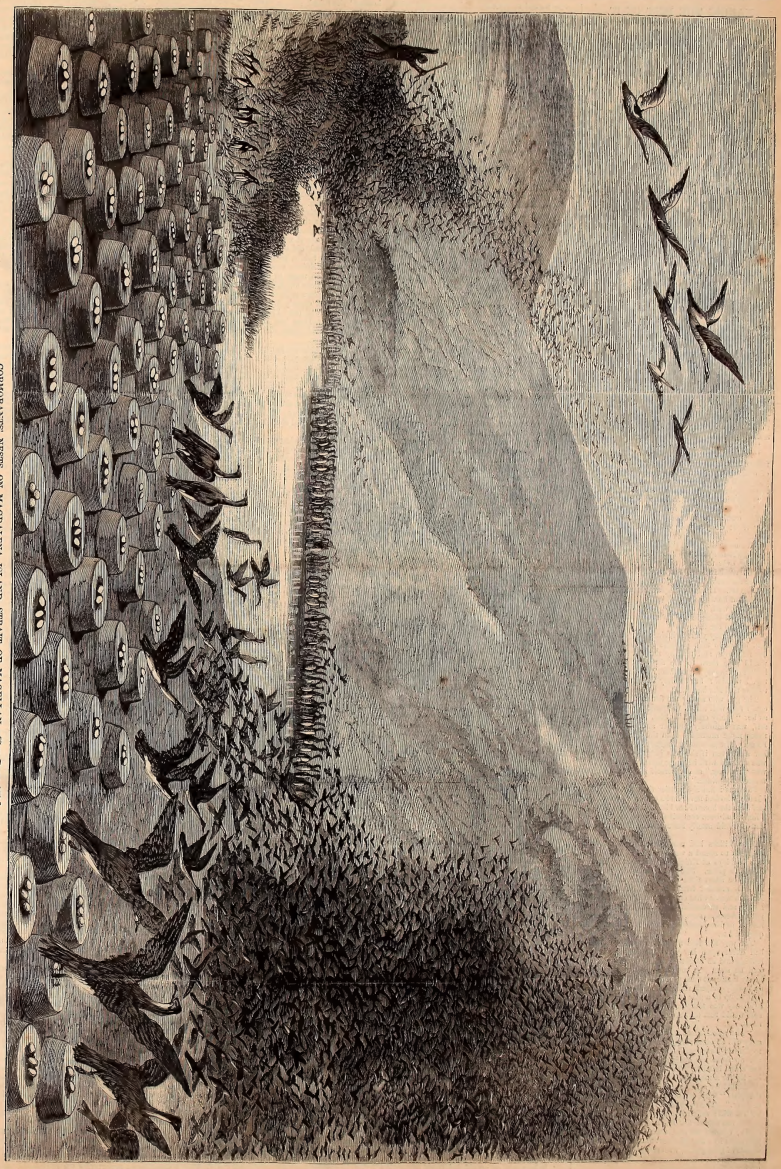
"WHY don't the men propose, mamma,
Why don't the men propose?
Each one seems coming to the point,
And then he goes!
They are frightened at your coat, my dear:
They are thinking of your bonnet.

WHEN Haddock's wife kicked him out of bed he said, "Look here, now, if you do that again it will be likely to cause a coldness in this family."

FATAL FALL.—An unhealthy autumn.

WHY would Saffron have made an excellent actor? Because he could so easily bring down the house.

THE GREAT FLOOD, OCTOBER, 1869.—[SEE PAGE 679.]



CORMORANTS' NESTS ON MAGDALENA ISLAND, STRAIT OF MAGELLAN.—[SEE PAGE 673.]

MAKING THE BEST OF IT.

By ANNIE THOMAS.

"Beauty is easy enough to win,
But one isn't loved every day."

"My face tingles so from the cold air that I shall be unfit for publication for some hours. Let me off the dinner; leave me up here quietly till later—do, Dora."

"Up here" was in Dora Ralston's dressing-room; and the one who wanted to be left there was her cousin, Georgie Villars.

"Nonsense, Georgie; your face will do very well, and I won't have every one disappointed. Here for three days hope has told the flattering tale of your coming, and expectation has been stimulated to the utmost; and you did not come, and I have had to strain my imagination and suggest impossible causes for the delay. Now get up and dress."

The speaker was a pretty, graceful blonde, who was giving a good deal of attention to the reflection of herself in the glass, and was in the position of some flowers in her hair. When she had satisfactorily adjusted the last petal, drawn on her glove, and possessed herself of her fan she turned round to the couch at the foot of her bed, on which in an attitude of ease and indolence Miss Villars was stretched.

"I am too lazy to move," the last-named young lady murmured, sleepily. "Do let me alone. Indeed I am very tired, Dora, though I will get up."

"Mamma's maid shall help you," Dora said, looking impatiently at the key. "I rather want to be down in the drawing-room, to tell the truth."

"Yes, why?" Georgie asked.

"Mamma wishes me to go down," Dora said, falling back upon her sense of filial duty as a full explanation; "but I feel sure that if I leave you you'll stay where you are, and that would be too annoying. Really I don't know what to do."

"Put the key down and leave me to my own devices," Georgie said, springing from the sofa. "You won't be cruel enough alone, Dora."

"What do you mean?" Dora asked, half alarmed.

"You would not rest till you got me here; and now you're in a hurry to show me," Georgie said, walking over to the dressing-table. "I will do that for you, I can fix myself, and be down before the second bell rings. I promise; so you may be off. If aunt can spare her maid, I shall be glad of her. Good-by."

"Very well," Dora said, and then she went away; and Georgie Villars sat down again and looked into the glass.

"How many years is it since my pretty cousin first began to take pleasure in showing me all her new toys, and making me feel that no one would give them to me for love, and that I hadn't the money to get them? When I got a new toy, I wonder? her anxiety to get me here betokens that she has one.

The girl sat back by the fire and thought this could very well afford to speak of Dora Ralston as her "pretty cousin." She, Miss Villars herself, was infinitely prettier and not three times more attractive than the daughter of the house. The personal advantages were clearly on her side, and if she was judged from what she was wearied with her long journey, and her face was "tingling," as she herself said, "to a most unbecoming glow."

She was infinitely prettier than the pampered blonde, who had never had a crease or a wrinkle of leaf from the hour of her birth. Yet she, Georgie Villars, had been compelled to rough it in a way that it would utterly have crushed Dora to contemplate.

Miss Villars had now come half across the kingdom to spend a week or two at the handsome holidays at Knighton Hall, her uncle Mr. Ralston's place. She would much rather have spent the short time that was to elapse till she recently married friend in London. But Dora Ralston wanted her cousin to come and see how happy and successful she (Dora) was, and the poor governess gave up her pet plan, sacrificed herself to her family, and came when they requested her.

The way she had roughed it had not had a bad effect upon her yet. She was as bright looking and as bright-hearted a beauty as could well be seen. A moderate-sized girl, with a lovely figure, a face graceful and pure in outline, a splendidly-shaped, richly-colored little oval face, lighted up by a pair of dark, melting eyes, whose brilliancy was tempered by long, curling lashes that would rest on her cheek when she lowered them.

The affectionate solicitude of my uncle and aunt will be most sorely tried if I don't go down to dinner, I suppose," she said to herself, as she got up from her chair about ten minutes after Dora had left her. There was a little sneer on her lip for a moment, but it died away, and was succeeded by a beaming, blushing smile, as she thought, "Well, it's only for a while, it will soon be over." Then she fell to the task of dressing with a will; rolled her wavy dark hair high up round the top of her head in a luxuriant loose caille, opened her box, took out a mass of drapery, and in a few minutes stood in the midst of clouds of gray gauze, with strings of gray Roman pearls round first and second arms, and gray gloves on her slender small hands.

She wasted no time in looking at herself after she was ready. She opened the door and looked into a dark passage, for Mr. and Mrs. Ralston reserved all their lamps and candles for such portions of the house as fell under the observation of strangers. This was essentially the family corridor, and the family had learned to stumble up and down in safety. Friends, in speaking of the Ralstons, described them as averse to "unnecessary expenditure;" those who were not liked by affection or tongue-tied by interest called them "disgustingly mean."

Georgie was nearly a stranger in the house, despite her relationship with the owner of it. When her father died, leaving her alone in the world without money, he recommended her to apply to her uncle Ralston for protection and advice. She was not twenty then, but she was far too clever to apply to Mr. Ralston; she wrote and told him of her father's death, and he in return wrote in a rebuking strain that was very hard to read, in which he chose to define what he called her fate, but she had a feeling that he did blame her for something. The advice he gave her was comprised in the suggestion that she should "do something for herself, respectably, and always bear in mind that he should feel very much ill used if she disgraced herself." Being a very practical, sensible girl, she felt no resentment either at what he said or at what he left unsaid, but just took what he gave—the advice—namely, to do something for herself respectably.

At that time she had thousands of women as young, as fair, as fascinating, and as unfit for it as herself have to do. She went out as a governess, and got on through several families, in which more or less hard measure was dealt out to her. Once or twice a year, whenever she moved from one place to another, she wrote to her relations at Knighton Hall, and apprised them of her well-being and whereabouts. These letters were generally answered by Dora, who said regularly that they "hoped soon to see her at Knighton"—a hope that had not been realized until this time of which I write.

When Georgie had with danger and difficulty got through the dark passage where none but the family were to be found, and which, she found her way down easily over a handsomely carpeted, liberally lighted staircase and hall, where a huge fire burned in a centre stove, and where two or three men in livery stood about. One of these opened a door for Georgie's door, announced her name, and the next moment she was, so to speak, in the bosom of her family.

It was a warm, not an elegant reception that was awarded her. Mr. Ralston—a rotund, puffy little man, about five feet high, with a fat crimson face, and no more waving hair than served to tuft up to her as she entered, and patting her effusively on the shoulder, vociferously declared her to be "one of dear Dora's friends, by the Jove! whom he remembered when she was that high" (holding his hand two inches and a half from the floor). Then Mrs. Ralston, who had propelled her forward to receive the more subdued welcome Mrs. Ralston offered her.

Mrs. Ralston was a thin, small, timid little woman, with dull gray eyes, and an acute, suspicious expression of face. A cold, cat-like, quiet woman, who never offended people by reason of her extreme caution, but who could be antagonistic to them on an extraordinary degree when she had once made up her mind that it behooved her to be so. She welcomed her husband's niece, Georgie Villars, with extreme politeness, but with none of the fervor that had characterized Mr. Ralston's greeting of the girl. And yet, for all her natural antagonism to Georgie, Georgie had an instinctive feeling that she (Mrs. Ralston) was the one to be trusted most in the family.

She looked round on the rest of the guests—on those to whom Dora had imperiously given over her cousin—and she had promised not to sight. And at the first glance she found them all wanting in all the elements that went to make the simple interesting girl. There were a couple of three elderly gentlemen and ladies of the unmistakable type that speaks of squiresdry and seclusion; country neighbors, whom Dora would take stock of the dinner presently, and return it in kind before the expiration of a month. There was one young lady, who was spared by courtesy —who was unmarried still, and was therefore obliged, by her sense of duty to her family, to make the best of a very unique by playing croquet, and dancing whenever she was given the opportunity. And there were also two men—evidently unappropriated men; and "which of them is Dora's new toy?" Georgie Villars thought as her eyes fell on them, even before she had time to speculate farther, one of these men was being presented to her as Mr. Butler, and he was offering her his arm to lead her in to dinner.

Who is our vis-à-vis?" she asked, after a short time, when the dinner-table conversation —or gabble, rather—was in such full swing that there was no chance of her being overheard. Their vis-à-vis was the other evidently unappropriated man; and it was equally evident that Dora Ralston did not mean him to be unappropriated much longer.

"Sir Lionel Arden," Mr. Buller answered, and instinctively, as he answered, he looked with a belligerent keenness at the girl by his side, in order to see whether or not she appeared to be in the least degree impressed with the sound of the title.

But Georgie's glorious eyes surveyed her vis-à-vis with the same calm indifference that had lived in them before her companion had told the tale of the title. Presently these same glorious eyes floated languidly on and rested on her cousin Dora; and then Mr. Buller, still watching her keenly, saw her lips part and her eyes deepen with amusement.

"Is he a new or an old habitué of my uncle's house?" she asked, after a pause; "I don't remember his name even having been mentioned to me before."

"An old acquaintance, but quite a recent habitué," Mr. Buller replied. "He has been a comparative recluse for some years; but your cousin's influence has lured him out of his solitude, and, if report speaks truly, will lure him into matrimony again."

"Is he a widower, then?"

"Yes. His first wife died when they had been married little more than a year; she was very young, too, and very lovely, which added to the melancholiness of her death. Poor Arden! I, for one, never expected to see him sunning himself in London society again."

Georgie was watching the man at her side attentively as he spoke, and it seemed to her that an element of bitterness mingled with his astonishment at "poor Arden's" relapse into comparative happiness. Could the bitterness be caused by her cousin Dora? She determined to try and find out.

It was expectating too much of a man of that type of physique that he should be faithful to the memory of a shade forever," she said.

"Yes, I suppose it was; nevertheless I, Arden's oldest friend, did expect it of him. Even as a very young fellow, he would not accept the flattering attentions and courtesies that women have always been ready to lavish upon him for his handsome person and his fascinating address. Your cousin seems to be conquering, however."

He looked eagerly for an instant at Dora as he said this, and from her to Georgie, whom he had not before seen had attempted the conquest of Sir Lionel Arden she had accomplished that of Mr. Buller.

"He has a handsome person. Of his fascinations I can't judge yet; but I think I should prefer another to the one that almost boyishly-sanguine one in the man 4 married," she said, critically and artfully. Then her eyes rested on Mr. Buller's face for a moment—a face that was handsome enough, but that was lined with much thought and some care; and as she looked he felt that her beauty, and she felt "this man has a history."

Georgie Villars asked no questions of her cousin until they were alone before Dora's dressing-room fire, previous to parting for the night. Then she asked two, half-absently:

"What is Mr. Buller, Dora?"

"What is he? Oh, rather a nice man, with very funny ideas. He had a good property until he was ruined by a law-suit, I believe, about rubbishing paper was found, written by his father, requesting him to share the property that he had been left sole heir to with an elder brother, by a private marriage, of whom he had never heard. Papa said the request would have been thrown to the fire as that of a madman, but Mr. Buller goes in for being honorable, and chivalrous, and all that rubbish; so he accepted the unknown claim, and went himself as a tutor—fancy it!" Dora wound up in a tone of such angry wonder that Georgie Villars saw in a moment how much Mr. Buller's history very easily.

"And, I suppose, before he did this very despicably chivalrous thing, that you had some interest in him?" she asked, sarcastically.

"Indeed I did," Dora answered, earnestly. "We were engaged, but I got papa to break it off at once; he's down staying in the neighborhood for the present holidays now, and he will come here and let me see that he likes me still—though, of course, it's very painful to me." Dora put her face down and looked effectively on one side as she spoke, and looked pensively down at nothing through her long eyelashes for a moment. Then she said:

"But, though a marriage between us is quite out of the question now, I have the highest respect for him, and should like to see him happy; you would suit each other so well, Georgie. I had the possibility in my mind when I asked you come down. You are good at fall in love with one another."

"Thanks, you," Georgie said, dryly. "I thought that I should be offered a reversionary interest in one of your broken toys if I came down; it was very kind of you to think of me, if you remember, dear; and I am duly grateful. What is Sir Lionel Arden—to you?"

"Nothing at present; we are not quite engaged, that is," he added, hurriedly; "but he admires me more than any one he has ever seen before even than he did the wife who died so long ago."

"Has he told you this? If he has, it is definite enough, I should say."

"He hasn't exactly told me," Dora said, hesitatingly; "but I can read it in his manner, and in Mr. Buller's also. Arthur has tried to conceal the fact that he sees what Sir Lionel wants—it's so silly of him."

"Did you tell Mr. Buller, dear?" Georgie asked, softly.

"Oh, desperately at one time!"

"But you showed him no favor when his fortunes fell?"

"I have shown him some now by introducing him to my lovely cousin," the heiress of Knighton Hall answered, lightly. Then Georgie yawned, kissed her cousin, and went away to her own room. "The heartless coquette!" she said to herself, as soon as she was alone. "She will be punished. The banished lover has no eyes for me, but the baronet has."

With unwonted hospitality Mr. Ralston had invited Sir Lionel Arden to be his guest for the ensuing week; and when he had accepted the invitation he had acknowledged to himself that lovely, fair, volatile Dora was the magnet that attracted him to Knighton Hall. However, he had not been there three days before he discovered that her little three was a powerful attraction, in the shape of Dora's splendid cousin, Miss Villars. And Dora herself awoke partially to the fact; and, scenting danger, and unable to tell how best to avert it, she entreated her mother to "get Arthur Buller there to stay." "He is just the sort of semi-romantic hero to take Georgie's fancy," she said; "and at present Georgie does for her society on Sir Lionel in such a forward way."

"I always thought her a bold and unscrupulous young woman," Mrs. Ralston said, shrewdly. She, too, saw how things were going, and, like Georgie, felt her husband's interest on her side. But on no account would she have blamed the man. The woman in such cases as these always has the blame, and in front of it. She called Georgie bold and unscrupulous, and declared that it was evidently disgusting to Sir Lionel the way in which she ran after him.

Mr. Buller came as invited, but his coming made no manner of difference to the pair of delinquents. It was utterly and absolutely untrue that Georgie was bold or unscrupulous, and that she ran after or disgusted him. But she did not shun him. The man had a charm for her quite independent of his title and his wealth; and, since he sought her, why should she deny herself the pleasure which that charm shed over their intercourse? She did not shun him, and he sought her; and Dora watched with eyes that strove to revenge herself by flirting vehemently with her old love.

"Dora, you're a fool to go on as you do," her mother said to her with cold decision one day; "but Georgie must go. I shall manage to get rid of her." And the same day Georgie Villars knew what her position is when she is not here. He won't wish to marry a teacher out of a school, I fear."

So that day at luncheon the attack which was intended to rout Georgie was commenced in the following way:

"What length holidays do they give at your school, Georgie?"

"Holidays?" Georgie answered, blushing a little. She was not ashamed of the reference to her position—that had been confided to Sir Lionel—but of the meanness of her aunt's attack she was most heartily.

"I dreadfully long!" that lady said; "most unjust to governesses and children, I think, to give such long holidays. Had you taken another situation for the time, dear, that you were so unwilling to come to Knighton for a week?"

"No. I wanted to go to some dear old friends to stay the whole time, if possible, and I got on sadly."

"Lucky people! to be able to spare a room to one guest for the whole six weeks," Mrs. Ralston remarked, with a sigh of envy; and then Georgie said, simply, that she "would not monopolize a room at Knighton any longer."

"Well, you see we have a perpetual visitor," Mrs. Ralston began to stammer and blunder under the cold consciousness of being keenly observed by both Sir Lionel and Mr. Buller—keenly observed by them, and satirically observed by her niece.

"I shall not mind it in the least, aunt," that young lady said, smiling; "but I am not so sure about my friends—"

"Oh, I imagined that they were friends on whom you could rely," Mrs. Ralston interrupted, sneeringly. "Of course if you can't go to them—"

"I can go elsewhere," Georgie interrupted her aunt, "and I will; I don't wish to rely on any one, I am beginning to think," the girl added, sorrowfully. Then, remembering that a semblance of sorrow was the best mask in superficial society, she banished it, and resumed with a smile.

"I must be false myself this afternoon—false to Dora. I promised her that I would go for a drive with her, and instead of that I must stay in and mind the baby of my acquaintance."

"My maid can pack for you, dear," her aunt said, suavely.

"You could she—are very good; but it's not the packing so much as some letters, which, by-the-way, must be written before post-time," she continued, jumping up, and so closing the meeting in which were too many of the elements of embarrassment to be perfectly agreeable to any one.

About an hour after this Dora, exquisitely habited in a driving costume of black velvet and white astrakhan, was standing on the lower step of the flight that led up to Knighton Hall, flickering her white whip impatiently. Two pretty, fiery as a pair, small grays, neatly matched, nicely groomed. But she was resolving in her own mind that she would have something very superior to them when she was Lady Arden.

It was a great relief to her that her cousin was not going with her this afternoon. It was an even greater relief that her cousin was going to stay altogether. Not that Miss Dora Ralston paid herself the poor compliment of imagining that she needed a clear field. Still Sir Lionel had not come to the definite point so specially as she had believed he would do before Georgie came upon the ground. "The mere sight of your sunny locks and dimples is a man," the pretty heiress of Knighton told herself confidentially; "he is apt to get a touch of being bewitched, and to calculate the cost of so many costumes en suite." Then she turned round and darted an impatient look into the hall. Her cavalier, for Sir Lionel was going to ride by the side of her carriage, was long in coming, and Dora detested waiting.

She meant that this drive should do great things for her. Not that the actual proposal should be made during it, because that would have occupied the perch behind; but it would be a magnificent opportunity for paying the way to the actual proposal. Revolving these things in her mind, it was with a feeling of horror that she saw Mr. Bulter approaching her. It was with a feeling of even greater horror that she heard him say:

"Will you accept my escort instead of Arden's, Miss Ralston?"

"What do you mean?" she stammered, not liking to refuse the old love such a trifling favor, and yet hating to grant it.

"I mean that, from what I gathered from him ten minutes ago, he will be too busy to keep his engagement."

"Impossible!" she said, angrily; and at that moment Sir Lionel Arden came out hurriedly toward her.

"A thousand apologies, my dear Miss Ralston!" he began. "Something has occurred to prevent my having the pleasure I promised myself this morning. Business of importance—"

"Takes you away?" she asked, coldly.

"It may almost immediately, but not to-day; still, I must ask you to wait awhile and to-day. You will excuse me and forgive me?" he pleaded.

"Both, certainly," Dora said, in a strained voice, as she got into her pony-carriage. Then she nodded a cool farewell to both the men, and drove rapidly.

"Piqued, by Jove!" Sir Lionel said, shrugging his shoulders carelessly. "I could do no other, though."

"Have you any business of importance on hand this afternoon?" Mr. Buller asked, dubiously.

"I have, indeed: about the most important a man can have, I fancy. I want to ask a woman to be my wife."

"And she woman is not Miss Ralston?"

"That woman is not Miss Ralston," the other one said, emphatically. "How it might have been if she had not seemed so sure of me, you know. As it is, my business this afternoon is to try and get a word with her cousin."

The two men separated soon after that. One of them went into the house. The other one sauntered away down the avenue and, by the entrance-gate, through which Dora would pass by-and-by on her way home. "She may listen to me now," he thought, with the quiet, unpalatable hankering after a woman whom he felt to be unworthy of him which is a foe some men can not conquer. It is needless to say that the man who thought this was the discarded lover, Arthur Buller. The baronet had gone in to wait an opportunity for the fair sake of Georgie Villars.

She said she had letters to write, so she is sure to come in the study in time," he thought, mending his way to that apartment. He had not been in Mr. Ralston's house long; but he had been there long enough to observe that the excellent lady deemed that a bedroom was a place to sleep, not to write or sit in. Accordingly, there were no aids to caligraphy in any of the bedchambers. People had to answer importunate lovers and wives and duns in the sight of all comers down in the study. So the study Sir Lionel Arden seated himself, and presently unto him there entered Mrs. Ralston.

She grew sort of unmindful of politeness and displeasure when she found that he had not gone with her cousin; for both mother and daughter her had decided that a coup would be made that day. "I didn't expect to see you here," she said; and he explained that he had important business to write and think about that afternoon.

"You're not thinking of leaving us, I hope," she said, with anxious anxiety.

"I have not thought about it yet, Mrs. Ralston; but I may find myself compelled to do so sooner than I had anticipated," he replied, politely.

"Dear me! how our party seems to be breaking up!" Mrs. Ralston said. "There is Georgie going unexpectedly, as one may say; but there —that is nothing: Georgie always was glad to get away from her own relations to strangers who don't care a rap about her."

This, on the face of it, seemed rather unjust from the lips of a woman who had been interested that Georgie should go, Sir Lionel thought. But he held his peace, and Mrs. Ralston presently resumed:

"The willfulness of that girl is past belief, Sir Lionel. I shall pity the man who marries her, if she ever succeed in getting a husband to do it; but, as I tell her uncle, she is too bold-faced about it. I am sure she has been a perfect plague to him ever since she left the nursery!" and Mrs. Ralston sighed as she concluded.

How exactly the man wished that he could say, "She shall be an anxiety to you no longer; she is going to be my loved and honored wife!" But he dared not do it. Georgie was too proud, friendless, and he was rich and powerful, but all the same her assent was not to be taken for granted. He reasoned himself, therefore, that he fered Mrs. Ralston's tongue to run on apace unchecked. After a time the hostess withdrew. She had some rather important household business to attend to, but she would have gladly neglected it had the possibility of Georgie's coming down and finding Sir Lionel alone presented itself to her. As it was, she went about in happy unconsciousness that, about half an hour after she left him, such an opportunity did actually fall in.

This speech was in Miss Villars's mind as she came slowly into the study. "He deserved something better than," my butterfly cousin," she was saying to herself, when she caught sight of him seated at a Davenport writing.

"Is Dora home?" she asked, quickly.

"I don't know, Miss Villars," he answered, looking up cheerfully; and then, seeing that she hesitated about coming on, he rose up and advanced toward her, passed her, shut the door, and very much astonished her by doing these things.

"I could not avail myself of the honor your cousin offered me this afternoon," he said, coming up to her and speaking in a low voice, "I had other weightier business on my mind."

"Indeed," she said, quietly. "I will not disturb you"; and she turned to leave the room. Was the man going to confide to her that he was writing to town to have the family jewels reset for Dora?

"You will disturb me most painfully if you do leave me," he said, earnestly. "Miss Villars, I have something to say to you. I came here thinking your cousin a pretty, innocent young girl; like a boy, I confess, I never for a moment in me really; and I thought that, if she was this, I might easily come to be interested in her, and to be happy with her. But I was mistaken. She is that dream dissolved, and I am dreaming another in its place."

"From which you will awake as speedily," she said, half scornfully.

"From which I trust I shall only awake to find it a reality," he said, eagerly. "I am dreaming of a nobler woman now, Georgie; of one who is more to me already than Dora could ever have been. I am not going to be rejected in a long hastily, I know; how lastingly I can love, you only can help me to prove."

He paused for an answer, and none came. Georgie, flushed, bewildered, tearful, stood looking upon him with blank amazement. She had given him her heart hastily enough, and there was balm in the thought that she had not given it for nothing. But the next moment, in the remembrance that he was her cousin's affianced lover, and that she (Georgie) was a traitress, therefore, the listening stopped.

"How will you ever look Dora in the face again after saying such words to me?" she stammered, at last.

"Dora's is a pretty face, but I don't care much about seeing it again," he said, laughing; "besides, she can't slay me for having evaded her toils."

"But are you not engaged to her?" Georgie asked.

"Thank Heaven, no! I mean nothing disparaging to pretty Dora; but when a man has a chance, or fancies he has a chance, of a love-quest, he does not gratefully grasp at what may be hanging beneath. You may answer me without a look through the window, for what you did not exist, I could not marry her."

"Then I will help you to prove that you can love lastingly," Georgie said, shyly; and they made their compact quickly, and sealed it with Love's own seal—a kiss.

Meantime Dora was making the best of it. Her discomfiture had been very great during her forced homeward drive. Mrs. Ralston had not had met Mr. Buller, and her heart had softened at the sight of him as it never would have softened had Sir Lionel been surrounded her vanity. She pulled up and spoke to him.

"I would offer you a seat, but it's a shame to play the groom to you after your having driven three people in it," she said, good-naturedly.

"Then send the boy home walking," he said, promptly; and as Dora did so definitely object, the boy was sent home, and Mr. Buller got up by Dora's side, and they drove slowly on together.

"Dora," he said, at last, after some minutes' silence, "do you ever think of the old days?"

"Yes—sometimes," Dora said, confusedly.

"Do you ever regret them?" he said. I loved you; do you ever feel that it is good to be so loved by a man? I won't take advantage of any confession you may make to me, Dora, to make you feel that you have not quite succeeded in obliterating the past."

"Not a bit of it," Dora said, promptly.

"Why can't we resuscitate that past?" he pleaded.

"Why, you see," Dora began, nervously, "you would do such a nifty thing—give up every thing, and leave poverty-stricken so poor: It wasn't my fault. Papa broke it off."

"You can't do without luxuries? Believe me, love is the greatest of all luxuries. I could keep you comfortably as my wife; but your father is a rich man, and could give you all you desired, and would, I believe, if you asked him."

Dora pouted. She did not wish to quite refuse or to accept this man. She wanted to keep him on still the old terms, and to be friendly with Sir Lionel. So the wily little diplomatist pretended to sob, and then said:

"I dare not listen any more now; I dare not, indeed; I feel in a cloud. I will answer you tomorrow, Arthur." Then she whipped her ponies, and drove home quickly; and he was steeped in happiness because a coquette had called him by his Christian name.

Astonishing news met her on her return. Her mother came flustered and hot to Dora's room.

"Here's a pretty thing!" the agitated lady began.

"What is it, mamma?"

"What is it?" Mrs. Ralston said, mimicking her. "Nothing to mince about, I can tell you, though I have foreseen from the moment your papa and you were such fools as to urge that Georgie should be asked here. Why, she has entrapped Sir Lionel into making her an offer."

"And she has accepted it?" Dora asked eagerly.

"Accepted it!" she has jumped at it."

Dora heaved a big sigh and sat down suddenly, as if she had been shot.

"If she does seem hard, horribly hard," she said at last, letting a few tears fall. "All our lives I have had the best of every thing, and Georgie has only come to for what I didn't care to take; I never thought she would have turned upon me in this way."

"Has he said nothing to you—nothing that we can take hold of?" asked Mrs. Ralston.

"Nothing," Dora said, defiantly; "it's no use to look for that, mamma. I would have had him say things fast enough if I could, to please papa and you; although," she added, virtuously, "I would have given him up, in my heart, as I shall take care to let every body know."

"What do you mean to do?" her mother asked, in some surprise.

"Marry where I love," Miss Dora said, quietly. "You mamma, let us be sensible; we should both hate to hear that people thought he had thrown me over for my cousin; and people will think that if we don't crush them with the fact of my prior engagement."

"But you have no prior engagement," Mrs. Ralston said, waxing more and more wrathful as she waxed more and more puzzled.

"But I can have one very easily. Arthur Buller proposed to me again this afternoon, and I told him to wait till to-morrow for my decision; now I shall go to him before dinner, so that papa will be able to give the health of the two engaged pairs. Now, mamma, it's no use; my mind is made up, and one to be followed: we must make the best of it."

So Dora's advice was taken, and the happy pairs were married quite gladly that night by Mr. Ralston. The weddings took place on the same day, about a month after these events, and Dora had the intense satisfaction of giving the impression, and seeing the impression take root, that Sir Lionel had never been serious with Georgie had she (Dora) been free. She prides herself much on having made the best of it, and on having successfully deceived every one, including her husband.

As for him, he loves her for what she is to him. He does not call her a "perfect woman nobly planned;" nor a very high-principled one, for that matter. But he is satisfied; and his great gift is the loving power of long-suffering, make him what Dora calls "very easy to live with."

But he knows as well as Sir Lionel and Lady Arden do that speedy answer to his suit was not given gratuitously. It was paid down as the price of silence on the subject of her former respecting the bouncery. But, though there is something humiliating in this, Mr. Buller is not enough to consider that it is also expedient to make the best of it.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

IT may interest some of our readers to know the name of the comet which is all the rage now in all the earth's equator, and was at the same time in perfect (that is, nearest the earth)—a conjunction of circumstances not to occur for high tides and destructive storms. On the 6th of October a straight line drawn from the centre of the earth would have passed directly through the moon and the sun, both being on the same side of the earth. The sun and moon thus exercised their greatest attractive power on the waters, and a high tidal wave was the result.

An American watch-maker is reported to have made a dance discovery that the balance-wheel in nearly every watch is, if made of steel, converted into a magnet. If this is a fact, the magnetic character of the wheel will account for many perturbations in watches which have hitherto been inexplicable. A key or dissected blade of a knife in the same pocket as the watch will exert a disturbing influence. But even if there should be but one piece of steel in the watch, a magnet will necessarily tend toward the north, and so far interfere with the regularities of the watch-maker in a very delicate piece of mechanism.

The Trustees of the Avondale Relief Fund assure the public that the fund is specific: that it is necessary for its proper use that those persons who survive the appalling death which involved husbands, fathers, brothers, and sons, and that to no other person, present or prospective, shall any of the fund be assigned. It is proposed that at least $40,000 be distributed within a year to the widows and orphans. The $40,000 will be permanently invested.

In an interesting sketch of the great American magazines of literature, Appleton's Mail places Harper's Monthly at the head of the list—"a position," it remarks, "to which its age and circulation entitle it." The Mail goes on to say: "It was once the fashion, in the failure days of American literary criticism, for the gentlefolk lightly of Harper's; but the public were, as always, practically indifferent to the critics, and true to their own tastes, and the magazine has steadily grown in standard thousand. The variety, quantity, and adaptedness of the matter furnished in its pages alone are something astonishing. It does not claim to be a great literary moulding influence,' or any thing of the sort. It not only does not claim it, but it does, for the price, a surprising quantity of excellent matter, profusely and well illustrated, and of a kind that the people care to read."

"A week ago I was worth $80,000 clear of the world. To-day every dollar I can get together will amount to just $66." Such was the remark of a gentleman in Wall Street one day during the late financial panic, and hundreds of others made somewhat similar statements. Said one broker: "I have been on the street thirty years, and I never knew there was such a failure in stocks as there is to-day." If gambling in gold and stocks brought, in such a crisis as has just occurred, its just punishment upon the dishonest gamblers only, it were well; but thousands and thousands have suffered innocently, and in various ways. There is a general sympathy expressed for some firms, who have been honorable and honest in their dealings, but who have experienced heavy losses.

It is rather unjue taste that has induced Miss Middy Morgan to choose for her business one which has belonged especially to men—namely, cattle raising. Yet, according to the Revolution, she is peculiarly well fitted for this line of business. Horses and other domestic animals have been a passion with her from childhood. Her father was an Irish country gentleman, and as enthusiastic fox-hunter. His daughter shared, with passion, his predilection, and qualified at no obstacle that her horse was willing to leap. No hedge, ditch, or gate that her fellow-riders cleared was refused by her; and notwithstanding several falls, and three dislocations of bones, her ardor remained unchecked. At her father's death she wound up his estate, and sojourned in Italy after a course of European travel. Her extensive knowledge of horses attracted the notice of some noted persons in foreign countries, and she was even commissioned, at one time, to purchase horses for King Victor Emanuel. She is about thirty, and is said to be in many respects a superior woman, speaking several languages, and possessing a well-cultivated mind.

One of the pleasantest affairs of the season was a musical entertainment lately given by Miss Clara Louise Kellogg, at New Hartford, Connecticut—pleasant, because given with no thought of gain or gold. The audience consisted of the factory girls themselves belonging to various factories in the vicinity, who had been invited to the musical treat. After the singing preceded at the piano, and sang every variety of song, and in many different languages, so that every one would have something that suited her taste. The delight experienced by the poor working-people language fails to express. They were almost wild with enthusiasm. Those that could not gain admittance surrounded the residence, and from without enjoyed the delicious notes.

Professor Faber's speaking-machine has been exhibited at the International Horticultural Exhibition at Hamburg. It is said to articulate various words, and even to answer questions and simple sentences with wonderful distinctness.

It is satisfactory to hear that M. Arnaud, a French savant, has stated to the Academy of Sciences that he has discovered a new and simple method of the common water-cress. It destroys the poisonous effects of Cholera, and is said does not also injure the cresses. A solution of water-cress may therefore be employed for steeping the leaves of tobacco, and would thus prevent one of the most noxious effects of smoke, moreover, a draught of the same will act as a sure antidote to cholera. In view of this latter recommendation, anti-tobacco societies will no longer have any excuse for the affectionate interest they have hitherto displayed in the saving of mankind from the evils which abuses they have so freely bestowed upon their victims. Instead of tracts, the anti-tobacconists should now distribute water-cresses.

The following is a description of the manner in which tobacco-pipes among the Scotch peasantry were formerly conducted: The food swain who had resolved to make proposite sent for the object of his affection to the village ale-house, previously informing the landlady of his intentions. The damsel, who knew the purport of the summons, presented herself in her best attire and waited on her admirer. She was entertained with a glass of ale; then the swain proceeded with his suit in the form of a request in the following manner: "I'm gaun to speir whether ye will tak me, Jessy?" "Deed, Jock, I thocht ye micht hae spairt that lang syne." "They said ye wad refuse me, Jessy." "Deed, Jock, they're no far wrang." "If ye'll no refuse me, lassie?" "I've telt ye that twice ower already, Jock." Then came the formal act of betrothal. The parties joined the middle of their right hands, which they licked, together, and vowed fidelity. The ceremony terminated the solemn oath, the violator of such an engagement being considered guilty of perjury. In allusion to this practice a favorite Scottish song commences:

"There's my thumb, I'll ne'er beguile thee."

In 1866 there were sent over the wires in the United States 18,366,000 words, or 3,000,000 more than in Great Britain, France, and Austria combined.

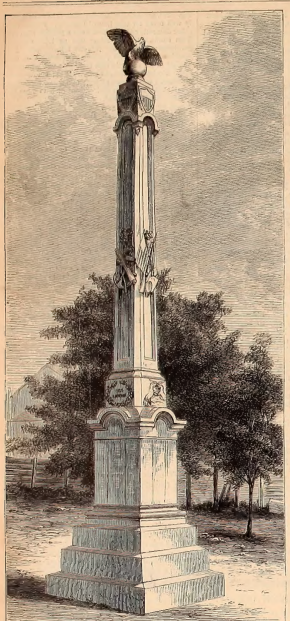
That English ladies are getting their fair share, at last, of literary work is shown by the fact that four magazines are now edited by ladies; and, also, that three of the most famous writers of magazine fictions are of the gentler sex.

Among many sensible remarks of the late Lord Chancellor, his suggestion as to the advisability of legible handwriting are well worthy of attention. His lordship, who wrote a very plain, clear hand himself, thought every letter should be able to stand its characters easily decipherable. We think so too; the object of an ill-written letter is that it may be read by one eminent men write a most abominable scrawl. Every body knows Mr. Dickens's sketch of a learned clergyman, whose epistles were so illegible that they were the most obstrue points of law, and whose old clerk was the only person in the world who could ever decipher them when the counsel had written them out. The great humorist himself, however, is as offender in this respect.

Here is a man who would have delighted the Vicar of Wakefield's heart. Jeremy Washburn was a young man, married, and when he had reached thirty his wife died, leaving him a father of ten children. He married again, and in the course of time he was once more made a widower, and a father to the extent of seventeen children. The enemy's house and the desh of his flesh had been therefore multiplied into forty-eight. Of the offspring of the marriages are the great-great-grandfather, of the second the great-grandfather; of the third of course the grandfather. The statistics of this remarkable family were collected and twelve as his contribution to posterity. He lives at Hull, England, and is yet hale and hearty.

The German savant, Falb, has been exciting the greatest alarm among the inhabitants of South America, having predicted an earthquake more severe than that of last year. This alarm has been increased by the fact that some of the first-named predictions of his have been verified, as on the 26th, 31st, and 5th of August several shocks of earthquake were experienced, and on the 15th and 16th of August preceded with great velocity, and afterward returned, causing much damage to small craft near the coast and in localities. All along the sea-shore shocks more or less severe have been experienced, and the consternation caused by them is most intense.

The late gale was disastrous to the oysters. In some beds fully one half were destroyed. At various points the oystermen find their prospective yield sadly interfered with. The wind and tide lifted and transported vast quantities of sand, depositing it over the beds, and completely burying the oysters.



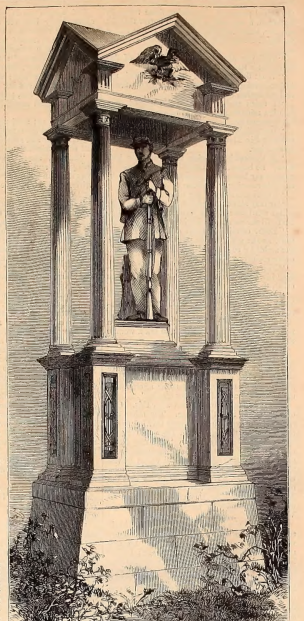
SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' MONUMENT AT NORRISTOWN, PENN. [PHOTOGRAPHED BY WILLIAM STROUD.]

SOLDIERS' MONUMENTS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

NEXT to the erection of homes for the widows and children of the soldiers and sailors fallen in the late war, there is no more fitting token of popular gratitude to the patriot dead than the perpetuation of their remembrance by means of monuments. We give on this page illustrations of two such monuments recently erected in Pennsylvania—one in the public square of Norristown, the capital of Montgomery County, the other on the grounds of Girard College, Philadelphia.

The Girard College monument was designed and executed by STRUTHER & SON, of Philadelphia. The sculptor of the statue, MR. J. A. BAILLY, also produced the WASHINGTON statue in front of Independence Hall, and the colossal statue of FRANKLIN on the new Ledger building in Philadelphia. The statue, six feet in height, and of Italian marble, represents a young private resting on his musket. The canopy is built of sandstone from Ohio, of drab color, the whole block weighing fifteen tons. The height of the entire monument is twenty-two feet; its cost $6000. Each pediment has a bass relief, and on each face of the pedestal there is an appropriate inscription.

The monument at Norristown reflects great credit on its designers and those engaged in its mechanical execution. It has four bases, three of blue marble, and one of white marble, moulded. Next is the die, four feet square and four feet high, on which is engraved the names of five hundred and forty-seven soldiers, all that have been hitherto reported. On this rests an arched cap two feet high. Its lettered sides will tell by whom the monument was erected. Above this cap is a moulded die, two feet five inches high, having on its four sides, in high relief, the coat of arms of Pennsylvania, the coat of arms of the United States, and two wreaths of immortelles whose leaves of oak, laurel, and ivy typify Liberty—the prisoner's pleasing dream—Victory and Friendship—Fidelity in Adversity. One wreath encircles the words, "Our Patriot Dead," the other the prophetic declaration, "The dead shall live." The shaft is fifteen feet high, and two feet four inches square at its base. On its four panels are beautifully-carved representations of the four arms of the service, viz.: Cavalry, Artillery, Infantry, and Navy. The extended wings of the eagle surmounting the monument measure five feet from tip to tip. Norristown is a picturesque town situated on the left bank of the Schuylkill River, ninety-one miles east of Harrisburg. Its population in 1860 numbered 8448.

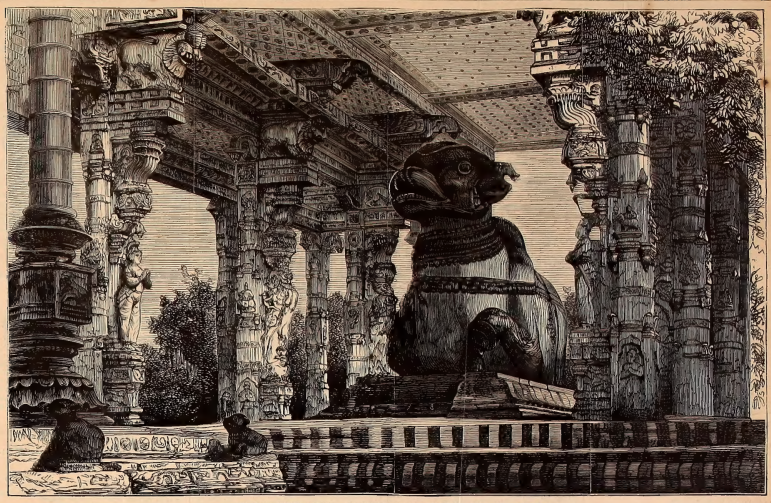


SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT GIRARD COLLEGE, PHILADELPHIA. [SKETCHED BY E. H. KLEMROTH.]

THE INDIANAPOLIS DISASTER.

IN connection with the State Fair at Indianapolis, Indiana, a frightful accident occurred on October 1. The fair had continued for four days under the most auspicious circumstances, when, about four o'clock P.M., just as the thousands of spectators were about to leave the grounds for their homes, a steam-boiler connected with a portable saw-mill exploded. There was a large circle of interested spectators immediately around the machine, when a noise said to have been equal to that of an exploding park of artillery saluted the ear, followed by a volume of steam and a blinding cloud of dust and smoke, while the air was filled with debris of timber, pieces of iron, and shreds of clothing, mingled with the fragments of mangled humanity. A large piece of the boiler, weighing 500 pounds, was carried a distance of a hundred yards, such was the force of the explosion. Then followed the rush of the 15,000 people in that part of the grounds, some striving to escape, and others to reach the scene of the disaster, while many were trampled under foot. So far as could be ascertained there were 27 persons killed by the explosion, and 56 wounded. The number of the wounded, however, is supposed to have been much larger.

SCENE OF THE TERRIBLE BOILER EXPLOSION AT THE STATE FAIR, INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. OTIS AND CO.]



THE SACRED BULL AT SERINGHAM, INDIA.—[SEE PAGE 679.]

Governor BAKER's coachman was standing near the horses, while the Governor, in company with Major WALKER and Captain DE LA HUNT, was standing just at the side of the carriage. Mrs. BAKER had left the Governor but a short time before, and for half an hour the Governor was in great distress for her safety.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION'S NEW BUILDING, FOURTH AVENUE AND TWENTY-THIRD STREET, NEW YORK CITY.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.—[SEE PAGE 686.]

The coachman was badly injured. The escape of the Governor and his friends seems miraculous.

Several yards from the scene of disaster was found a pair of legs held together by the merest shred of flesh. At one place was the headless trunk of a man; the arm of a man was found driven into a poplar board; while not far from Power Hall was seen the body of a boy with terribly mutilated limbs in his heart, stomach, liver, and lungs could readily be seen. When first discovered his heart was still palpitating, and the action of the organ was plainly observed.

Our illustration on page 684 represents the scene of the disaster as viewed from Power Hall.

*

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION BUILDING, NEW YORK.

THE Young Men's Christian Association of New York has been a centre of influences for good that have extended over the entire country. About a year ago this association commenced the erection of a building on the corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, opposite the Academy of Design. This building, of which we give an illustration on page 685, is now nearly completed, and will probably be opened about the middle of November.

This edifice is in the Renaissance style of architecture. Its frontage on Twenty-third Street is 175 feet, on Fourth Avenue 89 feet; it runs back 160 feet. The basement will be mainly occupied by stores; but there is a gymnasium occupying a portion of it and extending upward so as to include a part of the first floor. On the first story there are to be eight stores. The remaining space is occupied by the gymnasium and its appurtenances, including the Janitor's Lecture Room. The main entrance on Twenty-third Street is twenty-two feet wide.

On the second story there will be the rooms of the Association; namely, the Reception Room, Reading Room, three parlors, Dressing Room, and Wash Room. These are on the left-hand side. Opposite is the Lecture Room, which extends through the third story, and which is capable of seating 1640 persons. The seats in this room are iron chairs. The Secretary's Room also is on the second floor.

On the third story is a small lecture room, three class rooms, the library, extending through the fourth story, and the entrance to the gallery of the main Lecture Room.

The fourth and fifth stories are occupied by artists' studios, which, on the fourth story, there are 16, and on the fifth 20. On the fifth story there is a picture-gallery, lighted from the roof, for the exhibition of artists' pictures. The height of the building, from foundation to the roof, is 72 feet; the Mansard roof is 20 feet high, making the total height of the building 86 feet. The central tower on Twenty-third Street, including its base, adds 34 feet to the height. There are also four corner towers, each 8 feet in height. The whole building is to be heated by steam.

The cost of this edifice is $500,000. There is, however, upward of $100,000 still remaining unpaid.

The Library will, when filled to its capacity, contain 60,000 volumes. Every thing will be done by the Association to make this place of resort attractive to young men. Besides the Library, Reading-Room, Bath Rooms, and Coffee Rooms, and pictures of the best artists, there are other important attractions. Among these we may mention a course of twelve lectures to be delivered during the winter by Professor DORMUS, B. WATERHOUSE HAWKINS, MR. NOYES, and other gentlemen.

*

WESTERN FARMS.

Few of our readers in the East have any adequate conception of the extent of the prairie farms of the West. In a recent issue of the New York Tribune we find the following description of one of these farms:

"While at Jacksonville this week I made myself acquainted with some facts relating to one of our prairie farmers, who occupies a princely estate in the beautiful city, and also has a mammoth cattle-farm of 26,500 acres in Champaign County. It cost him $400,000, and is styled, with much appropriateness, 'Prairie lands.' It is nearly seven miles from north to south, and six from east to west; and its cattle capacity is enormous, when fully and properly stocked, is estimated at 10,000 head. On the west side of the farm are two pastures one and a half miles by three miles, that comprise nearly 3000 acres each. To the east of these is a 'patch' of corn half a mile wide and three miles long. On this there are now 6000 acres of corn, which, it is calculated, will yield, at a low estimate, 100 bushels. Of course every acre of as this is worked by the most approved machinery of all descriptions applicable to agricultural labor, much of which is made on the farm. Also there is a blacksmith shop, as well as a harness and carpenter shop in constant operation. The working-class consists of fifty yoke of oxen, and fifty spans of horses and mules; and the working force of a superintendent, a general foreman, six assistant foremen, a book-keeper, a clerk, a carpenter, a butcher, and about one hundred and fifty other operatives. The head-quarters are in the centre of the farm, and there are six out-stations fully equipped. The average cost of boarding is thirty-five cents per day.

"The farm is divided by two roads, two miles apart, north and south, and one through the centre east and west. These are lined with fifty-four miles of hedge, which was mostly set four years ago. Hedges have been, or are to be, set on every section line. Seventy-five miles were set in the spring of 1868, and twenty-five last spring. These hedges are to supersede the post and board fence, of which there are now eighty miles. This has required about 50,000 posts, 640,000 feet of lumber, and eighty kegs of nails.

"Mr. Alexander is the owner of this farm, and his operations are stated to be, as nearly as practicable, every year, as follows: He first purchases 4000 head of Texas steers, which cost him $140,000; corn for handling, interest, etc., $47,000; making an aggregate of $187,000. His average sales are $270 per head, or $260,000, leaving him a profit of $93,000. The profits upon the grain and other crops of the farm bring the whole up to nearly $300,000, after paying all expenses, and including a rent or interest of $4 per acre on the land."

*

HEALTH, the poor man's riches, the rich man's bliss, is found in AYER'S MEDICINES, after a fruitless search among other remedies. A word to the wise is sufficient.—(Com.)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO remove MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, and TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N.Y. Sold by all Druggists.

HITCHCOCK'S

New Monthly Magazine.

Read what Moore's Rural New-Yorker says:

HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.—If the excellent taste which characterizes the first issue of a new musical journal is a fair index of what it will be to come, then its publisher may rest assured of success. Handsomely illustrated, beautifully printed, and well edited, these sixteen pages of literature especially interesting to lovers of music, will be welcomed. MADAME and LEONARD DE VISCO—and vocal and instrumental music, are very attractive and valuable.

JUST PUBLISHED!

FIRST NUMBER

OF HITCHCOCK'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS:

MADAME MALIBRAN. Portrait and Biography.
LEONARDO DA VINCI. Portrait and Biography.
A SERIOUS QUESTION. By Madame DE VISCO.
CHEAP PUBLICATIONS. Editorial.
ART NOTES.
DRAMATIC NOTES.
MUSICAL NOTES.
POETRY AND CORRESPONDENCE.

MUSIC.

THE STARRY FLAG. Song and Piano.
MY SOUL TO GOD, MY HEART TO THEE. Duo. 16 PAGES OF MUSIC.
KIT FLANAGAN'S FAIRY. Voice and Piano.

Specimen copies mailed free, on receipt of price, 20 cents. Address, HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE,
Publisher, 34 Beekman St., New York.

☞ Agents wanted everywhere. Write for Terms.

PATENT STEM-WINDING

WATCHES

COIN-SILVER HUNTING CASES, $51; EXTRA FINE, $55; SOLID

Hunting-Case Full-Jeweled Lever Watches, $45, $48.
LADIES' SIZE, $36;
Ladies' Size, $36; Extra, $40; Enameled, $46.

COIN-SILVER

Hunting Cases, $14; Extra Quality, $16.

AMERICAN MOVEMENTS,

Every variety. LATEST, LOWEST PRICES.

And Watches of every description, fine Gold and Silver Cases, at Importers' Rates.

Goods sent by Express, to be paid for only after they have been received, examined, and accepted.

S. H. MOORE & CO., Importers,
Nos. 52 & 54 John St., N. Y.

Full Descriptive Price-List sent free.

$1—TAKING THE REINS

GRANT, BONNER, & DEXTER.

By JOHN W. EHNINGER, N.A.

"It is a striking likeness of the horse, and, I have no hesitation in saying, the best representation of a horse in action that I have ever seen."

*

This splendid photograph, embodying three life-like portraits, is 12¾ x 7⅞ inches, exclusive of mount. Sent free of expense on receipt of $1.

Larger Edition, 13 x 21, beautifully mounted on India tint, at $8 00: Ten copies for $70 00.

Address FILENDUCF LACROIX, Jr., Publisher,
Care of HARPER & BROTHERS,
Liberal Terms to Agents. New York.

SALESMEN.—Wanted, a few reliable, energetic salesmen, to sell by sample standard goods.
Address H. B. FACKLER & CO.,
413 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

IMITATION GOLD WATCHES

and DIAMOND JEWELRY

Are manufactured on scientific principles, none but experts can detect them, and have all the brilliancy, durability, and appearance of the best solid gold Watches and Diamond Jewelry.

Railroad Conductors, Engineers, Expressmen, the most exacting of our customers, have thoroughly tested them and guarantee their Strength, Accuracy, Time, and Durability of Case. Any number of certificates from them Unsolicited as reliable time-keepers. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Swiss Movements, $18 each. Gentlemen's Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, Fac-Simile Waltham, $20; Chronometer Balance, $30 and $35. Also, American Patent Levers in Silver Cases, $15. Magnificent Heavy Bridal-Gold Plated Watches, Patent Levers, $25 and $30. Genuine Waltham Patent Levers in Gold Cases, $75, $85, and $98. All in Hunting Cases for Ladies and Gentlemen. Warranted in perfect running order, and to retain the color of 18-carat gold. Latest style of Chains from $3 to $10 each.

The recently-discovered Fac-Simile Brazilian Diamonds—carbonized, crystallized quartz—are equal in every respect to the real Diamond, except Hardness. They are mounted with genuine 18-carat gold.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Solitaire Rings, $5, $10, $15; Solitaire Ear-Drops, with Pendants, $8, $10, $15, $20; Cluster Studs, $5, $10, $15, $20; Cluster Pins, $10, $15, $20, $25; Cross Pins and Charms, $5, $10, $15, $20; Lockets, $10, $15, $20, $25.

Orders sent per Express, C.O.D. Orders of $10 and less must be accompanied with the Price. Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order. Customers must pay all charges.

Address, DEMILT & CO.,
79 Nassau St., New York.

THE CURABILITY
OF CONSUMPTION
BY WINCHESTER'S
HYPOPHOSPHITES

has been conclusively established by its UNPARALLELED Success during the past TWELVE YEARS. There can be no doubt of its marvellous excellence. Each successive year adds to its renown, and leaves no room for doubt or mistake. Those who have experienced its efficacy can be found in nearly every town and hamlet throughout the land, and very many of these, according to their own testimony, would have been in their graves but for this remedy. THE HIGHEST MEDICAL TALENT in this country and Europe acknowledge its virtues, and have resorted to it with the most gratifying success in combating the ravages of this terrible Scourge of the Human Race.

Upon some one loved member in every family circle does CONSUMPTION cast its withering grasp, and buried the pale victim to a premature grave, despite the exertions and friends to save. Who is there that does not now know some one gradually wasting away under the influence of this terrible malady to whom the knowledge of this MAGNIFICENT MEDICAL DISCOVERY would bring

HOPE, JOY, AND LIFE?

If each one would therefore do his or her duty in extending to all sufferers within the circle of his or her acquaintance the glorious intelligence that CONSUMPTION is no longer to be regarded as INCURABLE DISEASE. THE WORLD will soon see when this malady will dwindle down to an insignificant item in the vocabulary of diseases.

The extraordinary TONIC, STIMULATING, and INVIGORATING properties of WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES render it the most appropriate, as it is the most reliable, remedy for all PULMONARY AFFECTIONS, DEBILITY, LOSS OF STRENGTH OR APPETITE, and in fact, in each INDIVIDUAL CASE it will promptly RELIEVE and CURE by its use, as will all diseases from the Blood, Nerves, or impaired condition of the Blood. WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES RESERVE FORCE, restore to the vital energy and reinvigorating all the functional processes of the body. It is unsurpassed as a remedy for the dyspepsia life, such as EDITORS, LAWYERS, PROFESSIONAL GENTLEMEN, MERCHANTS, PROFESSIONAL MEN, and ALL WHO LABOR WITH THE BRAIN imparting HEALTH and RENEWED nervous energy, relieving NERVOUS EXHAUSTION.

DELICATE LADIES

will derive the greatest benefit from WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES. It will promptly cure those peculiar NERVOUS AFFECTIONS to which they are subject. It will invigorate the Nervous System and drive away lassitude and languor, an incessant fever of unusual spirits. It will impart buoyancy and cheerfulness to the feelings, renew her Life and Energy, and, by strengthening the Nutritive Functions, enriching and purifying the Blood, will impart to the form and visage the complexion with the delicate BLOOM OF YOUTH and HEALTH.

We cheerfully recommend this STANDARD Medicine as an invaluable to all persons who are on the down-hill of Life, whose bodily powers are failing, and in whom the BLOOD is becoming chilled and thin. To such this Remedy will prove a BLESSING INDEED. Health, Vigor, Strength and Vitality and a consciousness of a New Lease of Life will result from its use.

NERVOUS TONIC AND INVIGORATOR

WINCHESTER'S

HYPOPHOSPHITES

has no superior in its power to bring out the LATENT VIGOR of the human system; to develope the STAMINA, to call its vitality into full play, and thoroughly arouse the vital energies of nature—the power of throwing off disease—by which the system is braced up and fortified against future attacks of disease.

The prompt and beneficial results of WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES will both SURPRISE and CHARM you. Circulars and Advice free.

☞ SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS. ☜

J. WINCHESTER & CO., Proprietors,
36 John St., New York.

FURNITURE

WARREN WARD & CO.,

Nos. 15 and 17 Spring St., corner Crosby.

ESTABLISHED IN 1850.

Wholesale and retail manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRINGS, BEDS, &c., suitable for city and country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

LACE CURTAINS, Styles for 1870.—Lace Shades after our own designs, and imported by no other house in America. Nottingham Lace Curtains, Real Brussels Lace Curtains, many of these styles now first introduced in this market.

Curtain Damasks, Brocatelles, Coverings of Brocatelle, Rep, Terry, Damask, &c. Curtains and Lambrequins made to order. Cornices, Poles, Tassels, Cords, Gimps, Fringes, and Trimmings. Window Shades of Linen and Paper made to order. Wholesale or retail. G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO., 52 and 54 Broadway, Fifth Avenue Hotel Corner.

N. B.—FURNITURE STORE at No. 661 Broadway.

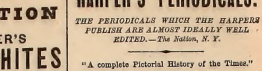
EMPLOYMENT.—PLEASANT AND PROFITABLE BOOKS. Send stamp for particulars to S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

TROY FEMALE SEMINARY.—The finest situation offers the accumulated advantages of over 30 years' experience. For Circulars, apply to JOHN H. WILLARD, Troy, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."



HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and commentary upon the events of the times. It will treat of every topic, Political, Historical, Literary, and Scientific, which is of current interest. In November will be commenced the new story "MAN AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, the author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of the story to the close of 1870 for $4 00.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for life.—N. Y. Evening Post.

HARPER'S BAZAR is a JOURNAL for the HOME. It is especially devoted to all subjects pertaining to Domestic and Social Life. It furnishes the latest Fashions in dress and ornament; describes in-door and out-door Amusements; contains Stories, Essays, and Poems—every thing, in brief, calculated to make an American home attractive.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Number for November completes the Thirty-ninth Volume of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. No change is contemplated in the general character of the Magazine. Its Conductors will not fail to give due attention of any suggestions which may add to its present interest or permanent value. Especial and increased attention will be given to the departments of Popular Science and Industrial Arts. Papers on these subjects will be profusely illustrated. It is proposed that the various Editorial Departments shall give a complete resume of the times. The Easy Chair will comment upon topics relating to social life and manners. The Drawer will utilize the humorous material that offers day by day. The Monthly Record will note all important political events. The Editor will present the facetiæ and anecdotes of the time.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred pages more matter than any similar periodical issued in the English language. Thus the ample space at the disposal of the Conductors will enable them to treat fully of all the topics embraced in their plan.

The Publishers feel themselves warranted in asking and anticipating for the future a continuance of the favor which has been accorded to their enterprises in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

Postage Free. Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, one remaining to any Club Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage which HARPER'S PERIODICALS receive from the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable quarterly, semi-annually, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from Canada or Nova Scotia must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for either WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of the order.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find each wrapper upon the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, although the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name, town, county, and State should be written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $105; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

S. W. GEERY,
IMPORTER,
Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,
Formerly I. & W. Geery, No. 219 Broadway,
Established in 1804. New York.
The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.
My stock comprises some of the Oldest Liquors in the country.
Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.
Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE,
NEW YORK.
The next Academical Year will begin on the 1st Monday (4th) of October. The subjects of the College will attend for matriculation on that day at 9½ A.M.
Candidates for the Freshman Class will present themselves for examination on FRIDAY, Oct. 1st, and Saturday, Oct. 2d, at 10 A.M.
Applicants for admission to advanced classes, and those required to be re-examined, will present themselves on Saturday, Oct. 2d, at the same hour.
For Catalogues and further information, apply to Rev. Da. BARNARD, President, or to
HENRY DRISLER,
Senior Professor and Acting as President.

FRENCH CLOCKS,
BRONZES,
FANCY GOODS,
MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,
Opera Glasses,
FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,
PARIS AND VIENNA
NOVELTIES,
WEDDING PRESENTS.
Alex. M. Hays & Co.,
No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York.
The above list comprises one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.
Ir Sign of Gold Telegraph. Ir

HENRY WARD
BEECHER'S
SERMONS IN
PLYMOUTH PULPIT
Are being read by people of every class and denomination all over this country and Europe. They are full of vitality, thoughtful religious thought and life. Plymouth Pulpit is published weekly, and contains Mr. Beecher's Sermons and Prayers, in form suitable for preservation and binding. For sale by all Newsdealers. Price 10c. Yearly subscription received by the publishers, $3, giving two handsome volumes of over 400 pages each. Half-yearly, $1.50. New and unpublished Sermons of Mr. Beecher presented to all yearly subscribers. Extraordinary Offer! Plymouth Pulpit (1868) and The Church Union ($2.50), an Unsectarian, Independent, Christian Journal—$3 for both; well stitched, clearly printed, ably edited, sent to one address for 26 weeks for four dollars. Special inducements to canvassers and those getting up clubs. Specimen copies, postage free, for 8c.
J. B. FORD & CO., Pub's, 39 Park Row, N.Y.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has the beauty and resemblance to Gold as such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the notice of all the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exhibition.
The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all parts are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them for a correct time-keeper.
Prices range from $18 to $27.
Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.
Goods sent by Express, C. O. D., to all parts.
Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

PIANOS and ORGANS.
Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of first-class makers, for $275 and upward. New Cabinet Organs for $46 and upward. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $40 to $175, at 481 Broadway, N.Y. HORACE WATERS.

GREAT ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC TEA COMPANY,
NO. 8 CHURCH STREET,
P. O. Box 5506. New York City.
An organization of capitalists for the purpose of Importing Teas and Distributing them to Consumers throughout the country at Importers' prices. Established 1859. Send for Price-List.

PSYCHOMANCY, Fascination; or, Science of the Soul, as applied to the purposes of life. 400 pages, Cloth. By Heindel, Professor. A. M. A curious book for inquisitive people. It contains complete instructions for acquiring this wonderful power over men and animals. Can be obtained by sending postage stamp and address to C. W. EVANS & CO.,
41 South 9th Street, Philadelphia.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR PRIEST and NUN.
Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 136½ Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

THE CELEBRATED IMITATION
Gold Watches and Jewelry.
THE COLLINS METAL, THE ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE ORIDE.
The $18 Watches, in appearance and for time, are equal to gold cases costing $100. Those of extra fine finish, at $30, are not surpassed by $200 gold watches. For TIME, ELEGANCE, FINISH, and DURABILITY, no imitation of gold can begin to compare with the Collins Metal. Excepting the intrinsic value, it is equal to gold. Every watch fully warranted by certificate.
CHAINS FROM $2 TO $8.
JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Ear-Rings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Charms, Gold-Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and which for gold is an appreciable advantage.
TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send the seventh Watch free of charge. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express, to be paid for on delivery. Money need not be sent with the order, as bills can be paid when goods are taken from the express office. Customers must pay express charges. We employ no agents; therefore, must be sent directly to us. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only office is No. 332 Broadway, cor. Worth St. (up stairs), New York.—C. E. COLLINS & CO.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR
STRUGGLES and TRIUMPHS OF
P. T. BARNUM
WRITTEN BY HIMSELF. IN ONE LARGE OCTAVO VOLUME—NEARLY 800 PAGES—PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.
33 Elegant Full-page Engravings.
It embraces FORTY YEARS' RECOLLECTIONS of his Busy Life, as a Merchant, Manager, Banker, Lecturer, and Showman, and gives accounts of his Experiences, his Failures, his Successful European Tours, and his Unparalleled Historical and Personal Collections, complete with Humor, Anecdotes, and Entertaining Narrative.
It contains his celebrated Lecture on the Art of Money-Making, with Hints, Secrets & Dodges, for which he was offered $5000. We offer extra inducements to Agents, and pay Freight. Send for Circulars, Specimen Engraving and Terms to Agents.
J. B. FORD & CO., Publishers, Hartford, Conn.

$10 Watches $1.00
THE GREAT TRADE INVIGORATOR ASSOCIATION, Incorporated by the State, will for a short time dispose of their Stock of 10,000 Expensive Silver Hunting and Open-face Watches, Ladies' and Gents' sizes, at One Dollar each. The movements are warranted as reliable and perfect as $100 Watches. Single Engravings, 50c.; Twelve, and 6th premium, $1; Twenty-five, and highest Silver Hunting, 6th premium, $2. Every engraving entitles the holder thereof to a Watch worth over $10. Circulars containing full list of premiums, and how to obtain them, sent to all parts of the country. Watches sent C. O. D. when desired, with the buyer may obtain a watch worth $150. Circulars Free! Two to Twelve Sewing Machines, $10 each.
MICHELIN & CO., Managers,
No. 5 Beekman Street, P. O. Box 4,224, New York.

GREAT INDUCEMENTS TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Let those who want a brilliant Family Magazine call at the Golden Rule Weekly Paper and at once for a sample copy of
THE GOLDEN RULE'S FRIEND
AND THE SATURDAY EVENING POST,
and see the unequaled inducements offered. $2 50 a year for a short time. Cash. Good Agents wanted, with splendid premium engraving. Five copies (and one free) for $10. Single Subscription, $2. Sheet of sent (postpaid) for fifteen cents. Address
JOHN E. PETERSON,
No. 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

5000 BOOK AGENTS WANTED for Harding's New Illustrated and Illustrated Editions of the LIFE OF CHRIST and BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.
The works are now ready for delivery. Address for Catalogue of the best-selling Subscription-Books published.
W. W. HARDING, Philadelphia, Publisher of Harding's Pictorial Family Bibles.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.
With one of our presses, and the material accompanying each, a man can do his own printing, thereby saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, with recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen book of types, cuts, borders, &c., for 25 cents.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 53 Murray Street, New York.

CATARRH!—SORE THROAT!—LOSS OF VOICE!—Dr. Hall's Catarrh Snuff, a positive and mode of treatment, relieves at once, and literally extinguishes Catarrh. Sample sent free. Send stamp for Pamphlet. Office, 11 Ann Street.

THE NEW, No. of Demorest's Monthly Magazine, for 1869, will surpass all its former issues. Subscriptions, now ready. Price $2 cts., mailed post free; or send for Circular.
W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 838 Broadway, N.Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—To sell the American Knitting Machine. Price $25. The most complete, cheap, and reliable Knitting Machine invented. Will knit 30,000 stitches per minute. Liberal inducements to Agents. AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES
To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machine. Fully warranted for five years. Not to stitch alike on both sides. First machine on trial. For further particulars, address
THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

WANTED AGENTS.—$75 to $200 per month, everywhere, to sell the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Co.'s NEW NOISELESS SEWING MACHINE. A new Sewing Machine, manufactured by the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Co., and sold at a low price. Address
W. S. HILL, Manchester, N.H.

Agents! Read This!
WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $100 per month and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., 167 Greenwich St., N.Y.

THE American Chemical Fire Engine, for extinguishing fires every where. Always ready for instant use. No compressed gases. For circulars, address COWING & CO., No. 76 Chambers St., N.Y.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any colored hair or a beard to a permanent Black or Brown. One Comb sent by mail for $1. For sale by Merchants & Druggists generally. Address MAGIC COMB MANUFACTORY, Mass.

SPARKLING LITTLE BEAUTIES are the Genie Love Diamond Pins. Exquisite specimens of Parisian skill. Sent C. O. D. by mail, on receipt of $1.50. Address LEE & CO., 1172 Broadway, N.Y.

LIVINGSTON'S PATENT
BRACED WEB SAW.
PATENT GRIPPER.
This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Price, $1.50.
LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO.,
50 BEEKMAN ST., N.Y.

Bloomington Nursery.
800 Acres. 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.
Fruit, Ornamental and Nursery Stock, immense and reliable assortment, very low for cash.
Descriptive Catalogue with illustrated stock of yearlings: also hardy Northern sorts, such as Duchess, Wilder, Hyslop, Transcendent, and other Crab apples—2, 3, and 4 year.
Peaches, Plums, Cherries, Pears, Quinces, Grapes, Forest and Evergreen Trees, Nursery Stocks, Osage Orange Hedge Plants, Asparagus, Conover's Colossal, Horseradish, Roots, Seeds, Bulbs, Specimens, Aurantum, &c.
Also superb Colored plates of Fruits and Flowers. Send 10 cents for Catalogues.
P. E. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

FURNITURE.—New designs and new styles; low prices for first-class warranted goods. Original drawings for Artists, with estimates for finishing dwellings with hard wood and furniture adapted to the style of rooms. Only seasoned and steam-dried lumber used—none other will stand in our house. S. D. KELTY & CO.,
661 Broadway, near Amity St.
N.B.—Curtain and Furniture-Covering Store at No. 447 Broadway.

GOOD READING AND NO IMPURE ADVERTISEMENTS IN THE
NEW YORK OBSERVER.
Price of Paper, $3 per Annum. Offices, 37& 39, 43d.
Send for a circular to LOWE PRESS CO.,
16 Spring Lane, Boston Mass.

THE CHURCHMAN.
THE BEST and LARGEST Weekly Newspaper, with the largest circulation in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Sent FREE for one month for examination. $3 per year in advance. To subscribers for that year, $2 a year, in advance.
No. 47 Cedar St., P. O. Box 4,224, New York.

BOOSEY'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.
A Complete Catalogue now ready. Sent free. Boosey's Musical Singer; the new Illustrated Journal of the Best Songs. Sold every where, or specimen number (and Catalogue) sent for 10 cents. 24 Union Square, N. Y.

MAPLE LEAVES, enlarged and improved. The best, the most popular, and the cheapest Magazine published. To send free of postage, at the end of 1870 for 80 cents. Send in your subscriptions without delay.
O. A. ROORBACH, 102 Nassau St., New York.

THE EXCELSIOR!—Edited and published by boys. The finest weekly to the boys in the world of America. Always filled with the best of juvenile literature. Contributors numbered by thousands. Address THE EXCELSIOR, Box 9, Woodbridge, N.J.

POCKET REVOLVERS. Six Shooter. A neat, durable weapon: four-inch barrel. Price $1.50, postpaid. Address S. C. AUSTIN, Easton, Mass.

A WATCH FREE—given gratis to every live man who A will act as agent in a new, right, honorable business paying $30 a week. No risk or enterprise, no humbug, money in advance. R Monroe Kennedy, Pittsburg, Pa.

WANTED, live men, to sell the Universal Stitch Lock recently patented. To distribute "packages" of "Wonder of the World," among families, and collect the name. A. L. TILLOU, Pittsburgh, Pa.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 70 full-size pictures, mailed, postpaid, for 50 cts.; for 81 cts. by express. Circulars free. Address J. W. SQUIRE, Holland, N.Y.

$25 A DAY.—$3 new articles for Agents. Sample free. S. M. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS, wonderful and amusing, 30 cents a package. Library or Love, 50 cents. Send to W. C. Works, 3 Astor Place, N.Y.

THE MYSTERIOUS PUZZLE. A great 3 scientific Nut to Crack. Sent by mail for 25 cents. WALTER HOLT, 109 Nassau St., N.Y. Box 1388.

$1140—How I made it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fulton, N.Y.

TYLER WATER WHEELS.—Over 3000 in operation. Address the manufacturers, Sullivan Machine Co., Claremont, N. H., for reduced price-list.

$3600 a Year guaranteed to Agents. Address J. ADLAKE, AFLEAN, S. P. O. Boston, Mass.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.
GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents per volume.
ADAM BEDE.
THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.
FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL.
SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE and SILAS MARNER, THE WEAVER OF RAVELOE.
ROMOLA. (Nearly Ready.)

FRANKLIN SQUARE, N.Y., Oct. 7th, 1869.

Efforts having been made in certain quarters to excite the sympathy and compassion of the public and the press on account of the recent failure of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, a cheaper and better edition of GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS than the one published by Messrs. FIELDS, OSGOOD, & CO., we think it proper to say, in explanation, and in reply to the unjust attacks upon us:

That we were the first to publish these Works in this country, and that for the Early Sheets thereof we have paid from time to time in the aggregate the sum of Five Thousand Dollars in Gold.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

2.
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Literature, Manners, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, LL.D. Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 883 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 8vo, Cloth, $5 per volume. Price, In Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Morocco, $10 00; Morocco extra, $12 00.

3.
THE MINISTER'S WIFE. A Novel. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," "Perpetual Curate," "Life of Edward Irving," "Brownlows," "Agnes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

4.
UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Mental Philosophy: embracing the Three Departments of the Intellect, Sensibilities, and Will. By Thomas C. Upham, D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Bowdoin College. In Two Volumes. Vol. I.: Intellect, Language: Vol. II.: Sensibilities, Will. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75 per volume.

5.
IN SILK ATTIRE. By William Black, Author of "Love or Marriage?" 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

6.
COUNTESS GISELA. By E. Marlitt. Translated by A. Nahmer. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

7.
A GREEK GRAMMAR FOR BEGINNERS. By William Balch, Professor of Greek and Ancient Languages in the University of Georgia. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

8.
FOUND DEAD. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

9.
THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By James Greenwood, the "Amateur Casual," Author of "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Wilds of London," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

10.
FALSE COLORS. By Annie Thomas. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

11.
SANDS'S PHILOSOPHY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, his Aim and his School. By Nathaniel Sands. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

12.
MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

13.
FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Careful Consideration of the Question of Fruit and Loss as involved in Amateur Farming, with much Valuable Advice for those about Purchasing Large or Small Places in the Rural Districts. By Richard Grant White. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

14.
META'S FAITH. By the Author of "St. Olave's." &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents

15.
A PARSER AND ANALYZER FOR BEGINNERS, with Exercises for Parsing and Analysis. By Prancis A. March, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, Author of "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "Anglo-Saxon Grammar," "Anglo-Saxon Language," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

16.
THACKERAY'S NOVELS.
New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.
VANITY FAIR. 89 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.
PENDENNIS. 179 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.
THE VIRGINIANS. 100 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
THE NEWCOMES. 163 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents
THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 54 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
HENRY ESMOND and LOVEL THE WIDOWER. 13 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

17.
RHETORIC; a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Colleges, and for Private Study. By Rev. E. P. Thwing, D.D., President of the Northwestern University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

18.
CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:
HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
PEG WOFFINGTON, CHRISTIE JOHNSTONE, and Other Stories. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

19.
THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By Alfred Russel Wallace. Author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro," "Palm Trees of the Amazon," &c. With Ten Maps and Fifty-one elegant Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

EFFECT OF MEDIATION.

The Gonzalus Hat.

For Gentlemen's wear. Just out. Something Entirely New. The Trade supplied.

DANIEL D. TOURNANS,
HATTER & FURRIER,
717 BROADWAY, New York Hotel.
IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO,

FOR CLEANING AND POLISHING.

Sapolio will make Tins resemble Silver. Use only Sapolio to clean White Paint. From Marble Sapolio removes all Stains. For polishing Knives Sapolio is unsurpassed. For cleaning Brass Stair-Rods Sapolio has no equal. If you would have clean windows, use Sapolio. Sample cake sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.
Depot, 211 Washington St., New York.
Established 1809.

Particular attention is called to our SOAPS for family use.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,
WITH PURE SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson, and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods in

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,

which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY,
Can not be Excelled.

All goods bearing our trade-mark,

"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"

ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED; and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, Conn.
SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 11 JOHN ST., N.Y.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE EXHIBITION.
Open DAILY from 9 A.M. to 10 P.M., on THIRD AVE., Cor. 63d St., near Central Park.
The Machinery in Motion
Is a Grand Display. The Exhibition is enlivened WEDNESDAY and SATURDAY AFTERNOONS, and EVERY EVENING, by A NEW ORCHESTRIA. Refreshments of the Best Kinds, at Moderate Prices, in the building.
Season Tickets for Gentlemen, $3: for Ladies, $2; Single Admission, 50 cts.; Children under 12 years, 25 cents. Packages of 15 tickets, for whom, at 50 cents each. Entrances on Second and Third Avenues.

SMITH'S COUCH CARAMELS.
Excellent for the Throat & Lungs. Sold by all Druggists.

STEREOPTICONS
AND
MAGIC LANTERNS.
Priced Catalogue of the same and over 5000 views sent free. W. MITCHELL McALLISTER, 138 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

"OLD FOGY" LOST his lead-pencil. Use the Novelty Pencil-Holders, and avoid losing pencils.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York.

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.: H. S. HEMPSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LUDIS THUP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KINGKEAD BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; C. M. MERCK, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MRS. C. BURNS, Pittsburg, Pa.; CAUTET & SONS, Albany and Troy, N.Y.; J. T. HAMILTON, Rhinebeck, N.Y.; J. H. HINTERMISTER, Ithaca, N.Y.; H. S. MACKIE, Rochester, N.Y.; H. URIE, Buffalo, N.Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; COREY BROS., Providence, R.I.; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C.W.; E. FIELD & BRO., St. John, N.B.

THE SECRET OF BEAUTY lies in the use of HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM for the complexion. Roughness, Redness, Blotches, Sunburn, Freckles, and Tan disappear where it is applied, and a beautiful complexion of pure, satin-like texture is obtained. The plainest features are made to glow with healthful bloom and youthful beauty.

Remember, HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM is the thing that produces these effects, and any lady can secure it for 75 cents at any of our stores.

To preserve and dress the Hair use LYON'S KATHAIRON.

NATURE'S REMEDY
MIDDLETOWN MINERAL SPRING WATER
DRINK IT
IT WILL CURE YOUR ILLS
M. M. S. Co. Middletown, Vt.
(Trade-mark Secured.)

Middletown Mineral Spring Water cures all diseases of the Kidneys, Skin, and Blood more promptly than any other known remedy.
☞ Call for TESTIMONIALS or CERTS. Sold by Druggists.
Caution.—All genuine bears our trade-mark, and the bottles and corks are branded "Nature's Remedy."
Address J. JAY JOSLIN,
Treas. M. M. S. Co.,
Middletown, Vt.
Or, S. H. Scripture, 193 Broadway, New York. General Agent.

A HOUSEHOLD WORD!
Buy your
CHINA, GLASS, SILVER-PLATED WARE, CUTLERY, and COOKING UTENSILS, at
BASSFORD'S,
COOPER INSTITUTE, N.Y.,
and save 20 per cent.

If Predisposed to Biliousness, nothing is easier than to prevent this constitutional tendency from culminating in acute disease, by taking TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT in small doses, as an alterative.
SOLD BY EVERY DRUGGIST.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
45 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

A Seven per Cent. GOLD LOAN.

$6,500,000.

The Kansas Pacific Railway, now in successful operation from Kansas City to Sheridan, proposes to build an extension to Denver, Colorado. The Government has granted Three Millions of Acres of the finest lands in Kansas and Colorado, which are mortgaged for the security of a loan of $6,500,000.

This loan is secured in the most effectual manner. It represents a road in profitable operation, and will open the trade of the Rocky Mountain Country, and connect it with the great markets of the East. It is considered to be one of the best loans in the market.

EVEN BETTER IN SOME RESPECTS THAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

The loan has thirty years to run, principal and interest payable in gold, semi-annually, seven per cent. The coupons will be payable semi-annually in either Frankfort, London, or New York, and will be free from Government taxation. The bonds for the present are sold in currency at 90, with accrued interest.

Circulars, maps, and pamphlets sent on application.

DABNEY, MORGAN, & CO.,
53 Exchange Place, N.Y.
M. K. JESUP & CO.,
12 Pine Street, N.Y.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.
CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines of the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical sheep-machine manufactured.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties by nearly every Steamer. Fine Supply of Fancy Goods, Swiss Carved Goods, Fine Gold and Silver Watches. M. J. FAILLARD & CO., 680 BROADWAY, N.Y.

A HOMESTEAD FREE to every one. Address
JAMES B. STRONG, 23 William St., Room 26, N.Y.

$2,500,000 IN PREMIUMS!

There are in the United States over SIX MILLION Families. Wherever the ground has been thoroughly canvassed, at least every second family, on an average, has subscribed for WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE. According to this calculation, there are yet about three million families ready to subscribe for our Magazine as soon as they shall be properly solicited to do so. Our Premiums, for the collection of these subscriptions, will amount to about $2,500,000!

READ!! READ!! READ!! READ!!

IN ADDITION TO OUR REGULAR PREMIUMS, we offer the following extras: To the senders of the five largest clubs before February 1st, 1870, One Hundred Dollars each. Also, to each subscriber in the largest club, any premium which we now furnish for six subscribers or less; for the second largest club, any which we furnish for five or less; in the third, for four or less; in the fourth, for three or less; in the fifth, for two or less. All subscriptions, to count, must be received by us before the first mail on February 1st. The names of the persons who send the clubs, together with the number of subscribers they send, will then be published, and the premiums duly forwarded.

S. S. WOOD.
NEWBURGH, N.Y., October 1, 1869.

Dr. JNO. V. BUETON'S
TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WASHINGTON, D.C., Sept. 1, 1869.
It entirely expunges and harmless. It purifies and enriches the blood, invigorates the system, possesses great nourishing and strengthening power, is an excellent tonic and appetizer, soothes the nerves, and digests the heartiest food, makes sleep refreshing, and eradicates rotten teeth, bad breath, and sore gums. Price Fifty cents per box, post free. As a smoking medium on the injurious effects of tobacco, with lists of testimonials, references, etc., sent free. Agents wanted. Address
Dr. J. E. ABBOTT, Jersey City, N.J.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
☞ Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations.
[Trademark & Copyrighted.]

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 71 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS.

HARPER'S LIBRARY EDITION.

ILLUSTRATED.

12mo, MOROCCO CLOTH,

SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS A VOLUME.

Vol. I. ADAM BEDE.
II. THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.
III. FELIX HOLT.
IV. SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE and SILAS MARNER.
V. ROMOLA. (Nearly Ready.)

"George Eliot's" novels belong to the enduring literature of the country—durable, not for the fashionable hour, but for all time.—Boston Traveller.

Few women—no living woman, indeed—have so much strength as "George Eliot," and, more than that, she never allows it to degenerate into coarseness. With all her so-called "masculine" vigor, she has a feminine tenderness, which is nowhere shown more plainly than in her descriptions of children.—Boston Transcript.

It was once said of a very charming and high-minded woman that to know her was in itself a liberal education; and we are inclined to set an almost equally high value on an acquaintance with the writings of "George Eliot."—London Review.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above volumes by mail, postpaid, free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 75 cents.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 670.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

H. W. BEECHER AND H. B. STOWE.

HENRY WARD BEECHER and HARRIET BEECHER STOWE are brother and sister, being children of Rev. LYMAN BEECHER by his first wife, ROXANA. HARRIET was born at Litchfield, Connecticut, June 15, 1812. HENRY WARD was born at the same place, June 24, 1813. HARRIET, therefore, is just one year and one week older than HENRY WARD.

H. WARD BEECHER graduated at Amherst College, Mass., in 1834, and studied theology under his father at the Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1837 he was settled as a Presbyterian clergyman at Lawrenceburg, Indiana, where he remained for two years, afterward removing to Indianapolis. In 1847 he accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the Plymouth Church in Brooklyn, N. Y. He is still the pastor of that church.

MR. BEECHER is the greatest pulpit orator in America. He is distinguished as a lecturer; he has taken a prominent position in journalism, having been one of the founders of the Independent; but his characteristic function is that of a preacher of the Christian gospel. It is not enough to say that he has the largest uniform congregation in the United States. That might be secured by qualities totally different from those possessed by BEECHER. It is very rarely that the emotional nature is so completely under the regulation of the intellect as it is in him. With a large heart, pulsating in sympathy with every progressive moral movement, he has also a large head and a well-balanced judgment to prevent him from becoming a mere sentimentalist or fanatic. One of the most prominent of his qualities is his commonsense.

MR. BEECHER'S mind has been well stored with book-learning; but his principal studies have been of life in nature and in man. To few men have been revealed so clearly the springs of human action. He speaks always from experimental knowledge; his words have been born of his own fire, or are the effluence of his observations. His sermons are never purely metaphysical; they are never doctrinal, in the ordinary acceptance of the term; but they are the results of life studies. He studies mostly outside of his library. Usually he does not know the subject of his Sabbath morning's discourse until within a few hours of his appearance in the pulpit. His mood, the incidents of the day, or some great moral question that demands attention, will decide that. Early Sunday morning this decision is made; a few leading heads are written out in full, and all the details of the sermon are left to the inspiration of the moment. No, it is not inspiration; it is a well-disciplined and well-filled mind that moves into thought and speech before the waiting audience of thousands that hangs upon the speaker's words.

HARRIET BEECHER at the age of fifteen was associated with her elder sister CATHARINE as principal of a female seminary at Hartford, Connecticut. In 1833 she accompanied her father, who had been elected President of Lane Theological Seminary, to Cincinnati. Associated with her father was Rev. CALVIN E. STOWE, Professor of Biblical Literature—a man of culture and of great good sense. In 1836 Professor STOWE and HARRIET BEECHER were married. Up to this time HARRIET had been known only within a limited circle; but she had, in what little she had written, shown her power of delineating character, especially the character of New England people. In 1851–52 MRS. STOWE published "Uncle Tom's Cabin" as a serial in the National Era, an anti-slavery newspaper of Washington. Upon the publication of this novel in book form in Boston it was found that the writer had achieved a memorable success—a success unrivaled by any that had previously been won by a literary woman: 400,000 copies were sold in America, and 500,000 in England. It was translated into all the languages of Europe, and was dramatized and acted in almost every theatre in Europe and America. "I have not read a novel for thirty years," said Lord PALMERSTON; "but I have read 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' three times, not for the story, but for the statesmanship of it. It is impossible to calculate the extent of the influence of this novel upon the political affairs of America.

HENRY WARD BEECHER AND HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY J. GURNEY AND SON.]

In 1853 MRS. STOWE visited Europe, and was warmly welcomed among all classes. On her return she published "Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands." She made a second European tour a few years later, and on her return published "Dred." Her "Minister's Wooing," "Agnes of Sorrento," "The Pearl of Orr's Island," and "Old Town Folks," published during the last twelve years, though by no means as successful as "Uncle Tom's Cabin," have still been received with great favor.

To really appreciate MRS. STOWE it is necessary to be upon intimate terms with her, to see her in her hours of repose, when she is really stronger than in activity. All who thus know her are her sworn friends. She has that remarkable quality so rarely possessed by any woman—namely, absolute self-possession. In her manners, as in her conversation, there is no appearance of effort. She is not fussy in her entertainment, and even those who are shy and awkward are in her presence perfectly at ease. She has lived a remarkable life, even if we put out of sight that sphere of social sympathies and influences to which her literary success has introduced her. The interior life of CHARLOTTE BRONTË was not more remarkable, whether we consider the individual characters of the two women, or the outward circumstances that awakened them into activity and controlled their development. The pictures of New England life given in "Old Town Folks" are simply reproductions of the original photographs made upon MRS. STOWE'S mind in early youth; subsequent culture has only enabled her to separate the unessential from the essential, and to draw the outlines with greater skill and fidelity. "The Minister's Wooing" indicates how strongly she was impressed by the religious problems of New England life.

It is peculiarly fitting that we should give the portraits of HENRY WARD BEECHER and HARRIET BEECHER STOWE in a single group as we have done. Not only are they brother and sister, of nearly the same age, but they have many mental, or rather, we should say spiritual, characteristics in common. Their mission in life, too, has been the same—namely, to agitate the human heart, not to fanatic enthusiasm, but to conflict against wrong.

IN OCTOBER.

A stillness as of autumn woods
In moonless morns, when winds are dea l;
Soft seas of mist in all the vales—
Mist on the mountains overhead.

A drowsy day: warm sweat of dew
About the hand-rail of the bridge;
Beneath, the slow stream's flawless face
Unruffled into rut and ridge.

At noon a sudden gleam of sun,
And light from the lower grounds
The vapors climb, and bring with them
Starved echoes of the valley's sounds.

Oh time of truce from striving crowds,
Whose murmur drowns the poet's voice;
Oh days that make the poet's heart
With thrills of fuller life rejoice!

Ah me! all sweet and wandering sounds
Of country life have left mine ears;
And scenes that stirred the soul to song
Are hurled with the hurried years.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1869.

☞ In November will be commenced "MAN AND WIFE," a new Serial Story, splendidly illustrated, by WILKIE COLLINS (Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone"). New Subscribers will be supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement of the Story to the end of 1870 for $4 00.

WHICH?

IS there any good reason why an intelligent citizen of New York, who wishes to promote the highest welfare of the State and country, should support the Democratic ticket at the election in November?

Is there any thing in the principles or the antecedents of the Democratic party, or in the character and ability and patriotism of those whom it usually elects to office, which such a citizen ought to prefer to the principles and history of the Republican party and to the candidates whom it presents?

Indeed, it is not difficult to ascertain what the principles and policy of the Democratic party are? Ribald abuse of the President and the Administration, sneers at radicalism, and plaudits of the colored population, which can not be accepted as arguments; and the pertinacity with which they are urged merely reveals the want of legitimate and forcible objections to Republican ascendency.

In this election there are really two serious issues, and only two. One is strictly political, and the other financial. One is the Fifteenth Amendment; the other, taxation and national honor. The Republicans propose by the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment to settle finally, in accordance with justice and American principles, and with the action of the people during and since the war—the question that has so long tormented and convulsed the country. The adoption of the amendment will be substantially the declaration that the people of the United States, taught by the most disastrous experience the danger of maintaining unreasonable and unjust political distinctions, have determined to prohibit them altogether. The declaration will be made in the manner provided by the Constitution and in the most decisive form; and once adopted, the most irritating of questions disappears from our politics. New York, indeed, has already adopted the amendment. But it is not yet a part of the Constitution, and a Republican victory in New York will be a popular ratification of the act of the Legislature which would have great moral influence.

The Democratic party, the old bulwark of slavery, the opponent of emancipation, and the contemptuous slanderer of the colored population, opposes the amendment. The Democrats in the State, indeed, as a condition of reconstruction, it has submitted to the recognition of equal political rights among citizens. But its spirit may be inferred from the course of its chief leaders in those States during the Presidential campaign of last year, and from the vehement opposition to the amendment in the Northern Democratic conventions of this autumn. Nothing whatever can be gained by the defeat of the amendment but prolonged and bitter agitation. The brain and heart and conscience of the country will continue to demand this necessary act of justice and common-sense until it becomes the fundamental law. If the sober and intelligent voters of New York wish that this angry question should be kept open, they will support the Democratic ticket. If they wish that it should be closed honorably, justly, and in the true American spirit, they will vote with the Republicans for equal rights.

The position of the two parties in regard to the financial situation is not less directly hostile. The Republicans demand that there shall be no equivocation, and that the debts of the United States shall be paid in gold, and that the immense injury constantly done to our credit by the suspicion that we may turn out to be a nation of swindlers shall cease. They point to the steady reduction of the debt under their auspices, and to the fair adjustment of taxation, and challenge the Democratic party to show that it presents any other financial policy than that of Mr. PENDLETON, which is fatal to the credit of the country in the people, indeed, like to pay heavy taxes. Upon this disinclination the Southern Democratic leaders counted when they rose to repudiate. They hoped that the necessary cost of war would disheaten the country. But the people disappointed this hope, and defeated the rebellion; and now the Democratic leaders, who made the tax necessary, denounce it as odious. But Democratic force could not dissolve the Union—which Democratic sympathy disgusts us! Whoever in New York wishes this result will support the Democratic ticket.

Or is there a feeling that the Republican party has been spoiled by success, and that it is necessary to try the Democrats? The city of New York, in which that party has indisputable power, shows the character of its administration. Does the voter wish the economy and honesty that are shown there to become universal? The Democratic party has perfected a system of frauds upon the ballot-box; it elects judges whose names are a stench; it depends upon ignorance and hate to swell its vote; its management of affairs makes men despair of a popular government. Is this the party—whose national history is summed up in a word, that it was the party of slavery—to which the honest voters of the State would intrust the general welfare? If it is, they will vote for its candidates. If it is not, they will vote with the party which has the majority in the field, and would now secure its prosperity by a policy of justice and honor.

THE NEW YORK REPUBLICAN CANDIDATES.

The Republican candidates in New York are men for whom it will be a pleasure for honest people to vote. General SICKLE is a fit representative of the great German element in the population, a soldier whose renown was assured early in the war, and to whom the Convention unanimously looked as the best leader for the nomination. For reasons which were undoubtedly satisfactory, he forbade the use of his name. But when it became necessary after the adjournment to select a candidate, the Committee, yielding to the universal wish, and his nomination was made as much by the common desire of the party in the State as by the general Committee. His nomination is very strong and wise and conciliatory; and his acceptance, under the circumstances, will not be forgotten by the party.

Horace Greeley is a name so widely and familiar name in the country. Identified from the first with the Republican party, and devoting his great abilities as an editor to its service, he early made his paper its chief national organ. Frank in the expression of opinion; patient of obloquy and reproach, of ridicule and bitter hostility; in the judgment both of his political friends often visionary, impracticable, and exasperating, he has never for a moment lost the public confidence in his honesty and patriotism; and his political influence upon public opinion has undoubtedly been greater than that of any other individual. Seldom called to office he has never asked it. His letter to the State in his letter of acceptance of his present nomination, he has never refused any honorable service which his party could render him. The highest praise is also his, that he would never decline any such service that he could honorably perform; for his party might call upon him for an honorable service that he could not safely undertake. His nomination is an indication of the determination of the Republican party of New York that its character and purpose shall appear in its candidates, and command its claim to the sympathy and support of all honest men.

This appears also in all the other nominations upon the State ticket, and in most of those made for the Legislature. In Queens County the Republicans have adopted the Democratic renomination of the present Assemblyman, who was free from complicity in the outrageous tax-levies of the last session. Not one Republican Senator who voted for those levies has been renominated. And of the twenty or more talented Assemblymen not more than four or five have succeeded in being renominated; and they will be defeated, we trust, by the action of the honest Republican voters of their districts. All these things show that the Republican party has the will and the power to purge itself of all betrayers of trust. It has no Tammany dictator, no man whose will settles nominations and determines policies, no regulating clique. But its regulator is the general consciousness of its members that the spirit of a party is necessarily shown in the character of its candidates, and the determination, so conspicuously displayed at its last national Convention, that it will not be controlled by its bummers and soldiers of fortune. This is the reasonable and conclusive ground of the popular confidence in the party. This is its inspiration in the coming election in New York; and this, if every voter properly considers the great importance of the election, and if the city frauds are not overpowering, will make that party triumphant on November.

THE AUTUMN ELECTIONS.

Dreams, not elections, go "by contraries," and the remarkable way in which the Democratic papers declare that the elections in Pennsylvania and Ohio do not show that the people sustain General GRANT and his administration, proves their consciousness that that is their exact significance. If Mr. PACKER had been elected Governor of Pennsylvania, the same papers would have declared that Mr. PACKER'S personality would have carried him through. It would have been urged that the Democratic party was not committed last year against the candidates of the people. Indeed, the prodigious lesson that would have been drawn from the most attenuated Democratic majorities in those States is not incalculable. But the majorities turned out to be Republican, the Democratic papers assure us that they mean nothing whatever, least of all an approval of the Republican principles and administration; and we are informed that the decisive defeat of Mr. PACKER in Pennsylvania and of Mr. PENDLETON in Ohio has "demonstrated their personal popularity almost as fully as if they had been elected."

If the Democratic party can flatten upon such beaks of contrition, of course no one will complain. But the Democratic leaders meanwhile know quite as well as every body else that the elections in Ohio and Pennsylvania mean precisely what they would mean if General GRANT himself was elected President. They mean that the American people are still honest; that they intend to pay their debts without any kind of swindling; that they think it is quite time to acquiesce in issues that the war settled by the last resort; and that they do not look for a better conduct of the affairs of the party to whose spirit and methods are shown in the system of electoral frauds in the city of New York and in its municipal management. They show, moreover, that the natural reaction, the inevitable personal disappointments, the innumerable private griefs, that follow every Presidential election, the bitterness and contemptuous slander that has been uttered against the President, the sneers, the derision, the foul insinuations, which are so easily thrown, have totally failed to effect the great public heart that trusted the General in the field and with gratitude and confidence called him to the Presidency.

So emphatic and significant a verdict is not to be argued down or sneered away. It reveals that kind of tenacity which it is supposed that a republic can possess, and which, amidst the universal skepticism of Europe and of multitudes of Americans, was displayed by this extraordinary people. It is the instinction of the clear perception in the public mind of the fundamental principles upon which alone the peaceful progress and prosperity of the country can be secured. As the New York Tribune truly says, the result should chide the croakers. It should show still more clearly the vitality of the American party, and of the conviction deeply seated in the popular heart that it is indeed the party of the people. It asks for no privilege nor exclusion. It favors no class, and proclaims and secures fair play. The result of the October elections in Pennsylvania and Ohio should make every Republican surer and bolder to demand the most constant elevation of the party standard, and even more trustful than ever of the fidelity to their truest interests of the American people.

As for the future the Republican fidelity is as sure as the law of gravity.

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

The New York World complains of the tone in which the Republican papers speak of conspicuous Democrats like Mr. Pierce and Mr. Buchanan after their deaths in contrast with that of the Democratic press in alluding to Mr. Lincoln. If the tone is "reviling," it can not be more indecent than the incessant flings at Mr. Lincoln in the personal columns of the World for two or three years after his death. But while a "reviling" tone is, of course, indefensible, the press has more imperative duty than to tell the whole truth of public men when they die. No man in his senses would think of asking or expecting that such official careers as those of Presidents Pierce and Buchanan should not be censured in comparison with the Presidency of Mr. Lincoln; and it is of the utmost importance that no conspicuous actor in our politics, whose public career has outraged humanity, liberty, and the better sense of the country, should disappear in a mere swash of praise.

The administration of Franklin Pierce was a conspiracy of four years against the rights of man and the honor and peace of the United States—why should it not be frankly stated? A single man and a supposed true friends is true; but his interest to the public, which justifies criticism of his career when he dies, is not that he was a courteous and kind neighbor in Concord, but that he countenanced border ruffians in Kansas. Mr. Buchanan was probably a respectable gentleman, as the phrase is used; but, worse than the Chief Magistrate to defend the Union, he declared that he had no authority to prevent its dissolution. It is not true that the political questions of their time died with these Presidents. They are mere questions that never die; questions of human rights and American honor. If there is any political morality whatever—if there is any difference between a magistrate who strains every possible point against liberty and one whose heart embraces every man—if there is any difference in conduct which hopefully rivets chains upon the innocent and that which joyfully breaks them, the official career of Mr. Pierce or of Mr. Buchanan can no more be compared with that of Mr. Lincoln than the private repute of Aaron Burr with that of George Washington.

Suppose that when Mr. Pierce died the other day all the newspapers of both parties had said only, as the World says, that he was "one of the most estimable and upright of men." It would have been a supreme falsehood. It is flagrantly immoral as a falsehood. If the kind of offense against civilization of which his Presidency was so signal an illustration is to be regarded as a mere temporary political interest, that vast influence upon public conduct which arises from the consciousness of posthumous justice is destroyed, and to the exceeding injury of society. If every body, without regard to principles and character and result of his public action, is to join history merely as privately estimable and upright, men whose names in public life are abolished altogether, and Calhoun is as admirable a figure in our history as old John Brown.

The official conduct of Mr. Pierce inflicted deep and terrible wounds upon the country. It confirmed the desperate assaults of the slave party upon the Constitution. It was denounced a wide national demoralization. It was directly responsible for massacre and a bloody reign of terror in Kansas. It depressed the hopes of every American citizen who loved the name of Franklin Pierce to this country and to mankind. It is recorded in our annals. It will be the verdict of history. When he disappeared from the political scene, it needed only to have been mentioned as occasion made the reference necessary. But when, at his death, it is substantially declared that nothing could be said than that he was an estimable and upright man, a decent regard for public morality requires that the whole truth be told. Not is it, in the least degree, making a grave or grave to tell the truth soberly, however strongly. Let every man in high office have a living consciousness that when he dies no fondness of private regret, no remembered personal urbanity, can woo to silence or evasion the tongue that tells his public story, and every such man will weigh well his actions while present with him, his final renown; and every citizen will learn that no station is splendid enough to dazzle the just public perception of the moral character and tendency of official action.

A VOICE FROM MISSISSIPPI.

If the late lamented John C. Calhoun could return and read the platform of the Republican party in Mississippi, especially the first four resolutions, he would either declare that his country had so degenerated, or, illuminated by celestial experience, he would join the party and proclaim its glad tidings more zealously than ever he preached "Southern rights" against the rights of human nature. In the report of the platform, the resolutions of which we speak go off, as it were, like a volley of triumph.

First. The Union first, last, and forever.

Second. Freedom of speech and of the press.

Third. Universal suffrage and universal amnesty.

Fourth. Free schools—their benefits to be extended to every child in the State.

The resolutions go on to declare for all the constitutional amendments; for the immediate removal of disabilities; and for the new State Constitution, with its equal distribution of proscription. How many of the noblest victims of the war, if they could have known that within less than ten years of their death a party with every prospect of success would proclaim such principles in Mississippi, and be cordially supported by the Administration, would not have felt, indeed, that they did not give their lives in vain! No great sacrifice ever produced more immediate and vaster results. In the four Mississippi resolutions lie the charm and spell are to redeem that State, and every other that went into rebellion—the policy which would have saved them all their sorrow had it been that of those States for the last generation.

These principles, and the measures that spring from them, and the spirit which accompanies them, are those of the Republican party of the United States every where. If the observer turn his admiring eye to the great Northwest, the marvel of progress and prosperity, he is not surprised to learn that those great States have been always faithful to these principles, and are steadily Republican. If he look at New England, which is not ashamed of her history, he finds that the Mississippi revolutions have no heartier echo than from Bunker Hill and the Green Mountains; and he is not surprised that to leave New England out in the cold was the angry wish of the haughty chiefs who were for the Union first, last, and forever; and not for freedom of speech and of the press; and not for universal suffrage; and not for free schools. Those chiefs ruled the country by the Democratic party. Let the same observer look at any State or section which is indisputably Democratic, and consider whether it is a greatly grateful to him with these as an American or as a man.

The great service of the Republican party in this country is that it has made a truly popular republic possible. Under Democratic supremacy, the fundamental principles of such a government were despised. Our system had become a vast propagandism of slavery. That has been overthrown, but its spirit and its traditions still linger in the party by which it was it worked. Nowhere does that party lead the van for the Union first, last, and forever, nor for freedom of speech and of the press; nor for universal suffrage, nor for free schools for all children. It clung to slavery while slavery lasted. It would have supported the Southern black laws if Congress had not made them impossible. It would still maintain all of slavery that it can, denying the suffrage to intelligent and industrious men, and every where promoting the conservative spirit of caste and race which will angrily agitate the country until it is laid.

By their works let the two great parties of this country be judged. And by them, because the general principles and policy of each are unchanged. Let any candid man answer, Which has been the party of liberty, of intelligence, of progress, of humanity? Which has been the party of retrogression, of ignorance, of slavery, and inhumanity? The tendencies, the imperative necessities of a political party are rather than the hopes and wishes of some of its members. By those tendencies, by its unjust and inhuman spirit, by its wanton enmity against liberty, let the Democratic party be judged.

FATHER HYACINTHE AND THE CARMELITE SUPERIOR.

THE correspondence between Father HYACINTHE and the Superior of his order at Rome has been published, and is of the utmost significance. The first letter of the Carmelite Superior was written in July, and deplores and laments and reproves Father HYACINTHE'S course, and repeats and amplifies its grief and remonstrance at great length. The offense of the Parisian orator was that he had gone beyond his work. Instead of following the rut of safe ecclesiastical tradition he thought for himself, and he freely expressed his thoughts. "I have carefully studied you," says the Superior, "not to identify yourself with questions in dispute among Catholics, and on which all were not agreed." That may be the Carmelite method of advancing the faith, but it is not one that would carry the truth very far. And this seems to have been the opinion of Father HYACINTHE. The Superior proceeds to a formal order that the Father shall not print any letters or speech; nor to speak outside of the churches; nor to be present at the Chambers; nor to take part in the Old Catholic Congress, or in any other meeting that "has not an exclusively Catholic and religious object."

To this end forbidding him to print letters Father HYACINTHE replied by printing the letter which is already famous. With indignant eloquence he protested against that breach, if Roman, not Christian. He declared that his tongue should never be tied, and he threw off the robe of his monkish order, and left his monastery. "I believe that have prayed Jesus Christendom be asserted religious liberty, and with a fervor that recalls the ancient days of religious protest he repudiated in advance the sentence that he expected would be given. He might at last have consented to be silent, but for the peculiarly demoralizing method of his declination. He started the nomination back to if he professed it as much as the Advertiser itself does. He might at least have consented to be nominated.

MR. CURTIS was in another State when the Convention met. The political situation in New York was not unlike that of 1860. Every one present it he saw in the New York papers that his nomination was probable; and before learning the action of the Convention every consideration that should have affected his decision, and which has since been urged, was fully considered by him. But as his acceptance was honorably impossible, and as there was but a month before the election, he felt it to be his duty, without awaiting the official notice of his nomination, and to prevent loss of time from remoteness and unsatisfactory communication, to make the necessary decision as soon and as widely as possible. In doing so he certainly did not use any words, but he chose such as he hoped would convey at least some impression of his profound sense of the honor which was offered him, not only by the fact but by the manner of the nomination. He said: "While I am sincerely grateful for this most honorable and unexpected proof of the confidence of my political friends, with whose declaration of principles I cordially agree, it is impossible for me to accept the nomination." He mistaken both those friends and the force of words if his letter is construed by them as hurling back their nomination in their teeth; and he has no doubt that, upon reflection, the Evening Journal will own that it has, certainly with no ill intent, misconceived his action.

MR. DICKENS must have been greatly amused, by the ingenuous misunderstanding of the Latin phrase in his speech at Birmingham that his faith in the people governing was infinitesimal and his faith in the governed was illimitable. There is surprising how many shrewd gentlemen, upon stumbling these words, shook their heads sagely, and remarked that they had long suspected that MR. DICKENS would sooner or later declare his hostility to the institutions that he had turned his back upon all his books. Another, with indignation, asserted that he had given himself the lie. The misinterpretation was remarkable as it was ludicrous. As it was generally received and angrily criticised the remark was nonsense. For what could a man who professed to mean what he said that he did not believe that the people could govern themselves, but that he had illimitable faith in their ability to be governed? And as to what he had begun by saying that he would tell his political creed. Consequently to say that his faith in the people was infinitesimal was to express the utmost political confidence in them. It was an astounding ingenuity of misconception to suppose that MR. DICKENS would slander his friend JOHN BRIGHT'S constituency and declare his want of faith in the people.

MR. FILLMORE lately made a speech upon taking the chair at the Commercial Convention, in Louisville, in which, alluding to the fact that during the Fugitive Slave Bill, he showed that his mind was not made up upon the subject. He said: "I freely confess it was against my feelings. I examined it carefully, but found no defect in it. It was constitutional in all, although I knew when I signed it I was signing my political death-warrant, I signed, and would have done it, had it been to-day." Mr. FILLMORE'S political feelings did not approve the bill, and he was politically ambitious; but he outraged his feelings and sacrificed his ambition for power by signing a bill that not every colored person in the country at the mercy of any slaveholder. The sacrifice of conscience and honor to ambition upon such a basis is not a very ennobling spectacle. MR. FILLMORE, perhaps, does not remember that to catch votes under the Fugitive Slave Law upon such a basis was to commit the life and liberty of innocent men, women, and children. MR. FILLMORE had chosen to resign his office, he would have spared his feelings, served his ambition and humanity together, and have made his name forever honored in history.

On the 4th of October the Cincinnati Inquirer, a Democratic paper, said:

"Our advices from all parts of the State amount to positive assurances that the election of Mr. PENDLETON by a majority larger than the average against us in the last two years. We are not disposed to overrate the mass our strength or overstate our prospects, but we see no certain way for our success but to defeat him. Tuesday week, that we feel it a duty to those who have helped us to put good work about to be commenced to tell them that their labor has not been in vain. The majority will exceed 5,000, and may be a great deal more."

The result of the election was the defeat of Mr. PENDLETON by a decisive majority. The New York World remarks of the election in New York in precisely the same vein:

"The editor of the Tribune knows that it is just as morally certain that the Democratic State ticket will be elected by a good working majority, and that the lower branch of the Legislature will be Democratic, as it is that the sun will rise to-day."

This is the way that the Democrats have counted their chickens for the last ten years.

THE Lycoons can this winter hear the latest adventures at the equator and the pole. Dr. DU CHAILLU, the African explorer, whose lectures to children are the most striking and delightful novelty of the lecture system, will speak in Boston on the 27th of October and the 3d of November; and Captain HALL, the newly-returned Arctic explorer, has made himself known at home with the Esquimaux, and who is accompanied by a family of that people, began his lectures in London on the 18th of October, under the auspices of the American Geographical Society. The address of Captain HALL is for the present at this office.

MR. AUGUSTUS MAVERICK, who has had a long and practical acquaintance with editorial life in New York, and who is very competent to treat the subject with interest and point, has in press a volume called "HENRY J. RAYMOND and the New York Press for Thirty Years." It can not fail to be a valuable and entertaining historical work.

A FRIENDLY enthusiast writes to the Sun of MT. GEORGE LAW that he has "loomed up among us and moved silently, as the great orb of day, for a number of years:" and that "in is a great reader, has an extraordinary memory, and, next to DR. SAMUEL H. COX, is probably the best historian in the country." The entusiast omits, however, to mention the titles of MR. LAW'S historical works.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

IN Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Iowa there were State elections on the 12th of October. The Governors of Pennsylvania and Ohio were re-elected by a slight majority. In Pennsylvania the Legislature has a Republican majority of 29 on a joint ballot. In Ohio the House is Democratic and the Senate Republican. The Republican majority in Iowa is very heavy.

IN Savannah, on the 19th of October, SCREVEN, the Democratic candidate for Mayor, was elected by 1,000 majority.

THERE was a mass-meeting of the working-men at Cooper Institute, in this city, on the evening of October 15. Among those who addressed the meeting was MR. PETER COOPER, the accredited representative of the working-men's unions of Birmingham, England, to the Workingmen's Industrial Union. The meeting adopted advocate the policy of independent political action on the part of the working-men.

A large number of the influential citizens of Philadelphia, irrespective of party and domestic ties, have addressed a memorial to their Representatives in Congress, requesting the support of the Civil Service Civil Service bill. "It may be safely affirmed," say these petitioners, "that no civilized community has a public service so costly and so incompetent as our own."

In an address delivered in Ohio previous to the late election GOVERNOR HAYES has remarked: "I believe that, under God, the Administration is performing its duties with an honesty of purpose, and a determination to do the right, to save every dollar that can be saved, and applied to the liquidation of the debt; and that is my idea of financiering. It is a kind of financiering that I know of none better, and General Grant's Administration has entered upon it with a determination, and every one to be sustained. I admit that I would have liked to vote for a tried statesman when I voted for him. I did not know formally he held the great principles of the Republican party; and I would have liked it much quicker than I did part with those principles to-day. I have never yet received any single talk from them, and I know it. I feared General Grant might not hold to the principles of the party and make up a Cabinet, but he has made no position which has called upon him to bring them out. I have not chosen a man, I do not know how and my own way, who had been tried by fire, and in whom we knew there was no dishonesty. That is the reason Grant has been tried. You see his dealings with the Cabinet and with the appointments in the line of the Government, and you find them all of the glorious stripe you could desire. I believe that, if I had known how, his heart is steeped in the great Republican doctrines. I am ready to ascertain this fact beyond a doubt."

GOVERNOR SENTER, of Tennessee, was inaugurated October 11. In his recent message to the Legislature he opposes repudiation, and urges and signs the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION on the 18th for the election of United States Senators.

IN New York and other large cities on the 11th of October there were enthusiastic meetings of the Central Republican Junta of Cuba and Porto Rico, and the Republican friends of the sister island to Cuban declaration of independence. The 10th of October, 1868, marks the commencement of the struggle in Cuba, and is looked upon by the Cuban patriots as their day of days. On this day the flag was hoisted on Cuba, and the celebration was deferred. SIGNOR M. LEMUS, the Cuban Minister to the United States, presided at the mass-meeting held in the evening at the Cooper Institute in this city. The Cuban flag was exhibited in the afternoon in the City Hall Park. One of the guns on that occasion had its muzzle burst open.

At the recent election of Directors of the Erie Railway Company, the entire ticket was again elected. The board was in the main re-elected; and by a classification of the Directors, the terms of office of two out of the Legislature, GOULD, Fish, and Tweed do not go out of office for two years.

The free-trade discussion on the evening of October 11 in Boston, between Messrs. WELLS and WILLIAMS and Rice Greeley, drew out quite a large audience, who listened with attention to the debate.

A Transcontinental Railroad Convention was held in the capital of Kansas on the 13th, there were sixty delegates present. The main object of this convention was to consider the speedy construction of an independent through line of railroad, by the most direct route practicable, from the Pacific to Chicago. By the route suggested at the convention from Portland to Chicago, through parts of Canada, and hence in connect with the great upper thoroughfare to Puget Sound—the only passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific would be shortened by over 2000 miles. With this advantage it is claimed that which is now dependent in its immense harbor, Portland hopes to throw New York and Boston into the shade as commercial centres.

THE official figures at the Agricultural Department estimate that the cotton crop of the Southern States will be one half larger than that of 1868. The total value of the exports of the South is set down at $200,000,000. In this rate the value of the cotton products is about $31 per head for the entire Southern population. The crop of Ohio, the largest in the South is even now the richest section of the country.

Charles William Eliot was inaugurated as President of Harvard University October 19.

THE Commercial Convention met in Louisville, Kentucky, October 13, and was presided over by ex-President FILLMORE. One of the principal topics discussed was that of immigration to the South. On the 14th the Convention was addressed by several speakers, one mile and three-quarters. Time, 3.35. The second race was won by "Gerbera," the Members' Cup—third race—by "Metairie" the Selling Stakes by "Harper." The fourth race, "won the Jerome Stakes; one mile, "Pinero," "La Polka," and "Corsican." On the 19th the fifth race "Mollie" "Rosedale," "Jerome," "Vesparine," "Abdel Kader," and "Defy."

The Commissioners of Public Parks in New York has recently proposed to that Board a plan for utilizing the water of the Harlem River for carrying and cleaning the streets.

FOREIGN NEWS

THE Emperor Napoleon has ordered that the travelling expenses of the French Bishop of Quebec, in going to and returning from the Ecumenical Council, shall be defrayed from the Imperial exchequer.

A clergyman of the Church of England—Mr. CHAS. Voysey, rector of Halsagh, Yorkshire—has been preaching sermons to which the Bishop of Manchester has to provoke the interference of the Archbishop.

The cost of the Paraguayan war to the allies is estimated to have been 400,888,000 and 139,940 men.

CASTELAR, the leader of the Spanish Republicans, has fled to Portugal. A number of the Provincial Journals in Spain have been suppressed. The Republicans in Spain have refused to attend the Chamber. Deputies are elected to the Cortes every three years and are secreted to the Chamber. The Cuban question was discussed in a recent debate in the Cortes General Prim is reported to have said that he could not allow a favorable result of the Cuban war to grant the colony all the reforms and liberties desired.

MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM M. BELKNAP.

THE new Secretary of War, Major-General WILLIAM M. BELKNAP, is a native of Hudson, New York. He was born in 1831; his father was Brigadier-General BELKNAP, a soldier in the War of 1812, and in the Mexican War. On the death of his father BELKNAP moved to Iowa. At the outbreak of the Civil War he entered the army as Major of the Fifteenth Iowa. For gallantry at Shiloh he was made Lieutenant-Colonel and Provost-Marshal of the Fifteenth Corps. He afterward rejoined his regiment as Colonel; after the fall of Vicksburg he was brevetted Brigadier-General, and led the Iowa Brigade in the Atlanta campaign. He marched to the sea with General SHERMAN, and, on the arrival of the Army at Savannah, was brevetted Major-General. He commanded a division of the Fifteenth Army Corps in the march through the Carolinas, fought his last fight at Bentonville, and at the end of the war was offered the rank of Brigadier-General in the Regular Army, which he declined. He delivered the address at the last reunion of the Army of the Tennessee. As to his competency for the exalted position to which he has been appointed, it is sufficient to say that President GRANT has carefully followed his past career, and has given him the preference to all others.

THE HUSS COMMEMORATION AT PRAGUE.

THE occasion of the commemoration at Prague of the fifth centenary of the great Reformer HUSS has been associated with the recent proceedings in Bohemia having reference to that assertion of nationality against Austrian absorption which so long characterized the proceedings of the patriotic Hungarians. The leaders of the movement, remembering the old fame of Bohemia, and wishing to see it restored, were determined not to let such an opportunity pass unimproved, and accordingly the festival assumed an almost solemn importance. The occasion was all that could be desired; the raising of a monument to HUSS was certain to evoke a large amount of enthusiasm; and the result verified the promoters' expectations, for within the walls of Prague were assembled all those who had the Zeck nationality at heart. At their head—as they are always the leaders on such occasions—were PALACKY, RIEGER, Count HARRACH, KLAUDY, ZEYTHAUNER, BRAUNER-SKREYSOWSKI, SLADKOWSKI, and some others less celebrated. All the Sclave peoples recognizing the sovereignty of the house of Austria sent deputations, all the trade corporations marched with banners and sang the National Hymn, and the same ceremony was being observed in every town in Bohemia. The commemoration was started in HUSSINETZ, a little village where JOHN HUSS first saw the light in the fourteenth century; and the house in which he was born is still standing—a plain, unpretending edifice enough, resembling the ordinary dwellings of the Bohemian peasantry. It would seem as though its preservation had been decreed that it might remain a national monument; and it was an exciting spectacle to see defiling before so simple a structure 20,000 men adorned with the national colors and shouting patriotic hymns with a high enthusiasm that gave extra pathos to the wild and stirring airs. The town of Prague—most picturesque of ancient European centres of population—presented an impressive spectacle; but the crowning moment, when RIEGER mounted a balcony, and addressed the assembled crowds, defies description. The people had taken possession of every point of vantage; and even the roofs of the houses were packed with eager assemblies waiting to listen to one of the most popular orators in the country. So great is his fame that even in Vienna silence reigns in every meeting where he deigns to speak; and his very opponents listen with profound attention to his eloquent harangues. It would be impossible to convey any adequate idea of his speech on this occasion; for it would need the action, tone, and gesture that accompanied it, even if it could be properly translated into another language. Suffice it to say that every eye and every ear of the assembled thousands seemed to hang upon him as he went on, and the answering enthusiasm was fully equal to the ceremony that had called it forth.

MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM M. BELKNAP, THE NEW SECRETARY OF WAR.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

LURKING LOVE.

WHEN lurking love in ambush lies
Under friendship's fair disguise,
When he wears an angry mien,
Imitating spite or spleen;
When, like Sorrow, he seduces;
When, like Pleasure, he amuses;
Still, however the parts are cast,
'Tis but "Lurking Love" at last.

THE WEBER CAÑON.

WE give on this page a view of the scenery of the Weber River cañon, near the Great Salt Lake, in Utah Territory. This wild gorge of the Wasatch range of mountains, through which the railway enters the Mormon settlement, was one of the most difficult parts of the line to construct. The Weber River, a large stream, with many rapids, cleaves its way through high bluffs that rise more than a thousand feet above its channel, and breaks out at the Devil's Gate into the plain of the Great Salt Lake. Several embankments, cuttings, tunnels, and bridges were needful within a short length of railroad. The tunnel, to which the opening is shown in our view, was excavated by the Mormons, being comprised in a contract known as "the hundred-mile job," taken by a party of those industrious saints, under the personal direction of BRIGHAM YOUNG himself. The train which appears on the line is traveling westward toward California. This point is about one thousand miles west of the Missouri River.

THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD—WEBER CANON AND RIVER.

STOPPED HALF-WAY!

THE tender of the Hector was lying alongside the wharf, waiting for the last contingent of passengers to go off to the ship. Few people, indeed, except those accustomed to such scenes, could feel otherwise than perfectly distracted amidst the hubbub that ensued.

The steam-whistle from the tender blowing, the bell ringing with that maddening sound preluding every departure of this kind, convincing all timid people that they are inevitably too late, deafening them, and driving them nearly wild in their frantic efforts to make their voices heard above the din and uproar; harsh tones raised to shrillness in command, and echoes of responses to orders carried out; such sounds and sights are not to be forgotten, especially when we know that deep and touching human feelings and emotions are making themselves heard and felt all around.

There were partings between mothers and sons, sisters and brothers, fathers and daughters, even husbands and wives; friends determining to go out to the ship, to get the last glimpse of their dear ones, some resolving to part at once. There were faces bathed in tears, others set and rigid, as they gazed their last, perhaps, into loving eyes, now filled with looks of sad and yearning tenderness.

Among these groups I was struck with one of three women, consisting of two young girls and an elderly lady; but whether the latter was the mother of the younger ones, or merely some old and confidential nurse or housekeeper, I could not quite make out. They were questioning and consulting about the place of parting: should it be here, or should they all go off to the vessel?

The elder female seemed to be in great sorrow, and the girls were dreading to leave her. The crowd around them where they stood was very thick; and as they were jostled about from place to place I could not help noticing the extreme beauty of the elder sister. She was charming to look upon—bewitching I may call her; for the feelings of the moment gave a marvelous mobility and amount of expression to a countenance in itself perfect in line and feature. Masses of soft chestnut-brown hair seemed to frame the delicate oval face, which was lighted up by a pair of dark blue eyes, shaded with long silky lashes. A small and rather provoking nose, an insinuating pouting little mouth, and dimpled chin, together with a beautifully formed head, gracefully poised on a [illegible] figure, made up indeed a most fascinating specimen of feminity.

During the time occupied in the depositing of the mails I ventured to address the three women, for their perplexity seemed increasing every moment. I saw at a glance how matters stood. The steam-tender was terribly crowded, and they were evidently timid about going on board. I also made out that the girls wished to have the parting with their old friend or nurse over at once; so, after consulting a moment with Simmons, who seemed rather proud of having me under his charge, and ready to do me honor, and fall into my wishes in every way, I offered to give them a seat in our boat. In a well-managed aside, I ventured to say to one of the ladies, "Pray let farewell be said here." I felt that I was perfectly justified in addressing them under such circumstances, when all conventionalities are cast away, and all differences of position and rank are utterly ignored. I was sure that it could be only right to smooth away the difficulties that seemed to add so much perplexity to the sorrow that was uppermost in the hearts of these three ladies, for ladies in one sense they unquestionably were, although perhaps wanting a certain something in tone and refinement.

"WE SAW THE THREE SAFELY DRAGGED OVER THE SIDE OF THE BOAT."

The removal of the gangway, and the departure of the steam-tug, amidst loud shouts and cheers, now absolutely compelled the young ladies to accept my offer. As nothing could be waited for after the mails were on board, it was necessary that the steam-tender should be alongside the ship, with its living cargo discharged, before the arrival of the mail-boat; thus I had still time to make some arrangements for the comfort of my fellow-passengers.

While purposely busying myself in this way the parting between my three friends took place. All passed quickly and quietly; but I own to having felt some very unusual choking sensations while glancing at the sorrowful faces of the girls as I handed them into our boat, which in another moment was cutting her way through the sparkling water toward the Hector. For a time I knew that sobs and tears must have their way with my two companions, and all my best and most chivalrous feelings were aroused as I noticed their weeping sad young faces looking so lovely in their sorrow.

I could only glean from them, in a few broken words, that they were going to Cape Town, where a married brother resided. They were orphans, they told me, and had just parted from a very dear old nurse, who had taken charge of them from childhood. I also found that their name was Smith. The name certainly was familiar to me; indeed, I am positive I had heard it before, but never had I seen such charming bearers of it.

As we neared the ship they began to recover themselves a little; and I almost wished that I, too, was going to the Antipodes.

"A voyage with such companions," thought I, "would be, in truth, a very pleonix of voyages!"

Arriving alongside the vessel, I did all in my power, in carrying shawls, hand-bags, etc., to assist my companions up the gangway.

Feeling that their position was really a very unprotected one, my first care, after having stowed away their little packages, found out their cabin for them, and done such small offices as time allowed, was to see the stewardess, and to interest her in my fair charges.

THE HUSS COMMEMORATION AT PRAGUE—CEREMONY BEFORE THE HOUSE OF THE REFORMER.

Great confusion reigned even here, but there was order in it—no doubles, no counter-orders now! Partings were all but over; and, for weal or for woe, each heart there had to face a new future. I speculated much upon the fate of the elder of our two friends, who smiled most sweetly upon me as I bade her and her sister my last adieu.

On leaving the saloon I ran with great force, in my haste, against a young man, who, by his costume, was evidently an outward-bound passenger. I beheld I must have hurt him, from his look of mute and half-angry surprise; but it soon passed away, and I was both amused and astonished by the manner in which he took my apologies.

"Don't apologize, pray," he said; "for my part, I should not have cared much if you had knocked the breath clean out of me; I don't find life a very enviable thing just now."

He was a fine stalwart-looking fellow, but with something rather eccentric in his appearance and manner, which was increased by a peculiarly lachrymose expression of countenance. He carried a small black leathern hand-bag, on which was painted in white letters, so conspicuous that I could not fail to read it, the name of "Cuthbert Dolworthy, Esq."

At such times, when people are saving goods by on the eve of a long voyage, social formalities are but little regarded; and those whose hours are few are apt to spend leave-taking, or whose feelings are much excited by conflicting emotions, seldom scruple to fall into conversation and even to indulge in confidences with complete strangers. Thus it was that, in a few minutes after our rencontre, and after I had expressed my regret that I was so unsatisfactory a thing to him, Mr. Dolworthy and I found ourselves talking as if we had been acquaintances of some standing. We had taken up on deck again together, and, continuing our dialogue, he went on to say:—

"I am going out to Melbourne; and perhaps your mirth will be somewhat excited if I tell you for what purpose. People say I'm a queer fellow, and I dare say I am; but, the truth is, I want to ask a girl out there to be my wife. I only left Melbourne six months ago; I had made as much money as I required, and came to England."

"Why, in the name of fortune," I inquired, "did not you make your inamorata certain, and sail in your own ship?"

"Ah! I don't know. I'm sure—want of pluck, perhaps. I was afraid she would refuse me, and though I'm a bold man at most things, in this I believed like an ass! But some women, you know, can make fools of strong men; I'm one, I think she could be one, and I hoped I might forget her by coming to England, but I can't, so I'm going back to-morrow, and here I am—a regular spring-point again."

"Why, said I, tickled at his oddity, "you have hardly been a day in this country."

"I would hardly be sure of that myself, if you there are two more charming girls than I have just seen on board them in their birth, and the elder sister, my dear Sir, would turn any man's head! Now do take the goods the gods provide, make the most of your opportunity, forget the young lady in Melbourne!"

"I forget a woman who has been in my thoughts constantly for months past! Why, I am not that sort of man, I can tell you! I love this woman now, and shall love her always, whether she love me for me or not."

He was going on, with many vociferations of constancy, when our dialogue was summarily interrupted by some bell-ringing, and shouts of "Now for the shore! now for the shore!" Then ensued a fresh hubbub and excitement, with much jostling and hustling, and I had but one moment to shake hands heartily with my new friend, and wish him "God-speed," before regaining the quay-way.

Summons's task ended, we re-entered our boat just as the Hector's hawsers were thrown off, and belly to a favorable wind. I naturally fell to thinking about life on shipboard, and my acquaintances of the hours. People living in town in the bustle of large communities, are not readily prone to commit themselves in matters matrimonial; their thought is that many divers damsels must be during a long sea passage all distinctions are levelled. E ery one falls into the same social position, no distinctions are made, and for propinquity's sake no opportunity is offered for comparing social degrees. I was but neutral, and could not help thinking of what my fate of the elder or the younger of passions. If I had been going out in the Hector I should then and there have fallen head over ears in love with her. All the perplexities, embarrassments, difficulties, and obstacles incidental to marrying upon nothing would have vanished into thin air; and but had I come across her in what is called society, it would have been a different matter. I could not have left home with my means in expansion and wealthy friends as a married man; for what would hitherto sufficed for one would have to do for two, and perhaps time for half a dozen. As it was, I knew that these selfish considerations never would have found place amidst the boredom and ennui of a long sea voyage.

"Ah!" I thought to myself, "I would not give much for the chances of that young lady in Melbourne who has been so long locked in secret by my 'knight of the woeful countenance' and wonderful name! He must be of adamant, that Cuthbert Dolworthy, if he passes the next two or three months unscathed in the society of such a 'Helen' as I have left him with on board the Hector."

My musings were brought to a close by our reaching shore. I really had quite enjoyed my little passage; for while having been pleasantly amused, I had also added to my store of philosophy. I often wondered how my sometime fellow-passengers fared on their journey; nor was it surprising that I kept a sharp look-out for some news of the Hector. And lo! one fine morning, a few months after, I had news indeed!

With the keenest interest I read the subjoined story in a Portsmouth paper, which my friend Dick Crosbie sent me:—

"GALLANTRY AND ROMANCE AT SEA.

"From a private letter we are enabled to give the following account of a romantic and tragic incident which occurred on board the clipper ship Hector on her voyage between England and the Cape:

* * * *

"There was a fair complement of passengers, and we had been at sea a sufficient time for them to settle into the little coteries and cliques which form a distinguishing feature of society during long voyages. The learned in the matter had come together, and the very poor and serious people had fallen into their places, likewise the fast and noisy, who, in this instance, were the most numerous. Two brainless young men were conspicuous among the latter for a tremendous flirtation, which they were carrying on with a couple of young ladies named Smith, bound for the Cape, and who were making the voyage, for some unaccountable reason, quite alone. These girls did not appear to have been accustomed to such attentions as they were then receiving, and the novelty of the life, the bracing air, the fine weather we were enjoying, and the general pleasant excitement which prevailed, seemed to have drawn them, perhaps imperceptibly to themselves, into a course of conduct and behavior which something about their deportment was not in the nature of their dispositions.

"Be this as it may, not an opportunity was lost for the two young men to carry on with the two pliant girls, on all possible occasions. Madcap pranks, and an evident desire to chaff and make game of every body else in their set, formed leading characteristics of their conduct. One of the chief butts of their merriment was a tall, good-looking, handsome young fellow, named, from his melancholy mood, downcast looks, deep-drawn sighs, and banished lord sort of aspect, formed of late by her their pet name of Hamlet.

"This behavior frequently bordered on downright rudeness, and little effort was made to subdue their voices when indulging in their merriments.

"Many such expressions as 'poor old moodymug!' 'I don't believe that's his in love, you know!' 'have you left your dear old sober-sides,' must frequently have been overheard by him, however he was disposed to express, or unwilling to hear any one of what was going on. It appeared to make not the slightest difference to any one, for aught one could tell by the expression of his face, he might have been deaf, dumb, and blind for any notice he took of the considerable conduct seemed to produce. The more questionable from the fact that, at the outset of the voyage, Mr. Dolworthy, for such his initials were received gratefully enough; but, after that, the advances made by Messrs. Binks and Bagman, the two fast young men above referred to, seemed to possess greater attractions for the Misses Smith, and gradually poor Dolworthy was snubbed and put aside.

"Modest and retiring, he accepted the conditions apposite as a matter of course, and, as one could not help feeling that it was the old story of brilliant, dashing superficiality, with plenty of brass and self-confidence, overcoming the claims of thoughtless women, sterling worth and true chivalry.

"However, Dolworthy accepted his position in the stoical manner I have described; and the only distinction in which he ever indulged was in occasionally joining the watch on deck, when steering, or re-setting the sails, and other employments incidental to nautical life, showing therein considerable knowledge, and a keen zest for vigorous exercise.

